I Humbly and heartily pray the everlaſting God and Father of mercy to bleſs and keep your heart and mind in the knowledge and love of his truth, and of his Chriſt, through the inſpiration and working of his Holy Spirit, Amen.

Although I have no doubt, but that you proſper and go forward daily in the way of godlineſs, more and more drawing towards perfection, and have no need of any thing that I can write; yet becauſe my deſire is, that you might be more fervent and perſevere to the end, I could not but write ſomething unto you, beſeeching you both often and diligently to call unto your mind, as a means to ſtir you hereunto, yea, as a thing which God moſt ſtraitly requireth you to believe, that you are beloved of God, and that he is your dear Father, in, through, and for Chriſt and his death's ſake. This love and tender kindneſs of God towards us in Chriſt is abundantly herein declared, in that he hath to the godly work of creation of this world made us after his image, redeemed us being loſt, called us into his church, ſealed us with his mark and ſign manual of baptiſm, kept and preſerved us all the days of our life, fed, nouriſhed, and moſt fatherly chaſtiſed us, and now hath kindled in our hearts the ſparkles of his fear, faith, love, and knowledge of his Chriſt and truth, and therefore we lament, becauſe we lament no more our unthankfulneſs, our frailneſs, our diffidence and wavering in things wherein we ſhould be moſt certain.

All theſe things we ſhould uſe as means to confirm our faith of this, that God is our God and Father, and to aſſure us, that he loveth us as our Father in Chriſt; to this end (I ſay) we ſhould uſe the things before touched, eſpecially in that, of all things, God requireth this faith and fatherly perſuaſion of his fatherly goodneſs, as his chief ſervice. For before he aſketh any thing of us, he ſaith, I am the Lord thy God, giving himſelf, and all that he hath to us, to be our own. And this he doth in reſpect of himſelf, of his own mercy and truth, and not in reſpect reſpect of us, for then were grace no grace. In conſideration whereof, when he ſaith, Thou ſhalt have none other gods but me, Thou ſhalt love me with all thy heart, &c. though of duty we ought to accompliſh all that he requireth, and are culpable and guilty if we do it not, yet he requireth not theſe things further of us than to make us more in love, and more certain of this his covenant, that he is our Lord and God. In certainty whereof, as he hath given us this whole world to anſwer our neceſſities and conveniences, ſo hath he given us his Son Chriſt Jeſus, and in, Chriſt, himſelf to be a pledge, whereof the Holy Ghoſt doth now and then give us ſome comfortable taſte and ſweet ſmell to our eternal joy.

Therefore (as I ſaid) becauſe God is our Father in Chriſt, and requireth of you ſtedfaſtly to believe it, give yourſelf to obedience, although ye do it not with ſuch feeling and readineſs as you deſire. Faith muſt firſt go before, and then, by the operation of love, zealous affections will follow. If our imperfection, frailty, and many evils ſhould be the occaſions whereby Satan would have us to doubt; let us abhor that ſuggeſtion as much as poſſible, as of all others the moſt pernicious; and indeed ſo it is. For when we ſtand in doubt whether God be our Father, we cannot be thankful to him, we cannot heartily pray, or think any thing we do acceptable to him; we cannot even love our neighbours as we ought to do; and therefore Satan is very ſubtil, for he well knoweth that if we doubt of God's eternal mercy towards us through Chriſt, we can neither pleaſe God, nor rightly do our duty to man. He continually caſteth into our thoughts our imperfection, frailty, falls and unwary miſcarriages, to make us deſpair of God's mercy and favour.

Therefore, my good ſiſter, we muſt not be ſluggiſh herein; but as Satan laboureth to weaken our faith, ſo muſt we endeavour to ſtrengthen it by meditating upon the promiſes and covenant of God in Chriſt's blood; namely, that God is our God, with all that ever he hath: which covenant entirely dependeth on God's own goodneſs, mercy, and truth, and not on our obedience or worthineſs in any point; for then we ſhould never be certain. Indeed God requireth of us obedience and worthineſs, but not that thereby we may be his children, and he our Father: but becauſe he is our Father, and we his children through his goodneſs in Chriſt, therefore he requireth faith and obedience. Now if we want this obedience and worthineſs which he requireth, ſhould we doubt whether he be our Father? Nay, that were to make our obedience and worthineſs the cauſe, and ſo to put Chriſt out of place, for whoſe ſake God is our Father: but rather becauſe he is our Father, we ought to be moved with ſhame and remorſe for not being as we ought to be: and thereupon we ſhould take occaſion to go to our Father in prayer on this manner: "Dear Father, thou of thine own mercy in Jeſus Chriſt haſt choſen me to be thy child, and therefore thou wouldeſt that I ſhould be brought into thy church, and faithful company of thy children, wherein thou haſt hitherto kept me, thy name therefore be praiſed. Now I ſee myſelf to want faith, hope, love, &c. which thy children have, and thou requireſt of me, for the want of which the devil would have me to doubt, yea, utterly to deſpair of thy fatherly goodneſs, favour and mercy. Therefore I come to thee as to my merciful Father, through thy dear Son Jeſus Chriſt, and pray thee to help me, good Lord: Help me, and give me faith, hope, love, &c. and grant that thy Holy Spirit may be with me for ever, and more and more to aſſure me that thou art my Father; that this merciful covenant that thou madeſt with me in reſpect of thy grace in Chriſt and for Chriſt, and not in reſpect of any of my worthineſs, is always to me, &c."

On this manner you ought to pray when Satan perſuadeth you to doubt of ſalvation. He doth all he can to prevail againſt you. Do you all you can to withſtand him. Though you are not ſo feelingly affected as you deſire to be, yet doubt not, but hope beyond all hope, as Abraham did. For, as I ſaid before, faith always goeth before love. As certain as God is almighty, as certain as God is merciful, as certain as God is true, as certain as Jeſus Chriſt was crucified, is riſen, and ſitteth on the right hand of the Father, as certain as this is God's commandment: I am the Lord thy God, &c. ſo certain ought you to believe that God is your Father. As you are bound to have no other gods but him, ſo are ye no leſs bound to believe that God is your God. What profit would it be to you to believe this ſentence, "I am the Lord thy God," to be true to others, if you will not believe it to be true to yourſelf? The devil believeth in this manner. And whatſoever it be that would move you to doubt whether God be your God through Chriſt, the ſame undoubtedly cometh of the devil. Wherefore did God make you, but becauſe he loved you? Might he not have made you blind, deaf, lame, lunatic, &c. Might not he have made you a Jew, a Turk, a Papiſt, &c? And why hath he not done ſo? Verily becauſe he loved you. And why did he love you? what was there in you to move him to love you? Surely nothing moved him to love you, neither to create you, nor hitherto to preſerve you, but his own goodneſs in Chriſt. Now then in that his goodneſs in Chriſt ſtill remaineth as much as it was, that is, even as great as himſelf, for it cannot be leſſened; how ſhould it be but that he is your God and Father? believe this, believe this, my good ſiſter, for God is unchangeable: them whom he loveth, he loveth to the end.

Therefore caſt yourſelf wholly upon him, and think without all wavering that you are God's child, that you are a citizen of heaven, that you are a child of God, and the temple of the Holy Ghoſt. If you be aſſured hereof as you ought to be, then ſhall your conſcience be quieted, then ſhall you lament more and more for the want of many things which God loveth; then ſhall you labour to be holy in ſoul and body; then ſhall you deſire and endeavour to make God's glory ſhine in all your words and works: then you ſhall not be afraid what man can do unto you; then you ſhall have wiſdom to anſwer your adverſaries, as ſhall ſerve to their ſhame and your comfort; then ſhall you be certain that no man can touch one hair of your head, further than it ſhall pleaſe your good Father, to your everlaſting joy; then ſhall you be moſt certain that God as your good Father will be more careful for your children, and make better proviſion for them, if all you have were gone, than you can with the peaceable enjoyment of it. Being aſſured, I ſay, of God's favour towards you, give yourſelf over to help and care for others that be in need, then ſhall you contemn this life, and deſire to be at home with your good and ſweet Father; then ſhall you labour to mortify all things that would ſpot either ſoul or body. All theſe things ſpring out of this certain perſuaſion and faith, that God is our Father, and we are his children by Chriſt Jeſus. All things ſhould help our faith herein, but Satan goeth about to hinder us.

Therefore let us uſe earneſt and hearty prayer; let us often remember this covenant, "I am the Lord thy God." Let us look upon Chriſt and his precious blood ſhed for the confirmation of his covenant; let us remember all the free promiſes of the goſpel; let us ſet before us God's benefits generally in making this world, and in governing it, in calling and keeping his church, &c. let us ſet before usGod's benefits particularly, how he hath made his creatures after his image, our bodies in perfect form and beauty, and endow'd our ſouls with underſtanding, memory, and will; how he hath made us chriſtians, and hath given us theſe faculties to enable us to make a right judgment of his religion; how he hath bleſſed, kept, nouriſhed, and defended us ever ſince we were born; how he hath often chaſtiſed, and fatherly corrected us; how he hath ſpared us, and now doth ſpare us, giving us time, place, and grace. If you do this, and uſe earneſt prayer, and flee from all things which may wound your conſcience, giving yourſelf to diligence in your vocation, you ſhall at length find (which God grant to us both) a ſure certainty of ſalvation, without all ſuch doubt as may trouble the peace of conſcience, to your eternal joy and comfort, Amen, Amen.

Yours in Chriſt,

J. Bradford.

Another Letter to the ſame Perſon.

THE good Spirit of God, which guideth his children, be with you, my good ſiſter in the Lord, for ever, Amen.

Although as I to you, ſo you unto me in priſon are unknown, yet to him whom we deſire to pleaſe, we are not only in perſons but alſo in hearts known and throughly ſeen: and therefore as for his ſake you would by what you ſent to me be perceived how that in God you bear to me a good will; ſo that I might be ſeen to bear you the like good will, I ſend to you theſe few words in writing, wiſhing that in all your doings and ſpeech, yea, even in your very thoughts, you would labour to feel that they are all preſent and open before the ſight of God, be they good or bad. This cogitation often had in mind, and prayer made to God for the working of his Spirit thereby as a means, you ſhall at length feel more comfort and advantage, than any man can know but ſuch as are exerciſed therein. Howbeit this is to be added, that in thinking yourſelf, and all that you have and do to be in the ſight of God; this, I ſay, is to be added, that you think his ſight is the ſight not only of a Lord but rather of a father, which tendereth more your infirmities, than you can tender the infirmities of any of your children. Yea, when you feel in yourſelf a motherly affection to your little one that is weak, let the ſame bring to your remembrance the unſpeakable kind affection of God your Father towards you.

And therefore upon the conſideration of your infirmities and natural evils, which continually cleave unto us, take occaſion to go to God as your Father through Chriſt: and before his merciful heart lay open your infirmities and evils, with deſire of pardon and help after his good will and pleaſure, but in his time, and by what means he will, and not when you will; in the mean time depend on his fatherly goodneſs, and you ſhall never be aſhamed. For if a woman that is natural cannot finally forget the child of her womb, be ſure God which is a Father ſupernatural cannot nor will not forget you. Yea if a woman could be ſo forgetful, yet God himſelf ſaith, he will not be ſo.

This opinion, yea rather certain perſuaſion of God our Father through Chriſt, ſee that you cheriſh, and by all means, as well by diligent conſideration of his benefits, as of his loving corrections, whether they be inward or outward, ſee that you nouriſh, knowing for certain, that as the devil goeth about nothing ſo much as to bring you in a doubt whether ye be God's child or no: ſo whatſoever ſhall move you to admit that dubitation, be aſſured the ſame to come from the devil; if you feel in yourſelf not only the want of good things, but alſo plenty of evil, do not therefore doubt whether you be God's child in Chriſt or no.

For if for your goodneſs or illneſs ſake, which you feel or feel not, ye ſhould believe or doubt, then ſhould you make Chriſt Jeſus, for whoſe ſake only God is your Father, either nothing, or elſe but half Chriſt.

But rather take occaſion of your wants in good, and of your plenty in evil, to go to God as to your Father, and to pray to him, that inaſmuch as he commandeth you to believe that he is your God and Father; ſo he would give you his good Spirit, that you might feel the ſame, and live as his child, to his glory: and ceaſe not upon ſuch prayers to look for comfort in God's good time, ſtill hoping the beſt, and rejecting all dubitation, and ſo all evil works, words, and cogitations, as the Lord ſhall enable you by his good Spirit and grace, which I beſeech him to give unto you, my good ſiſter, for ever. And further I pray you, that as he hath made you to be an helper unto your huſband, ſo you would endeavour yourſelf therein to ſhew the ſame as well in ſoul as body; and beg grace of God, that your endeavour may be effectual to both your comforts in Chriſt, Amen.

John Bradford.

To my well-beloved in the Lord, W. P.

GRACE and peace from God the Father through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

Dear brother, God moſt juſtly hath caſt me down into a dungeon, but much better than I deſerve; wherein I ſee no man but my keeper, nor can ſee any except they come to me. Something in the earth my lodging is, which is an example and memorial of my earthly affections (which God I hope will mortify) and of my ſepulchre, whereunto I truſt my Lord God will bring me in peace in his good time. In the mean ſeaſon may he give me patience, lively hope, and his good Spirit. I pray you pray for me; for the prayer of the righteous, if it be fervent, prevaileth much with God. I thank God my common diſeaſe doth leſs trouble me than when I was abroad, which doth teach me the merciful providence of God towards me. Uſe true and hearty prayer, and you ſhall perceive God at length will declare himſelf to ſee, where now many think he ſleepeth. Out of the Tower,

John Bradford.

Mr. Bradford's Letter to a faithful Woman inwardly afflicted.

GOD our good Father for his mercy's ſake in Chriſt, with his eternal conſolation ſo comfort you, as I deſire to be comforted of him in my greateſt need: yea, he will comfort you, my good ſiſter, only caſt your care upon him, and he never can nor will forſake you. For his calling and gifts are ſuch that he can never repent of them. Whom he loveth, he loveth to the end; none of his choſen can periſh. Of which number I know you are, my dearly beloved ſiſter: God increaſe the faith thereof daily more and more in you, may he give unto you to depend wholly on him, and on his providence and protection. For whoſo dwelleth under that ſecret thing, and help of the Lord, he ſhall be happy for evermore. He that dwelleth, I ſay, under God's providence and protection, ſhall be ſafe; but if we fly from it as Lot fled from Zoar, where God promiſed him protection, if he had dwelled there ſtill, we ſhall remove to our loſs, as he did into the mountains. Dwell therefore, that is, truſt, and that finally unto the end, in the Lord (my dear ſiſter), and you ſhall be as mount Sion. As mountains compaſs Jeruſalem, ſo doth the Lord all his people. How then can he forget you, which are as the apple of his eye, for his dear Son's ſake? Ah dear heart, that I were now but one half hour with you, to be a Simon to help carry your croſs with you. God ſend you ſome good Simon to be with you, and help you!

You complain in your letters of the blindneſs of your mind, and the troubles you feel. My dearly beloved, God make you thankful for that which he hath given unto you; may he open your eyes to ſee what and how great benefits you have received, that you may be leſs covetous, or rather impatient, for ſo (I fear) it ſhould be called, and more thankful. Have you not received at his hands ſight to ſee your blindneſs, and thereto a deſirous and ſeeking heart to ſee where he lieth in the midday, as his dear ſpouſe ſpeaketh of herſelf in the Canticles? O Joyce, my good Joyce, what a gift is this?

Many have ſome ſight, but none this ſobbing and ſighing, none this ſeeking which you have, I know, but ſuch as he hath married unto him in his mercies. You are not content to kiſs his feet with Mary Magdalen, but you would be kiſſed even with the kiſs of his mouth, Canticles 1. You would ſee his face with Moſes, forgetting how he biddeth us to ſeek his face, Pſalm 27. yea, and that for ever, Pſalm 105. Which ſignifies no ſuch ſight as you deſire to be in this preſent life, which would ſee God now face to face, whereas he cannot be ſeen, but covered under ſomething, yea ſometime in that which is (as you would ſay) clean contrary to God; as to ſee his mercy in his anger. In bringing us to hell, faith ſeeth him to bring us to heaven; in darkneſs, it beholdeth brightneſs; in hiding his face from us, it beholdeth his merry countenance. How did Job ſee God, but (as you would ſay) under Satan's cloak? For who caſt the fire from heaven upon his goods? Who overthrew his houſe, and ſtirred up men to take away his cattle, but Satan? And yet Job pierced through all theſe, and ſaw God's work, ſaying, "The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away, &c."

In reading of the Pſalms, how often do you ſee that David in the ſhadow of death ſaw God's ſweet love? And ſo, my dearly beloved, I ſee that you in your darkneſs and dimneſs by faith do ſee clearneſs and brightneſs: by faith, I ſay, becauſe faith is of things abſent, of things hoped for, of things which I appeal to your conſcience whether you deſire not. And can you deſire any thing which you know not? And is there any other true knowledge of heavenly things than by faith?

Therefore be thankful, for (before God I write it) you have great cauſe. Ah, my Joyce, how happy is the ſtay wherein you are? Verily you are in the bleſſed ſtate of God's children; for they mourn, and do not you ſo? And that not for worldly wealth, but for ſpiritual riches, faith, hope, charity, &c. Do you not hunger and thirſt for righteouſneſs? And I pray you, ſaith not Chriſt, who cannot lye, that happy are ſuch? How ſhould God wipe away the tears from your eyes in heaven, if now on earth ye ſhed no tears? How could heaven be a place of reſt, if on earth ye find it? How could ye deſire to be at home, if in your journey you find no grief? How could ye ſo often call upon God, and talk with him, as I know you do, if your enemy ſhould ſleep all day long? How ſhould you elſewhere be made like unto Chriſt, I mean in joy, if in ſorrow you ſobbed not with him? If you will have joy and felicity, you muſt firſt needs feel ſorrow and miſery. If you will go to heaven, you muſt ſail by hell; if you will embrace Chriſt in his robes, you muſt not ſcorn him in his rags. If you will ſit at Chriſt's table in his kingdom, you muſt firſt abide with him in his temptations. If you will drink of his cup of glory, forſake not his cup of ignominy.

Can the head corner-ſtone be rejected, and the other more baſe ſtones in God's building be in this world ſet by? You are one of his lively ſtones, be content therefore to be hewn and perſecuted, that you might be made more meet to be joined to your fellows who ſuffer with you Satan's ſnatches, the world's wounds, contempt of conſcience, and threats of the fleſh, whereby they are enforced to cry, O wretches that we are, who ſhall deliver us? You are of God's corn, fear not therefore the flail, the fan, millſtone or oven. You are one of Chriſt's lambs, look therefore to be fleeced, haled at, and even ſlain.

If you were a market-ſheep, you ſhould go in more fat and graſſy paſture. If you were for the fair, you ſhould be ſtall-fed, and want no wealth: but becauſe you are of God's own occupying, therefore you muſt paſture on the bare common, abiding the ſtorms and tempeſts that will fall. Happy, and thrice happy are you (my dear ſiſter) that God now haleth you whither you would not, that you might come whither you would. Suffer a little and be ſtill. Let Satan rage againſt you, let the world cry out, let your conſcience accuſe, let the law load you and preſs you down, yet they ſhall not prevail, for Chriſt is Emmanuel, that is, God with us. If God be with us, who can be againſt us? The Lord is with you, your Father cannot forget you; your ſpouſe loveth you. If the waves and ſurges ariſe, cry with Peter, Lord, I periſh; and he will put out his hand and help you. Caſt out your anchor of hope, and it will not ceaſe for the ſtormy ſurges, till it take hold of the rock of God's truth and mercy.

Think not that he who hath given you ſo many things corporally; as inductions of ſpiritual and heavenly mercies, and that without your deſerts or deſire, can deny you any ſpiritual comfort, when you deſire it. For if he giveth you a deſire, he will give you the enjoyment of what you deſire. The deſire to have, and the going about to aſk, ought to certify your conſcience, that they be his earneſt of the thing which (you aſking) he will give you; yea, before you aſk, and whilſt you are about to aſk, he will grant the ſame (as Iſaiah ſaith) to his glory, and your eternal conſolation. He that ſpared not his own Son for you, will not, nor cannot think any thing too good for you, my heartily beloved.

If he had not choſen you (as moſt certainly he hath) he would not have ſo called you, he never would have juſtified you; he never would have ſo glorified you with his gracious gifts, which, praiſed be his name, I know; he would never have ſo exerciſed your faith with temptations, as he hath done and doth, if he had not choſen you. If he hath choſen you, ye ſhall never periſh; for if you fall, he will lift you up. Never was a mother ſo careful of a child as he is of you.

Chriſt and his mercy is the only cauſe of our election. This Chriſt, this mercy, and the infallible truth of God remaineth for ever; and if an angel from heaven ſhould tell you the contrary, let him be accurſed. Your thankfulneſs and worthineſs are fruits and effects of your election, but they are no cauſes. Theſe fruits and effects ſhall be ſo much more fruitful and effectual, as you are more ſtedfaſt and ſincere.

Ariſe, and remember from whence you are fallen. You have a Shepherd who never ſlumbereth nor ſleepeth: neither man or devil can pull you out of his hands. Night and day he commandeth his angels to keep you. Have you forgot what I read to you out of the Pſalm, "The Lord is my ſhepherd, I can want nothing?" As God ſpared Noah in the ark, even ſo hath he ſpared you. Ten thouſand ſhall fall on your right hand, and twenty thouſand on your left, yet no evil ſhall touch you. Say boldly with the Pſalmiſt, "Many a time from my youth up have they fought againſt me, but they have not prevailed;" no, nor never ſhall prevail, for the Lord is round about his people; and who are his people but ſuch as love him, ſerve him, and hope in him? Happy are all they that ſo do, as it is manifeſt you do by what you have written and unfeignedly confeſſed unto me. And if you once had that hope, as doubtleſs ye had, though you feel it not at preſent, it is not loſt, you ſhall find it again if you ſeek it: for the anger of the Lord laſteth but for a moment, but his mercy endureth for ever. Tell me who hath weakened you? Surely not a perſuaſion which came from him that calleth you.

Why ſhould you waver, and be ſo heavy-hearted? Whom look you on? On yourſelf? on your worthineſs? on your thankfulneſs? on that which God requireth of you, as faith, hope, love, fear, joy, &c.? then can you not but waver indeed: for what have you as God requireth? do you believe, hope and love as much as you ought? No, no, nor never can in this life. Ah, my dearly beloved, have you ſo ſoon forgotten that which ever ſhould be had in memory? namely, that when you would and ought to be certain and quiet in conſcience, your faith ſhould break through all things that are in earth, heaven, or hell, until you come to Chriſt crucified, and the eternal ſweet mercies and goodneſs of God in him. Here is the reſting-place, here is your ſpouſe's bed; creep into it, and in your arms of faith embrace him, bewail your weakneſs, unworthineſs, diffidence, &c. and you ſhall ſee he will turn to you: nay, I ſhould rather have ſaid, you ſhall feel he will turn to you. You know that when Moſes went to the mount to talk with God, he entered into a dark cloud; and Elias had his face covered when God paſſed by. Both theſe dear friends of God heard of him, but they ſaw him not, but ye ſhall ſee him when he appeareth in power and great glory. Here is not the time of ſeeing, but as it were in a glaſs. Iſaac was deceived, becauſe he was not content with hearing only.

Therefore to make an end of theſe many words, wherewith I fear I do but trouble you from better exerciſes; inaſmuch as you are indeed the child of God elect in Chriſt before the beginning of all times, inaſmuch as you are given to the cuſtody of Chriſt, as one of God's moſt precious jewels; inaſmuch as Chriſt is faithful, and hitherto hath all power, ſo that you ſhall never periſh, no, one hair of your head ſhall not be loſt. I beſeech you, I pray you, I deſire you, I crave at your hands with all my heart, I aſk of you with hand, pen, tongue and mind, in Chriſt, through Chriſt, for Chriſt, for his name, blood, mercies, power, and truth's ſake, my moſt entirely beloved ſiſter, that you admit no doubting of God's final mercies towards you, howſoever you feel yourſelf; but to complain to God, and crave of him, as of your tender and dear Father, all things, and in that time which ſhall be moſt convenient, you ſhall find and feel far above that your heart or the heart of any creature can conceive, to your eternal joy. Amen, Amen, Amen.

The good Spirit of God always keep us as his dear children: may he comfort you, as I deſire to be comforted, my dearly beloved, for evermore, Amen.

I break up this abruptly, becauſe our common prayer time calleth me. The peace of Chriſt dwell in both our hearts for ever, Amen.

As for the report of W. Po. if it be as you hear, you muſt prepare to bear it. It is written on heaven's door, Do well, and bear evil. Be content therefore to bear whatſoever the enemy ſhall imagine to blot you withal. God's Holy Spirit always comfort and keep you, Amen, Amen.

John Bradford.

Here followeth another letter of Mr. Bradford's to the good lady Vane, wherein he reſolveth certain queſtions which ſhe demanded. This lady Vane was a great ſupporter of the pious martyrs who were impriſoned in queen Mary's time. Unto whom divers letters were wrote by Mr. Philpot, Careleſs, Trahern, Thomas Roſe, and others, wherein they render unto her moſt grateful thanks for her exceeding goodneſs extended towards them, with their ſingular commendation and teſtimony alſo of her chriſtian zeal towards God's afflicted priſoners, and to the truth of his goſpel. She died Anno 1568.

To my good Lady Vane.

THE true ſenſe and ſweet feeling of God's eternal mercies in Chriſt Jeſus be ever more and more lively wrought in your heart by the Holy Ghoſt, Amen.

I moſt heartily thank you, good madam, for your comfortable letter; and whereas you would be adverti ſed what were beſt to be done on your behalf concerning your three queſtions; the truth is, that the queſtions are never well ſeen, nor anſwered, until the thing whereof they ariſe be well conſidered; I mean until it be ſeen how great an evil the thing is. If it be once indeed perceived in your heart, upon probable and pithy places gathered out of the word of God, that there never was any thing upon the earth ſo great and ſo much an adverſary to God's true ſervice, to Chriſt's death, paſſion, prieſthood, ſacrifice and kingdom, to the miniſtry of God's word and ſacraments, to repentance, faith, and all true godlineſs of life, as that is whereof the queſtions ariſe (as moſt aſſuredly it is indeed), then cannot a chriſtian heart but ſo much the more abhor it, and all things that in any point might ſeem to allow it, or any thing pertaining to the ſame, by how much it hath the name of God's ſervice.

Again, your ladyſhip doth know, that as all is to be diſcommended and avoided, which is followed or fled from in reſpect of ourſelves, in reſpect of avoiding Chriſt's croſs: ſo the end of all our doings ſhould be to God-wards, to his glory, to our neighbours, to edification and good example, whereof none can be given in allowing any of the three queſtions by you propounded. But becauſe this which I write now is brief, and needeth the more conſideration or explication; as I doubt not of the one in you, ſo from me by God's grace you ſhall ſhortly receive the other: for I have already written a little book of it, which I will ſend unto you, in which you ſhall have your queſtions fully anſwered and ſatisfied, therefore I now omit writing any more about it: beſeeching God our good Father, to guide you as his dear child with his Spirit of wiſdom, power and comfort, unto eternal life, that you may be ſtrong, and rejoice in him, and with his church, to carry the croſs of Chriſt, if it be his will, 1 Pet. 1. which is a thing to be deſired and embraced, if we look on things after the judgment of God's word, and try them by that touch-ſtone.

If you be accuſtomed to think on the brevity, vanity, and miſery of this life, and on the eternity, truth, and felicity of life everlaſting: if you look on the end of things, and not on their preſent appearance only; if you accuſtom yourſelf to ſet God's preſence, power, and mercy always before your eyes, to ſee them, as God by every creature would we ſhould; I doubt not but you ſhall find ſuch ſtrength and comfort in the Lord, as ſhall not be ſhaken with all the power of Satan. God's mercy in Chriſt be with you, and his good Spirit guide you for ever, Amen.

Another Letter to the Lady Vane.

AS to mine own ſoul, I wiſh to your ladyſhip grace and mercy from God our dear Father in Chriſt our Lord and Saviour.

I thank God that he hath ſomething eaſed you, and mitigated his fatherly correction in us both; I would to God he had done ſo much in the behalf of the grief of the body to you, as he hath done to me. For as for the ſoul, I truſt you feel that which I pray God increaſe in you, I mean his fatherly love, and grant that I may with you feel the ſame in ſuch degree as may pleaſe him; I will not ſay you feel, leſt I ſhould ſeem to aſk too much at one time. God doth often much more plentifully viſit with the ſenſe of his mercy them that humble themſelves under his mighty hand, than others which to the face of the world have a greater ſhew and appearance.

Therefore I wiſh as I do, and that not only for mine own convenience, but alſo that I might occaſion you to conſider the goodneſs of God, which I by your letters do well perceive; which is indeed the high-way, whereby God increaſeth his gifts, and ſheweth his ſalvation more lively, Pſal. 50. 107. I have received God's bleſſing from you, which I have partly diſtributed to my three fellow-priſoners, Mr. Farrar, Mr Taylor, and Mr. Philpot, and the reſidue I will beſtow on four poor ſouls who are impriſoned in the common gaol for religion alſo. As for mine own part, if I had need, I would have ſerved mine own turn alſo. But becauſe I had not, nor (I thank God) have not, I have been, and will be, your almoner, in ſuch a manner as I have already advertiſed you. God reward you in this world and in the world to come. Becauſe otherwise I cannot talk with you, therefore on this sort, as occasion and opportunity will serve, I am ready to shew my good will and desire of your help and furtherance in the Lord to everlasting life, whereunto God bring us shortly for his mercies sake, Amen.

Good madam, be thankful to God, as I hope you be; be earnest in prayer, continue in reading and hearing God's word, and if God's further cross come, as therein God doth serve his providence (for else it shall not come unto you), so be certain the same shall turn to your eternal joy and comfort, Amen.

John Bradford.

To my dear Friends and Brethren, R. and E. with their Wives and Families.

THE comfort of Christ felt commonly of his children in their cross for his sake, the everlasting God work in both your hearts, my good brethren, and in the hearts of both your yoke-fellows, especially of Mary, my good sister in the Lord, Amen.

If I had not heard something of the hazard which you are in for the gospel's sake, if you continue the profession and confession thereof, as I trust you do and will do, and that, by God's help, to the end, which assistance will not be wanting, if you hope in him (for this bindeth him, as David in the person of Christ witnesseth, "Our fathers hoped in thee, and thou didst deliver them," Psalm 22.) yet by conjectures I could not but suppose (though not so certainly) the time of your suffering and probation to be at hand. For now the power of darkness is fully and justly come upon this realm for our sins, and abusing the light lent us of the Lord, to the setting forth of ourselves more than God's glory, that we might be brought to a better knowledge of our evils, and so heartily repent (which God grant us to do), as well as to increase in us a true sense of our sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, by humbling and dejecting us, thereby to make us more desirous of him, and him more sweet and pleasant to us; which may the good Spirit of God work sensibly in all our hearts for God's holy name's sake.

For this cause I thought it my duty, being now (thanks be to God) where I have some liberty to write, and hearing of you as I hear; to do that which I should have done, if I had heard nothing at all; that is, to desire you to be of good cheer and comfort in the Lord (although in the world you see cause rather to the contrary), and to go on forwards in the way of God whereinto you have entered, considering that the same cannot but so much more wax hard upon the outward man, by how much more you draw nearer to the end of it: even as in the travail of a woman, the nearer she draweth to her delivery, the more her pains increase; so it goeth with us in the Lord's way, the nearer we draw to our deliverance by death to our eternal felicity.

Example whereof we have not only in the holy prophets and apostles of God, who when they were young girded themselves, and went in a manner whither they pleased; but when they grew old, they went girded by others whither they would not, concerning the outward man; but rather, and most lively in our Saviour Jesus Christ, whose life and way was much more painful to him towards the end than it was at the beginning. And no wonder, for Satan can bear with a man that begins well, and if he makes some progress, but rather than he should go on to the end, he will spit his venom, and use a thousand means to prevent his perseverance.

Therefore as we should not be dismayed at this world, as though some strange thing happened unto us, in that it is but as it was wont to be to the godly, in that the devil declareth himself after his old manner, in that we have professed no less, but to forsake the world and the devil, as God's very enemies, in that we learned no less at first, when we came to God's school, than to deny ourselves, and take up our cross and follow our master, who leadeth us no other way than he himself hath gone before us: as, I say, we should not be dismayed, so we ought to go forwards with patience and joy, if we set before us the time to come as present, as the saints of God did, but especially our pattern and Saviour Jesus Christ; for the apostle saith, "He set before him the joy and glory to come, and therefore contemned the shame and sorrow of the cross:" and if we do so, we shall at length find as they have found. For who would grieve if his journey seemeth rough and tedious, if, when he comes to the end of it he shall enjoy infinite pleasure for evermore? who will be afraid, or loth to leave a little pelf, which lasteth but a short time, (even in the possession of which there is no true satisfaction), if he knew that soon after he should enjoy a most plentiful fortune, an eternal inheritance? who would be unwilling for a little while to forsake his wife, children, and friends, when he knows that in a short time they shall again meet together, according to their own hearts desire, and never to be separated? who will be sorry to forsake his life, who cannot but be most certain of eternal life? who loveth the shadow better than the body? who can love this life, but they that regard not the life to come? who can desire the dross of this world, but such as are ignorant of the treasures of the everlasting joy in heaven? I mean, who is afraid to die, but such as expect not to live eternally? Christ hath promised pleasures, riches, joy, felicity, and all good things to them that lose any thing, or suffer any sorrow for his sake: and is he not true? How can he but be true, for guile was never found in his mouth?

Alas, then, why are we so slack and slow, yea hard of heart to believe him, promising us eternal bliss thus plentifully, and are so ready to believe the world promising us many things, and yet paying nothing? If we will not curry favour, and lean to both sides, then it may promise us peace and quietness for a little while, but how doth it pay? and if it doth pay, with what quietness of conscience? or if so; how long, I pray you? Do not we see before our eyes, men to die shamefully, I mean as rebels and other malefactors, who refuse to die for God's cause? What way is so sure to heaven as to suffer for the cause of Christ? If there be any way on horseback to heaven, surely this is the way; "By many troubles, saith the apostle, we must enter into heaven. All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution." For the world cannot love them that are of God; the devil cannot love his enemies: the world will love none but his own: you are Christ's, therefore look for no love here. Should we look for fire to quench our thirst? as soon shall God's true servants find peace and favour in Antichrist's regiment.

Therefore, my dearly beloved, be stout in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Put on you his armour; stand in the liberty of Christ which you have learned; rejoice that you may be counted worthy to suffer any thing for God's cause: to all men this is not given. Your reward is great in heaven, though in earth ye find nothing. The journey is almost over, you are almost in the haven. Hale on apace, I beseech you, and merrily hoise up your sails. Cast yourselves on Christ, who careth for you. Keep company with him now still to the end; he is faithful, and will never leave you, nor tempt you further than he will enable you to bear; yea, in the midst of the temptation he will find you a way to escape. Heartily pray unto him, be thankful for his indignation, rejoice in hope of the health you shall receive, and be mindful of us who lead the van, and by God's grace trust in Christ to be made able to break the ice before you, that you following, may find the way more easy. God grant it may so be, Amen, Amen.

Out of Prison, by your brother in Christ,

John Bradford.

To

To Mrs. Wilkinſon.

ALmighty God our moſt loving Father, increaſe in your heart (my dear mother and good miſtreſs in the Lord), his true knowledge and love in Chriſt, to the encouraging and confirming of your faith in theſe ſtormy days; which are neceſſary and will be profitable to us if we perſevere unto the end, which God grant we may, Amen.

My right dearly beloved, I know no better thing to write unto you, than to deſire you to be thankful to the Lord for his great mercies towards you, for many of your ſtate and calling he doth not ſo favour; it pleaſeth him to bleſs you with extraordinary grace, to keep you from that horrid filth wherewith our country is moſt abominably defiled. This bleſſing aſſuredly is rare, as you ſee. But now if he ſhall bleſs you with another bleſſing which is more rare, I mean to call you forth as a martyr, and a witneſs againſt this filth, I hope you will become doubly thankful. For a greater token commonly we have not to judge of our election and ſalvation (next to Chriſt, and faith in him) than the croſs, eſpecially when it is ſo glorious as on this ſort to ſuffer any thing, but chiefly loſs of this life; for true life indeed is never found but by the loſs of this; except the grain of wheat fall down and die, it cannot riſe and flouriſh.

You know that he who was taken into the third heaven, and knew what he wrote, doth ſay, "That as the corn liveth not, except it be dead, and caſt into the earth, ſo truly our bodies." And therefore the croſs ſhould ſo little fear us, that even death itſelf ſhould be deſired by us, as the taylor which putteth off our rags, and arrayeth us with the royal robes of immortality, incorruption and glory. Great ſhame it ſhould be for us, that all the whole creatures of God ſhould deſire, yea groan in their kind for our liberty, and we ourſelves to loath it, as doubtleſs we do, if for the croſs, yea for death itſelf, we with joy ſwallow not up all ſorrow that might hinder us from following the Lord's calling, and obeying the Lord's providence; whereby doubtleſs all croſſes, and death itſelf doth come, and not by hap or chance. In conſideration whereof, right dear mother, that this providence ſtretcheth itſelf ſo unto us, and for us, that even the hairs of our heads are numbered with God, not one of them to fall to our hurt; ſurely we declare ourſelves very faint in faith if we receive not ſuch comfort, that we can willingly offer ourſelves to the Lord, and caſt our whole care upon him, honouring him with this honour, that he is and ever will be careful for us and all we have, as for his dear children. Be therefore of good chear even in the midſt of theſe miſeries; be thankful to the Lord, and prepare yourſelf for a further trial; which if God ſend you, as I hope, ſo do you believe, that God will help and comfort you therein, and make you able to bear whatſoever ſhall happen. And thus much, having this opportunity, I thought good to write, praying God our Father to recompenſe into your boſom all the good that ever you have done, to me eſpecially and to many others, both in this time of trouble, and always heretofore.

Your own in the Lord,
John Bradford.

Another Letter to certain pious Perſons, encouraging them to prepare themſelves to bear the Croſs with Patience.

GRacious God and moſt merciful Father, for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, thy dearly beloved Son, grant us thy mercy, grace, wiſdom, and Holy Spirit to counſel, comfort and guide us in all our thoughts, words and works to thy glory, and our everlaſting joy and peace for ever, Amen.

In my laſt letter you might perceive my conjecturing to be no leſs towards you than I have now learned. But, my dearly beloved, I have learned none other thing than what I before told you would come to paſs, if ye caſt not away that which ye have learned. I do appeal to both your conſciences, whether I ſpeak truth herein, as well of my telling (though not ſo often as I might and ſhould, God forgive me) as alſo of your learning. Now God will try you, to make others learn by you, that which ye learned by others, and by them which have ſuffered this day ye might learn (if already ye had not learned) that life and honour is not to be regarded more than God's commandment. They in no point for all that ever their ghoſtly fathers could do, having Dr. Death to take their part, would conſent, or ſeem to conſent to the popiſh maſs and papiſtical god, otherwiſe than they had received in the days of our late king. And this their faith they have confeſſed with their deaths, to their great glory and all our comforts, if we follow them; but to our confuſion if we ſtart back from the ſame. Wherefore I beſeech you to conſider, as well to praiſe God for them, as to go the ſame way with them if God pleaſe.

Conſider not the things of this life, which is a very priſon to all God's children; but the things of everlaſting life, which is our very home. But to behold this, ye muſt open the eyes of your mind, of faith, I ſhould have ſaid, as Moſes did, who choſe rather to ſuffer affliction with the people of God, than to poſſeſs the riches of Egypt, and the pleaſures of Pharaoh's court. Your houſe, home, and goods, yea life, and all that ever ye have, God hath given you as love-tokens, to admoniſh you of his love, and to win your love to him again. He will try your love, whether ye ſet more by him than by his tokens. If ye for the ſake of his tokens, that is, your houſe, home, goods, yea life, will go with the world rather than loſe them, then be aſſured, your love, as he cannot but eſpy it to be a ſtrumpet's love, ſo will he caſt it away with the world. Remember that he who will ſave his life ſhall loſe it, if Chriſt be true: but he who adventureth, yea, loſeth his life for the goſpel's ſake, the ſame ſhall be ſure to find it eternally. Do not ye know that the way to ſalvation, is not the broad way which many run in, but the ſtrait way which now few walk in?

Before perſecution came, men might partly have ſtood in a doubt by the outward ſtate of the world with us (although by God's word it was plain) which was the high-way (for there were as many that pretended the goſpel as popery), but now the ſun is riſen, and the wind bloweth, ſo that the corn which has not taken faſt root, neither can nor will abide; and therefore ye may eaſily ſee the ſtrait way by the ſmall number of paſſengers. Who will now adventure their goods and life for the ſake of Chriſt, who gave his life for our ſakes? We are now become Gergeſites, that would rather loſe Chriſt than our ſwine. A wife is proved faithful when ſhe rejecteth and withſtandeth other ſuitors. A faithful chriſtian is then found ſo to be, when his faith is aſſaulted.

If we are neither able nor willing to forſake this world for God's glory and goſpel's ſake, ere long ſhall we be obliged to leave it for nature's ſake. Die ye muſt once, and leave all ye have (God only knoweth how ſoon) whether ye will or not; and ſeeing you cannot avoid it, why will ye not voluntarily do it for God's ſake?

If ye go to maſs, and do as the moſt part doth, then may ye live quietly and at reſt; but if ye refuſe to go thither, then ye ſhall go to priſon, loſe your goods, leave your children comfortleſs, yea, loſe your life alſo. But (my dearly beloved) open the eyes of your faith, and conſider the ſhortneſs of this life, that it is even as a ſhadow and a ſmoke. Again, conſider how intolerable the puniſhment of hell-fire is, and that endleſs. Laſt of all, look on the joys incomprehenſible, which God hath prepared for all them, world without end, who loſe either life, land, or goods for his name's ſake, and then reaſon, thus;

thus; if we go to maſs, the greateſt enemy that Chriſt hath, though for a little time we ſhall live in quiet, and leave to our children ſomething to live upon hereafter, yet we ſhall diſpleaſe God, fall into his hands (which is horrible to hypocrites), and be in wonderful hazard of falling from eternal joy into eternal miſery, firſt of ſoul, and then of body, with the devil and all idolaters.

Again, we ſhall want peace of conſcience, which ſurmounteth all the riches of the world: and for our children, who knoweth whether God will viſit our idolatry on them in this life? yea, our houſe and goods, and even our lives, are in danger of being loſt by many caſualties: and when God is angry with us, he can when he pleaſes ſend one means or other to take all from us for our ſins, and to caſt us into greater trouble, who will not come into ſome little for his ſake.

On this ſort reaſon with yourſelves, and then doubtleſs God will work otherwiſe with you, and in you, than ye are aware of. Where now ye think yourſelves unable to abide perſecution, be moſt aſſured, that if you earneſtly purpoſe not to forſake God, that he will make you ſo able to bear his croſs, that you ſhall rejoice therein. "God is faithful (ſaith St. Paul), who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above that you are able: but will with the temptation alſo make a way to eſcape, that ye may be able to bear it." Think how great a benefit it is, if God will make you worthy of this honour, to ſuffer loſs of any thing for his ſake. He might juſtly inflict moſt grievous plagues upon you, and yet now he will correct you with that rod, whereby you ſhall be made like to his Chriſt, that ye may for ever reign with him. Suffer yourſelves therefore now to be made like to Chriſt, for elſe ye ſhall be never made like unto him. The devil would gladly have you now to overthrow that, which ye have a long time ſtedfaſtly profeſſed. O how would he triumph, if he could win his purpoſe! O how would the Papiſts triumph againſt God's goſpel in you! O how would you confirm them in their wicked popery! O how would the poor children of God be diſcomforted, if you ſhould now go to maſs and other idolatrous ſervice, and do as the world doth!

Hath God delivered you from the Sweat, to ſerve him ſo? Hath God miraculouſly reſtored you to health from your grievous agues for ſuch a purpoſe? Hath God given you ſuch bleſſings in this world, and good things all the days of your life hitherto, and now of equity will ye not receive at his hands, and for his ſake, ſome evil? God forbid: I hope better of you. Uſe prayer, and caſt your care upon God; commit your children into his hand; give to God your goods, bodies and lives, as he hath given them, or rather lent them, to you. Say with Job, "God hath given, and God hath taken away, his name be praiſed for ever." Caſt your care upon him, I ſay, for he is careful for you; and take it amongſt the greateſt bleſſings of God, to ſuffer for his ſake. I truſt he hath kept you hitherto to that end.

And I beſeech thee, O merciful Father, for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, that thou wouldeſt be merciful unto us, comfort us with thy grace, and ſtrengthen us in thy truth, that in heart we may believe, and in tongue boldly confeſs thy goſpel, to thy glory, and our eternal ſalvation, Amen. Pray for me, and I by God's grace will do the ſame for you.

John Bradford.

An Admonition to certain Profeſſors of the Goſpel, to beware they fall not from it in conſenting to the Romiſh Religion.

THE peace of Chriſt, which is the true effect of God's goſpel believed, my dearly beloved, be more and more plentifully perceived by you, through the grace of our dear Father, by the mighty working of the Holy Spirit our Comforter, Amen.

No. 20.

Though I have many letters at preſent to hinder me from writing unto you, yet being deſired, I could not but ſignify my ready good will in this behalf as much as I may, when I cannot ſo much as I would.

You hear and ſee how Satan beſtirreth him, raging as a roaring lion to devour us. You ſee and feel partly what ſtorms he hath raiſed up to drown the poor boat of Chriſt, I mean his church. You ſee how terribly he traineth his ſoldiers to give a fierce onſet on the van of God's battle. You ſee he hath received power of God, to moleſt God's children, and to begin at his houſe. By reaſon whereof conſider two things; one, the cauſe on our behalf; the other, what will be the ſequel on ſtrangers.

For the firſt, if we be not blind, we cannot but well ſee that our ſins are the cauſe of all this miſery; our ſins, I ſay, which I wiſh that every one of us would apply to ourſelves after the example of Jonah and David, ſearching our own hearts, that other men's offences might lie behind, and our own before. Not that I would excuſe other men, who outwardly have walked much more groſly than many of you have done; but that I would provoke you all as myſelf to more hearty repentance and prayer. Let us more and more increaſe to know and lament our doubting of God, of his preſence, power, anger, mercy, &c.

Let us better feel and hate our ſelf-love, ſecurity, negligence, unthankfulneſs, unbelief, impatience, &c. and then doubtleſs the croſs ſhall be leſs fearful, yea it ſhall be comfortable, and Chriſt moſt dear and pleaſant: death then ſhall be deſired, as the diſpatcher of us out of miſery, and entrance into eternal felicity and unſpeakable joy, which is ſo much the more longed for, by how much we feel indeed the ſerpent's bites, wherewith he woundeth our heels, that is, our outward Adam and ſenſes. If we had, I ſay, a lively and true feeling of his poiſon, we could not only rejoice over our captain that hath bruiſed his head, but be deſirous to follow his example, that is, to give our lives with him and for him, and ſo fill up his paſſions, that he might conquer and overcome in us and by us, to his glory and comfort of his children.

Now the ſecond (I mean the ſequel, or that which will follow on the ſtrangers), my dearly beloved, let us look well upon. For if God doth juſtly thus permit Satan and his ſeed to vex and moleſt Chriſt and his penitent people; O what and how juſtly may he and will he give to Satan to moleſt the wicked and impenitent ſinners! If judgments begin thus at God's houſe, what will follow on them that be without, if they repent not! certainly the dregs of God's cup is reſerved for them, that is, brimſtone, fire, and tempeſt intolerable. Now are they unwilling to taſte of God's cup of afflictions, which he offereth with his Son Chriſt our Lord, leſt they ſhould loſe their ſwine with the Gerbeſites. They are unwilling to come into the way that bringeth to heaven, even afflictions: they in their hearts cry, "Let us caſt his yoke from us;" they walk two ways, that is, they ſeek to ſerve God and Mammon, which is impoſſible; they will not come nigh the ſtrait way that leadeth to life: they ſet their eyes to behold preſent things only; they judge of religion after reaſon, and not after God's word; they follow the greater part, and not the better: they profeſs God with their mouths, but in their hearts they deny him; they would be counted to live godly in Chriſt, but yet they will ſuffer no perſecution; they love this world, whereby the love of God is driven far from them: they ſavour of thoſe things that be of men, and not that be of God: in ſhort, they love God in their lips, but in their hearts, yea, and in their deeds deny him, as well by not repenting their ſins paſt, as by continuing ſtill in them; by doing as the world, the fleſh, and the devil willeth them, and yet perchance they will pray, or rather prate, Thy will be done in earth, which is generally that every one ſhould take up his croſs and follow Chriſt. But this is a hard ſaying, who is able to abide it? Therefore Chriſt muſt be prayed to depart, leſt all the ſwine be drowned. The devil ſhall have his dwelling again in themſelves rather than in their pigs, and therefore to the devil they ſhall go, and dwell with him in eternal perdition and damnation, even in hell fire, a torment endleſs, and above all cogitations incomprehenſible, if they repent not.

Wherefore by them, my dearly beloved, be admoniſhed to remember your profeſſion, how that in baptiſm you made a ſolemn vow to forſake the devil, the world, &c, You promiſed to fight under Chriſt's ſtandard. You learned Chriſt's croſs before you began with A B C. Go forwards then, pay your vow to the Lord; fight like men, and valiant men under Chriſt's ſtandard; take up your croſs and follow your maſter, as your brethren Mr. Hooper, Rogers, Taylor and Saunders have done, and as now your brethren, Dr. Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Farrar, Bradford, Haukes, &c. are ready to do. The ice is broke before you, therefore be not afraid, but be content to die for the Lord. You have no cauſe to waver, or doubt of the doctrine thus declared by the blood of the paſtors. Remember that Chriſt ſaith; "He that will ſave his life ſhall loſe it." And what ſhould it profit you to win the whole world, much leſs a little quietneſs, your goods, &c. and to loſe your own ſouls? Render to the Lord that he hath lent you, by ſuch means as he would have you render it, and not as you would. Forget not, Chriſt's diſciples muſt deny themſelves, as well concerning their will, as concerning their wiſdom. Have in mind, that as it is no ſmall mercy to believe in the Lord, ſo it is no ſmall kindneſs of God towards you, to ſuffer any thing, much more death, for the Lord. If they be bleſſed that die in the Lord, how ſhall they be that die for the Lord? O what a bleſſing is it to have death due for our ſins, diverted into a demonſtration and teſtification of the Lord's truth! O that we had a little of Moſes's faith to look upon the end of the croſs, to look upon the reward, to ſee continually with Chriſt and his people greater riches than the riches of Egypt! O let us pray that God would open our eyes to ſee his hid manna, heavenly Jeruſalem, the congregation of his firſt-born, the melody of the ſaints, the tabernacle of God dwelling with men; then ſhould we run and become violent men, and ſo take the kingdom of heaven as it were by force. God our Father give us for Chriſt's ſake to ſee a little what and how great joy he hath prepared for us, he hath called us unto, and moſt aſſuredly giveth us for his own goodneſs and truth ſake, Amen.

My dearly beloved, repent, be ſober, watch and pray; ſtudy to be quiet, and mind your own buſineſs; be obedient to the higher powers in all things that are not contrary to God's word; and if you cannot with a good conſcience obey man without offending God, patiently ſuffer, preſume not to rebel, and the glory and good Spirit of God ſhall dwell upon you. I pray you remember us your afflicted brethren, being in the Lord's bonds for the teſtimony of Chriſt, and waiting for the gracious hour of our moſt merciful Father. The Lord for Chriſt's ſake give us courage to drink heartily of this cup, which daily we groan and ſigh for, lamenting that the time is thus prolonged. The Lord Jeſus give us grace to be thankful, and to ſuffer patiently the provident hour of his moſt gracious will, Amen, Amen.

Yours in Chriſt,
John Bradford.

To my good Brother John Careleſs, Priſoner in the King's Bench.

THE Father of mercy, and God of all comfort, viſit us with his eternal conſolation, according to his great mercies in Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour, Amen.

My very dear brother, I never received ſo much conſolation by any thing ſince I came into priſon, as I have by your laſt letter, God be praiſed. I muſt confeſs that for my unthankfulneſs towards you, and eſpecially to God, I have now more need of his merciful aſſiſtance than ever. Ah that Satan envieth us ſo greatly, ah that our Lord would ſhortly lay his head under our feet. Ah that I may for ever beware, and be a godly example to you and to others to beware of unthankfulneſs. Good brother, we had more need to take heed of a foil after lightening than before. God therefore is to be praiſed even when he hideth (for a ſeaſon) his chearful countenance from us, leſt we, by not knowing how to uſe it as we ought, do hurt ourſelves more thereby; ſo great is our ignorance and corruption. This, my good brother, I write unto you, as to one whom in the Lord I embrace, and I thank God that you do me in like manner. God our Father more and more give us both his good Spirit, that as by faith we may feel ourſelves united unto him in Chriſt, ſo by love we may find ourſelves linked in the ſame Chriſt to one another, I to you, and you to me, we to all the children of God, and all the children of God to us, Amen, Amen.

Commend me to your good brother Skelthrop, for whom I heartily praiſe God, who hath given him at length grace to ſee and profeſs his truth. I doubt not but he will be ſo wary in all his converſation, that his old acquaintance may thereby ever think themſelves aſtray. Wo, and wo again would be unto us, if we by our example ſhould make men to ſtumble at the truth. Forget not ſalutations in Chriſt, as you ſhall think good, to Trew and his companions. The Lord hath his time (I hope) for them alſo, although we perchance think otherwiſe. It is not one or two drops that maketh the ſtone hollow, but the perpetual dropping; ſo, if with hearty prayer for them, and by our good example gently working upon them, we may at length ſee the operation of God. I beſeech God to make perfect all the good he hath begun in us all, Amen. I deſire you all to pray for me the moſt unworthy priſoner of the Lord,

Your brother,
John Bradford.

To Mr. John Hall and his Wife, Priſoners in Newgate.

ALmighty God our heavenly Father through Jeſus Chriſt be with you both, my dearly beloved, as with his dear children for ever, and ſo bleſs you with his Holy Spirit, that you may rejoice in his cauſe and this croſs, and gladly take it up and bear it ſo long as he ſhall think good. I have heard (my good brother and ſiſter) that God hath brought you both into his ſchool-houſe, that thereby you might ſee his love and care for you. If it be a token of a loving and careful father, to prevent the purpoſe, and diſappoint the intent of his children, while they inconſiderately endeavour to keep from ſchool (which they would not do, if they did but know and conſider the advantage of the learning they might there get); how ſhould you take this work of the Lord preventing your purpoſe, but as an evident ſign of that love and fatherly carefulneſs which he beareth towards you? If he had winked at your faults, you might, indeed, have eſcaped beating (I mean the croſs), but then you would have loſt the advantage of learning that which your Father would have you to learn for your future good. He, I ſay, hath brought you where you be; and though your wit and reaſon may tell you, it is by chance or fortune, yet (my dearly beloved) whatſoever was the means, know for certain that God your Father was the worker hereof, and that for your welfare, though your old Adam doth tell you otherwiſe: yet I ſay of truth, that your duty is to think of this croſs, that as it is of God's ſending, and although you deſerve otherwiſe, yet it cometh from him out of pure love and fatherly affection for your welfare and advantage.

You will be apt to object, and ſay, What advantage can ariſe from all this? We are now kept cloſe in priſon; our families and our poor children have nobody to take care of them; our ſubſtance by this means is diminiſhed; our poverty approacheth, and perchance more dangers alſo, yea, and loſs of life too. Theſe are no advantages, but the greateſt miſeries and misfortunes; ſo that we may juſtly enquire, and ſhould be glad to know, what advantage can come to us from this croſs, which ſeems to be attended with nothing but the moſt miſerable inconveniences.

To theſe things I anſwer, That indeed what you ſay is true of your bodies, families, children, ſubſtance, poverty, life, &c. But then you muſt conſider theſe things in another manner, you muſt view them inwardly as well as well as outwardly, and then perhaps you may find more ſatisfaction. Do not you know that you muſt of neceſſity part from all theſe fine things in a very ſhort time? Tell me then, have you not this advantage from your croſs, to learn to loath and leave this world, and to long for and deſire another, where is perpetuity? You ought of your own head and free-will to have (according to your profeſſion in baptiſm) forſaken the world and all earthly things, uſing the world as though you uſed it not. Your heart muſt be entirely ſet upon your treaſure in heaven, or elſe you can never be Chriſt's true diſciples, nor be ſaved, and be where he is. The advantage that cometh by this croſs, if you rightly and willingly embrace, will moſt aſſuredly bring you to the Lord in endleſs glory. How doth God now, as it were, fatherly pull you by the ears, to remember your former offences, that repentance and remiſſion might enſue? How doth God now compel you to call upon him, and to be earneſt in prayer? Are all theſe no advantages? Doth not the ſcripture ſay that "God doth correct us in this world, becauſe we ſhall not be damned with the world? That God chaſteneth every one whom he loveth?" That the end of this correction ſhall be joy and holineſs? Doth not the ſcripture ſay, that you are now going the right way to heaven? that your ſuffering is Chriſt's ſuffering? My dearly beloved, what greater advantages than theſe can a godly heart deſire?

Therefore ye are commanded to rejoice and be glad when ye ſuffer as now ye do: for through the goodneſs of God great ſhall be your reward. Where? forſooth on earth, firſt your children; for now they are in God's immediate protection. Never was father ſo careful for his children, as God is for yours. God's bleſſing, which is more worth than all the world, you leave indeed to your children. Though all your providence for them ſhall be pulled away, yet God is not poor, he hath promiſed to provide for them moſt fatherly: "Caſt thy burthen upon me, ſaith he, and I will bear it." Do you therefore caſt them, and commend them unto God your Father, and doubt not that he will die in your debt. He never was found unfaithful, and he will not now begin with you. The good man's ſeed ſhall not go begging their bread, for he will ſhew mercy upon thouſands of the poſterity of them that fear him. Therefore, as I ſaid, God's reward firſt upon earth ſhall be felt by your children even corporally, and ſo alſo upon you, if God ſee it moſt for your advantage, at leaſt inwardly you ſhall feel it by quietneſs and comfort of conſcience: And ſecondly, after this life you ſhall find it ſo plentifully, as the eye hath not ſeen, the ear hath not heard, the heart cannot conceive, how great and glorious God's reward will be upon your bodies, much more upon your ſouls. God open our eyes to ſee and feel this indeed! Then ſhall we think the croſs, which is a means hereto, to be commodious. Then ſhall we thank God that he would chaſtiſe us. Then ſhall we ſay with David: "Happy am I that thou haſt puniſhed me: for before I went aſtray, but now I keep thy laws."

That we may do this indeed, my dearly beloved, let us firſt know that our croſs cometh from God. Secondly, that it cometh from God as a Father, that is, for our good. Thirdly, let us call to mind our ſins, and aſk pardon. Fourthly, let us look for certain help at God's hand in his good time: help, I ſay, ſuch as ſhall make moſt to God's glory, and to the comfort and advantage of our ſouls and bodies eternally. This if we certainly conceive, then will there proceed from us hearty thankſgiving, which God requireth as a moſt precious ſacrifice. That we may all offer this through Chriſt, let us uſe earneſt prayer to our God and dear Father, who bleſs us, keep us, and comfort us under his ſweet croſs for ever, Amen, Amen.

My dear hearts, if I could any way comfort you, you ſhould be ſure thereof, though my life lay thereon, but now I muſt do as I may, becauſe I cannot as I would. O that it would pleaſe our dear Father ſhortly to bring us where we ſhall never depart, but enjoy continually the bleſſed fruition of his heavenly preſence! Pray, pray, that it may ſpeedily come to paſs, pray. To-morrow I will ſend to you, to know your eſtate; ſend me word what are the chiefeſt things they charge you withal. From the Compter, by your brother in the Lord,

John Bradford.

To Mrs. Hall, Priſoner in Newgate.

OUR moſt merciful God and Father through Chriſt Jeſus our Lord and Saviour, be merciful unto us, and make perfect the good he hath begun in us unto the end, Amen.

My dear ſiſter, rejoice in the Lord, rejoice; be glad, I ſay, be merry and thankful, not only becauſe Chriſt ſo commandeth us, but alſo becauſe our ſtate wherein we at preſent are, requireth no leſs, for we are the Lord's witneſſes. God the Father hath vouchſafed to chooſe us amongſt many to witneſs and teſtify that Chriſt his Son is king, and that his word is true. Chriſt our Saviour, for his love's ſake towards us, will have us to bear record that he is no uſurper nor deceiver of the people, but God's ambaſſador, prophet and Meſſias; ſo that of all dignities upon earth this is the higheſt. Greater honour had not his prophets, apoſtles, nor deareſt friends, than to bear witneſs with Chriſt, as we now do. The world, following the counſel of their ſire Satan, would gladly condemn Chriſt and his verity, but lo, the Lord hath choſen us to be his champions to hinder this. As ſtout ſoldiers therefore let us ſtand to our maſter, who is with us, and ſtandeth on our right hand, that we ſhall not be much moved if we hope and depend on his mercy; he is ſo faithful and true, that he will never tempt us farther than he will make us able to bear.

Therefore be not careful (for I hear that this day you will be called forth) what you ſhall anſwer. The Lord, who is true and cannot lye, hath promiſed, and will never fail nor forget it, that you ſhall have both what and how to anſwer, as ſhall make his ſhameleſs adverſaries aſhamed. Depend therefore on this promiſe of God, who is an helper at a pinch, and a moſt preſent remedy to them that hope in him. Never was it ever heard of, or ſhall be, that any hoping in the Lord was put to foil.

Therefore as I ſaid, I ſay again, dear ſiſter, be not only not careful for your anſwering, but alſo be joyful for your cauſe. Confeſs Chriſt, and be not aſhamed, and he will confeſs you, and never be aſhamed of you. Though loſs of goods and life be like here to enſue; yet if Chriſt be true (as he is moſt true), it is otherwiſe indeed: for he that loſeth his life, ſaith he, winneth it; but he that ſaveth it, loſeth it. Our ſins have deſerved many deaths. Now if God ſo deal with us, that he will make our deſerved death a demonſtration of his grace, a teſtimonial of his verity, a confirmation of his people, and overthrow of his adverſaries; what great cauſe have we to be thankful! Be thankful therefore, good ſiſter, be thankful. Rejoice and be merry in the Lord; be ſtout in his cauſe and quarrel, be not faint-hearted, but run out your race, and ſet your captain Chriſt before your eyes. Behold how great your reward is. See the great glory and the eternity of felicity prepared for you. Strive and fight lawfully, that you may get the crown. Run to get the game, you are almoſt at your journey's end: I doubt not but our Father will with us ſend to you alſo, as he did to Elijah, a fiery chariot, to convey us into his kingdom. Let us therefore not be diſmayed to leave our cloak behind us, that is, our bodies to aſhes. God will one day reſtore them to us like to the body of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe coming is now at hand; let us look for it and lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh, Amen, Amen. The Lord of mercy grant us his mercy, Amen. I pray you, pray for me, and ſo deſire my brethren which be with you. God's peace be with us all, Amen. Bleſſed be the dead that die in the Lord; then how much more they that die for the Lord?

Your brother in bonds,

J. Bradford.

To a Woman that deſired to know his Mind, whether ſhe, refraining from the Maſs, might be preſent at the Popiſh Mattins, or no.

I Beſeech Almighty God our heavenly Father to be merciful unto us, and to increaſe in you, my good ſiſter, the knowledge and love of his truth; and at this preſent give me grace to write to you ſomething of the ſame, as may make to his glory and our own comfort and confirmation in him through Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

Whether you may come with ſafe conſcience to the church now, that is, to the ſervice uſed commonly, in part, as at mattins, or at even-ſong, or no, is your deſire to have me write ſomething for your further ſtay. My dearly beloved, although your benefits towards me might perchance make you to think, that in reſpect thereof I would bear that which elſe were not to be borne withal; yet by God's grace I am purpoſed, ſimply and without all ſuch reſpect in this matter, to ſpeak to you the truth according to my conſcience, as I may be able to ſtand unto when I ſhall come before the Lord.

Firſt, therefore, go about to learn perfectly the firſt leſſon to be learned by all that profeſs Chriſt, that is, to deny yourſelf, and in nothing to ſeek yourſelf.

Secondly, Learn, after this, to begin at the next leſſon to it, which is, to ſeek God in all things you do and leave undone.

Thirdly, Know then, that you ſeek God, when in his ſervice you follow his word, and not the fancies of man, cuſtom, multitude, &c. and when with your brother you follow the rule of charity, that is, to do as you would be done by. In theſe is a ſum of all the counſel I can give you, if that hereto I admoniſh you of the ſervice now uſed, which is directly contrary to God's word. So that your going to the ſervice, is a declaration that you have not learned your firſt leſſon, and never can learn it, ſo long as you go thither; and conſequently the ſecond leſſon you will utterly loſe, if you ceaſe not the ſeeking of yourſelf, that is, if for company, cuſtom, father or friend, life or goods, you ſeem to allow that which God diſalloweth. And this by God's grace, I purpoſe briefly to ſhew.

Firſt. The mattins and even-ſong is in a tongue forbidden to be uſed in the public congregation, where they underſtand it not. Read what St. Paul ſaith, that to pray in an unknown tongue is againſt God's commandment, 1 Cor. 14. This one, I think, is ſufficient, if there were no other argument againſt it. For how can God's glory be ſought, where his word and commandment is wilfully broken? How can charity to man ſtand, when charity to God, which is obedience to his word, is broken down?

Again, Both in mattins and even-ſong idolatry is maintained; for there is invocation and prayer made to ſaints departed this life, which robbeth God of that glory which he will give to none other.

Moreover, This ſervice, and the ſetters-forth of it, condemneth the Engliſh ſervice as hereſy, thereby falling into God's curſe, which is threatened to all ſuch as call good evil, and evil good; whereof they ſhall partake who communicate with them.

Beſides, This Latin ſervice is a plain mark of Antichriſt's catholic ſynagogue; ſo that the communicants and approvers of it thereby declare themſelves to be members of the ſame ſynagogue, and ſo cut off from Chriſt and his church, whoſe exterior mark is the true adminiſtration of God's word and ſacraments.

Furthermore, The example of your going thither to allow the religion of Antichriſt (as doubtleſs you do in deed, howſoever in heart you think) occaſioneth the obſtinate to be utterly untractable, the weak papiſts to be more obſtinate, the ſtrong goſpellers to be much weakened, and the weak goſpellers to be utterly overthrown: the inconveniences that muſt neceſſarily attend it, neither tongue can utter, nor pen deſcribe. All theſe evils thoſe be guilty of, that (externally only) accompany theſe in religion; from which you are admoniſhed to fly. If Chriſt be Chriſt, follow him. Gather with him, leſt you ſcatter abroad. Serve God not only in ſpirit, but alſo in body; make not your body, which is now a member of Chriſt, a member of Antichriſt. Come out from amongſt them, ſaith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing. Confeſs Chriſt and his truth, not only in heart, but alſo in tongue, yea, in very deed, which too few goſpellers do. Indeed many deny him, and therefore had need tremble, leſt that Chriſt deny them in the laſt day: which day, if it were often ſet before our eyes, the profits and pleaſures of this world would be eſteemed as mere trifles.

Therefore, good ſiſter, often have it before your eyes, daily ſet yourſelf and your doings, as it were, before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that hereafter you be not called into judgment. Think that it will be little profit to you to win the whole world, and loſe your own ſoul. Mark well Chriſt's leſſon, "He that will ſave his life ſhall loſe it." The Father of heaven commandeth you to hear Chriſt, who ſaith, Follow me: this you cannot do and follow idolatry, or idolatries. Fly from ſuch, ſaith the ſcripture.

God grant this to you, to me, and to all God's children, Amen. Thus in haſte I have accompliſhed your requeſt. God grant that as you have done me much good bodily, ſo that this may be a little means to do you ſome good ſpiritually, Amen. If time had ſerved, I would have written more at large. March 2, 1555.

To the Right Worſhipful the Lady Vane.

THE good Spirit of God our Father be more and more plentifully perceived by your good ladyſhip, through the merits and mediation of our dear Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

Although your benefits towards me have deſerved all the ſervice that I can do for you, yet (right worſhipful, and dearly beloved in the Lord) the true fear of God, and the love of his truth, which I perceive to be in you, doth, in a more extraordinary manner, oblige me to reſpect you. This bearer hath told me that your deſire is to have ſomething ſent to you concerning the uſurped authority of the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome (who is undoubtedly that great Antichriſt, of whom the apoſtles do ſo much admoniſh us.) Now, to ſtrengthen your faith, as to furniſh you with anſwers (that you may at any time be capable to render a reaſon of the hope that is in you), I ſhall write ſomething to the purpoſe, which I deſire you would read and mark well.

The papiſts do place the pope in preheminence over the whole church, thereby unplacing Chriſt, who is the only head of the church, that giveth life to the whole body, body, and by his Spirit doth enliven every member of the ſame. This they do againſt all ſcriptures. For where they bring in this ſpoken to Peter, Feed my ſheep; I would gladly know whether this was not commanded unto others alſo. As for that (which perchance they will urge), that he ſpake to Peter by name; I anſwer, that if they had any learning, they might eaſily perceive that it was not for any ſuch cauſe as they pretend, but rather by a threefold commandment to reſtore him to the honour of an apoſtle, which he had loſt by his threefold denial. And how dare they interpret this word, My ſheep, My lambs, to be the univerſal Church of Chriſt? I think a man might eaſily by the like reaſon prove that Peter himſelf had reſigned that which Chriſt had given to him, in exhorting his fellow-paſtors to feed the flock of Chriſt. Is not this pretty ſtuff? Becauſe Chriſt ſaith to Peter, Feed my ſheep, therefore he ought to rule the univerſal and whole church of Chriſt? If Peter do truly write unto others that they ſhould do the like, that is, Feed Chriſt's flock, either he conferreth his right and authority committed to him upon them, or elſe he doth participate or communicate with them; ſo that fooliſhly they go about to eſtabliſh that which hath no ground. Peter indeed was a ſhepherd of the ſheep, ſuch as beſtowed his labour on them ſo far, as he could ſtretch himſelf by his miniſtry. But the papiſts prate that he had full power over all churches: wherein they may ſee St. Paul to diſprove them, for elſe he had done unjuſtly in denying him the ſuperior place. Howbeit, who ever yet read that St. Peter ever took any thing upon him over churches committed to other men? Was not he ſent by the church, and ſent by one not having rule over the reſt? I grant that he was an excellent inſtrument of God, and for the excellency of his gifts, whenſoever they met together, place therefore was commonly given unto him. But what is this to the purpoſe, to make him head and ruler over all the whole church, becauſe he was ſo over a ſmall congregation?

But be it ſo, that Peter had as much given to him as they do affirm: Who yet will grant that Peter had a patrimony given for his heirs? He hath left (ſay the papiſts) to his ſucceſſors the ſelf-ſame right which he received. O Lord God! then his ſucceſſor muſt be a Satan: for Peter received that title from Chriſt himſelf. I would gladly have the papiſts to ſhew me one place of ſucceſſion mentioned in the ſcriptures. I am ſure that when Paul painteth out the whole adminiſtration of the church, he neither maketh one head, nor any inheritable primacy, and yet he is altogether in commendation of unity. After he hath made mention of one God the Father, of one Chriſt, of one Spirit, of one body of the church, of one faith, and of one baptiſm, then he deſcribeth the means and the manner how unity is to be kept; namely, becauſe unto every paſtor grace is given after the meaſure wherewith Chriſt hath endued them. Where I pray you is now any title of Plenitudinis poteſtatis, of fulneſs of power? When he calleth home every one unto a certain meaſure, why did he not forthwith ſay, One Pope? which he could not have forgotten, if the thing had been as the papiſts make it.

But let us grant that perpetuity of the primacy in the church was eſtabliſhed in Peter; I would gladly learn, why the ſeat of the primacy ſhould be rather at Rome than elſewhere. Marry, ſay they, becauſe Peter's chair was at Rome. This is even like to this, that becauſe Moſes the greateſt prophet, and Aaron the firſt prieſt, exerciſed their offices unto their death in the deſert, therefore the principal place of the Jewiſh church ſhould be in the wilderneſs. But grant them their reaſon that it is good; what ſhould Antioch claim? For Peter's chair was there alſo, wherein Paul gave him a check, which was unſeemly and unmannerly done of Paul, that would not give place to his preſident and better.

No, ſay the papiſts, Rome muſt have this authority, becauſe Peter died there. But what if a man ſhould by probable conjectures ſhew, that it is but a fable, which is feigned of Peter's biſhoprick at Rome? Read how Paul doth ſalute very many private perſons when he writeth to the Romans. Three years after he was brought priſoner to Rome, Luke telleth, that he was received of the brethren, and yet in all theſe is no mention at all of Peter, who then, by their ſtories, was at Rome. Belike he was proud, as the pope and his prelates be, or elſe he would have viſited Paul. Paul while priſoner at Rome wrote divers epiſtles, in which he expreſſeth the names of many who were but mean perſons in compariſon of Peter, but of Peter he ſpeaketh never a word. Surely if Peter had been there, this ſilence of him had been ſuſpicious. In the ſecond epiſtle to Timothy, Paul complaineth that no man was with him in his defence, but all had left him. If Peter had been then at Rome, as they write, then either Paul had belied him, or Peter had played his Peter's part, Luke 22. In another place, how doth he blame all that were with him, Timothy excepted? Therefore we may well doubt whether Peter was biſhop at Rome as they prate: for all this time, and long before, they ſay that Peter was biſhop there.

But I will not ſtir up coals in this matter. If Rome be the chief ſeat becauſe Peter died there, why ſhould not Antioch be the ſecond? Why ſhould not James and John, who were taken with Peter, be as pillars? Why, I ſay, ſhould not their ſeats have honour next to Peter's ſeat? Is it not prepoſterous, that Alexandria, where Mark (who was but one of the diſciples) was biſhop, ſhould be preferred before Epheſus, where John the evangeliſt taught and was biſhop; and before Jeruſalem, where not only James taught and died biſhop, but alſo Chriſt Jeſus our Lord and high-prieſt for ever, by whom, being maſter, I hope honour ſhould be given to his chair, more than to the chair of his chaplains?

I need to ſpeak nothing how that Paul declareth Peter's apoſtleſhip to concern rather the circumciſion or the Jews, and therefore properly pertaineth not to us. Neither need I bring in Gregory the firſt biſhop of Rome, which was about the year of our Lord 600, who in his works doth plainly write, that this title of Primacy, and to be head over all churches under Chriſt, is a title meet and agreeing only to Antichriſt, and therefore he calleth it a prophane, a miſchievous, and a horrible title. Whom ſhould we believe now, if we will neither believe apoſtle nor pope?

If I ſhould go about to tell how this name was firſt gotten by Phocas, I ſhould be too long. I purpoſe, God willing, to ſet it forth at large in a work which I have begun of Antichriſt, if God for his mercy's ſake give me life to finiſh it. For this preſent therefore I ſhall deſire your ladyſhip to take this in good part. If they will needs have the biſhop of Rome to be acknowledged for the head of the church, then will I urge them that they ſhall give us a biſhop. But they obtrude unto us a butcher rather, or a bite-ſheep, than a biſhop. They brag of Peter's ſucceſſion, of Chriſt's vicar, this is always in their mouth. But alas, how can we call him Chriſt's vicar that reſiſteth Chriſt, rejecteth his truth, perſecuteth his people, and preferreth himſelf above God and man? How or wherein doth the pope and Chriſt agree? How ſupplieth he Peter's miniſtry, that boaſteth of his ſucceſſion? Therefore if the papiſts will have the biſhop of Rome ſupreme head of the church of Chriſt in earth, they muſt, before they attain this, give us a biſhop in deed, and not in name. For whoſoever he be that will make this the bond of unity, whatſoever the biſhop of Rome be, ſurely this muſt needs follow, that they do nothing elſe but teach a moſt wicked defection, and departing from Chriſt.

But of this, if God lend me life, I purpoſe to ſpeak more at large hereafter. Now will I leave your ladyſhip to the tuition of God our Father, and Chriſt our only head, paſtor and keeper, to whom ſee that you cleave by true faith, which dependeth only on the word of God, which if you do follow as a lantern to your feet, and a light to your ſteps, you ſhall then avoid darkneſs, and the dangerous deeps wherein the papiſts are fallen by the judgment of God, and ſeek to bring us into the ſame dungeon with them, that the blind following the blind, they both may fall into the ditch: out of which God deliver them according to his good will, and preſerve us for his name ſake, that we being in his light, may continue therein, and walk in it whilſt it is day; ſo ſhall the night never over-preſs us, we going from light to light, from virtue to virtue, from faith to faith, from glory to glory, by the governance of God's good Spirit, which God our Father give unto us all for ever, Amen.

Your brother in bonds
for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt,
John Bradford.

Here followeth another letter from Mr. Bradford to Mr. Richard Hopkins ſometime ſheriff of Coventry; who, during the time of his ſhrievalty, was accuſed by certain malignant adverſaries of matters pertaining to religion. What matter it was I am not yet certainly informed, unleſs it were for ſending to a thief, being then in priſon ready to be hanged, a certain Engliſh book of ſcripture for his ſpiritual comfort.

Whereupon, or on ſome ſuch like matter, he being maliciouſly accuſed, was ſent for and committed to the Fleet-priſon, where he remained a long time in great peril of his life. Notwithſtanding the ſaid Hopkins being at length delivered out of priſon, following Mr. Bradford's counſel, and minding to keep his conſcience pure from idolatry, was driven with his wife and eight young children to quit the realm: and went into High-Germany, where he continued in the city of Baſil till the death of queen Mary, being like a good Tobias, to his power, a friendly helper and a comfortable reliever of other Engliſh exiles there about him, God's providence ſo working with him, that in thoſe far countries he fell not into any decay, neither any one of all his houſhold miſcarried during his ſtay there, but as many as he brought out, ſo many he carried home again, yea, and that with advantage, and God's plenty withal upon him.

A Letter to Mr. Richard Hopkins, then Sheriff of Coventry, and Priſoner in the Fleet.

DEarly beloved in the Lord, I wiſh unto you as unto mine own brother, yea as of mine own heart, God's mercy, and to the feeling of the ſame plentifully in Chriſt our ſweet Saviour, who gave himſelf a ranſom for our ſins, and price for our redemption, praiſed therefore be his holy name for ever and ever, Amen.

I will not go about to excuſe myſelf for not ſending unto you hitherto, but rather accuſe myſelf before God and you, deſiring of you forgiveneſs, and with me to pray to God for pardon of this my unkind forgetting you, and all other my ſins, which I beſeech the Lord in his mercy to do away for Chriſt's ſake, Amen.

Now I would be glad to make you ſome amends if I could; but becauſe I cannot, I heartily deſire you to accept the will for the deed. At preſent, my dear heart, you are in a bleſſed ſtate, although it ſeem otherwiſe to you, or rather unto your old Adam, which I dare now be ſo bold as to diſcern from you, becauſe you would have him not only diſcerned, but alſo utterly deſtroyed. For if God be true, then is his word true.

Now his word pronounceth of your ſtate that it is happy, therefore it muſt needs be ſo. To prove this I think there is no need: for you know that the Holy Ghoſt ſaith, "That they are happy who ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake, and that God's glory and Spirit reſteth on them who ſuffer for conſcience to God." You know that you ſuffer for the ſake of God and religion, or elſe you might be ſoon out of trouble. You account yourſelf a great ſinner, and ſo ye think ye deſerve this puniſhment: but the papiſts do neither perſecute your ſins, nor you for the ſake of your ſins; but in you they perſecute Chriſt, and puniſh you for profeſſing his religion. Happy are ye who have found ſuch favour with God as to be accounted worthy to ſuffer for his ſake in the ſight of man: you ſhall ſurely rejoice with a joy unſpeakable in the ſight of men and angels.

You may think yourſelf born in a bleſſed time, that have found this grace with God, as a veſſel of honour to ſuffer with his ſaints, yea, with his Son. The apoſtle ſaith, "Not many noble, not many rich, not many wiſe in the world, hath the Lord God choſen." Who then hath greater cauſe to rejoice than you, that amongſt the Not many, he hath choſen you to be one? for that cauſe hath God placed you in your office, that thereby ye might the more ſee his ſpecial favour and love towards you. It had not been ſo great a thing for Mr. Hopkins to have ſuffered as Mr. Hopkins, as it is for Mr. Hopkins alſo to ſuffer as Maſter Sheriff. O happy day that you were put into this high office! by which, as God in this world would promote you to greater honour, ſo by ſuffering in this room he hath exalted you in heaven, and in the ſight of his church and children, to a much more excellent glory. When was it read that the ſheriff of a city hath ſuffered for the Lord's ſake, or caſt into priſon for a good conſcience? To the end of the world it ſhall be written for a memorial to your praiſe, "That RICHARD HOPKINS, Sheriff of Coventry, for the conſcientious diſcharge of his Office before God, was caſt into the Fleet, and there a long time kept Priſoner." Happy, and thrice happy are you, if for the ſake of religion you may give your life. Never could you have attained to this promotion in this manner, had you not been in that office. Who would ever have thought that you would have been the firſt magiſtrate that for Chriſt's ſake ſhould have loſt any thing? As I ſaid before, therefore I ſay again, that your ſtate is happy.

Be thankful therefore, rejoice in your trouble, pray for patience, perſevere to the end, let patience have her perfect work. If you want this wiſdom and power, aſk it of God, who will give it to you in his good time. Hope ſtill in him, yea if he ſhould ſlay you, with Job truſt in him, and you ſhall find him merciful and full of compaſſion: for he never did, nor never will break his promiſe. He is with you in trouble, he heareth you calling upon him, yea, before you call, through Chriſt he granteth your deſire. If he now and then hide his face from you, it is to provoke your appetite to make you the more to long for him. This is moſt true, he is coming, and will come, he will not be long. But if for a time he ſeem to tarry, yet ſtand you ſtill, and you ſhall ſee the wonderful works of the Lord. O my beloved, why ſhould you be heavy? Is not Chriſt Emmanuel, God with us? ſhall you not find that he is true in ſaying, "In the world you ſhall have trouble?" ſo is he in ſaying, "In me you ſhall have comfort." He doth not only foretel that trouble will come, but alſo promiſeth that comfort ſhall enſue. And ſuch comfort as the eye hath not ſeen, the ear hath not heard, neither can the heart of man conceive. O great comfort! who ſhall have this? verily they that ſuffer for the Lord, as I hope you do. Then, as I ſaid, happy, happy, and happy again are you, my dearly beloved in the Lord. You now ſuffer with the Lord, ſurely you ſhall be glorified with him. Now we are both in the ready road to heaven: for by many afflictions we muſt enter in thither, whither God bring us for his mercies ſake, Amen, Amen.

Your fellow in affliction,
John Bradford.

To Mrs. Elizabeth Brown.

GOOD ſiſter, God make perfect the good he hath begun in you unto the end.

I am

I am afraid to write to you, becauſe you ſo overcharge yourſelf at all times, even whenſoever I do but ſend commendations to you. I would be more bold to you than many others, and therefore you might ſuſpend ſo great tokens till I ſhould write to you of my need. Dear ſiſter, I ſee your unfeigned kindneſs to me, which I do recompenſe with the like, and will do by God's grace ſo long as I live, and therefore I hope not to forget you, but to remember you in my prayers, as I hope you do me. Otherwiſe I can do you no ſervice, except it be now and then by my writing to hinder you from better exerciſe; though the end of my writing is to excite and ſtir up your heart more earneſtly to go forwards in your well-begun enterprize. For you know none ſhall be crowned but ſuch as ſtrive lawfully, and none receiveth the prize but thoſe that run to the appointed mark. None ſhall be ſaved but ſuch as perſiſt and continue to the end.

Therefore, dear ſiſter, remember that we have need of patience, that when we have done the good will of God, we may receive the promiſe. Patience and perſeverance are the proper notes, whereby God's children are known from counterfeits. Many make good beginnings, yea their progreſs ſeemeth marvellous, but yet in the end they fail. Theſe were never of us, ſaith St. John, for if they had been of us, they would have continued to the end.

Go forward therefore, my beloved in the Lord, as you have well begun, ſo well perſevere, and happily end, and then all is yours. Though this be ſharp and ſour, yet it is not tedious and long. Accuſtom yourſelf now to ſee God continually, that he may be all in all unto you. In good things behold his mercy, and apply it to yourſelf. In evil things and plagues behold his judgments, whereby learn to fear him. Beware of ſin, as the ſerpent of the ſoul, which ſpoileth us of all our ornament and ſeemly apparel in God's ſight. Let Chriſt crucified be your book to ſtudy on, and that both night and day. Mark your vocation, and be diligent in the works thereof. Uſe earneſt and hearty prayer, and that in ſpirit. In all things give thanks to God our Father through Chriſt. Labour to have life everlaſting begun in you here: for elſe it will not be enjoyed elſewhere. Set God's judgments often before your eyes, that now examining yourſelf you may make diligent ſuit, and obtain never to come into judgment. Uncover your evils to God, that he may cover them. Beware of this Antichriſtian traſh: defile not yourſelf therewith in ſoul or body, but accompliſh holineſs in the fear of God, and bear no yoke with unbelievers. God our Father accompliſh his good work in you, Amen. Commend me to my good mother Mrs. Wilkinſon, and to my very dear ſiſter Mrs. Warcup. I ſhall daily commend you all to God, and I pray you do the like for me.

John Bradford.

MY good brother, our merciful God and dear Father through Chriſt, open your eyes effectually to ſee, and your heart ardently to deſire the everlaſting joy which he hath prepared for his ſlaughter-ſheep, that is, for ſuch as ſhrink not from his truth for any ſuch ſtorm ſake, Amen.

When you ſhall come before the magiſtrates to give an anſwer of the hope that is in you, do it with all reverence and ſimplicity. And if you are afraid of the power and cruelty of the magiſtrates, ſet before you the example of good father Moſes; for he ſet the inviſible God before the eyes of his faith, and with them he looked upon God and his glorious majeſty and power, as with the eyes of his body he ſaw Pharaoh and all his frightful terrors. So do you, my dearly beloved: let your inward eyes give ſuch light unto you, that as you are before the magiſtrates, ſo, and much more, are you and they preſent before the face of God, who will give you ſuch wiſdom as the enemies ſhall be amazed at: and further, he will ſo order their hearts and doings, that they ſhall, whether they will or no, ſerve God's providence towards you (which you cannot avoid though you would), as ſhall be moſt to his glory, and your everlaſting comfort.

The chief matter they will trouble you for, and go about to deceive you withal, is the ſacrament, not of Chriſt's body and blood, but of the altar, as they call it, thereby deſtroying the ſacrament which Chriſt inſtituted. I would have you note theſe two things:

Firſt, That the ſacrament of the altar which the prieſt offereth in the maſs, and eateth privately by himſelf, is not the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood inſtituted by him; as Chriſt's inſtitution plainly written, and ſet down in the ſcriptures, being compared with their uſing of it, evidently doth declare.

Again, If they talk with you of Chriſt's ſacrament inſtituted by him, whether it be Chriſt's body or no: anſwer them, That as to the eyes of your reaſon, to your taſte and corporal ſenſe it is bread and wine, and therefore the ſcripture calleth it ſo, even after conſecration: but to the eyes, taſte, and ſenſe of your faith, which aſcendeth into heaven where Chriſt ſitteth, it is in very deed Chriſt's body and blood, which ſpiritually your ſoul feedeth on to everlaſting life, in faith and by faith, even as your body preſently feedeth on the ſacramental bread and ſacramental wine.

By this means, as you ſhall not allow tranſubſtantiation, nor none of their popiſh opinions: ſo ſhall you declare the ſacrament to be a matter of faith, and not of reaſon, as the papiſts make it. For they deny God's omnipotence, in ſaying that Chriſt is not there if bread be there: but faith looketh on the omnipotency of God, joined with his promiſe, and doubteth not but that Chriſt is able to give us what he promiſeth ſpecially by faith, the bread ſtill remaining in ſubſtance, as well as if the ſubſtance of bread were taken away: for Chriſt ſaith not in any place, this is no bread. But in theſe things God will inſtruct you, if you rely on his promiſe, and pray for the power and wiſdom of his Spirit, which may he grant unto us both, and to all his people, for his name ſake, through Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

John Bradford.

A Letter to certain godly Men, whom he exhorteth to be patient under the Croſs, and conſtant in the true Doctrine which they had profeſſed.

MY dearly beloved in the Lord, as in him I wiſh you well to fare, ſo I pray God that I and you may continue in his true ſervice, that we may perpetually enjoy the ſame welfare, as here in hope, ſo in heaven indeed, and eternally.

You know this world is not your home, but a pilgrimage, a place where God trieth his children; and therefore as it neither doth nor can know you, ſo I hope you know not it, that is, you allow it not, nor in any point will ſeem ſo to do, although you may be moved thereto on many occaſions. For this ſun that now ſhineth, is ſo burning hot, that the corn which is ſown upon ſand and ſtony ground, beginneth to wither, that is, many who before were taken for hearty goſpellers, do now, for fear of trouble, begin to fall away, and turn to their vomit again, thereby declaring that they were not of us, for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us, and neither for loſs nor gain have left us, either in word or deed. As for their hearts (which undoubtedly are double, and therefore in danger of God's curſe), we have as much with us as the papiſts have with them, and more too by their own judgment. They deceive themſelves in thinking that they may inwardly love the truth, and outwardly curry favour in ſeeming to like the contrary. What though with my body, ſay they, I do this or that? God knoweth my heart is whole with him.

Ah brother, if thy heart be whole with God, why doſt thou not confeſs and declare thyſelf accordingly by word and deed? That which thou ſayeſt, thou believeſt in thine heart, is either good or not: if it be good, why art thou aſhamed of it? if it be evil, why doſt thou keep it in thine heart? Is not God able to defend thee, adventuring thyſelf for his cauſe? or will he not defend his worſhippers? Doth not the ſcripture ſay, that the eyes of the Lord are on them that fear him, and truſt in his mercy; to deliver their ſouls from death, and to feed them in the time of hunger?

If this be true, as certainly it is, why are we afraid of death, as though God could not comfort and deliver us; or, contrary to his promiſe, would not? Why are we afraid of the loſs of our goods, as though God would leave them that ſeek him deſtitute of all good things? Ah faith, faith, how few feel thee now-a-days? Full truly ſaid Chriſt, that he ſhould ſcarcely find faith when he came on earth. For if men believed theſe promiſes, they would never do any thing outwardly which inwardly they diſallow. No example of men, how many ſoever they be, or how learned ſoever they be, can prevail in this behalf: for the pattern which we muſt follow is Chriſt himſelf, and not the greater company or cuſtom. His word is the lantern to lighten our ſteps, and not learned men. Company and cuſtom are to be conſidered according to the thing they allow. Learned men are to be liſtened to and followed according to God's law, for elſe the greater part goeth to the devil. As cuſtom cauſeth error and blindneſs, ſo learning, if it be not according to the light of God's word, is poiſon, and learned men moſt pernicious. The devil is called Dæmon for his cunning, and the children of the world are much wiſer than the children of light in their generation: and I know that the devil and his agents have for the moſt part more helps in this life than Chriſt's church and her children. The devil and his ſynagogue have cuſtom, multitude, unity, antiquity, learning, power, riches, honour, dignity and promotions plenty, as always they have had, and commonly will have more than the true church until the coming of Chriſt: for the glory, riches and honour of this true church is not here; but her trial, croſs and warfare is here.

And therefore, I pray you, conſider theſe things accordingly. Conſider what you be; not worldlings, but God's children. Conſider where you be; not at home, but in a ſtrange country. Conſider with whom you are converſant; even in the midſt of your enemies, and of a wicked generation, and then, I hope, you will not much muſe at your affliction; which you cannot be without, being as you be, God's children, in a ſtrange country, and in the midſt of your enemies, unleſs you would leave your captain Chriſt, and follow Satan for the dung and droſs of this world, reſt and quietneſs, which he may promiſe you, and you indeed may think ye ſhall receive it, by doing as he would have you: but he is a lyar, he is not able to pay what he promiſeth. Peace and war come from God, riches and poverty, wealth and woe. The devil hath no power but by God's permiſſion. If then God permit him a little on your goods, body or life, that cannot much hurt you if ye be followers of godlineſs, as St. Peter ſaith. God will certainly remember you in his time as ſhall make moſt for your comfort. Can a woman forget the child of her womb? and if ſhe ſhould, yet will I not forget thee, ſaith the Lord. Look upon Abraham in his exile and miſery, look upon Jacob, Joſeph, Moſes, David, the prophets, apoſtles, and all the godly from the beginning; and, my good brethren, is not God the ſame God? You have heard of the patience of Job, ſaith St. James, and you have ſeen the end, how that God is merciful, patient and long-ſuffering: even ſo ſay I unto you, that you ſhall find accordingly if that you ſet his word always before you, and live according to it; and if he lay his croſs on you, you bear it with patience.

Therefore I heartily beſeech you, and out of my bonds which I ſuffer for your ſake, intreat you, that you would cleave in heart and humble obedience to the doctrine taught you by me, and many other brethren. For we have taught you no fables nor tales of men, but the very word of God, which we are ready to confirm with our lives, and by the ſhedding of our bloods, in all patience and humble obedience to the ſuperior powers, to teſtify and ſeal up, as well that you might be more certain of the doctrine, as that you might be ready to confeſs the ſame before this wicked world; knowing that if we confeſs Chriſt and his truth before men, he will confeſs us before his Father in heaven; but if we be aſhamed hereof for loſs of life, friends or goods, he will be aſhamed of us before his Father and his holy angels in heaven.

Therefore take heed, for the Lord's ſake take heed, and defile not your bodies or ſouls with this Romiſh and antichriſtian religion ſet up amongſt us again: but come away, come away, as the angel crieth, from amongſt them in their idolatrous ſervice, leſt you be partakers of their iniquity.

Uſe much and hearty prayer for the Spirit of wiſdom, knowledge, humbleneſs, meekneſs, ſobriety and repentance; which we have great need of, becauſe our ſins have thus provoked the Lord's anger againſt us: but let us bear his anger, and acknowledge our faults with bitter tears, and ſorrowful ſighs, and doubtleſs he will be merciful to us after his wonted mercy through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, to whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour and glory, praiſe, and everlaſting thanks, from this time forth for evermore, Amen.

Out of priſon by yours to command,

John Bradford.

A Letter to Mr. George Eaton.

ALmighty God our heavenly Father, recompenſe abundantly into your boſom, here and eternally, my dearly beloved, the good which from him by you I have continually received ſince my coming into priſon. Other ways can I never be able to requite your loving kindneſs here, than by praying for you, and after this life by witneſſing your faith declared to me by your fruits when we ſhall come and appear together before the throne of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whither I thank God I am even now going, always expecting the officers to come and ſatisfy the precept of the prelates, whereof though I cannot complain, becauſe I have juſtly deſerved an hundred thouſand deaths at God's hands by reaſon of my ſins, yet I may and muſt rejoice, becauſe the prelates do not perſecute in me mine iniquities, but Chriſt Jeſus, and his verity.

And becauſe they can do him no hurt (for he ſitteth in heaven, and laugheth them and their devices to ſcorn, as one day they ſhall feel), therefore they turn their rage upon his poor ſheep, as Herod their Father did upon the infants, Matt. 2. Great cauſe therefore have I to rejoice, that my dear Saviour Chriſt will vouchſafe, amongſt many, to chuſe me to be a veſſel of grace to ſuffer in me (who have deſerved ſo often and juſtly to ſuffer for my ſins), that I might be moſt aſſured I ſhall be a veſſel of honour, in whom he will be glorified.

As for the doctrine which I have profeſſed and preached, I do confeſs unto you in writing, as to the whole world I ſhall ſhortly by God's grace in ſuffering, that it is the very true doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, of his prophets, apoſtles, and all good men: ſo that if an angel ſhould come from heaven and preach otherwiſe, the ſame were accurſed.

Therefore waver not, dear brother in the Lord, but be confirmed in his truth, and as your vocation requireth, when when God ſo will, confeſs it, though it be dangerous ſo to do. The end will evidently ſhew another manner of pleaſure for ſo doing, than tongue can tell. Be diligent in prayer, and watch therein. Reverently read God's word. Set the ſhortneſs of this time before your eyes, and let not the eternity that is to come, depart out of your memory. Practiſe in your lives what you learn by reading and hearing. Decline from evil, and purſue good. Remember them that be in bonds, eſpecially for the Lord's cauſe, as members of your body, and fellow-heirs of grace. Forget not the afflictions of Sion, and the oppreſſion of Jeruſalem; and God our Father will give us his continual bleſſing through Chriſt our Lord, who guide us as his dear children for ever, Amen.

And thus I take my farewel of you, dear brother, for ever in this preſent life, till we ſhall meet in eternal bliſs; whither our good God and Father bring us ſhortly, Amen. God bleſs all your babes for ever, Amen.

Out of priſon the 8th of February.

Your afflicted brother for the cauſe,

John Bradford.

Another Letter to Mrs. Anne Warcup.

ALmighty God our heavenly Father for his Chriſt's ſake, increaſe in us faith, by which we may more and more ſee what glory and honour is repoſed and ſafely kept in heaven, for all them that believe with the heart, and confeſs Chriſt and his truth with the mouth, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I remember that ſome time ago I took my leave of you upon conjecture: but now indeed I bid you farewel, upon certain knowledge. My ſtaff ſtandeth at the door, I continually look for the ſheriff to come for me, and I thank God I am ready for him. Now I go to confirm that which I preached. Now I am climbing up the hill, it will cauſe me to puff and blow before I come to the cliff: The hill is ſteep and high, my breath is ſhort, and my ſtrength is feeble: pray therefore to the Lord for me, that as I have now through his goodneſs come almoſt to the top, I may by his grace be ſo ſtrengthened as not to reſt till I come where I ſhould be. O loving Lord, put out thy hand and draw me unto thee: for no man cometh, but he whom the Father draweth. See, my dearly beloved, God's loving mercy: he knoweth my ſhort breath, and my great weakneſs. As he ſent for Elias in a fiery chariot, ſo ſendeth he for me: for by fire my droſs muſt be purified, that I may be fine gold in his ſight. O unthankful wretch that I am! Lord, do thou forgive me mine unthankfulneſs. Indeed I confeſs that my ſins have deſerved hell-fire, much more than this fire. But lo, ſo loving is my Lord, that he converteth the remedy for my ſins, the puniſhment for my tranſgreſſions, into a teſtimonial of his truth, and a teſtification of his verity, which the prelates do perſecute in me, and not my ſins: therefore they perſecute not me, but Chriſt in me, who I doubt not will take my part unto the very end, Amen.

O that I had ſo open an heart, as could receive this great benefit and unſpeakable dignity as I ſhould, which God my Father offereth to me! Now pray for me, my dearly beloved, pray for me that I never ſhrink. I ſhall never ſhrink, I hope. I truſt in the Lord I ſhall never ſhrink: for he that always hath taken my part, I am aſſured will not leave me when I have moſt need, for his truth and mercy ſake. O Lord, help me. Into thy hands I commend me wholly. In the Lord is my truſt, I care not what man can do unto me, Amen. My dearly beloved, ſay you Amen alſo, and come after if God ſo call you. Be not aſhamed of the goſpel of Chriſt, but keep company with him ſtill. Uſe hearty prayer, reverently read and hear God's word, put it in practice: look for the croſs, lift up your hands, for your redemption draweth nigh; know that the death of God's ſaints is precious in his ſight. Be merry in the Lord, pray for mitigation of his heavy diſpleaſure upon our country. God keep us for ever, God bleſs us with his ſpiritual bleſſings in Chriſt. And thus I bid you farewel for ever in this preſent life. Pray for me, for God's ſake pray for me. God make perfect his good work begun in me,

John Bradford.

In the ſtory of Mr. Bradford (p. 247.) there was mention made of a gentlewoman, who being troubled by her father and mother for not coming to maſs, ſent her ſervant to viſit Mr. Bradford in priſon; who tendering the woful caſe of the gentlewoman, to the intent partly to confirm her with counſel, and partly to relieve her oppreſſed mind with ſome comfort, directed unto her the following letter.

To a certain Gentlewoman, troubled and afflicted by her Parents for not coming to Maſs.

I Wiſh you, right worſhipful, and dearly beloved ſiſter in the Lord, as to myſelf, the continual grace and comfort of Chriſt, and of his holy word, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, that you may continue to the end in the faithful obedience of God's goſpel whereto you are called, Amen.

I underſtand you are on your trial in the ſchool-houſe of the Lord, which to me is a great comfort to ſee the number of God's elect by you increaſed, who are in that ſtate whereof God hath not called many, as St. Paul ſaith. May God of his infinite goodneſs finiſh and perfect the good he hath begun in you!

If then your croſs be to me a comfort, a token of your election, and a confirmation of God's continual favour, how much more ought it to be ſo unto you! unto whom he hath not only given to believe, but alſo to come into the rank of thoſe who ſuffer for his name's ſake, and that not by common enemies, but even by your own parents and kindred, as you told me. By which I ſee Chriſt's words to be true. That he came to give his children ſuch a peace with him, as the devil cannot abide, and therefore he ſtirreth up father and mother, ſiſter and brother, rather than it ſhould continue. But, my dear ſiſter, if you cry with David to the Lord, and complain to him; that for conſcience to him your father and mother have forſaken you, you ſhall hear him ſpeak in your heart, that he hath received you, and by this he would have you ſee, that he maketh you like unto Chriſt here, that in heaven you may perfectly enjoy him, when Chriſt ſhall appear, you ſhall be like unto him; for he ſhall make your vile body like unto his glorious and immortal body, according to the power whereby he is able to do all things. He will confeſs you before his Father, who do not deny his verity in word nor deed before your Father; he will make you to reign with him, who now ſuffer for him and with him; he will not leave you comfortleſs, who ſeek no comfort but at his hand: tho' for a little time you be afflicted, yet therein will he comfort and ſtrengthen you, and at length make you to be merry with him in ſuch joy as is infinite and endleſs. He will wipe all the tears from your eyes: he will embrace you as your dear huſband; he will, after he hath proved you, crown you with a crown of glory and immortality, ſuch as the heart of man ſhall never be able to conceive in ſuch ſort as the thing is. He now beholdeth your ſtedfaſtneſs, and ſtriving to do his good will; and ſhortly he will ſhew you how ſtedfaſt he is, and will be ready to do your will, after that you have fully reſigned it to his.

Pledge him in his cup of the croſs, and you ſhall pledge him in the cup of his glory. Deſire to drink it before it be come to the dregs, whereof the wicked ſhall drink, and all thoſe that for fear of the croſs and pledging the Lord, do walk with the wicked, in betraying in fact and deed that which their heart embraceth for verity. Which thing if you ſhould do (which God forbid), then you will not only loſe all that I have before ſpoken, and much more infinitely of eternal joy and glory, but alſo be a caſt-away, and partaker of God's moſt heavy diſpleaſure for ever; and ſo for a little eaſe, which you cannot tell how long it will laſt, to loſe for ever and ever all eaſe and comfort. For "He that gathereth not with me, ſaith Chriſt, ſcattereth abroad." According to that we do in this body, we ſhall receive, be it good or bad. If of our words we ſhall be judged to condemnation or ſalvation, much more then of our facts and deeds. You cannot be a member of Chriſt's church, and a member of the pope's church. You muſt glorify God not only in ſoul and heart, but alſo in body and deed. God eſteemeth his children not only of their hearts, but of their pure hands and works, and therefore in Elias's time he accounted none to be his ſervants and people, but ſuch as had not bowed their knees to Baal; as now he doth not in England account any other to be his ſervants, which know the truth in heart, and deny it in their deeds, as do our maſs-goſpellers.

We ought to deſire above all things the ſanctifying of God's holy name, and the coming of his kingdom; and ſhall we then ſee his name blaſphemed ſo horribly as it is at maſs, by making it a ſacrifice propitiatory, and ſetting forth a falſe Chriſt made by prieſts and bakers to be worſhipped as God, and ſay nothing? The Jews rent their cloaths aſunder in ſeeing or hearing any thing blaſphemouſly done or ſpoke againſt God, and ſhall we yet come to church where maſs is, and be mute? Paul and Barnabas rent their cloaths to ſee the people of Lycaonia come to offer ſacrifice unto them, and ſhall we ſee ſacrifice and God's ſervice done to an inanimate creature, and be ſilent? What thing helpeth more, or ſo much Antichriſt's kingdom, as the maſs doth? And what deſtroyeth preaching and the kingdom of Chriſt upon earth more than it doth? And how can we then ſay, Let thy kingdom come, and go to maſs? How can we pray before God, Thy will be done on earth, when we will do our own will, and the will of our father or friends? How pray we, Deliver us from evil, which knowing the maſs to be evil, do come to it?

But what need I go about to light a candle in the noonday, that is, to tell you that we may not go to maſs, or to the congregation where it is, except it be to reprove it, in that all men in ſo doing do but diſſemble both with God and man? And is diſſembling now to be allowed? "How long will men yet halt on both knees, ſaith God? Halting, ſaith Paul, bringeth out of the way," that is to ſay, out of Chriſt, who is the way: ſo that he which is not in him ſhall wither away, and be caſt into hell-fire. For Chriſt will be aſhamed of them before his Father, who are now aſhamed of his truth before this wicked generation.

Therefore, my good miſtreſs, take good heed, for it had been better for you not to have known the truth, and thereby to have eſcaped from papiſtical uncleanneſs, than now to return to it, making your members, being members of righteouſneſs, members of unrighteouſneſs, as you do if you do but go to the church where maſs is. Be pure therefore, and keep yourſelf from all filth of the ſpirit, and of the fleſh. Abſtain not only from all evil, but from all appearance of evil.

And ſo the God of peace ſhall be with you, the glory of God ſhall govern you, the Spirit of God ſhall ſanctify you, and be with you for ever, to keep you from all evil, and to comfort you in all your diſtreſs and trouble; which is but ſhort if you conſider the eternity you ſhall enjoy in glory and felicity in the Lord, which undoubtedly you will not fail to inherit for ever, if you put your truſt in God's mercy, call upon his name unfeignedly, and conſent not with the wicked world, but remain ſtedfaſt againſt it unto the end. God for his holy name ſake, who is properly the God of the widows, be your good and dear Father for ever, and help you always, Amen, Amen.

John Bradford.

To a Perſon by whom he had received Comfort and Relief in his Impriſonment.

THE mercy of God in Chriſt, peculiar to his children, be evermore felt by you, my dearly beloved in the Lord, Amen,

When I conſider with myſelf the benefits which God hath ſhewed unto me by your means, if I had ſo good and thankful a heart as I wiſh I had, I could not with dry eyes give him thanks; for certainly they are very many and great. And now being yet ſtill the Lord's priſoner, I receive from him more benefits by you. For which I think myſelf ſo much bound to you, my good brother (although you were but the inſtrument by whom God wrought and bleſſed me), that I look not to come out of your debt by any pleaſure or ſervice that I ſhall ever be able to do you in this life. I ſhall heartily pray unto God therefore to requite you the good you have done to me for his ſake: for I know that which you have done, you have done it ſimply in reſpect of God and his word. May he therefore give you grace to be daily more and more confirmed in his truth and word, and plentifully pour upon you the riches of his Holy Spirit and heavenly treaſures laid up in ſtore for you, that your corporal and earthly riches may be uſed by you as ſacraments and ſignifications thereof; the more to deſire the one, that is, the heavenly, and the leſs to eſteem the other, that is, the earthly. For Satan's ſolicitation is, ſo to ſet before you the earthly, that therein and thereby you ſhould not have acceſs to the conſideration of the heavenly, but as one bewitched ſhould utterly forget them, and altogether become a lover and worſhipper of the earthly Mammon, and ſo to fall to covetouſneſs and a deſire to be rich, by that means to bring you into many noiſome and hurtful luſts: as now-a-days I hear of many who have utterly forſaken God and all his heavenly riches, for Antichriſt's pleaſure, and the preſerving of their worldly pelf, which they imagine to leave to their poſterity, whereof they are uncertain, as they may be moſt certain they leave to them God's wrath and vengeance if they in time heartily repent not, and prevent not the ſame by earneſt prayer. Wherein, my good brother, if you be diligent, hearty, and perſevere, I am ſure God will preſerve you from evil, and from yielding yourſelf to do as the world now doth, by allowing in bodily fact in the Romiſh ſervice, that which the inward cogitation and mind doth diſallow. But if you be cold in prayer, and come into conſideration of earthly and preſent things ſimply, then ſhall you fall into faithleſs follies and wounding of your conſcience; from which God evermore preſerve you, with your good wife, and your babe Leonard, and all your family, to which I wiſh the bleſſing of God now and for ever, through Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

I pray give thanks for me to your old bed-fellow, for his great friendſhip for your ſake ſhewed to me when I was in the Tower.

John Bradford.

Mr. Bradford's Letter to a faithful Friend and his Wife, reſolving their Doubt, why they ought not to come to auricular Confeſſion.

THE merciful God, and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who loveth us as a moſt dear Father, keep you, my dear brother Nathanael, and your good yoke-fellow, my heartily beloved ſiſter in the Lord, in all things now and for ever, to his glory and your eternal comfort; and alſo of his goodneſs may he grant you both the the feeling of that hope, which undoubtedly he hath laid up in ſtore for you both, infinitely ſurpaſſing all the ſtore and proviſion that this world is able to make for you; but I beſeech him to increaſe it more and more, and kindle in you a hearty longing for the enjoyment of the ſame; which when once felt, it would ſo animate and enliven us, that the means whereby we come to this bleſſed end, will not appear dreadful: but the cauſe why moſt men dread theſe means, is either the want of this feeling, or elſe the things of this preſent world do ſo dazle their eyes and attract their affections, that they cannot find in their hearts to part with them.

For auricular confeſſion, wherein you deſire my advice for your wife and family, my dear brother, I am as ready to give it as you are to deſire it; yea more ready, for I had half a ſuſpicion that you and your wife (eſpecially your wife) were tired of my advice, as if I had given you too much; whereas indeed I ſhould lament my too little care in feeding you ſpiritually, ſince you have ſpared no pains, both in priſon and out of priſon, to feed me corporally.

Auricular confeſſion, as it was firſt uſed and inſtituted (which was by way of aſking counſel), I take to be amongſt thoſe traditions which are in themſelves indifferent, that is, it may be done, or it may be left undone, unleſs it giveth offence to the weak brethren, and then it ought to be avoided, for we learn by St. Paul that things may be lawful that are not at all times expedient. But to conſider it, as it is now uſed (I write to you as I think, and what my own mind is; which follow no further than good men by God's word do allow), to conſider it, I ſay, as it is now uſed, methinks it is plainly unlawful and wicked, and that for theſe cauſes.

Firſt, Becauſe they make it a ſervice of God, and a thing which pleaſeth God of itſelf, not to ſay meritorious: my brother the bearer, can tell you at large how great an evil this is.

Secondly, Becauſe they make it of neceſſity, ſo that he or ſhe that uſeth it not, is not taken for a good chriſtian.

Thirdly, Becauſe it requireth of itſelf an impoſſibility, that is, the numbering and telling of all our ſins, which no man can conceive, much leſs utter.

Fourthly, Becauſe it eſtabliſheth and confirmeth, at leaſt alloweth, praying to ſaints; Precor Sanctam Mariam, you muſt ſay, or the prieſt for you.

Fifthly, Becauſe it is very injurious to the liberty of the goſpel, which to affirm in example and fact, I take to be a good work, and dear in the ſight of God.

Sixthly, Becauſe (as it is uſed) it is a note, yea, a very ſinew of the popiſh church; and therefore we ſhould be ſo far from allowing the ſame, that we ſhould think ourſelves happy to loſe any thing in bearing witneſs againſt it.

Seventhly, Becauſe inſtead of counſel, thereat ye ſhall receive poiſon, or if you refuſe it under Sir John's Benedicite, you ſhall no leſs there be wound in the briars.

Eighthly, Becauſe the end and purpoſe of your going thither is to avoid the croſs, that is for our own cauſe, and not for Chriſt's cauſe or the edification of our brethren. For in that they make it ſo neceſſary a thing, and a worſhipping of God, it cannot but be againſt Chriſt and the freedom of his goſpel: and the ſame thing teacheth us, that it is diſadvantageous to our brethren, who either be weak, or ſtrong, or ignorant, or obſtinate. If they be weak, by your reſorting to it, they be made more weak: if they be ſtrong, you do what you can to decreaſe their ſtrength: if they be ignorant, thereby you help to keep them ſo: if they be obſtinate, your reſorting to it cannot but rock them to ſleep in their obſtinate error of the neceſſity of this rite and ceremony. Theſe cauſes recited do ſhew you what I think in this: but my thinking muſt no farther bind you than a man's thought ſhould do, except the ſame be grounded upon God's word which bindeth indeed, as I think they do. I doubt not but you weighing theſe cauſes, and eſpecially two of the firſt and the laſt, if you pray to God for his Spirit to direct you, and likewiſe aſk the advice of this my good brother, and other godly learned men, I doubt not, I ſay, but you will be guided to that which is beſt in God's ſight, although in the ſight of the world perhaps you ſhould be counted fooliſh and preciſe. But be at a point with yourſelves as the diſciples of Chriſt (who had forſaken themſelves), to follow not your own will, but God's will, as you daily pray in the Lord's prayer.

The croſs of Chriſt be willing to carry, leſt you carry the croſs of the world, the fleſh, or the devil. One of theſe four croſſes you muſt carry. Three of them bringeth to hell, and therefore the greater part goeth that way. Only the fourth bringeth to heaven, and few walk in it becauſe it is ſtrait. However if it be ſtrait, it is but ſhort; and the few are many, if you conſider the godly, as the patriarchs, prophets, apoſtles, martyrs, confeſſors, and Chriſt Jeſus; with all his guard and train. Do not ſcorn to follow thoſe who are gone before, and thoſe that are now going, of which number I hope I am appointed to be one, and I beſeech you pray for me that God would make me worthy of that honour. Our ſins deſerve plagues, priſon, and the loſs of all that ever we have: therefore if God remove our ſins out of ſight, and ſend us priſon, and loſs of goods and living for his name's ſake, O how happy are we! Conſider this, and be aſſured, that he who loſeth any thing for him ſhall find it in his poſterity, both here and in heaven. As for your unableneſs to anſwer for your faith; it ſhall be enough for them to diſpute with your teachers. Faith ſtandeth not in diſputing. I think few, if it came to diſputing, could defend the Godhead of Chriſt, and many other articles; I ſpeak it for the ſimple ſort. Pray for me. Lack of paper maketh this end. Commend me to my good brother R. B. and my good ſiſter his wife. I pray them to pray for me. I truſt by this bearer to hear how you do.

John Bradford.

To Auguſtine Barneher.

MINE own good Auguſtine, the Lord of mercy bleſs thee, my dear brother, for ever. I have good hope, that if you come late at night, I ſhall ſpeak with you, but come as ſecretly as you can: Howbeit, in the mean ſeaſon, if you can, and as you can learn what Mr. G. hath ſpoke to Dr. Story and other. The cauſe of all this trouble both to my keeper and me, is thought to come by him. It is ſaid that I ſhall be burned in Smithfield, and that ſhortly. The Lord's will be done. Behold here I am, Lord, ſend me. Ah my own ſweet friend, I am now alone, leſt I ſhould make you and others worſe. If I ſhould live, I would more warily uſe the company of God's children, than ever I have done. I will bear the Lord's anger, becauſe I have ſinned againſt him. Commend me to my moſt dear ſiſter for whom my heart bleedeth, the Lord comfort her and ſtrengthen her unto the end. I think I have taken my leave of her for ever in this life, but in eternal life we ſhall moſt ſurely meet, and praiſe the Lord continually. I have now taken a more certain anſwer of death than ever I did: and yet not ſo certain as I think I ſhould do. I am now as a ſheep appointed to the ſlaughter. Ah my God, the hour is come, glorify thy moſt unworthy child. I have glorified thee, ſaith this my ſweet Father, and I will glorify thee, Amen. Ah mine own bowels, praiſe God for me, and pray for me, for I am his hope: I hope he will never forſake me, though I have above all others moſt deſerved it. I am the moſt ſingular example of his mercy, praiſed be his name for ever. Cauſe Mrs. Perpoint to learn of the ſheriff Mr. Cheſter, what they purpoſe to do with me; and know if you can, whether there be any writ for me. I am like to an owl in the houſe, and as a ſparrow alone in the houſe-top. Ah my Auguſtine, how long ſhall God's enemies thus triumph? I have ſent you this of the baptiſm of children to write out; when this is done, you ſhall have other things. Pray, pray, my own dear heart, on whom I am bold. The keeper telleth me that it is death for any to ſpeak with me, but yet I truſt that I ſhall ſpeak with you.

John Bradford.

To theſe letters of Mr. Bradford, here is alſo adjoined another, written to ſome of his faithful friends, worthy to be read by all chriſtians; wherein is deſcribed a lively compariſon between the old man and the new; alſo between the law and the goſpel.

A Letter of Mr. Bradford, deſcribing a Compariſon between the Old Man and the New, &c.

A Man that is regenerate and born of God (which that every one of us be, our baptiſm, the ſacrament of regeneration, doth require under pain of damnation, and therefore let every one of us ſay with the virgin Mary, "Be it unto me, O Lord, according to thy word," according to the ſacrament of baptiſm, wherein thou haſt declared our adoption; and let us lament the doubting hereof in us, ſtriving againſt it as we ſhall be made able by the Lord), a man, I ſay, that is regenerate, conſiſteth of two men (as a man may ſay) namely of the old man and of the new man. The old man is like to a mighty giant, ſuch a one as was Goliah, for his birth is now perfect. But the new man is like to a little child, ſuch a one as was David, for his birth is not perfect until the day of his general reſurrection.

The old man therefore is more ſtrong, luſty, and ſtirring than the new man, becauſe the birth of the new man is now begun, and the old man is perfectly born. And as the old man is more active, luſty and ſtrong than the new man; ſo is the nature of him clean contrary to the nature of the new man, as being earthly and corrupted with the ſeed of Satan; the nature of the new man being heavenly, and bleſſed with the celeſtial ſeed of God. So that inaſmuch as the old man is corrupt with the ſeed of the ſerpent, ſo is the new man bleſſed with the ſeed of God from above. And as the old man is a ſinner, and an enemy to God, ſo inaſmuch as he is regenerate, he is righteous and holy, and a friend to God, the ſeed of God preſerving him from ſin, ſo that he cannot ſin, as the ſeed of the ſerpent, wherewith he is corrupt even from his conception, inclineth him, yea enforceth him to ſin, and nothing elſe but to ſin: ſo that the beſt part in man before regeneration, in God's ſight, is not only an enemy, but even enmity itſelf.

A man therefore that is regenerate may well be called always juſt, and always ſinful; juſt, in reſpect of God's ſeed, and his regeneration; ſinful, in reſpect of Satan's ſeed and his firſt birth. Betwixt theſe two men there is continual conflict, and a deadly war. The fleſh and old man, by reaſon of his birth being perfect, doth often for a time prevail againſt the new man (being but a child in compariſon), and that in ſuch a manner, that even the children of God themſelves think that they be nothing elſe but old, and that the Spirit and ſeed of God is loſt and gone away; where yet notwithſtanding the truth is otherwiſe, the Spirit and the ſeed of God at length appearing again, and diſpelling the clouds which cover the ſun; ſo that ſometimes a man cannot tell by any ſenſe, that there is any ſun, the clouds and wind doth ſo hide it from our ſight: even ſo our blindneſs and corrupt affections do often ſhadow the ſight of God's ſeed in his children, as though they were downright reprobates. Whereof it cometh that they praying according to their ſenſe, but not according to the truth, deſire of God to give them again his Spirit, as though they had loſt it, and he had taken it away. Which thing God never doth indeed, although he make us to think ſo for a time; for he always holdeth his hand under his children in their falls, that they lie not ſtill as others do which are not regenerate. And this is the difference betwixt God's children which are regenerate and elect before all times in Chriſt, and the wicked always: that the elect lie not ſtill continually in their ſin, as the wicked do, but do at length return again by reaſon of God's ſeed, which is hid in them as a ſpark of fire in the aſhes, as we may ſee in Peter, David, Paul, Mary Magdalen, and others. For theſe (I mean God's children), God hath made all things in Chriſt Jeſus, to whom he hath given his dignity, that they ſhould be his inheritance and ſpouſes.

This our inheritor Chriſt Jeſus, God with God, Light of Light, co-eternal and conſubſtantial with the Father, and with the Holy Ghoſt, to the end that he might become our huſband (becauſe the huſband and the wife muſt be one body and fleſh), hath taken our nature upon him, communicating with it and by it in his own perſon, to us all his children, his divine majeſty (as St. Peter ſaith), and ſo is become fleſh of our fleſh, and bone of our bones ſubſtantially; as we are become fleſh of his fleſh, and bone of his bones ſpiritually, all that ever we have pertaining to him, yea even our ſins; as all that ever he hath pertaineth unto us, even his whole glory. So that if Satan ſhould ſummon us to anſwer for our debts or ſins, in that the wife is no ſueable perſon, but the huſband, we may well bid him enter his action againſt our huſband Chriſt, and he will make him a ſufficient anſwer.

For this end (I mean that we might be coupled and married thus to Chriſt, and ſo be certain of ſalvation, and at peace with God in our conſciences), God hath given his holy word, which hath two parts (as now the children of God do conſiſt of two men), one part of God's word being proper to the old man, and the other part of God's word being proper to the new man. The part properly pertaining to the old man is the law; the part properly pertaining to the new man is the goſpel.

The law is a doctrine which commandeth and forbiddeth, requiring doing and avoiding. Under it therefore are contained all precepts, threatnings, promiſes upon conditions of our doing and avoiding, &c. The goſpel is a doctrine which always offereth and giveth, requiring faith on our behalf, not as of worthineſs, or as a cauſe, but as a certificate unto us, and therefore under it are contained all the ſweet promiſes of God; as, I am the Lord thy God, &c.

In thoſe that be of years of diſcretion, it requireth faith, not as a cauſe, but as an inſtrument, whereby we ourſelves may be certain of our good huſband Chriſt, and of his glory, and therefore when the conſcience feeleth itſelf diſquieted for fear of God's judgment againſt ſin, ſhe may in no wiſe look upon the doctrine pertaining to the old man, but on the doctrine only that pertaineth to the new man, in it not looking for that which it requireth, that is, faith, becauſe we never believe as we ſhould; but only on it which it offereth, and which it giveth, that is, on God's grace and eternal mercy and peace in Chriſt. So ſhall ſhe be in quiet, when ſhe looketh for it, altogether out of herſelf, in God's mercy in Chriſt Jeſus; in whoſe lap if ſhe lay her head with St. John, then is ſhe happy, and ſhall find quietneſs indeed. When ſhe feeleth herſelf quiet, then in God's name let her look on the law, and upon ſuch things as it requireth, thereby to bridle and keep down the old Adam, to ſlay that Goliah; from whom ſhe muſt needs keep the ſweet promiſes, being the bed wherein her ſpouſe and ſhe meet and lie together. For as the wife will keep her bed only for her huſband, although in other things ſhe is contented to have fellowſhip with others, as to ſpeak, ſit, eat, drink, go, &c. ſo our conſciences, which are Chriſt's wives, muſt needs keep the bed, that is, God's ſweet promiſes only for ourſelves and our huſband, there to meet together, to embrace and be joyful together. If ſin, the law, the devil, or any thing would creep into the bed, and lie there, then complain to thy huſband Chriſt, and forthwith thou ſhalt ſee him play Phineas's part. Thus, my dearly beloved, I have given you in few words a ſum of all the divinity which a chriſtian conſcience cannot want.

A Letter written to his Mother as a Farewel, when he thought he ſhould have ſuffered ſhortly after.

THE Lord of life and Saviour of the world, Jeſus Chriſt, bleſs you and comfort you, my good and dear mother, with his heavenly comfort, conſolation, grace and ſpirit, now and for ever, Amen.

If I thought that daily, yea almoſt hourly you did not cry upon God the Father through Jeſus Chriſt, that he would give me his bleſſing, even the bleſſing of his children, then would I write more about it. But foraſmuch as I am certain you are diligent herein, ſo I beſeech you, good mother, to continue; I think it good to write ſomething, whereby this your crying might be furthered. Furthered it will be, if thoſe things which hinder it be taken away. Among which, in that I think my impriſonment is the greateſt and chiefeſt, I will ſpend this letter about it, and that briefly, leſt it might increaſe the hindrance, as my good brother this meſſenger can tell you. You ſhall know therefore, good mother, that for my body, though it be in an houſe, out of which I cannot come when I will, yet in that I have conformed my will to God's, I find herein liberty enough, I thank God. And for my lodging, bedding, meat, drink, pious and learned company, books, and all other neceſſaries for mine eaſe, comfort and convenience, I am in much better caſe than I could wiſh, and God's merciful providence here is far above my worthineſs. Worthineſs, ſaid I? Alas, I am worthy of nothing but damnation.

But beſides all this, for my ſoul I find much more advantage. For God is my Father, I now perceive, through Chriſt; therefore in impriſoning me for his goſpel, he maketh me like to the image of his Son Jeſus Chriſt here, that when he cometh to judgment, I might then be like unto him, as my truſt and hope is I ſhall be. Now he maketh me like to his friends the prophets, apoſtles, the holy martyrs and confeſſors. Which of them did not ſuffer at the leaſt impriſonment or baniſhment for his goſpel and word?

Now, mother, how far am I unworthy to be compared to them? I (I ſay) which always have been, and am ſo vile an hypocrite and grievous ſinner. God might have cauſed me long before this time to have been caſt into priſon as a thief, a blaſphemer, an unclean liver, and an heinous offender of the laws of the realm; but dear mother, his mercy is ſo great upon you and all that love me, that I ſhould be caſt into priſon for none of theſe or for any ſuch vices, but only for Chriſt's ſake, for his goſpel's ſake, for his churches ſake, that thereby as I might learn to lament and bewail my ingratitude and ſins, ſo I might rejoice in his mercy, be thankful, look for eternal joy with Chriſt, for whoſe ſake, praiſed be his name for it, I now ſuffer, and therefore ſhould be merry and glad. And indeed, good mother, ſo I am as ever I was, yea, never ſo merry and glad was I, as now I ſhould be, if I could get you to be merry with me, to thank God for me, and to pray on this ſort: "Ah good Father, who doſt vouchſafe that my ſon, being a grievous ſinner in thy ſight, ſhould find this favour with thee, to be one of thy Son's captains and men of war to fight and ſuffer for his goſpel's ſake, I thank thee, and pray thee, in Chriſt's name, that thou wouldſt forgive him his ſins and unthankfulneſs, and make perfect in him that good which thou haſt begun; yea, Lord, I pray thee, make him worthy to ſuffer not only impriſonment, but even death itſelf, for thy truth, religion, and goſpel ſake. As Anna did apply and give her firſt child Samuel unto thee, ſo do I, dear Father, beſeeching thee for Chriſt's ſake to accept this my gift; and give my ſon John Bradford grace, always truly to ſerve thee and thy people, as Samuel did, Amen, Amen."

Good mother, mark what I have written, and learn this prayer by heart, uſe it ſincerely every day, and then I ſhall be merry, and you ſhall rejoice if you continue, as I truſt you do, in God's true religion, even the ſame I have taught you, and my father Traves I hope will put you in remembrance of: my brother Roger, I doubt not, daily doth ſo. Go on therefore, and learn apace. Although the devil caſteth divers ſnares in the way, God in whom you truſt, will caſt them away for his Chriſt's ſake, if you will call upon him; and never will he ſuffer you to be tempted farther than he will enable you to bear. But how you ſhould do herein, the other letter which I have written herewith, ſhall teach you, which I would have nobody read till my father Traves hath read it, and he will give you, by God's grace, ſome inſtructions.

Now therefore will I make an end, deſiring you to expect no more letters: for if it were known that I have pen and ink, then ſhould I want all the other conveniences I have mentioned concerning my body, and be caſt into ſome dungeon in fetters of iron: which thing I know would grieve you, and therefore for God's ſake ſee that theſe be burned, when this little prayer in it is copied by my brother Roger: it may be your houſe may be ſearched for ſuch things, when you little think of it: and look for no more, ſweet mother, till either God ſhall deliver me, and ſend me out, or till you and I ſhall meet together in heaven, where we ſhall never part aſunder, Amen.

I require you Elizabeth and Margaret my ſiſters, that you will fear God, uſe prayer, love your huſbands, be obedient unto them, as God requireth you: bring up your children in God's fear: and be good houſewives. God bleſs you both, with both your huſbands, my good brethren, to whom to do good, becauſe I now cannot, I will pray for them and you. Commend me to my ſiſter Anne, mother Pike, Th. Sorrocold and his wife, R. Shalcroſs and his wife, R. Bolton, J. Wild, Mr. Vicar, the parſon Mottrom, Sir Laurence Hall, with all that love, and I hope, live in the goſpel; and God turn Sir Thomas his heart, Amen. I will daily pray for him. I need not ſet my name, you know it well enough.

Becauſe you ſhould give my letters to my father Traves to be burned, I have written here a prayer for you to learn to pray for me, and another for all your houſe in your evening prayer, to pray with my brother. Theſe prayers are written with mine own hand: keep them ſtill, but the letters give to father Traves to burn, and give him a copy of the latter prayer.

Another Letter to his Mother, being his laſt Farewel, a little before he was burnt.

GOD's mercy and peace in Chriſt, be more and more perceived of us, Amen.

My moſt dear mother, in the bowels of Chriſt I heartily pray and beſeech you to be thankful for me unto God, who now taketh me unto himſelf: I die not as a criminal, but as a witneſs of Chriſt, the truth of whoſe goſpel I have hitherto confeſſed, I thank God, both by preaching and impriſonment, and now I am willing to confirm the ſame by fire. I acknowledge that God might juſtly have taken me hence for my ſins (which are many, great, and grievous: but the Lord for his mercy in Chriſt, I hope, hath pardoned them all), but now, dear mother, he taketh me hence by this death, as a confeſſor and witneſs, that the religion taught by Chriſt Jeſus, the prophets and the apoſtles, is God's truth. The prelates in me do perſecute Chriſt, whom they hate, and his truth, which they will not abide, becauſe their works are evil. They do not care for the light, leſt men thereby ſhould diſcover their darkneſs. Therefore, my dear mother, give thanks to God for me, that he hath made the fruit of your womb to be a witneſs of his glory, and attend to the truth, which I have truly taught out of the pulpit of Mancheſter. Uſe often and continual prayer to God the Father, through Jeſus Chriſt. Hearken to the ſcriptures, and ſerve God according to them, and not according to the cuſtom: beware of the Romiſh religion in England; defile not yourſelf with it: carry the croſs of Chriſt as he ſhall lay it upon your back: forgive them that kill me: pray for them, for they know not what they do: commit my cauſe to God our Father: be mindful of both your daughters, and help them as well as you can.

I ſend all my writings to you and my brother Roger; do with them as you will, becauſe I cannot as I would, he can tell you more of my mind. I have nothing to give you, or to leave behind me for you: only I pray God my Father for Chriſt's ſake, to bleſs you, and keep you from evil. May he make you patient, and thankful that he will take the fruit of your womb to witneſs his truth; wherein I confeſs to the whole world, I die, and depart this life, in hope of a much better: which I look for at the hands of God my Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt.

Thus, my dear mother, I take my laſt farewel of you in this life, beſeeching the Almighty and eternal Father by Chriſt, to grant us to meet in the life to come, where we ſhall give him continual thanks and praiſe for ever and ever, Amen. Out of priſon, June 24, 1555.

Your Son in the Lord,
John Bradford.

A Letter of Supplication ſent to Queen Mary, her Council, and the whole Parliament.

IN moſt humble wiſe complaineth unto your majeſty and honours, a poor ſubject, perſecuted for the confeſſion of Chriſt's verity; which deſerveth your protection and encouragement, as the thing by which you reign and have your honour and authority, Although we that be profeſſors, and through the grace of God the conſtant confeſſors of the ſame, are, as it were, the outſweepings of the world: yet, I ſay, the truth itſelf is not a thing unworthy for your ears to hear, for your eyes to ſee, and for your hands to handle, help and ſuccour, as the Lord hath made you able, and placed you where you are, for the ſame purpoſe. Your highneſs and honours ought to know, that there is no innocency in words or deeds, where it is enough and ſufficient only to accuſe. It behoveth kings, queens, and all that be in authority, to know that in the adminiſtration of their kingdoms they are God's miniſters. It behoveth them to know, that they are not kings, but plain tyrants, who reign not to this end, that they may ſerve and ſet forth God's glory after true knowledge: and therefore it is required of them that they would be wiſe, and ſuffer themſelves to be taught, to ſubmit themſelves to the Lord's diſcipline, and to kiſs their Sovereign, leſt they periſh; as all thoſe Potentates, with their principalities and dominions cannot long proſper, but periſh indeed, if they and their kingdoms be not ruled with the ſcepter of God, that is, with his word; which whoſo honoureth not, honoureth not God, and they that honour not the Lord, the Lord will not honour them, but bring them into contempt, and at length take his own cauſe, which he hath chiefly committed to them to care for, into his own hands, and ſo overthrow them, and ſet up his truth glorioufly; the people alſo periſhing with the princes, where the word of prophecy is wanting, much more is ſuppreſſed, as it is now in this realm of England; over which the eyes of the Lord are ſet to deſtroy it, your highneſs, and all your honours, if in time ye look not better to your office and duties herein, and not ſuffer yourſelves to be ſlaves and hangmen to Antichriſt and his prelates, who have already brought your highneſs and honours in the mind to let Barabbas looſe, and to hang up Chriſt: as by the grace and help of God I ſhall make apparent, if firſt it would pleaſe your excellent majeſty, and all your honours, to take to heart God's doctrine, which rather through the malice of the phariſees, I mean the biſhops and prelates, than your conſciences, is oppreſſed: and not for our contemptible and execrable ſtate in the ſight of the world, to paſs the leſs of it. For this doctrine is higher, and of more honour and majeſty than all the whole world. It ſtandeth invincible above all power, being not our doctrine, but the doctrine of the ever living God, and of his Chriſt, whom the Father hath ordained King, to have dominion from ſea to ſea, and from the river unto the ends of the world. And truly ſo he doth and will reign, that he will ſhake all the whole earth with his iron and braſen power, with his golden and ſilver brightneſs, only by the rod of his mouth, to ſhivers, in ſuch a manner as though they were pots of clay, according to what the prophet writeth of the magnificence of his kingdom. And thus much for the doctrine, and your duties to hearken, to propagate, and defend the ſame.

But now will our adverſaries mainly cry out againſt us, becauſe no man may be admitted once to ſpeak againſt them, that we pretend falſely the doctrine and word of God, calling us the moſt wicked contemners of it, and heretics, ſchiſmatics, traitors, &c. All which their ſayings, how malicious and falſe they are, though I might refer to that which is written by thoſe men whoſe works they have condemned, and all that retain any of them, publicly by proclamation; yet here will I occaſion your majeſty and honours by this my writing, to ſee that it is far otherwiſe than they report of us. God our Father, for his holy name's ſake, direct my pen to be his inſtrument to put into your eyes, ears and hearts, that which moſt may make to his glory, to the ſafe-guard of your ſouls and bodies, and preſervation of the whole realm, Amen.

John Bradford.

To certain of his Friends, N. S. and R. C.

I Wiſh to you, my good brethren, the ſame grace of God in Chriſt, which I pray the Father of mercies to give me for his holy name's ſake, Amen.

Your letter, though I have not read myſelf, becauſe I would not alienate my mind from conceived things to write to others, yet I have heard the ſum of it, that it is of God's election; wherein I will briefly write to you my faith, and how I think it good and meet for a chriſtian man to wade in it.

I believe, that man, made after the image of God, did fall from that bleſſed ſtate to the condemnation of himſelf, and all his poſterity. I believe that Chriſt (for man being thus fallen) did oppoſe himſelf to the juſtice of God, a mediator, paying the ranſom and price of redemption for Adam and his whole poſterity that refuſe it not finally. I believe, that all who believe in Chriſt (I ſpeak of ſuch as be of years of diſcretion), are partakers of Chriſt and all his merits. I believe that faith, and to believe in Chriſt (I ſpeak not now of faith that men have by reaſon of miracles, John 2. 11. Acts 8. or by reaſon of earthly conveniences, Matt. 13. cuſtom and authority of men, which is commonly ſeen, the hearts of them that ſo believe, being not right and ſimple before God: but I ſpeak of that faith which indeed is the true faith, the juſtifying and regenerating faith), I believe, I ſay, that this faith and belief in Chriſt, is the work and gift of God, given to none but thoſe who are the children of God, that is, to thoſe whom God the Father before the beginning of the world hath predeſtinated in Chriſt to eternal life.

Thus

Thus do I wade in predeſtination, in ſuch a manner as he hath opened it. Though in God it be the firſt, yet to us it is the laſt opened. And therefore I begin with creation, from whence I come to redemption, ſo on to juſtification, and then to election. On this manner I am ſure, that warily and wiſely a man may walk in it eaſily by the light of God's Spirit, in and by his word, ſeeing this faith not to be given to all men, 2 Theſſ. 3. but to ſuch as are born of God, predeſtinate before the world was made, after the purpoſe and good will of God, which will we muſt not call in queſtion, but in fear and trembling ſubmit ourſelves to it, as to that which can will nothing otherwiſe than what is holy, juſt and good, how far ſoever it may ſeem otherwiſe to our reaſon, which muſt needs be beaten down to be more careful for God's glory, than for man's ſalvation which dependeth only thereon, as all God's children full well ſee: for they ſeek not the glory which cometh of men, but the glory which cometh of God, Jer. 9. John 5. They know God to be a God which doth on earth, not only mercy, but alſo judgment, which is his juſtice, and moſt juſt, although our fooliſh reaſon cannot ſee it. And in this knowledge they glory and rejoice, though others through vain curioſity grudge and murmur againſt it. Thus briefly I have ſent you my mind and meaning concerning this matter. Hereafter you ſhall have (I think) your letter particularly anſwered by Mr. Philpot; as alſo, if I have time, and you ſo require it, I will do.

John Bradford.

Notes upon the foregoing Epiſtle.

AS touching the doctrine of election (whereof this letter of Mr. Bradford, and many other his letters do much treat), three things muſt be conſidered.

1. What God's election is, and what is the cauſe thereof.

2. Secondly, How God's election proceedeth in working our ſalvation.

3. To whom God's election pertaineth, and how a man may be certain thereof.

Between predeſtination and election there is this difference: Predeſtination is as well to the reprobate as to the elect. Election pertaineth only to them that be ſaved.

Predeſtination, in that it reſpecteth the reprobate, is called reprobation: in that it reſpecteth the ſaved, is called election, and is thus defined:

Predeſtination is the eternal decreement of God, purpoſed before in himſelf, what ſhall befal all men, either to ſalvation or damnation.

Election is the free mercy and grace of God in his own will through faith in Chriſt his Son, chuſing and preferring unto life ſuch as pleaſeth him.

In this definition of election, firſt goeth before the mercy and grace of God, as the cauſes thereof, whereby are excluded all the works of the law, and merits of deſerving, whether they go before faith, or come after. So was Jacob choſen, and Eſau refuſed, before either of them began to work, &c.

Secondly, In that this mercy and grace of God in this definition is ſaid to be Free, thereby is to be noted the proceeding and working of God not to be bounded to any ordinary place, or to any ſucceſſion of chair, nor to ſtate and dignity of perſon, nor to worthineſs of blood, &c. but all goeth by the mere will of his own purpoſe. And thus was the outward race and ſtock of Abraham after the fleſh refuſed (which ſeemed to have the preheminence), and another ſeed after the Spirit raiſed up to Abraham of the ſtones, that is, of the Gentiles. So was the outward temple of Jeruſalem and chair of Moſes, which ſeemed to be of price, forſaken, and God's chair advanced in other nations. So was tall Saul refuſed, and little David accepted: the rich, the proud, the wiſe of this world rejected, and the word of ſalvation daily opened to the poor and miſerable abjects, the high mountains caſt under, and the low valleys exalted, &c.

Thirdly, Where it is added (in his own will) by this falleth down the free will and purpoſe of man, with all his actions, counſels, and ſtrength of nature; according as it is written, "It is not in him that willeth, nor in him that runneth, but in God that ſheweth mercy." So we ſee how Iſrael ran long, and yet got nothing. The Gentiles began to ſet out later, and yet got the game. So they which came at the firſt hour did labour more, and yet they which came laſt were rewarded with the firſt. The working will of the phariſee ſeemed better, but yet the Lord's will was rather to juſtify the publican. The elder ſon had a better will to tarry by his father, and ſo did indeed: and yet the fat calf was given to the younger ſon that ran away. Whereby we are to underſtand, how the matter goeth, not by the will of man, but by the will of God, as it pleaſeth him to accept; according as it is written, "Which are born not of the will of fleſh, nor yet of the will of man, but of God." Furthermore, as all then goeth by the will of God only, and not by the will of man: ſo again here is to be noted, that this will of God never goeth without faith in Chriſt Jeſus his Son.

And therefore, fourthly, is this clauſe added in the definition, through faith in Chriſt his Son. Which faith in Chriſt to us-ward maketh all together. For firſt, it certifieth us of God's election; as this epiſtle of Mr. Bradford doth well expreſs. For whoſoever will be certain of election in God, let him firſt begin with his faith in Chriſt: which if he find in him to ſtand firm, he may be ſure, and nothing doubt, but that he is one of the number of God's elect. Secondly, The ſaid faith, and nothing elſe, is the only condition and means whereupon God's mercy, election, vocation, and all God's promiſes to ſalvation do ſtay, according to the words of St. Paul, "If ye abide in the faith," Coloſſ. 1. Thirdly, This faith alſo is the immediate and next cauſe of our juſtification ſimply, without any other condition annexed. For as the mercy of God, his grace, election, vocation, and other precedent cauſes do ſave and juſtify us upon condition, If we believe in Chriſt: ſo this faith only in Chriſt without condition, is the next and immediate cauſe which by God's promiſe worketh our juſtification; according as it is written, "Believe in the Lord Jeſus, and thou ſhalt be ſaved, thou and thy whole houſe," Acts 16. And thus much touching the definition of election, with the cauſes thereof declared. Which you ſee now to be no merits nor works of man, whether they go before or come after faith, but only the mere mercy of God through faith. For like as all they that be born of Adam, do taſte of his malediction, though they taſted not his apple: ſo all they that be born of Chriſt (which is by faith) take part of the obedience of Chriſt, although they never did that obedience themſelves which was in him, Rom. 5.

Now to the ſecond conſideration, let us ſee likewiſe, how, and in what order this election of God proceedeth in chooſing and electing them which he ordaineth to ſalvation; which order is this. In them that be choſen to life, firſt God's mercy and free grace bringeth forth election; election worketh vocation, or God's holy calling, which vocation, through hearing, bringeth knowledge and faith of Chriſt. Faith through promiſe obtaineth juſtification, juſtification through hope waiteth for glorification.

Election is before time. Vocation and faith cometh in time. Juſtification and glorification is without end.

Election, depending upon God's free grace and will, excludeth all man's will, blind fortune, chance and all peradventures.

Vocation, ſtanding upon God's election, excludeth all man's wiſdom, cunning, learning, intention, power and preſumption.

Faith

Faith in Chriſt, proceeding by the gift of the Holy Ghoſt, and freely juſtifying man by God's promiſe, excludeth all other merits of men, all condition of deſerving, and all works of the law, both God's law and man's, with all other outward means whatſoever.

Juſtification cometh freely by faith, ſtandeth ſure by promiſe, without doubt, fear, or wavering in this life.

Glorification pertaining only to the life to come, by hope is looked for.

Grace and mercy preventeth.

Election ordaineth.

Vocation prepareth and receiveth the word, whereby cometh faith.

Faith juſtifieth.

Juſtification bringeth glory.

Election is the immediate and next cauſe of vocation.

Vocation (which is the working of God's Spirit by the word) is the immediate and next cauſe of faith.

Faith is the immed ate and next cauſe of juſtification.

And this order and connection of cauſes is diligently to be obſerved, becauſe of the papiſts, who have miſerably confounded and inverted this doctrine, thus teaching: That Almighty God ſo far forth as he foreſeeth man's merits before to come, ſo doth he diſpenſe his election: That the Lord recompenſeth the grace of election, not to any merits preceding; but yet granteth the ſame to the merits which follow: As though we had our election by our holineſs that followeth after, and not rather have our holineſs by God's election going before.

But we, following the ſcripture, ſay otherwiſe, that the only uſe of God's election, is his own free mercy; and the only cauſe of our juſtification is our faith in Chriſt, and nothing elſe. As for example; firſt concerning election, if the queſtion be aſked, Why was Abraham choſen, and not Nachor? Why was Jacob choſen, not Eſau? Why was Moſes elected, and Pharaoh hardened? Why was David accepted, and Saul refuſed? Why be few choſen, and the moſt forſaken? It cannot be anſwered otherwiſe but thus, Becauſe it was ſo the good will of God.

In like manner touching vocation, and alſo faith, if the queſtion be aſked, Why this vocation and gift of faith was given to Cornelius the Gentile, and not to Tertullus the Jew? Why to the poor, to the babes, and to the little ones of this world (of whom Chriſt ſpeaketh, "I thank thee, Father, who haſt hid this from the wiſe, &c." Matt. 11.) Why to the unwiſe, the ſimple abjects and out-caſts in this world? (of whom St. Paul ſpeak- 1 Cor. 1. "Ye ſee your calling, my brethren, how not many of you, &c.") Why to the ſinners, and not to the juſt? Why the beggars by the highways were called, and the bidden gueſts excluded? We can go to no other cauſe, but to God's purpoſe and election, and ſay with Chriſt our Saviour, "Yea, Father, for ſo it ſeemeth good in thy ſight," Luke 10.

And ſo for juſtification likewiſe, if the queſtion be aſked, Why the publican was juſtified, and not the phariſee? Luke 18. Why Mary the ſinner, and not Simon the inviter? Luke 11. Why harlots and publicans go before the ſcribes and phariſees in the kingdom? Matt. 21. Why the ſon of the free-woman was received, and the bond-woman's ſon, being his elder, was rejected? Gen. 21. Why Iſrael, which ſo long ſought for righteouſneſs, found it not? and the Gentiles, which ſought not for it, found it? Rom. 9. We have no other cauſe to render, but to ſay with St. Paul, Becauſe they ſought for it by works of the law, and not by faith: which faith, as it cometh not by man's will (as the papiſts falſely pretend), but only by the election and free gift of God; ſo it is only the immediate cauſe whereunto the promiſe of our ſalvation is annexed, according as we read; "And therefore of faith is the inheritance given, as after grace, that the promiſe might ſtand ſure to every ſeed," Rom. 4. Item, in the ſame chapter, "Faith, believing in him which juſtifieth the wicked, is imputed to righteouſneſs."

And thus concerning the cauſes of our ſalvation, ye ſee how faith in Chriſt, only and immediately, without any condition to juſtify us, being ſo linked with God's mercy and election, that whereſoever election goeth before, there faith in Chriſt muſt needs follow after. And again, whoſoever believeth in Chriſt Jeſus, through the vocation of God, he muſt needs be partaker of God's election.

Whereupon reſulteth now the third note or conſideration; which is, to conſider whether a man in this life may be certain of his election. To anſwer to which queſtion, this firſt is to be underſtood; That although our election and vocation ſimply indeed be known to God only in himſelf, A priore; yet notwithſtanding it may be known to every particular faithful man, A poſteriore; that is, by means, which means is faith in Chriſt Jeſus crucified. Foraſmuch as by faith in Chriſt a man is juſtified, and thereby made the child of ſalvation, reaſon muſt needs lead the ſame to be then the child of election, choſen of God unto everlaſting life. For how can a man be ſaved, but by conſequence it followeth, that he muſt alſo be elected?

And therefore of election it is truly ſaid, We muſt judge of election by that which cometh after; that is, by your faith and belief in Chriſt: which faith, altho' in time it followeth after election, yet this is the proper and immediate cauſe aſſigned by the ſcripture, which not only juſtifieth us, but alſo certifieth us of this election of God.

Whereunto likewiſe well agreeth this preſent letter of Mr. Bradford; wherein he ſaith, Election, albeit in God it be the firſt, yet to us it is the laſt opened. And therefore beginning firſt (ſaith he) with creation, I com from thence to the redemption and juſtification by faith and ſo to election. Not that faith is the cauſe efficient of election, being rather the effect thereof, but is to us the cauſe certificatory, or the cauſe of our certification, whereby we are brought to the feeling and knowledge of our election in Chriſt. For albeit that election firſt be certain in the knowledge of God; yet in our knowledge, faith only that we have in Chriſt, is the thing that giveth to us our certificate and comfort of this election.

Wherefore, whoſoever deſireth to be aſſured that he is one of the elect number of God, let him not climb up to heaven to know, but let him deſcend into himſelf, and there ſearch his faith in Chriſt the Son of God; which if he find to be ſincere and unfeigned, by the working of God's Holy Spirit accordingly: thereupon let him ſtay, and ſo wrap himſelf wholly, both body and ſoul, under God's general promiſe, and encumber his head with no other ſpeculations; knowing this, "That whoſoever believeth in him ſhall never periſh, John 3. Shall not be confounded, Rom. 9. Shall not ſee death, John 8. Shall not enter into judgment, John 5. Shall have everlaſting life, John 3. 7. Shall be ſaved, Matt. 28. Acts 16. Shall have remiſſion of all his ſins, Acts 10. Shall be juſtified, Rom. 3. Gal. 2. Shall have floods flowing out of him of water of life, John. 7. Shall never die, John 11. Shall be raiſed in the laſt day, John 6. Shall find reſt to his ſoul, and ſhall be refreſhed, Matt. 11."

Now then, foraſmuch as we ſee faith to be the ground whereupon dependeth the whole condition of our juſtifying, let us diſcuſs in like manner what is this faith whereof the ſcripture ſo much ſpeaketh, for the more plain underſtanding of the ſimple. For many kinds there be of faith: as a man may believe every thing that is true, yet not every truth doth ſave, neither doth the believing of every truth juſtify a man. He that believeth that God created all things of nought, believeth truly. He that believeth that God is a juſt God, that he is omnipotent, that he is merciful, that he is true of promiſe, believeth well, well, and holdeth the truth. So he that believeth that God hath his election from the beginning, and that he alſo is one of the ſame elect and predeſtinate, hath a good belief, and thinketh well: but yet this belief alone, except it be ſeaſoned with another thing, will not ſerve to ſalvation: as it availed not the old Jews, which ſo thought of themſelves, and yet think to this day to be only God's elect people.

Only the faith which availeth to ſalvation is that, whoſe object is the body and paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt crucified. So that in the act of juſtifying, theſe two, faith and Chriſt, have a mutual relation, and muſt always concur together; faith, as the action which apprehendeth; Chriſt, as the object which is apprehended.

For neither doth the paſſion of Chriſt ſave, without faith; neither doth faith help, except it be in Chriſt: as we ſee the body of man ſuſtained by bread and drink, not except the ſame be received and conveyed into the ſtomach: and yet neither doth the receiving of every thing ſuſtain man's body, except it be meat and drink, which have power to give nouriſhment. In like ſort it is with faith; for neither doth the believing of every thing ſave, but only faith in the blood of Chriſt: neither again doth the ſame blood of Chriſt profit us, except by faith it be received. And as the ſun, being the cauſe of all light, ſhineth not but to them only which have eyes to ſee; nor yet to them neither, unleſs they will open their eyes to receive the light: ſo the paſſion of Chriſt is the efficient cauſe of ſalvation, but faith is the condition whereby the ſaid paſſion is to us effectual.

And that is the cauſe why we ſay with the ſcripture, that faith only juſtifieth us, not excluding thereby all other external cauſes that go before faith, as grace, mercy, election, vocation, the death of Chriſt, &c. all which are external cauſes, working our ſalvation through faith. But when we ſay that faith only juſtifieth us, the meaning thereof is this; that of all internal actions, motions, or operations in man, given to him by God, there is none other that contenteth and pleaſeth God, or ſtandeth before his judgment or can help any thing to the juſtifying of man before him, but only this one action of faith in Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God.

For although the action of praying, faſting, alms, patience, charity, repentance, the fear and love of God, be high gifts in man, and not of man, given of God to man, yet be none of all theſe actions in man imputed of God to ſalvation, but only this one action of faith in man upon Chriſt Jeſus the Son of God. Not that the action itſelf of believing, as it is a quality in man, doth ſo deſerve, but becauſe it taketh that dignity of the object. For as I ſaid, the act of juſtifying faith, as it is an action in man, is not to be conſidered alone, but muſt ever go with his object, and taketh his virtue thereof. Like as the looking up of the old Iſraelites did not of itſelf procure any health unto them, but the promiſe made in the object, which was the braſen ſerpent, whereupon they looked, gave them health by their looking up: Even ſo after like ſort are we ſaved by faith and ſpiritual looking up to the body of Chriſt crucified. Which faith to define is this.

To believe Jeſus Chriſt to be the Son of the living God, ſent into this world, by his death to ſatisfy for our ſins, and ſo to receive the ſame.

And thus much touching election and faith; with the order and explication of the cauſes neceſſary to be conſidered in our ſalvation, whereby may appear how far the pretended catholics do ſwerve from the truth of the ſcriptures. For where the ſcriptures, in declaring the cauſes of ſalvation, do ſend us only to faith, as the only condition whereby theſe cauſes have their working, theſe catholics do quite leave out faith, and, inſtead thereof, place in other conditions of doings, merits, will-works, pardons, maſſes, and eſpecially auricular confeſſions, with penance, ſatisfaction for our ſins, &c.

Beſides theſe letters of Mr. John Bradford above ſpecified, there were other letters which he wrote to father Traves, miniſter of Blackley, long before he came into trouble, the ſubſtance of which being fully contained in his foregoing letters, and alſo becauſe we would make room for matter more agreeable, we chuſe to leave them out, as knowing them to tire the reader's patience. And now we proceed to the hiſtory of the martyrs.

William Minge, who died in Priſon.

THE next day after Mr. Bradford and John Leaf ſuffered in Smithfield, William Minge, prieſt, died in priſon at Maidſtone, being there in bonds for religion, and would (had he lived a little longer) alſo have ſuffered the fury of his adverſaries, whoſe nature was to ſpare and favour none that favoured Chriſt's pure goſpel: This William Minge with as great conſtancy and boldneſs yielded up his life in priſon, as if it had pleaſed God to have called him to ſuffer by fire, as other good and godly men had done before at the ſtake, as he himſelf was ready to do, had it pleaſed God to have called him thereunto.

James Treviſam, buried in the Fields.

UPON Sunday the third of July 1555. died one James Treviſam in the pariſh of St. Margaret in Lothbury, who being impotent and lame, kept his bed a long time. This Treviſam had a ſervant named John Small, who was reading in the Bible, when one Berd the promoter came to the houſe, and would needs go up ſtairs, where he found four perſons beſides him and his wife; to wit, the young man that read, and two men and a woman. All whom the ſaid Berd apprehended and carried to the Compter, where they remained about a fortnight, notwithſtanding all the friends they could make. Not only ſo, but the ſaid Berd intended to carry the poor lame bedridden man to Newgate in a cart (and brought a cart to the door for that purpoſe), had not the neighbours, who had a little more humanity, prevented that barbarous deſign. Nevertheleſs, the poor man was obliged to have two ſureties for his forth-coming, notwithſtanding he could not get out of his bed, being not only lame, but alſo very ſick at the ſame time. In a few days time he grew ſo ill that his life was not expected; and the parſon of the pariſh, one Mr. Farthing, came to viſit him, and had communication with him, and they both agreed very well in matters of religion, and ſo the parſon departed. No ſooner was he come down into the ſtreet, but he was met by one Toller a founder, who threatened to accuſe him for agreeing with Treviſam; for, ſaid the founder, he denieth the ſacrament of the altar. Upon that the parſon went to him again, and then they could not agree. And ſo the parſon went to the biſhop of London, and told him. The biſhop anſwered, that he ſhould be burnt; and if he were already dead, he ſhould be buried in a ditch. And when he was dead, the parſon ſhewed as much ſpite and ill nature to his poor ſorrowful widow as poſſibly he could, not ſuffering her to put him in a coffin, or any thing elſe, but were fain to carry him on a table to Moorfields, and there he was buried. The ſame night the body was taken up again, and the ſheet taken from him, and he left naked above ground. The owner of the field, ſeeing this, buried him again; a fortnight after the ſumner came to his grave, and ſummoned him to appear at Paul's before his ordinary, to anſwer to ſuch things as ſhould be laid againſt him. But what became of this affair afterwards, I cannot certainly ſay.

The Hiſtory of Mr. J. Bland, Preacher and Martyr.

THE 12th day of July, John Bland, John Frankeſh, Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphry Middleton, were all four burnt at Canterbury together for one cauſe. Of which number, Frankeſh and Bland were miniſters and preachers of the word of God, the one being parſon of Adeſham, the other the vicar of Rolvindon. Mr. Bland was a man ſo little born for his own advantage, that no part of his life was ſeparated from the common and public utility of all men. For his firſt doings were there employed to the bringing up of children in learning and virtue. Under whom were trained up ſeveral hopeful young men, which even at this preſent do handſomely flouriſh. In which number is Dr. Sands, a man of ſingular learning and worthineſs, as may well become a ſcholar for ſuch a ſchoolmaſter, whom I gladly here name for his ſingular gifts of virtue and erudition.

After this, he coming to the miniſtry in the church of God, or rather being called thereto, was inflamed with incredible deſire to profit the congregation, which may appear by this, that whereas he was caſt into Canterbury priſon for preaching of the goſpel, and delivered once or twice from thence at the interceſſion of his friends, yet he would preach the goſpel again as ſoon as he was delivered. Whereupon he being the third time apprehended, when his friends yet once again would have found means to have delivered him if he would promiſe to abſtain from preaching, he ſtood in it earneſtly, that he would admit no condition, notably well expreſſing unto us the manner and example which we read in the apoſtle St. Paul; "Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? Tribulation, or anguiſh, or hunger, or nakedneſs, or danger, or perſecution, or the ſword? &c." But to expreſs the whole life and actions of this pious martyr, ſeeing we have his own teſtimony concerning the ſame, it will be beſt to refer the reader to his own report, writing to his father the whole diſcourſe of his trouble, from the beginning almoſt to the latter end, in order and manner as ye ſhall hear.

An Account of the whole Proceedings againſt Mr. Bland, written and reported by himſelf to his Father in his own Letter, as followeth:

DEARLY beloved father in Chriſt Jeſus, I thank you for your gentle letters. And to ſatisfy your mind as concerning the troubles whereof you have heard, theſe ſhall both declare unto you all my vexations that have happened unto me ſince you were with me, and alſo ſince I received your laſt letters. God keep you ever.

Your ſon, John Bland.

FIRST, The third of September, being Sunday, after ſervice ended, ere I had put off my ſurplice, John Auſten came to the table (commonly called the Lord's table), and laid both his hands upon it, ſaying, Who ſet this here again? Now they ſay they took the table down the Sunday before, which I know not, neither do I know who ſet it up again. The clerk anſwered, that he knew not. Then, ſaid Auſten, he is a knave that ſet it here. I was then going down the church, marvelling what he meant, and ſaid, Goodman Auſten, the queen's highneſs hath ſet forth a proclamation that ye may move no ſedition: and before I could ſpeak any more, he ſaid, Thou art a knave: and I ſaid, Well, goodman Auſten, what I have ſaid, I have ſaid. By God's ſoul, quoth he, thou art a very knave. Then my clerk ſpake to him, but what I am not ſure. But he ſaid, Ye are both heretic knaves, and have deceived us in this manner too long already; and if ye ſay any ſervice here again, I will turn your tab'e upſide down; and in that rage he, with others, took the table and laid it on a cheſt in the chancel, and ſet the treſſels by it. Soon after I rode to Mr. Iſaac, and declared unto him how ſeditiouſly Auſten had behaved himſelf. Mr. Iſaac directed a warrant to the conſtable, which was immediately ſerved, ſo that he was brought before him the ſame night, and was bound by recognizance, with ſureties, to appear if he were called. But then we agreed ſo well, that he was never called for; the table was brought down, and was permitted as before.

The 26th of November, being Sunday, Richard Auſten and his brother Thomas came to the aforeſaid table after the communion was done, and as I was going by them, Richard ſaid unto me, Mr. Parſon, we want to ſpeak with you. And I ſaid, What is your will? And he ſaid, You know that you took down the tabernacle wherein the rood did hang, and ſuch other things: we would know what recompence you would make us: for the queen's proceedings are (as you know) that ſuch things muſt be put up again.

Quoth I, I know no ſuch proceedings as yet; and as for what I did, I did it by commandment.

No, ſaid Thomas Auſten, ye will not know the queen's proceedings.

Yes, ſaid I, I refuſe not to know them.

Then ſaid Richard, Ye are againſt the queen's proceedings; for you ſay there are abominable uſes and deviliſhneſs in the maſs.

Goodman Auſten, ſaid I, if I ſo ſaid, I will ſay it again, and, God willing, ſtand to the proof of it.

Maſters all, quoth Richard Auſten, bear record of theſe words; and went his way.

Quoth Thomas Auſten, Thou wilt as ſoon eat this book as ſtand to them. No, quoth I, not ſo ſoon.

Tell us, quoth he, what deviliſhneſs is in the maſs? I have often preached it unto you, ſaid I, and ye have not believed it, nor borne it away, nor will now neither, though I ſhould tell you.

Thou (quoth he) haſt told us always like an heretic as thou art. Now ye lye, goodman Auſten, quoth I, by your leave. Marry, ſaid he, thou lyeſt. And I ſaid, And you lye, for I have taught you Chriſt and his truth.

Quoth he, Thou art an heretic, and haſt taught us nothing but hereſy: for thou canſt ſay nothing that is true.

Yes, goodman Auſten, I can ſay that God is in heaven, and ye will ſay (I hope) that it is true, and ſo have I taught you truly.

Quoth he, Thou haſt taught us like an heretic, and haſt ſaid, that there is no devil in hell.

Well, ſaid I, lye on; methinks you can ſay little truth. Many other taunts he gave, too long to write. And at laſt he ſaid, Ye pulled down the altar, will ye build it again? No, ſaid I, except I be commanded; for I was commanded to do that I did.

Well, if you will not, ſaid he, then will I. For I am churchwarden.

I charge you, ſaid I, that you do not, except you have authority. I will not, ſaid he, be hindered by your charge. For we will have a maſs here on Sunday, and a preacher that ſhall prove thee an heretic, if thou dare abide his coming.

Yes, ſaid I, God willing, I will abide and hear him; for ſure I am that he cannot diſprove any doctrine that I have preached.

Yes, ſaid he, and that thou ſhalt hear, if thou run not away ere then.

No, goodman Auſten, I will not run away. Marry, ſaid he, I cannot tell; thou art as like as not. With many more words we came out of the church, and ſo departed.

When Sunday came, I looked for our preacher, and at the time of morning prayer I ſaid to the clerk, Why do ye not ring? ye forget that we ſhall have a ſermon today.

day. No, quoth he, Mr. Miles's ſervant hath been here this morning, and ſaid, his maſter hath letters from my lord chancellor, that he muſt go to London, and cannot come. That day I preached to them a ſermon in his ſtead. Now have they ſlandered me, that I had prepared a company from divers places to have troubled him: but they agreed not in their lye. For ſome ſaid, I had them at Adeſham, and that Richard Auſten had knowledge, and ſent for the conſtable to ſee the peace kept, which is found a lye. Others ſaid, I had them lying in wait for him between Canterbury and Adeſham. Others ſaid, I had them in both places, that if the one miſſed, the other ſhould not. God forgive them all. Now upon theſe two matters they boaſt, that they ſent two bills of complaint to the council. Wherefore by the advice of friends, I made this teſtimony, and ſent it up by Mr. Wiſeman.

The Behaviour of John Bland, Parſon of Adeſham, in the County of Kent, on Sunday, the third day of December laſt, containing the Words which he there ſpake unto the People.

WHereas upon certain communication had between the ſaid parſon and Richard Auſten, and Thomas Auſten, in the preſence of all the pariſh of Adeſham, the Sunday before St. Andrew's day laſt, the ſaid Auſten then declared, that the ſaid parſon had taught there in times paſt great hereſies, which to confound, they would prepare a preacher againſt the next Sunday following, if ſo be the ſaid parſon would abide, and not run away: Upon which rumour, divers perſons reſorted out of the country, unto the ſaid pariſh church, at the day appointed, there to hear the preacher; and at the time in which the ſermon ought to be made, no man appeared there to preach: but it was reported to the parſon, that the preacher appointed had urgent buſineſs, and could not come. So that the multitude being now come together, the ſame parſon perceiving that the people's expectation was defrauded, ſaid, Foraſmuch as you are willingly come to hear ſome good advertiſement of the preacher who cannot be now preſent, I think it not convenient to let you depart without ſome exhortation for your edification. And further declaring that he had no licence to preach, ſaid, That he would not meddle with any matter in controverſy. And then he began the epiſtle for the day, deſiring the audience to mark three or four places in the ſaid epiſtle, which touched of quietneſs and love to one another: and there briefly reading the epiſtle, he noted the ſame places, and ſo making an end thereof deſired all men to depart quietly and in peace, as they did, without any manner of diſturbance, or token of evil.

Witneſſes they undernamed, with divers others.

Another Matter of Trouble wrought againſt John Bland, as appeareth by his own Narration.

UPON Innocents day, being the 28th of December, they had procured the prieſt of Stodmaſh to ſay maſs; he had nigh made an end of mattins ere I came; and when he had ended them, he ſaid to me, Mr. Parſon, your neighbours have deſired me to ſay mattins and maſs; I hope ye will not be againſt the queen's proceedings. No (quoth I) I will offend none of her majeſty's laws, God willing. What ſay ye? quoth he, and made as though he had not heard: and I ſpake the ſame words to him again with an higher voice; but he would not hear, though all the reſt in the chancel heard: I ſpake ſo loud the third time, that all the church might hear, That I would not offend the queen's laws. And then he went to maſs; and when he was reading the epiſtle, I called the clerk unto me, with the beckoning of my finger, and ſaid unto him, I pray you deſire the prieſt when the goſpel is done, to tarry a little, I have ſomething to ſay to the people; and the clerk did ſo.

And the prieſt came down into the ſtall where he ſat; and I ſtood up in the chancel door, and ſpake to the people of the great goodneſs God always ſhewed unto his people, unto the time of Chriſt's coming; and in him and his coming, what benefit they paſt, we preſent, and our ſucceſſors have; and among other benefits I ſpake of the great and comfortable ſacrament of his body and blood. And after I had briefly declared the inſtitution, the promiſe of life to the good, and damnation to the wicked, I ſpake of the bread and wine, affirming them to be bread and wine after the conſecration, as yonder maſs-book, ſaying, Holy bread of eternal life, and the cup of perpetual ſalvation. So that like as our bodily mouths eat the ſacramental bread and wine, ſo doth the mouth of our ſouls (which is our faith), eat Chriſt's fleſh and blood. And when I had made an end of that, I ſpake of the miſuſe of the ſacrament in the maſs; ſo that I judged it in that uſe no ſacrament, and ſhewed how Chriſt bid us all eat and drink; and in the maſs one only eateth and drinketh, and the reſt kneel, knock, and worſhip: and after theſe things ended, as briefly as I could, I ſpake of the benefactors of the maſs, and began to declare who made the maſs, and recited every man's name, and the patch that he put to the maſs; but before I had rehearſed them all, the churchwarden the conſtable, his ſon-in-law, violently came upon me and took my book from me, and pulled me down, and thruſt me into the chancel, with an exceeding roar and cry. Some cried, Thou heretic; ſome, Thou traitor; ſome, Thou rebel; and when every man had ſaid his pleaſure, and the rage was ſomething paſt, Be quiet, good neighbours, ſaid I, and let me ſpeak to you quietly. If I have offended any law, I will make anſwer before them that are in authority to correct me. But they would not hear me, and pulled, one on this ſide, and another on that, and began again. Then Richard Auſten ſaid, Peace, maſters, no more till maſs be done, and they ceaſed. Then I ſaid to the churchwarden and the conſtable, each holding me by the arm; Maſters, let me go into the church-yard till your maſs be done. No, ſaid the churchwarden, thou ſhalt tarry here till maſs be done. I will not, quoth I, but againſt my will. And they ſaid, Thou ſhalt tarry, for if thou go out thou wilt run away. Then I ſaid to the conſtable, Lay me in the ſtocks, and then ye will be ſure of me, and turned my back to the altar. By that time Richard Auſten had deviſed what to do with me, and called to the conſtable and the churchwarden, and bade them put me into a ſide chapel, and ſhut the door to me, and there they made me tarry till maſs was ended. When the maſs was ended, they came into the chapel to me, and ſearched what I had about me; and found a dagger, and took it from me. Then ſaid Tho. Auſten, churchwarden, after many brabblings that they made with me, Thou keepeſt a wife here amongſt us, againſt God's law and the queen's. Ye lye, goodman Auſten, ſaid I, it is not againſt God's law, nor, as I ſuppoſe, againſt the queen's. Thus they brought me out of the church, and without the door they railed on me without pity or mercy: but anon the prieſt came out of the church, and Ramſey that of late was clerk, ſaid unto him, Sir, where dwell you? And therefore Thomas Auſten took him by the arm, and ſaid, Come on, ſirrah, you are of his opinion, and took his dagger from him, and ſaid, he ſhould go with him. I am content, ſaid he, and a little mocked them in their envious talk. By this time John Gray of Wingham, ſervant to John Smith, came in at the church ſtile, and ſeeing them hold Ramſey by the arms, ſaid to him, How now, Ramſey, have you offended the queen's laws? No, quoth he. Then there is no tranſgreſſion. Therewith Thomas Auſten took him, and ſaid, Ye are one of their opinion, ye ſhall go with them for company, and took his dagger from him, and then demanded what he did there? But after (I think) for very ſhame they let him go again. But they carried me and Ramſey to Canterbury, guarded with eighteen perſons. A ſheet of paper will not hold the talk that we had that night with Mr. Hardes juſtice, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Spilman, and Mr. Tutſam.

The next day they made a bill againſt me, but it ſerved not their purpoſe, which was, that they would have had me to priſon. But James Chapman, and Bartholomew Joyes were bound in twenty pounds each of them for my appearance at the next general ſeſſions, or in the mean time to appear, if I were ſent for before the queen's majeſty's council, or any other commiſſioners ſent by the queen's authority. And Ramſey was bound to the peace, and to be of good behaviour till the next ſeſſions. His ſureties were Thomas Hogeking and Simon Barrat.

Now the 23d or 24th of February, Sir Thomas Finch, knight, and Mr. Hardes, ſent for me and my ſureties to Mr. Finch's place, and took me from my ſureties, and ſent me to the caſtle of Canterbury, by Sir Thomas Moyles's order, as they ſaid, where I lay ten weeks, and then was bail'd, and bound to appear at the next ſeſſions holden at Canterbury; but after, they changed it to be at Aſhford, on Thurſday in Whitſun-week, being the nineteenth of May: but in the mean time the matter was exhibited to the ſpiritual court.

The firſt Examination of Mr. John Bland in the Spiritual Court, before Dr. Harpsfield, Archdeacon of Canterbury, and Mr. Collins Commiſſary.

THE 18th day of May, Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, obliged the mayor's ſerjeant to bring me before him and Mr. Collins commiſſary, into Chriſt's-church, and they took me into a chamber in the ſuffragan of Dover's houſe.

Then the archdeacon ſaid, Art thou a prieſt? And I ſaid, I was one. And he ſaid, Art thou a graduate of any univerſity? And I ſaid, Yea. What degree, ſaid he, haſt thou taken? The degree, quoth I, of Maſter of Arts. The more pity, quoth he, that thou ſhouldeſt behave thyſelf as thou haſt done. Thou haſt been a common licenſed preacher, haſt thou not? And I ſaid, I have been ſo. Marry, quoth he, ſo I underſtand.

Harpſ. What haſt thou preached?

Bland. God's word, to the edifying of his people.

Harpſ. No, no, to the deſtruction both of thy ſoul and theirs too, if the mercy of God be not ſpeedily extended towards you. I pray thee tell me what thou haſt preached?

Bland. I told you already what I have preached.

Harpſ. Nay, but tell me what one matter haſt thou preached to the edifying of the people, as thou ſayeſt?

Bland. I will tell you no particular matter; for I perceive you would have ſome matter againſt me.

Harpſ. No, by my faith, I only deſire to win thee from the hereſies thou art bewrapt in, and haſt infected others withal. For thou haſt preached, as I am informed, that the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar is not the real body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt after the conſecration. Tell me, haſt thou not thus preached? and is not this thine opinion?

Bland. Sir, I perceive, as I ſaid before, that ye ſeek ſome matter againſt me. But ſeeing that I am bound in the ſeſſions to my good behaviour for preaching, which may be broken with words, and well I know not with what words; and alſo both mine authority to preach, and my living are taken from me, I think I am not bound to make you an anſwer.

Collins. Mr. Bland, do you not remember, that St. Peter biddeth you make anſwer to every man that aſketh you a reaſon of the faith that is in you?

Bland. I know that, and am content ſo to anſwer as that text biddeth: but I know that Mr. Archdeacon doth not aſk me after that manner, but rather to bring me into trouble. Then they ſaid, No, ye ſhall not be troubled for any thing that ye ſay here.

Bland. I am content for knowledge ſake to commune with you in any matter, but not otherwiſe. And ſo they fell to reaſoning for the ſpace of an hour, of the ſacrament, both againſt me. At laſt Mr. Collins ſaid, Mr. Bland, will you come and take in hand to anſwer ſuch matters on Monday next as ſhall be laid to you?

Bland. Sir, ye ſaid I ſhould not be troubled for any thing that ſhould be ſaid here for learning's ſake. And they ſaid, Ye ſhall not, but it is for other matters.

Bland. Sir, I am bound to appear, as ſome tell me, on Thurſday next at Aſhford; I am in doubt whether I can or no: yet have I purpoſed to be there, and ſo to go to London to Mr. Wiſeman, for an obligation that he hath, whereby I ſhould receive ſome money to pay my debts withal. Then ſaid Mr. Archdeacon, I will write to Mr. Wiſeman, that ye ſhall ſuſtain no loſs.

Bland. That ſhall not need: for I can ſuſtain no great loſs if I go not. But I pray you let me have a longer day. No, quoth he.

Bland. Sir, I cannot well come on Monday.

Harpſ. Wilt thou not come when he ſo gently ſpeaketh to thee, where he may command thee?

Bland. I do not deny to come, but I deſire a longer day.

Harpſ. Thou ſhalt have no other day: I charge thee to come on Monday.

Bland. Sir, I perceive it ſhall be for this or like matters: will it pleaſe you, or Mr. Collins, for God's ſake, to confer ſcriptures privately with me in this matter, ſeeing ye ſay ye would ſo gladly win me?

Harpſ. With all my heart will I take the pains, and I will alſo borrow my lord of Dover's library, to have what books thou wilt: and thus they departed. Now the 17th of May at Aſhford I could not be releaſed, although I was called to the Spiritual Court for that purpoſe, but was bound to appear at the ſeſſions held at Crambroke the third of July.

Another Appearance of Mr. Bland before the Archdeacon and his Fellows.

ON the 21ſt of May I appeared in the chapter-houſe, where was a great multitude of people, unlooked for by me, and Mr. Archdeacon ſaid thus to me; Ye are come here according as ye were appointed; and the cauſe is, that it hath pleaſed the queen's highneſs here to place me, to ſee God's holy word ſet forth, and to reform thoſe that are here fallen into great and heinous errors, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the decay of Chriſt's ſacraments, and contrary to the faith of the catholic church, whereof thou art notably known to be one that is ſore poiſoned with the ſame, and haſt infected and deceived many with thy evil preaching; which if thou wilt renounce, and come home again to the catholic church, both I and many others would be very glad: and I for my part ſhall be right glad to ſhew you the favour that lieth in me, as I ſaid unto you when you were appointed hither, becauſe ye then refuſed to ſatisfy again the people that ye have deceived. And whereas it is feigned by you, that I ſhould openly diſpute the matter with you this day; although I did neither ſo intend or appoint, yet I am content to diſpute the matter with thee, if thou wilt not without diſputation help to heal the ſouls that are brought to hell-ward by thee. What ſayeſt thou?

Bland. I do proteſt before God and you all, that neither is my conſcience guilty of any error or hereſy, neither that I ever taught any error or hereſy willingly. And where your matterſhip ſaith, That I have feigned an open diſputation with you, it is not true, as I can thus prove: Upon Saturday I was at Ugden's, and there Mr. Bingham laid it to my charge, that ſuch an open diſputation, as you have here offered, ſhould be this day between you and me. Whereat I much marvelled, and ſaid to him, That before that preſent I never heard any ſuch word; neither would I anſwer nor diſpute: And Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Seth of Overland, and Mr. Ugden can witneſs to this; and further I ſaid to them, that I never ſpake to you of any diſputation, nor you to me. Now if your maſterſhip have any thing to ſay to me by the law, I will make anſwer to it.

Harpſ. Hear ye what he ſaith? His conſcience is clear. I pray thee whereon groundeſt thou thy conſcience? Let me hear what thy faith is?

Bland. I know not why ye ſhould aſk me a reaſon of my faith, more than any other man in this open audience?

Harpſ. Why, thou heretic, art thou aſhamed of thy faith? if it were a chriſtian belief, thou needeſt not to be aſhamed of it.

Bland. I am not aſhamed of my faith. For I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jeſus Chriſt his only Son our Lord, &c. with all the other articles of the creed; and I do believe all the holy ſcriptures of God to be moſt certain and true.

Harpſ. Wilt thou declare no more than this?

Bland. No.

Harpſ. Well, I will tell thee whereon I ground my faith: I do believe and ground my faith and conſcience upon all the articles of the creed, and upon all the holy ſcriptures, ſacraments, and holy doctors of the church, and upon all the general councils that ever were ſince the apoſtles time. Lo, hereupon ground I my faith; with many more words which I do not well remember.

And when he could get no other anſwer from me, than what I had ſaid before, he called for a ſcribe to make an act againſt me. And after much communication, I ſaid, By what law and authority will ye proceed againſt me? Mr. Collins ſaid, By the canon law.

Bland. I doubt whether it be in ſtrength or no. Yet I pray you let me have a counſellor in the law, and I will make anſwer according to the law.

Harpſ. Why, thou heretic, thou wilt not confeſs thy faith to me, that have authority to demand it of thee; and yet I have confeſſed my faith to thee before all this audience. As concerning the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, thou haſt taught, that after the conſecration it is bread and wine, and not the body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. How ſayeſt thou, haſt thou not thus taught?

Bland. Sir, as concerning this matter of the ſacrament, when I was with you and Mr. Collins, ye ſaid then it was for other matters that I ſhould come hither: and further, that ye would be content, at my deſire, to confer ſcriptures with me, to ſee if ye could win me; and ye ſaid, ye would borrow my lord of Dover's library, that I ſhould have what book I would; and now ye require me thus to anſwer, contrary to your promiſe before any conference be had, and ſeek rather to bring me into trouble, than to win me.

Harpſ. I will, as God ſhall help me, do the beſt to thee that I can, if thou wilt be any thing conformable; and I hope to diſſolve all thy doubts, if thou be willing to hear. And I alſo will deſire theſe two worſhipful men, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins, to hear us.

Bland. No, ye ſhall pardon me of that: there ſhall be no ſuch witneſs. But when we agree, ſet to our hands. Here the people made a noiſe againſt me, for refuſing the witneſs: and here we had many more words than I can rehearſe. But at laſt I ſaid, Sir, will ye give me leave to aſk you one queſtion? And he ſaid, Yea, with all my heart. For in that thou aſkeſt any thing, there is ſome hope that thou may'ſt be won.

Bland. Sir, when it pleaſed almighty God to ſend his angel unto the virgin Mary to ſalute her, and ſaid, "Hail, full of grace," &c. came any ſubſtance from God our Father into the virgin's womb to become man? Whereat Mr. Archdeacon, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins were ſilent. But my lord ſpake firſt, and ſaid, The Holy Ghoſt came to her; and ere he had brought out his ſentence, Mr. Syriac Peters ſaid, "The Power of the Moſt High overſhadowed her." Truth, ſaid Mr. Archdeacon, it was the power of God ſent by the Holy Ghoſt. They had forgot, that He was begotten of the Subſtance of his Father; or elſe they perceived whereunto this queſtion tended: and ſo both I and they left it, by what words I cannot tell. But I ſaid, Sir, ſhall I aſk one other? And he ſaid, Yea. Is there in the ſacrament, after the conſecration, Chriſt's natural body, with all the qualities of a natural body, or no?

Harpſ. Hark, ſaid Mr. Archdeacon, hear ye this heretic? He thinks it an abſurdity to grant all the quantities of Chriſt's natural body to be in the ſacrament. But it is no abſurdity: For even that natural body that was born of the virgin Mary is glorified, and that ſame body is in the ſacrament after the conſecration. But perceive ye not the arrogancy of this heretic, that will put me to anſwer him, and he will not anſwer me? He thought to put me to a pinch with his queſtion; for I tell you it is a learned queſtion.

Bland. If ye be ſo much diſcontented with me, I will ſay no more; yet I would all men heard, that ye ſay the glorified body of Chriſt is in the ſacrament after the conſecration.

Harpſ. I may call thee groſs ignorant. Thou groſs ignorant, is not the ſame body glorified, that was born of the virgin Mary? Is it then any abſurdity to grant that to be in the ſacrament? And while he ſpake many other words, I ſaid to Mr. Petit, That the ſacrament was inſtituted, delivered, and received of his apoſtles, before Chriſt's body was crucified; and it was crucified before it was glorified; which ſaying, Mr. Petit partly recited to Mr. Archdeacon.

Harpſ. Thou haſt no learning. Was not Chriſt's body given to his apoſtles, as in a glorified act? and yet no inconvenience, although his natural body was not crucified; for when he was born of the virgin Mary without pain, was not that the act of a glorified body? and when he walked on the water, and when he came into the houſe to his apoſtles, the doors being ſhut faſt, were not theſe acts of a glorified body?

Then my lord of Dover helped him to a better place; and ſaid, When Chriſt was in mount Tabor, he was there glorified in the ſight of his apoſtles.

Harpſ. You ſay truth, my lord, he was glorified in the ſight of three of his apoſtles.

Bland. This methinks is new doctrine.

Harpſ. Well, ſeeing he will by no other way be reformed, let the people come in and prove theſe matters againſt him. And thereupon the archdeacon brought forth a copy of the bill of complaint that was put up againſt me at Chriſtmas, and about that we had a little talk. And then Mr. Archdeacon roſe up, and ſaid, See ye, good people that know this matter, that ye come in, and prove it againſt him. Whereunto anſwered Thomas Auſten, I pray you let us be no more troubled with him; and then ſpake John Auſten, and Heath a one-eyed man, and began to accuſe me; but I gave them no other anſwer, but, Do to me what ye can by law, and I will anſwer it. Then ſaid Thomas Auſten, Bland, ye were once abjured. Ye ſay not truly, goodman Auſten, ſaid I; I was never abjured. Either, ſaid he, ye were abjured, or elſe ye had the king's pardon. Neither of both, ſaid I; ye ſpeak this of mere malice, with many other babbling words. Then Mr. Archdeacon departed, and left Mr. Collins to command me to appear the next day. Howbeit, for certain other urgent buſineſs that I had, I did not appear, but wrote a letter to Mr. Commiſſary, deſiring him to reſpite the matter till my coming home again; again; and if he would not, I would contentedly ſubmit myſelf to the law when I came home.

Now about the 28th day of June I came to Mr. Commiſſary, to let him know of my return, and offered myſelf to ſatisfy the law, if it were proceeded againſt me, before Mr. Cocks of Surry, and Marks the apparitor; but Mr. Commiſſary gently ſaid, that he had done nothing againſt me. And ſo appointed me to appear before him the Friday ſeven-night after. In the mean time a ſeſſions was held at Crambroke, where I was bound to appear; and carrying ſurety with me to be bound again, for I expected no other, did appear the third day of July.

Then ſaid Sir John Baker, Bland, we hear that you be a Scot; where were ye born and brought up? And I ſaid, I was born in England. And he ſaid, Where? And I ſaid, In Sedber, and brought up by one Dr. Lupton, provoſt of Eton college. Well, ſaid he, I know him well. Remain to your bond till afternoon.

Then ſaid Sir Thomas Moyle, Ah Bland, thou art a ſtiff-necked fellow. Thou wilt not obey the law, nor anſwer when thou art called. Then ſaid Sir John Baker, Mr. Sheriff, take him to your ward: and the bailiff ſet me in the ſtocks, with others, and would not hear me ſpeak one word; and ſo we remained in the gaol of Maidſtone, till a fortnight before Michaelmas, or thereabouts; and then we were carried to Rocheſter, to the aſſize held there, where we were two days among the priſoners: and when we were called, and the judges aſked our cauſes, when my cauſe was rehearſed, Mr. Barrow, clerk of the peace, ſaid, that I was an excommunicate perſon.

Then the judges of aſſize remanded us to Maidſtone again, ordering us to be brought to the next ſeſſions that ſhould be held at the town of Maldin: however the ſheriff never ſent for us; ſo that we tarried at Maidſtone till the ſeſſions held at Greenwich the 18th and 19th of February. I and others being within the bar amongſt the felons, and irons upon our arms, were called out the latter day by the jailer and bailiffs, and eaſed of our irons, and carried by them into the town to Sir John Baker, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and two others whom I knew not.

Another Examination of Mr. Bland.

Baker. BLAND, wherefore were you caſt into priſon?

Bland. I cannot well tell. Your maſterſhip caſt me in.

Baker. Yea, but for what were you in before that time?

Bland. For an unjuſt complaint put upon me.

Baker. What was the complaint?

I told him as truly and briefly as I could.

Baker. Let me ſee thy book. And I gave him a Latin teſtament.

Baker. Will ye go to the church, and obey and follow the queen's proceedings, and do as an honeſt man ſhould do?

Bland. I truſt in God to do no otherwiſe but as an honeſt man ought to do.

Baker. Will ye do as I ſaid?

Bland. Will it pleaſe your maſterſhip to give me leave to aſk you a queſtion?

Baker. Yea.

Bland. Sir, may a man do any thing that his conſcience is not ſatisfied to be good?

Baker. Away, away; and threw down the book, and ſaid, It is no teſtament. And I ſaid, Yes. And Mr. Webb took it up, and ſaid unto me very gently, Mr. Bland, I knew you when you were not of this opinion; I would to God ye would reform yourſelf; with better words than I can write. And I ſaid; If you have known me of another opinion than I am now of, it was for lack of knowledge.

Baker. Yea, ſayſt thou ſo? By St. Mary, and thou hold thee there, I will give ſix faggots to burn thee withal, ere thou ſhouldeſt be unburned: hence, knave, hence. And ſo were we returned into our place again within the bar. And at night, when judgment of felons and all was done, we were called, and the judge ordered the jailer to deliver us to the ordinary. And if, ſaid the judge, they will not be reformed, let them be delivered to us again, and they ſhall have judgment and execution. And one of our company ſaid, My lord, if we be killed at your hands for Chriſt's ſake, we ſhall live with him for ever.

Another Appearance of Mr. Bland in the Spiritual Court.

THEN we came to the caſtle of Canterbury, and there we remained till the ſecond day of March, on which day we were brought into the chapter-houſe of Creechurch, where were ſitting the ſuffragan of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, Mr. Mills, with others, and then went to them Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb and Mr. Hardes, juſtices. And when I was called, Mr. Webb ſaid, Here we preſent this man unto you, as one vehemently ſuſpected of hereſy.

Bland. Mr. Webb, ye have no cauſe to ſuſpect me of hereſy. I have been a priſoner this whole year, and no matter proved againſt me. I pray you what is the reaſon that I have been kept ſo long in priſon?

Webb. Leave your arrogant aſking of queſtions, and anſwer to that that is laid to your charge.

Bland. I do ſo; for I ſay ye have no cauſe to ſuſpect me of hereſy.

Webb. Yes; ye denied to Sir John Baker, to be conformable to the queen's proceedings.

Bland. Is it a juſt cauſe to ſuſpect me of hereſy, for aſking a queſtion with leave? So we had more words there than I well remember.

Then ſtood up Mr. Petit, and ſaid, Ye were caſt into priſon, becauſe ye fled away from your ordinary.

Bland. Then have I had wrong: for I never fled nor diſobeyed mine ordinary, nor did any thing contrary to the law. If I did, let them now ſpeak: but they ſaid nothing. And when I ſaw that they held their peace, I ſaid, Mr. Commiſſary, have you been the cauſe of this my impriſonment? No, quoth he; ye know that when ye went from me, ye were appointed to appear the Friday after the ſeſſions. Here I was ſuffered to ſpeak no more, but ſhut up in a corner till my companions were alſo preſented, and then we were ſent to Weſtgate into priſon, and were put in ſeveral cloſe holds, ſo that we could not ſpeak to one another, neither was any man permitted to come to us. We appeared four times in this manner: but one they diſpatched, by what means I cannot tell; whoſe name was Cornwall, a tanner.

And thus hitherto paſſed the talk between Bland and the juſtices, and certain gentlemen of the ſhire. Now followeth the order of the reaſoning between him and the clergymen, before whom he was examined. But foraſmuch as the chief doer and judge againſt him was the biſhop of Dover, or ſuffragan of Canterbury, called Dr. Richard Thornton, to the intent it may appear what little truth or conſtancy is in theſe catholic perſecutors, I thought here to exhibit, by the way, a certain popiſh letter, written to him by a papiſt. Wherein is declared what a goſpeller the ſaid Richard Thornton was in king Edward's time, who now turning with the tide, ſheweth himſelf a moſt bitter perſecutor againſt God's ſervants in queen Mary's time. The copy of this letter here followeth.

The

The Copy of a Popiſh Letter written to the Biſhop of Dover, by one Thomas Goldwell a Prieſt, declaring what a Profeſſor he was in King Edward's time.

Right reverend, and my good lord, after my hearty thanks for your good cheer at my laſt being with your lordſhip, this ſhall be to certify to you, that as ſoon as my lord's grace arrived, I gave him your letters, but I had much work to obtain any thing of him for you. For there hath been very evil informations given of you, and it hath been ſaid, that you have concurred with all manner of evil proceedings, which have for ſome years been in England, as well againſt the holy ſacrament of the altar, and againſt the ſupreme authority of Chriſt's vicar upon earth, as with the uſe of the late abominable communion, and with the marriage of prieſts, as well religious as ſecular; and that you have given orders to (I cannot tell how many) baſe, unlearned, and evil-diſpoſed people, by reaſon of which they have taken upon them to preach, and thereby have done much hurt in Kent. So that men think that yet if any new mutation (which God forbid) ſhould happen, you would be as ready to change as any other. And indeed it maketh me to fear the ſame, by reaſon that notwithſtanding it hath pleaſed Almighty God to provide, that your abſolution was ſent unto you (when you little thought of it), abſolving you from all your paſt offences, yet your lordſhip (more regarding the vanity of the world than the offence of God, which he only knoweth how much it grieves me, for the due love I bear unto you) preſumed to ſing maſs in Pontificalibus, the holy-days immediately following, and alſo to miniſtrate to children the ſacrament of confirmation, becauſe that one (being a member of the devil) did ſomewhat comfort you ſo to do.

Oh my lord, what honour ſhould it have been both to God and to yourſelf, and alſo edification to all good people (though all worldly men and heretics would have laughed you to ſcorn), if you, conſidering your great offences towards God, and his goodneſs towards you, would, as you have offended in the face of the world, to the damnation of many, likewiſe have ſhewed yourſelf penitent in the face of the world, to the edification of many, and not ſo ſoon to have celebrated for vanity Pontificaliter; but for a time to have abſtained for reverence Totaliter from the Altar according to the ancient cuſtom of the church. Which I have alſo ſeen obſerved by ſome honeſt men, not being thereto enjoined by any man, but as their own conſciences obliged them. But what is paſt cannot be recalled. And I thought it not my part to leave your lordſhip, mine own friend and maſter, in the mire. Wherefore I ceaſed not to ſolicit your cauſe with my lord's grace, till at laſt I obtained of his grace for your lordſhip all the faculties of which I ſend you a copy here encloſed, partly for your own conſolation, and partly for the comfort of others, deſiring your lordſhip to uſe them to the honour of God, that there come to me thereof no rebuke: not publiſhing them to any perſon, but to ſuch as you know will gladly receive them. For hitherto there is never a biſhop in England, who hath granted him ſo great authority concerning thoſe which be under his cure. Only Mr. Archdeacon hath the like, and in one thing, more great than be theſe your lordſhip's. Wherefore your lordſhip ſhall do well to remit unto him all ſuch prieſts as have cure of ſouls, whether they be beneficed men, or pariſh prieſts. For he hath not only authority to abſolve them, as you have, but alſo to give them authority to abſolve ſuch as be underneath their cures. And thus I commit your lordſhip to the protection of Almighty God. Written at Bruſſels the 16th of June, 1554.

Your lordſhip's beadman,
Thomas Goldwell.

And thus much, by way of digreſſion, concerning the biſhop of Dover. Now to return again to the examination of Mr. Bland: let us hear his own report of his anſwers, as followeth.

Here followeth mine anſwer, as nigh as I can call to remembrance, every word and ſentence; yet if any that was preſent can help to perfect it, I would be glad. But yet this dare I ſay, that there is never one ſentence, but it was openly ſpoken the ninth of March in the chapter-houſe of Creechurch, in the preſence of as many as they had choſen, the mayor of the city being called to be aſſiſtant, and all others ſhut out.

The Anſwer of Mr. Bland in his Appearance before the Commiſſary, and others in the Spiritual Court.

Maſter Collins ſaid; Mr. Bland, ye know that ye are preſented unto us as one ſuſpected of hereſy. How ſay ye, be ye contented to reform yourſelf to the laws of this realm, and of the holy church?

Bland. I deny that I am juſtly ſuſpected of hereſy, and that ye heard when I was preſented, that I denied the ſuſpicion to be juſt, but to defend the unjuſt puniſhment that I have ſuffered: neither can ye prove that any occaſion hath been given by me, whereby any man ſhould ſuſpect me therein. But if you have any law or authority to proceed againſt me for any thing done for a whole year ago and more, I will anſwer to it.

Collins. Ye were convented before Mr. Archdeacon and me, and matter of hereſy laid to your charge.

Bland. That matter was done and ſaid a whole year ago, for I have been in priſon this year and more. If ye have any thing againſt me by any law, I deſire you to let me know the law and the matter, and I will anſwer according to the law.

Then ſaid my lord ſuffragan; But that I am one of the judges, I would riſe, and ſtand by thee, and accuſe thee to be a ſacramentary, and bring witneſs to prove it; yea, and further, that thou haſt called the maſs an abominable idol.

Bland. You, my lord, never heard me ſay ſo: but I heard you once ſay, That in your conſcience ye had abhorred the maſs three years.

Thou lyeſt, quoth he, I never ſaid ſo.

Bland. My lord, if they might be heard, I can bring witneſs to prove it, with the day, time and place; and I once did hear Mr. Collins at a viſitation in Wingham ſay, That Chriſt was a full ſatisfaction for all ſin, preſent, paſt, and to come, contrary to that he ſaith now.

And here we had more words of this matter, which I let paſs for lack of good remembrance.

Mr. Collins ſaid, This is but a drift. You were better anſwer now, elſe you ſhall go to priſon again, and be called on Monday, and have articles laid to you, and if ye then anſwer not directly, ye ſhall be condemned Pro confeſſo, and that will be worſe for you.

Bland. Sir, I do not now, nor will I then deny to anſwer to any thing that ye can lay to my charge by the law; wherefore I truſt ye will let me have the benefit of the law.

Collins. This is the law, that if ye be required of the ordinary, to render a reaſon of your faith, then may ye not deny it. And that we do now.

Bland. To that then will I anſwer. For I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jeſus Chriſt his only Son our Lord, with all the other articles of the ſame creed: And I believe all the articles contained both in the creed called the maſs creed, and in the creed of Athanaſius: And I do believe, that all the holy ſcriptures, and all things therein contained, are moſt true.

Collins. This will not ſerve you: ye muſt anſwer to all ſuch articles in all theſe as ſhall be laid to you, or aſked of you.

Bland. Let me know the law that is in that force (without any juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion proved againſt me), and I will anſwer.

Collins. How ſay ye, will ye anſwer?

Bland. Sir, I have anſwered you. Have him away, ſaid my lord of Dover, he had better have anſwered.

Bland. My lord, I am ready to anſwer, if ye have any thing againſt me by the law.

Bp. of Dover. Ye have preached many hereſies in Adeſham, where I am parſon now; and therefore ye muſt make anſwer to them.

Bland. Lay them to my charge by the law, and I will anſwer them, if ye can prove I am bound to anſwer to that which was done a year ago or more: for if ye may do that, ye may alſo lay to my charge, and compel me to anſwer to all things done in all my life.

Collins. It is not a year ago ſince you were before Mr. Archdeacon and me.

Bland. It is a year and ten weeks ſince the words were ſpoken, and I have been a priſoner ever ſince, and have been at five ſeſſions, and never could have my cauſe tried. Methinks your charities ſhould think it puniſhment enough if I had been guilty.

Collins. All this will not ſerve you: you muſt needs anſwer, and it will be better for you to anſwer now than another time. Will ye reform yourſelf, and go to the church, and worſhip Chriſt in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, and be obedient unto all the queen's laws?

Bland. I pray you wherefore am I brought hither?

Collins. To anſwer to ſuch things as are demanded of you.

Bland. Sir, I thought ye had ſome matters againſt me by the law.

Collins. Well, on Monday at nine of the clock ye ſhall ſee the law, and have articles laid unto you.

Then they had eſpied Mr. Cox the lawyer, and called him in, and ſaid, Here is a lawyer can tell you are bound by the law to anſwer: and he ſaid as they had ſaid.

Collins. Do ye now believe, that after the conſecration of the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, there remaineth no ſubſtance of bread, but the ſubſtance of Jeſus Chriſt, both God and man?

Bland. Mr. Commiſſary, I know not by any law why ye ſhould aſk me that queſtion more than any other man here. And after a little talk, my lord of Dover aſked me this queſtion: Doſt thou not believe, after the conſecration, that it is the body of Chriſt? And I ſaid, No, I do not ſo believe: for the ſcriptures do not teach me, that there ſhould remain the fleſh of Chriſt, to eat as a man ſhould eat man's fleſh.

Then Mr. Glaſier ſaid, That was the opinion of the Capernaites, there is no man here of that opinion: and ſpake long of cutting of Chriſt's body, as men cut fleſh in the ſhambles.

Then Dr. Faucet ſaid, Mr. Bland, foraſmuch as you and I were brought up both in one houſe, and born both in one pariſh, I would be as glad as any man alive to do you good; but ye may not thus ſtand againſt the church. For Chriſt ſaith; Ye muſt humble yourſelf, and take up his croſs, and follow him: and to humble yourſelf in this place, is to be content, and not ſtick to your own judgment, but to humble yourſelf to the holy church, which hath determined, that after the conſecration there remaineth no bread, but the natural body and blood of Chriſt.

Bland. Mr. Doctor, if ye take humbling of ourſelves in that place, to admit the determination of the church, then muſt we know by the ſcriptures, that the ſame church determined nothing but according to the ſcriptures, as this is not: and therefore I do not believe any ſuch tranſubſtantiation, nor never will, God willing. Then, quoth he, I have done with you: I will no more pray for you than for a dog.

Then ſaid Mr. Glaſier, How think ye? Did St. Paul, when he ſaid, Is not the bread that we break a partaking of the body of Chriſt? did he mean baker's bread?

Bland. Though he did not mean baker's bread, that doth not prove that he brake natural and real fleſh.

Glaſier. No, by St. Mary, we ſay not ſo, but we ſay it is the natural body glorified, under the forms of bread and wine.

Bland. Then the apoſtles had it not as we have; or elſe his glorified body was crucified for us.

Glaſier. Tuſh, ye do not underſtand the ſcriptures. For Chriſt's body was ever glorified, in that it was ſo marvellouſly united to the Godhead: yea, and he ſhewed his body divers times glorified, as in the mount Tabor: and when he walked on the water, we ſee he was light, and had no weight in him. Was not that then a glorified body?

Bland. Then belike Peter's body was glorified, if walking on the water was the deed of a glorified body? and the iron that Eliſha made to ſwim upon the water.

Tuſh, ſaid my lord of Dover, that was done by prayer. But there was ſuch a noiſe made with laughing, that I heard no more what my lord ſaid.

Bland. Maſters, I know that it availeth us nothing to reaſon with you, no more than it availed you in the time of the goſpel. For then neither the reaſon of Eckius, Cochlæus, nor yet of detection of the devil's ſophiſtry of my lord chancellor's doing, could take any place. And it is known to ſome that be here, that ſomething I can ſay in them.

Dover. No, you know Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, and ſuch others.

Bland. Indeed, my lord, I have ſeen part of their doings.

Dover. That is ſeen by thee to-day.

Glaſier. I was glad when I heard you ſay ye believed the catholic church, and now go you from it?

Bland. No, that I do not.

Glaſier. Ye know that Chriſt ſaith; "If thy brother have offended thee, go and reconcile him between thee and him. If he hear thee not, take two or three with thee, that in the mouth of two or three witneſſes all things may be eſtabliſhed. If he hear not them, tell it unto the church; if he hear not the church, take him as an heathen." I pray you where could ye have found this church of yours fifty years ago?

Bland. Ye know that the true church did not at all times flouriſh, but was wonderfully perſecuted.

Then my lord of Dover cried, No more, I command you to hold your peace. Have him away, and bring in another.

Collins. Ye ſhall come again on Monday at nine of the clock, and in the mean time ye ſhall have whom ye will to confer withal; your friend Dr. Faucet, or Mr. Glaſier, if ye deſire them.

Bland. I will refuſe to talk with no man: as for any conference of your part, it is but weak laws, eſtabliſhed as they are. But when there was no law, I did deſire conference. And ſo for that time I departed.

The Monday after we were brought to the ſame place again; and then Mr. Collins began to ſpeak to me, but after what manner, it is clean out of my mind: but the end was, that I would reform myſelf. But as I did before, I demanded what they had to lay to my charge, and to ſee the law, which they ſaid before I ſhould ſee.

Dover. What needs that? We have enough againſt you: for ye denied unto me tranſubſtantiation in the ſacrament.

Bland. I did refuſe to anſwer till ye promiſed that I ſhould ſee the law, whereby ye might compel me to anſwer.

My lord took the ſcribe's book, and read the anſwer that I made to Dr. Faucet's reaſon, which I knew not that they had written.

Bland. My lord, I made you no ſuch anſwer when ye aſked me: I take Mr. Collins and Mr. Glaſier to witneſs. Then they brought forth a decretal, a book of the biſhop of Rome's law, to bind me to anſwer, which my heart abhorred to look upon. The effect was, that the ordinary had authority to examine, and that thoſe whom they ſo examined muſt needs anſwer. But I ſaid that it meaned ſuch as were juſtly ſuſpected, as I was not. And here we had much communication: for I charged them with unjuſt impriſonment, which they could not avoid.

Mr. Oxenden would have helped them, and ſaid, the juſtices put me in priſon for preaching a ſeditious ſermon, and for troubling a prieſt at maſs.

Bland. That is not true; for after I had been ten weeks in priſon I was bailed out, till I was caſt in again (as the juſtice ſaid) for the diſobeying mine ordinary, which I never did.

Collins. Are ye willing to confer with ſome? it will be better for you; now we offer it, becauſe ye would not deſire it.

Bland. As I did not refuſe before, no more will I now. But I did not perceive before, but that one thing might have come, without any leave-aſking, to confer the ſcriptures: and therefore I expected Dr. Faucet would have come to me without deſiring, if any profit to me had been in conference; for though I was never able to do him good; yet once I was his tutor.

Collins. Will ye come to his chamber in the afternoon?

Bland. Sir, I am a priſoner, and therefore it is meet that I obey, and come whither you will; and ſo departed. At this time we were three. But they took another to appear before them the Tueſday ſeven-night after. And when he came, I knew not what was done, but I hear they excommunicated him, and let him go. His name was Miller, a clothier.

Here followeth a certain Confutation of Mr. Bland againſt falſe and manifeſt Abſurdities, granted by Mr. Milles, Prieſt of Chriſt-church in Canterbury.

Milles. WE ſay that Chriſt is in or under the ſacrament really and corporally, which are the forms of bread and wine, and that there is his body contained inviſibly; and the qualities which we do ſee, as whiteneſs and roundneſs, be there without ſubſtance by God's power, as quantity and weight be there alſo by inviſible meaſure.

Bland. This is your own divinity, to make accidents the ſacrament, and Chriſt's real body inviſibly contained in them, and ſo to deſtroy the ſacrament. And yet the doctors ſay; Materia Sacramenti eſt panis & vinum. And God by his power worketh no miracles with Hoc eſt corpus meum, ſo to change the ſubſtance of bread and wine into his body and blood, in that he maketh accidents to be without their ſubſtance by inviſible meaſure. I am aſhamed to ſee you ſo deſtroy Chriſt's ſacrament, contrary to your own doctors, and trifle with God's work.

Milles. To Chriſt is given all power in heaven and in earth, ſo that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be, and is where he liſteth; and is in the ſacrament really and corporally without occupying of place; for a glorified body occupieth no place.

Bland. Mark your own reaſon. All power is given to Chriſt both in heaven and earth; by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he liſt: Ergo, He is in the ſacrament really and corporally without occupying of place.

I deny your argument; for it followeth neither of your Major nor Minor. And firſt I would learn of you, how you know that Chriſt liſteth to be preſent at the will of every prieſt. For if the prieſt liſt not to ſay your maſs, then Chriſt liſteth not to be there.

Again, ye ſay, all power is given unto Chriſt both in heaven and in earth, ſo that that is the cauſe by your reaſon, that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he liſt; and by that reaſon he had no power of his Godhead, till he had his human body, and then he was not equal with the Father in divinity: for all power was not given to Chriſt, before the humanity and the Godhead were knit together, neither was he Filius. Here is more danger than ye are aware of, if ye would ſtand to it with juſt judges.

Milles. We eat Chriſt's fleſh and blood ſpiritually when we receive it with faith and charity. And we alſo do eat it corporally in the ſacrament; and the body that we ſo receive hath life. For the Godhead is annexed thereto: which although it be received with the body of Chriſt, yet it is not viſible after a groſs ſort, and the fleſh of Chriſt that we receive is lively; for it hath the Spirit of God joined to it. And if a man be drunken, it is not by receiving of the blood of Chriſt: for it is contrary to the nature of Chriſt's blood. If he be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without ſubſtance of blood.

Bland. I am glad that you are ſo much againſt all men, to ſay that Chriſt's body is alive in the ſacrament; it may fortune to bring you to the truth in time to come. Methinks it is evil to keep Chriſt's body alive in the Pix; or elſe muſt ye grant, that he is alive in receiving, and dead in the Pix And ye ſay truth, that it is not the natural receiving of Chriſt's blood that maketh a man drunken: for it is the nature of wine that doth that, which ye deny not.

And a greater truth ye confeſs than ye did think, when ye ſaid; If a man be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without the ſubſtance of blood; for indeed blood hath no ſuch qualities with it: by which it is evident that there is no natural blood.

If a man be drunken with wine conſecrated, it muſt be a miracle, as I think you will have it that the ſaid accidents ſhould be without their natural ſubſtance, and work all the operations of both ſubſtance and accidents: and ſo it followeth that a man may be drunken by miracle. The body that ye receive, ye ſay, is alive, becauſe it is annexed to the Godhead; and the fleſh that ye receive is lively, becauſe it hath the Spirit of God joined to it.

This diviſion is of your new inventions, to divide the body and the fleſh, the one alive by the Godhead, the other lively by God's Spirit, and both one ſacrament: ye make of it a thing ſo fantaſtical, that ye imagine a body without fleſh, and fleſh without body; as ye do qualities and quantities without ſubſtance, and a living body without qualities and quantities.

Milles. If caſe ſo require, and there be a godly intent in the miniſter to conſecrate, after the conſecration thereof, there is preſent the body and blood of Chriſt, and no other ſubſtance, but accidents without ſubſtance to a true believer.

Bland. Ye grant three abſurdities. That in a tun of wine conſecrated is nothing but accidents: and to increaſe it withal, ye have brought in two inconveniences; firſt, that it is not the word of God that doth conſecrate, but the intent of the prieſt muſt help it; and if that fail, ye ſeem to grant no conſecration, though the prieſt ſpeak the word; and yet your doctors ſay, that the wickedneſs of the prieſt diminiſheth not the ſacrament.

And to an unbeliever ye ſeem to ſay, that it is not the ſame, as it is to the true believer; and then muſt the believer have ſomething to do in the conſecration. Incidit in Scyllam, qui vult vitare Charybdim.

Milles. The ſubſtance of Chriſt's body doth not fill the mouſe's belly. For although he doth receive the outward forms of bread and wine, yet he doth not receive the ſubſtance inwardly, but without violation. And a mouſe doth not eat the body of Chriſt, to ſpeak properly; for it doth not feed him ſpiritually or corporally, as it doth man, becauſe he doth not receive it to any inducement of immortality to the fleſh.

Bland. Ye make not your doctrine plain to be underſtood: we muſt know how a mouſe can receive the ſubſtance inwardly and outwardly. Ye ſay he doth not receive the ſubſtance inwardly, but without violation: Ergo, With violation he receiveth the ſubſtance inwardly. Ye ſay that the mouſe cannot violate Chriſt's body; but he violateth the ſubſtance that he eateth. And this your proper ſpeech doth import as much, as that the mouſe ſhould eat the ſacrament to as great effect, and the ſame thing, as doth the unworthy receiver. For if that be the cauſe that ſhe properly eateth not the body of Chriſt, becauſe ſhe doth not feed upon it ſpiritually nor corporally, nor receiveth it to any inducement of immortality, as ye ſay; then it followeth, that the unbeliever and the mouſe receive both one thing. And yet it cannot be denied, but the mouſe will live with conſecrated bread, and then ye muſt grant this abſurdity, that a ſubſtance is nouriſhed and fed only with accidents.

Milles. Men's bodies be fed with Chriſt's body, as with immortal meat by reaſon of the Godhead annexed, to eternal life; but men's bodies be corporally nouriſhed with qualities and forms of bread and wine: and we deny that by the ſacramental eating any groſs humour turned into blood is made miraculouſly in the body.

Bland. Where it cannot be denied that a man may live, and naturally be nouriſhed in his natural body with the ſacramental bread and wine conſecrated; ye cannot avoid that: but then ye turn to the ſpiritual nouriſhing of man's body, by Chriſt's body and Godhead annexed, which is nothing to put away the abſurdity, that either a man's natural body ſhould be fed naturally with accidents, or elſe to have them changed into groſs humours. But ye ſay, men's bodies be corporally nouriſhed with qualities and forms of bread and wine; and then muſt ye needs grant, that qualities and quantities muſt be made ſubſtance in man. For ex eiſdem ſunt & nutriuntur mixta, or elſe is all that is the nutriment in man accidents and no ſubſtance.

Milles. If the forms of bread and wine be burned, or worms ingendred, it is no derogation to the body of Chriſt, becauſe the preſence of his body ceaſeth to be there, and no ſubſtance cometh again.

Bland. Ye grant here, that a ſubſtance may be made of accidents, as aſhes or worms; but I think you will have it by your miracles, and this I count a greater abſurdity than the other, that Chriſt's body ſhould ceaſe to be there, and no ſubſtance to come again; for no word in all the whole Bible ſeems to ſerve you for the ceaſing of his preſence, though we granted you, which we do not, that it were there. God Almighty open your heart, if it be his will and pleaſure, to ſee the truth. And if I thought not my death to be at hand, I would anſwer you to all the reſt, in theſe and all other my doings.

I ſubmit myſelf to our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and his holy word, deſiring you in the bowels of Chriſt to do the ſame.

Your orator in the Lord,

John Bland.

The laſt Appearance and Examination of Mr. Bland.

HItherto you have heard the troubleſome handling of this faithful ſervant of God, John Bland, toſt to and fro, from priſon to priſon, from ſeſſion to ſeſſion. At laſt he was brought before the biſhop of Dover, the commiſſary, and the archdeacon, at Canterbury, the 13th day of June. The name of this biſhop was Richard Thornton. The commiſſary was Robert Collins, whom the cardinal by his letters patent had ſubſtituted his agent, before his coming over to England. The archdeacon was Nicholas Harpsfield. Under theſe a great many innocent lambs of Chriſt were cruelly treated and barbarouſly ſlain at Canterbury, amongſt whom this aforeſaid Mr. Bland was one of the firſt; who, as it is ſaid, being brought before the ſaid biſhop, and collegues, which were John Frankeſh, Nicholas Sheterden, Thomas Thacker, Humfrey Middleton, and William Cocker, were examined of articles. To whom it was objected by the commiſſary, Whether he believed that Chriſt is really in the ſacrament, or no, &c. To this he anſwered and ſaid, That he believed that Chriſt is in the ſacrament, as he is in all other good bodies; ſo that he judged not Chriſt to be really in the ſacrament.

Whereupon the day being on Monday, he was bid to appear again upon Wedneſday next, and from thence he was deferred again to Monday following, being the 20th of June, in the ſame chapter-houſe, then to hear further what ſhould be done, in caſe he would not relent to their mind. Which day and place he appearing as before, was required to ſpeak his mind plainly and fully to the aforeſaid articles, being again repeated to him. Which articles, commonly and in courſe they uſually objected to their examinates which were brought before them; which articles, as here now followeth, need not hereafter be repeated, eſpecially for the county of Kent.

Articles miniſtered by Richard Biſhop of Dover, to Mr. Bland, and likewiſe to the reſt following after him.

1. FIRST, That thou art of the dioceſe of Canterbury, and ſo ſubject to the juriſdiction of the archbiſhop there.

2. Item, That thou art a chriſtian man, and doſt profeſs the laws of God, and faith of Chriſt's catholic church, and the determination of the ſame.

3. Item, That all perſons who teach, preach, believe, affirm, hold, maintain, or ſay within the dioceſe of Canterbury, otherwiſe than our holy mother the church doth, are excommunicate perſons, and heretics, and as excommunicate and heretics ought to be named, reputed and taken.

4. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of our mother holy church within the dioceſe of Canterbury, haſt openly ſpoken, maintained, holden, affirmed, and believed, and yet doſt hold, affirm, and believe, that in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in ſubſtance, but only a token, ſign, and remembrance thereof, and that the very body and blood of Chriſt is only in heaven, and nowhere elſe.

5. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith, and determination of our holy mother church, haſt within this dioceſe of Canterbury openly ſpoken, ſaid, maintained, holden, affirmed, and believed, and yet doſt hold, maintain, affirm, and believe, that it is againſt God's word, that the ſacrament of Chriſt's church ſhould be miniſtered in an unknown tongue; and that no man with a ſafe conſcience, or without peril of ſin, receiveth any ſacrament adminiſtered in any tongue that he underſtandeth not.

6. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith of our mother holy church, haſt, and yet doſt hold opinion, and ſay, that it is againſt God's word, that the ſacrament of the altar ſhould be adminiſtered in one kind; and that no man may with a ſafe conſcience ſo receive it.

7. Item, That the premiſes be true, and that there is a common fame upon them within the dioceſe of Canterbury.

The Anſwers of Mr. Bland to the aforeſaid Articles.

1. TO theſe articles Mr. Bland, anſwering again in order as they were objected to him, ſaith to the firſt, granting the ſame, that he was a prieſt, and of the dioceſe of Canterbury.

2. To the ſecond alſo he anſwereth affirmatively.

3. Item, to the third he anſwereth, that the article is true, meaning the catholic church to be Chriſt's church.

4. Item, in the fourth article, as touching the firſt part of the article, he doth confeſs, that he hath preached and taught it, as it is contained in the ſame. And as touching the ſecond part of the article, he doth confeſs, that he doth now alſo hold and ſay, as he preached and taught before.

5. Item, to the fifth article, he granteth.

6. To the ſixth, he preached, held and doth hold, as is contained in the article.

7. Item, to the laſt article, he granteth the ſame, &c.

This done, and his anſwers and confeſſion taken, reſpite was given him yet a few days to deliberate with himſelf. And on the 25th day of the ſaid month of June he appear'd again in the chapter-houſe, and there openly and boldly withſtood the authority of the pope; whereupon he was condemned and committed to the ſecular power. Touching the form and tenor of the ſentence, becauſe all their ſentences of courſe agree in one, read before in the hiſtory of Mr. Rogers, page 97.

Mr. Bland's Prayer before his Death.

THE Lord Jeſus, for whoſe love I do willingly leave this life, and deſire rather the bitter death of his croſs, with the loſs of all earthly things, than to abide the blaſphemy of thy holy name, or elſe to obey man in breaking of thy commandments; thou ſeeſt, O Lord, that whereas I might live in worldly wealth to worſhip falſe gods, and honour thy enemy, I choſe rather the torments of this body, and loſs of this my life, and have counted all things but vile duſt and dung that I might win thee: which death is more dear unto me than thouſands of gold and ſilver. Such love, O Lord, haſt thou laid up in my breaſt, that I hunger for thee as the deer that is wounded deſireth the ſoil. Send thy holy comfort, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and ſtrengthen this weak piece of earth, which is void of all ſtrength of itſelf. Thou remembereſt, O Lord, that I am but duſt, and not able to do any thing that is good. Therefore, O Lord, as thou of thy accuſtomed goodneſs haſt bidden me to this banquet, and counted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongſt thine elect; give me ſtrength againſt this element, that as it is to my ſight moſt irkſome and terrible, ſo to my mind it may be at thy commandment, as an obedient ſervant, ſweet and pleaſant; and through the ſtrength of thy Holy Spirit I may paſs through the ſtrength of this fire into thy boſom, according to thy promiſe, and for this mortality to receive immortality, and for this corruptible to put on incorruptible. Accept this burnt-offering and ſacrifice, O Lord, not for the ſacrifice itſelf, but for thy dear Son's ſake my Saviour: for whoſe teſtimony I offer this free-will offering with all my heart, and with all my ſoul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my ſins, as I forgive the whole world. O ſweet Saviour, ſpread thy wings over me. O God, grant me thy Holy Ghoſt, through whoſe merciful inſpiration I am come hither. Conduct me unto everlaſting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit: Lord Jeſus receive my ſoul. So be it.

The Hiſtory of John Frankeſh, Humfrey Middleton, and Nicholas Sheterden.

HAVING now paſſed over the examination of Mr. Bland, let us further proceed to the reſt of his fellow-priſoners, being joined the ſame time with him in the like cauſe and like affliction. The names of whom were, John Frankeſh, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphrey Middleton, Thacker and Cocker, of whom Thacker only gave back. The reſt conſtantly ſtanding to the truth, were all together condemned by the ſuffragan of Canterbury, the 25th day of June the year above expreſſed. Whoſe examination I need not dwell long upon, foraſmuch as the articles miniſtered againſt them were all one, ſo in their anſwers they little or nothing diſagreed, as you ſhall hear hereafter. In the mean time becauſe Nicholas Sheterden in his examination had a little more talk with the archdeacon and the commiſſary, I will firſt begin with him.

The firſt Examination or Reaſoning of Nicholas Sheterden with Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield, and Mr. Collins the Commiſſary, for which they ſent him to Priſon.

FIRST the archdeacon and commiſſary affirmed, that the very words of Chriſt, when he ſaid, This is my body, did change the ſubſtance, without any other interpretation or ſpiritual meaning of the words.

Sheterden. Then belike when Chriſt ſaid, "This cup is my blood," the ſubſtance of the cup was changed into his blood, without any other meaning; and ſo the cup was changed, and not the wine.

Harpsfield. Not ſo; for when Chriſt ſaid, "This cup is my blood," he meant not the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Sheterden. If Chriſt ſpake one thing, and meant another, then the bare words did not change the ſubſtance; but there muſt be a meaning ſought as well of the bread, as of the cup.

Harpſ. There muſt be a meaning ſought of the cup otherwiſe than the words ſtand. But of the bread it muſt be underſtood only as it ſtandeth, without any other meaning.

Sheterden. Then do ye make one half of Chriſt's inſtitution a figure, or borrowed ſpeech, and the other half a plain ſpeech; and ſo ye divide Chriſt's ſupper.

Harpſ. Chriſt meant the wine, and not the cup, though he ſaid, This cup is my blood.

Sheterden. Then ſhew me whether the words which the prieſt ſpeaks over the cup, do change the ſubſtance, or whether the mind of the prieſt doth it?

Harpſ. The mind of the prieſt doth it, and not the words.

Sheterden. If the mind of the prieſt doth it and not the words, if the prieſt then do mind his harlot, or any other vain thing, that thing, ſo minded, was there made, and ſo the people do worſhip the prieſt's harlot inſtead of Chriſt's blood: and again, none of the people can tell when it is Chriſt's blood, or when not, ſeeing the matter ſtandeth in the mind of the prieſt. For no man can tell what the prieſt meaneth but himſelf; and ſo are they ever in danger of committing idolatry.

Then was the archdeacon ſomewhat moved, and ſate him down, and ſaid to the commiſſary, I pray you Mr. Commiſſary to ſpeak to him for a while; for they are unreaſonable and perverſe anſwers as ever I heard of. Then the commiſſary ſtood up and ſaid:

Your argument is much againſt yourſelf, for ye grant that the bread is a figure of Chriſt's body, but the cup can be no figure of his blood, nor yet his very blood: and therefore Chriſt did not mean the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Sheterden.

Sheterden. My argument is not againſt me at all; for I do not ſpeak it to prove that the cup is his blood, nor the figure of his blood, but to prove that the bare words being ſpoken by the prieſt, do not change the ſubſtance no more of bread, than they do change the cup into blood.

Commiſ. It could not be ſpoken of the cup, when he ſaid, This cup is my blood; but he meant the wine in the cup.

Sheterden. Then remaineth for you to anſwer my queſtion to the archdeacon, that is, whether the mind of the prieſt, when he ſpeaketh over the cup, doth change it into blood, or the bare words?

Commiſ. Both together doth it, the words and the mind of the prieſt together; yea, the intent and the words together doth it.

Sheterden. If the words and intent together do change the ſubſtance, yet muſt the cup be his blood, and not the wine, foraſmuch as the words are, "This cup is my blood," and the intent ye ſay, was the wine: or elſe the words take none effect, but the intent only.

After, the commiſſary, in his chamber, ſaid, it was the intent of the prieſt before he went to maſs, without the words; for the prieſt did intend to do as holy church had ordained, then the intent made the ſacrament to take effect.

Sheterden. If the ſacraments take effect of the intent of the prieſt, and not of God's word, then many pariſhes having a prieſt that intendeth not well, are utterly deceived, both in baptizing, and alſo worſhipping that thing to be God, which is but bread, becauſe for lack of the prieſt's intent, the words do take none effect in it: ſo that by this it is doubtful, whether they worſhip Chriſt or bread, becauſe it is doubtful what the prieſts do intend.

Then the commiſſary would prove to me, that Chriſt's manhood was in two places at one time, by theſe words of Chriſt in the third chapter of John, where he ſaith, "No man aſcendeth up into heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." By this he would prove, that Chriſt was then in heaven, and on earth alſo naturally and bodily.

Sheterden. This and other places muſt needs be underſtood for the unity of the perſon, in that Chriſt was God and man, and yet the matter muſt be referred to the Godhead, or elſe ye muſt fall into great error.

Commiſ. That is not ſo: for it was ſpoken of the manhood of Chriſt, foraſmuch as he ſaith, "The Son of man which is in heaven."

Sheterden. If ye will needs underſtand it to be ſpoken of Chriſt's manhood, then muſt ye fall into the error of the Anabaptiſts, who deny that Chriſt took fleſh of the virgin Mary; for if there be no body aſcended up, but that which came down, where is then his incarnation? for then he brought his body down with him.

Commiſ. Lo how you ſeek an error in me, and yet ſee not how ye err yourſelf. For it cannot be ſpoken of the Godhead, except ye grant that God is paſſible, for God cannot come down, becauſe he is not paſſible.

Sheterden. If that were a good argument, that God could not come down, becauſe he is not paſſible: then it might be ſaid by the like argument, that God could not ſit, and then heaven is not his ſeat, and then ſay as ſome do, that God hath no right hand to ſit at.

Then the commiſſary affirmed plainly, that it was true, God hath no right hand indeed.

Sheterden. Oh what an injury to Chriſt's religion will this be, that becauſe we cannot tell how God came down, therefore we ſhall ſay, that he came not down at all; and becauſe we cannot tell what manner of hand he hath, to ſay that he hath no hand at all; and then he cannot reach the utmoſt parts of the ſea. O miſery! at length it will come to paſs, that God cannot ſit, and then how can heaven be his ſeat? and if heaven be not his ſeat, then here is no heaven; and then at length I doubt, ye will ſay there is no God, or elſe no other God but ſuch as the heathen gods are, which cannot go nor feel.

Commiſ. Why, doth not the ſcripture ſay, that God is a ſpirit? and what hand can a ſpirit have?

Sheterden. Truth it is, God is a ſpirit, and therefore is worſhipped in ſpirit and truth; and as he is a ſpirit, ſo hath he a ſpiritual power, ſo hath he a ſpiritual ſeat, and a ſpiritual hand, and a ſpiritual ſword, which we ſhall feel, if we go on at this rate. Becauſe we know not what God hath, therefore if we ſay he hath none, then it may as well be ſaid, there is no Chriſt.

Then the commiſſary ſaid, he would talk no more with me, and ſo departed; and alſo the commiſſary was compelled to grant, that Chriſt's teſtament was broken, and his inſtitution was changed from that he left it: but he ſaid they had power ſo to do.

My firſt Anſwering, after their Law was eſtabliſhed.

BEcauſe I know ye will deſire to hear from me ſome certainty of my eſtate, I was called before the ſuffragan, and ſeven or eight of the chief prieſts, and examined of certain articles, and then I required to ſee their commiſſion.

They ſhewed it to me, and ſaid, There it is, and the king and queen's letters alſo. Then I deſired to have it read: and ſo in reading I perceived, that on ſome notable ſuſpicion he might examine upon two articles; Whether Chriſt's real preſence were in the ſacrament, and Whether the church of England be Chriſt's catholic church.

To that I anſwered, that I had been a priſoner three quarters of a year, and, as I thought, wrongfully: reaſon would therefore that I ſhould anſwer to thoſe things for which I was impriſoned.

The ſuffragan ſaid, His commiſſion was, that I muſt anſwer directly, yea or no.

This commiſſion, ſaid I, was not general to examine whom he will, but on juſt ſuſpicion.

He ſaid, I was ſuſpected, and preſented to him.

Then I required him to ſhew the accuſation.

He ſaid, he was not bound to ſhew it; but he commanded me in the king and queen's name to anſwer directly.

Sheterden. I, as a ſubject, do require juſtice of you: for what I have done, I aſk no favour.

Suffragan. You were ſuſpected.

Sheterden. Prove your ſuſpicion, or ſhew what cauſe you have to ſuſpect.

Suffragan. Thou wert caſt into priſon for that cauſe.

Sheterden. That was a pretty ſuſpicion, becauſe I had ſuffered impriſonment contrary to God's law and the realm, that therefore I muſt now for amends be examined of ſuſpicion without cauſe, to hide all the wrong done to me before. For when I was caſt into priſon, there was no law that hindered me from ſpeaking as I did: therefore in that point I could be no more ſuſpected than you, who preached the ſame yourſelf not long before.

Suffragan. That was no matter to thee what I preached.

Sheterden. Well, yet in the king and queen's name I muſt anſwer directly: and therefore I require as a ſubject, that ye do not extend beyond your commiſſion, but prove me ſuſpected, more than you yourſelf.

Then Mr. Milles told them that I had written to my mother, and that he had ſeen the letter, wherein I perſuaded my mother to my opinions.

Sheterden. In that I did but my duty, to certify her, that I was not in priſon for any evil. And likewiſe that was before the law, and therefore no more ſuſpicion was in me, than was in them which taught the like.

Milles. Well, ye are required here to anſwer directly.

Sheterden. Firſt then I require of you to prove this ſuſpicion; and thus we toſſed it to and fro. At laſt the the biſhop ſaid, he himſelf did ſuſpect me. I aſked whereby?

Suffragan. Well, I myſelf did ſuſpect thee, and it is no matter whereby.

Sheterden. But your commiſſion doth not ſerve you ſo to do without cauſe of ſuſpicion.

Suffragan. Well, yet I did ſuſpect you.

Sheterden. It is not meet for you to be my accuſer and my judge alſo, for that is too much for one man. And thus many words were multiplied, and they were much grieved.

Milles. If you were a chriſtian man, you would not be aſhamed of your faith being required.

Sheterden. I am not aſhamed indeed, I thank God; and if any man did come to me, either to teach or learn, I would declare it; but foraſmuch as I perceive you come neither to teach nor to learn, I hold it beſt not to anſwer you.

Milles. If you will not, then will we certify the king's council.

Sheterden. I am therewith content that you would certify that I had ſuffered three quarters of a year wrongfully in priſon, and therefore I deſire to be juſtified or condemned, firſt for that I ſuffered ſuch impriſonment; and then I will not refuſe to anſwer your articles, though there were a buſhel of them. But to ſay that I would anſwer, whereby you ſhould heal all your wrong done to me againſt the law of God and the realm, I will not.

Here much ado there was to prove that he had no wrong; and again, that it was not they that did it. But, ſaid he, the commiſſary was one of them. He anſwered, No, and ſaid it was the archdeacon. He ſaid, You ſat with him, and he aſked your counſel in it; and yet if it were he, it was your church, except the archdeacon and you be divided one from another. Well, ſaid they, Will ye now deny what ye ſaid then, and promiſe here to ſubmit yourſelf henceforth, and ye ſhall be delivered?

Sheterden. I am not ſo much beholden to you as to grant you any ſuch promiſe: and you ſhall plainly ſee that I will not promiſe to go acroſs the ſtreet for you: but if at any time I have offended your law, let me have the puniſhment: I aſk no favour.

Then they ſaid, it was obſtinacy in him that he would not anſwer, and a token that his faith was naught, ſeeing he was aſhamed to utter it.

Nay, ſaid Sheterden, you ſhall well know I am not aſhamed of my faith: but becauſe you do ſo greedily ſeek blood, I will anſwer only to that you have againſt me.

Suffragan. Nay, you ſhall anſwer to the articles, or elſe be condemned upon ſuſpicion.

Sheterden. I am content with that, yet all men ſhall know, that as ye ſuſpect and can prove no cauſe, ſo ſhall ye condemn me without a matter, and then ſhall all men know ye ſeek my blood, and no juſtice.

Suffragan. No, we ſeek not thy blood, but thy converſion.

Sheterden. That we ſhall ſee. For then ſhall you prove my perverſion firſt, before you condemn me on your ſuſpicion without proof of the ſame: and by that I ſhall know whether you ſeek blood or no. Many other words were between them.

At laſt ſtept up one Lovels a lawyer, who would prove his impriſonment not to be wrong, but right, by old ſtatutes of Edward the fourth, and Henry, &c. but at laſt he was compelled to forſake thoſe ſtatutes from Michaelmas to Chriſtmas, and then he ſaid it was no wrong.

To this Mr. Sheterden ſaid, if he could prove that men might wrongfully impriſon before a law, and in the mean while make laws, and then under that hide the firſt wrong, then he ſaid true, or elſe not.

Thus he kept the band-dogs at ſtaves end, not as thinking to eſcape them, but that I would ſee, ſaid he, the foxes leap above the ground for my blood if they can reach it (ſo it be the will of God), yet we ſhall ſee them gape and leap for it. From Weſtgate in haſte.

By yours,
Nicholas Sheterden.

His Examination before the Biſhop of Wincheſter, then Lord Chancellor.

I Was called into a chamber before the lord chancellor, the ſuffragan, and others, prieſts I think for the moſt part. He ſtandeth to the table, called me to him; and becauſe I ſaw the cardinal was not there, I bowed myſelf and ſtood near.

Then ſaid he, I have ſent for you, becauſe I hear you are indicted of hereſy, and being called before the commiſſioners, ye will not anſwer nor ſubmit yourſelf.

I ſaid, If it pleaſe you, I did not refuſe to anſwer; but I did plainly anſwer, that I had been in priſon a long time, and reaſon it was that I ſhould be charged or diſcharged of that, and not to be examined of articles to hide my wrong impriſonment, neither did I know any indictment againſt me. If there were any, it could not be juſt, for I have not been abroad ſince the law was made.

Then ſaid the biſhop of Wincheſter, Well, yet if ſuch a ſuſpicion be of you, if you be a chriſtian, ye will declare that it is not true, and ſo clear yourſelf.

Sheterden. I thought it ſufficient to anſwer to mine offences, &c. truſting that they would lay no ſuch burden upon me, whereby the wrong done to me might be covered; but I would be proved to have wrong or right.

Wincheſter. If thou wilt declare thyſelf to the church to be a chriſtian, thou ſhalt go, and then have a writ of wrong impriſonment, &c.

Sheterden. I have no mind to ſue now, but require right juſtice: but to make a promiſe, I will not: and if I offend the law, then puniſh me accordingly. For it might be that my conſcience was not perſuaded, nor would be, in priſon; ſeeing theſe things which I have learned, were by God's law openly taught and received by the authority of the realm. And he ſaid, it was never received, that I might ſpeak againſt the ſacrament. I ſaid, that againſt ſome opinion of the ſacrament it was openly taught.

Winch. By no law, and that was not able to conſider, that all that while God preſerved that, ſo that no law could paſs againſt it.

Sheterden. I ſaid, their law did not openly perſuade me, but this moſt; when they preached unto us, they took pains to ſet out the word of God in our tongue, ſo that we may read and judge whether they ſay true or no; but now they take the light from us, and would have us believe it, becauſe they ſay ſo, which is to me a great perſuaſion.

Winch. It was not a few that could be your guide in underſtanding, but the doctors and the whole church; now whom wouldeſt thou believe? either the few or the many?

Sheterden. I did not believe for the few or for the many, but only for that he bringeth the word, and ſhewed it to me to be ſo according to the proceſs thereof.

Winch. Well, then if an Arian come to thee with ſcripture, thou wilt believe him, if he ſhew this text, "My Father is greater than I."

Sheterden. No, my lord, he muſt bring me alſo the contrary place, and prove them both true, where he ſaith, "My Father and I am one."

Winch. Yea, that is by charity, as we are one with him.

Sheterden. That gloſs will not ſtand with the reſt of the ſcripture, where he ſaid, "I am the very ſame that I ſay to you." He ſaid the truth, and the truth was God; with more ſuch like. And here he made many words, but very gently, of the ſacrament. Likewiſe Chriſt ſaid, quoth he, it was his body; yea, that is to ſay, a figure of his body; and how men did not conſider that the Word was God, and God the Word, and ſo provoked me with ſuch temptation; but I let him alone, and ſaid nothing. So, after many words, he came to the church's faith, and comely order of ceremonies, and images. And then I joined to him again with the commandments.

Winch. That was done that no falſe thing ſhould be made, as the heathen would worſhip a cat, becauſe ſhe killed mice.

Sheterden. It is plain that the law forbad not only ſuch, but even to make an image of God to any manner of likeneſs.

Winch. Where find ye that?

Sheterden. Forſooth, in the law where God gave them the commandments: for he ſaid, "Ye ſaw no ſhape, but heard a voice only:" and added a reaſon why; "Leſt they ſhould after make images and mar themſelves:" ſo that God would not ſhew his ſhape, becauſe they ſhould have no image of him who was the true God, &c.

Winch. You have made a goodly interpretation.

Sheterden. No, it is the text.

Then was the Bible called for, and when it came, he bade me find it, and I ſhould preſently be confounded with my own words; ſo that if there were any grace in me, I ſhould no longer truſt to my own judgment; and when I looked, it was Latin.

Winch. Why, can ye read no Latin?

Sheterden. No. Then was the Engliſh Bible brought. He bade me find it; and ſo I read it aloud: and then he ſaid; Lo here thou mayſt ſee; this is no more to forbid the image of God, than of any other beaſt, fowl or fiſh; (the place was Deut. 4.) I ſaid it did plainly forbid to make any of theſe as an image of God, becauſe no man might know what ſhape he was of. Therefore might no man ſay of any image, This is an image of God.

Winch. Well, yet by your leave, ſo much as was ſeen we may, that is, of Chriſt, of the Holy Ghoſt; and the Father appeared to Daniel like an old man, &c.

Sheterden. That is no proof that we may make images contrary to the commandment; for though the Holy Ghoſt appeared like a dove, yet was he not like in ſhape, but in certain qualities; and therefore when I ſaw the dove which is God's creature, indeed I might remember the Spirit to be ſimple and loving, &c. and with that he was ſomewhat moved, and ſaid, I had learned my leſſon; and aſked who taught me, with many words; and he ſaid he would prove how good and profitable images were to teach the unlearned, &c.

Sheterden. At laſt I ſaid, My lord, although I were able to make never ſo good a gloſs upon the commandments, yet obedience is better than all our good intents; and much ado we had: At laſt he ſaid, He ſaw what I was, and that he had ſent for me for charity ſake to talk with me, but now he would not meddle; and ſaid, my wrong impriſonment could not excuſe me, but I muſt clear myſelf.

Sheterden. I ſaid that was eaſy for me to do, for I had not offended.

Winch. He ſaid I could not eſcape ſo, there I was deceived.

Sheterden. Well then I am under the law, &c.

The archdeacon was then called in, and he ſaid, that I behaved myſelf before him with ſuch arrogancy and ſtoutneſs, as never was heard; whereas he was minded with ſuch mercy towards me, &c. and many other lyes he laid to me, that I was ſent home till another time, and I would not be contented, but went out of the church with ſuch an outcry as was notable.

Sheterden, I declare that herein he falſly reported me, and brought in the laws then in the realm, and the queen's proclamation, that none of her ſubjects ſhould be compelled till the law were to compel, and that I rehearſed the ſame in the court for me; and I did uſe him then, ſaid I, as I uſe your grace now, and no otherwiſe.

Winch. He ſaid, that I did not uſe myſelf very well now.

Sheterden. I ſaid, I had offered myſelf to be bailed, and to confer with them when and where they would.

Winch. He ſaid, I ſhould not confer, but be obedient, I ſaid, let me go, and I will not deſire to confer neither: and when I offended, let them puniſh me; and ſo departed.

By your brother, Nicholas Sheterden.

The laſt Examination with the Condemnation of Mr. Bland, J. Frankeſh, N. Sheterden and H. Middleton.

AND thus much touching the particular and ſeveral examinations of Mr. Sheterden and Mr. Bland. Now to touch ſomething alſo of the other martyrs, who were examined the ſame time, and ſuffered together with them, to wit, Humfrey Middleton of Aſhford and John Frankeſh vicar of Rolvynden in the dioceſe of Kent abovementioned, here firſt ſhould be declared the articles, which publicly in their laſt examinations were jointly and ſeverally miniſtered unto them by the aforeſaid Thornton biſhop of Dover; but foraſmuch as theſe articles being ordinary and of courſe, are already expreſſed in the ſtory of Mr. Bland, [Page 298.] it is not therefore needful to make any new rehearſal thereof.

The ſeven articles being propounded to the perſons abovenamed, to wit, John Frankeſh, John Bland, Nicholas Sheterden, Humfrey Middleton, and one Thacker; John Frankeſh firſt anſwered ſomewhat doubtfully, deſiring further reſpite to be given him of fourteen days to deliberate with himſelf, which was granted. Mr. Bland anſwered flatly and roundly, as ye heard before. Nicholas Sheterden and Humfrey Middleton anſwered to the firſt and ſecond articles affirmatively. To the third concerning the catholic church after a ſort they granted. To the fourth, fifth and ſixth, concerning the real preſence, and the ſacrament to be adminiſtered in the Latin tongue, and in one kind, they utterly refuſed to anſwer. Sheterden ſaid, he would not anſwer thereto before the cauſe were determined why he was impriſoned, and ſo ſtill remained priſoner, before the laws of parliament received, &c. Middleton added moreover and confeſſed, that he believed in his own God, ſaying, My living God, and no dead God, &c. Thacker only relented, and was content to take penance. Thus the aforeſaid four upon theſe anſwers were condemned by the biſhop of Dover the 25th day of June 1555.

And being delivered to the ſecular power, they were all four burnt together at Canterbury the 12th of July, at two ſeveral ſtakes, but in one fire, where they in the ſight of God and of his angels, and before men, like true ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, gave a conſtant teſtimony to the truth of his holy goſpel.

Mr. Nicholas Sheterden's Prayer before his Death.

O Lord my God and Saviour, who art Lord in heaven and earth, maker of all things viſible and inviſible, I am the creature and work of thy hands; Lord God, look upon me and other thy people, who at this time are oppreſſed by the worldly-minded for thy law's ſake; yea, Lord, thy law itſelf is now trodden under foot, and men's inventions exalted above it, and for that cauſe do I, and many thy creatures, refuſe the glory, praiſe, and conveniences of this life, and do chuſe to ſuffer adverſity, and to be baniſhed, yea, to be burnt with the books of thy word, for the hope ſake that is laid up in ſtore. For, Lord, thou knoweſt, if we would but ſeem to pleaſe men in things contrary to thy word, we might by their permiſſion permiſſion enjoy theſe advantages that others do, as wife, children, goods and friends, all which I acknowledge to be thy gifts, given to the end I ſhould ſerve thee. And now, Lord, that the world will not ſuffer me to enjoy them except I offend thy laws, behold I give unto thee my whole ſpirit, ſoul and body, and lo, I leave here all the pleaſures of this life, and do now leave the uſe of them for the hope ſake of eternal life purchaſed in Chriſt's blood, and promiſed to all them that fight on his ſide, and are content to ſuffer with him for his truth, whenſoever the world and the devil ſhall perſecute the ſame.

O Father, I do not preſume to come unto thee truſting in mine own righteouſneſs, no, but only in the merits of thy dear Son my Saviour. For which excellent gift of ſalvation I cannot worthily praiſe thee, neither is my ſacrifice worthy, or to be accepted with thee, in compariſon of our bodies mortified, and obedient unto thy will: and now, Lord, whatſoever rebellion hath been, or is found in my members againſt thy will, yet do I here give unto thee my body to the death, rather than I will uſe any ſtrange worſhipping, which I beſeech thee accept at my hand for a pure ſacrifice: let this torment be to me the laſt enemy deſtroyed, even death, the end of miſery, and the beginning of all joy, peace and ſolace: and when the time of reſurrection cometh, then let me enjoy again theſe members then glorified, which now be ſpoiled and conſumed by the fire. O Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit into thy hands, Amen.

Mr. Sheterden's Letter to his Mother.

AFTER my humble and bounden duty remembered, well-beloved mother, this ſhall be to wiſh you increaſe of grace and godly wiſdom, that ye may ſee and perceive the crafty bewitching of Satan our mortal enemy, who, as I have divers times declared unto you, doth not openly ſhew himſelf in his own likeneſs, but under colour of devotion deceiveth them that keep not a diligent eye upon him; but having confidence in men's traditions and cuſtoms of the world, leaving the commandments of God, and teſtament of his Son Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, do grow more into ſuperſtition and hypocriſy, than into wiſdom and true holineſs. For this is moſt true, that Satan, the enemy of ſouls, doth by his miniſters make many believe, that thoſe things which they compel us unto for their bellies ſake, have many godly ſignifications, although they be moſt contrary to God's will, as doubtleſs they be, even as the ſerpent did in paradiſe to our firſt mother Eve. "What, ſaid he, hath God commanded ye ſhall not eat of all the trees in the garden? The woman ſaid, Of the fruits of the trees in the garden we may eat: but of the tree in the midſt of the garden, ſaid God, ſee ye eat not, leſt ye die." Even ſo our miniſters now-a-days, ſay, Hath God commanded ye ſhall not make you any image or likeneſs of any thing? Yea forſooth. Tuſh, ſay they, what harm can they do? May we not remember God the better, when we ſee his image or picture? For they are good books for the lay-men; but indeed they be better for the prieſts, becauſe they receive the offerings.

And look how truly the promiſe of the ſerpent was kept with Eve, ſo is the perſuaſion of our prieſts found true to us. For as Adam and Eve did become like God in knowing good and evil, ſo are we in remembering God by his image. For Adam's eyes were ſo open, that he loſt both innocency and righteouſneſs, and was become the moſt miſerable of all creatures: and even ſo we remember Chriſt ſo well by images, that we forget his commandments, and count his teſtament, confirmed in his blood, for ſtark madneſs or hereſy; ſo miſerably have we remembered him, that of all people we are moſt blind: and this doth follow upon our preſumption, when we remember God by breaking of his law: and therefore ſurely except we repent, ſhortly God will remember us in his wrath, and reward us with his plagues, as ſure as there is a God it will come to paſs.

But (I thank God) I know their craftineſs herein, who will ſay, Where went he to ſchool? Is he wiſer than our great doctors that ſtudied all their life? And lo, they ſay that it is good hay; although we ſmell it muſty ourſelves, yet we muſt believe it is ſweet, and then pay them well for their ſo ſaying, and all is ſafe. But I might ſay again, What, Sir, be ye wiſer than Chriſt, and God his Father, and the Holy Ghoſt? What, wiſer than the prophets, and the holy apoſtles, and all the holy martyrs? I pray you, Sir, where had you your high learning? Is it higher than God (being in heaven) is able to reach, or have ye ſet it lower in hell than ever Chriſt durſt to venture? For methinks it is ſome ſtrange learning, that Chriſt and his apoſtles could never attain to the knowledge of it. But vain men are never without ſome ſhift: for peradventure they will not be aſhamed to ſay, that Chriſt coming on his Father's meſſage, did forget half his errand by the way: for I dare ſay, that the greater half of their ceremonies were never commanded by Chriſt: yea, I doubt it would be hard to find one in the church perfectly as he left it: ſo Romiſhly hath Antichriſt turned the church upſide down for lucre ſake.

Beloved mother, as I have oftentimes ſaid unto you, even ſo now I beſeech you from my very heart in Chriſt, to conſider your own ſoul's health is offered to you, do not caſt it off: we have not long time here. Why ſhould we deceive ourſelves either for the eaſe of our fleſh, or for gaining the treaſures of this world? I know that ſome will ſay to you, Why ſhould we condemn our fathers who lived thus? God forbid that we ſhould condemn any that did according to their knowledge. But let us take heed that they condemn not us; for if they had heard the word as we have, and had been warned as we have been, it is to be thought that they would more thankfully have received it than we do: yea, they were more faithful in what they knew than many now are. Therefore they ſhall be our condemnation, if we do not embrace this grace offered to us. And ſurely look how many of them God will accept and ſave, thoſe ſhall we never ſee, nor have any part among them: for our diſobedience is greater than was their ignorance. Wherefore, if we will meet our fathers in bliſs and joy, let us not refuſe his mercy offered to us more largely than to them, even according to Chriſt's promiſe, which ſaid, after ſuch great ignorance as to ſeek him from country to country, and find him not; Yet ſhall the goſpel, ſaith he, be preached in all the world, and then ſhall the end come.

And now let us know the time of our viſitation, and not turn back again, ſeeing we are once delivered: for ſurely God will not bear it at our hands to turn backward. O remember Lot's wife. God muſt needs puniſh out of hand our ſhameful backſliding, either with induration and hardneſs of heart, ſo that they ſhall perſecute his church and his true ſervants, or elſe reward it with open vengeance and plagues. And therefore, good mother, accept this my ſimple letter as a fruit of my love and obedience to you. Would God we might be ſo knit in faith and truſt in God's word and promiſes here in this life, as we might together enjoy the bliſs and conſolation of eternal life; which I deſire and ſeek above all worldly treaſure, as ye partly know. If I would ſeek the good will of men contrary to my conſcience, I could make ſome my friends which now peradventure are jealous over me amiſs. But I thank God, let them weigh the matter between God and their conſciences, and they have no juſt cauſe ſo to do: Nevertheleſs I wiſh they would yet refrain, and put their matter and mine into the balance of God's moſt holy word, there to be weighed by the mind of the Holy Ghoſt, expreſſed unto us by the holy patriarchs and prophets, and by Jeſus Chriſt our only Saviour and Mediator, and by his holy apoſtles; and then I doubt not but our matter ſhall be ended with peace and joyfulneſs of heart; which God grant us for his mercy ſake, Amen.

A Letter to his Brother Walter Sheterden.

I Wiſh you health in Chriſt, true knowledge of his word, and a faithful obedient heart unto the ſame. It is ſhewed me, my brother, that ye deſired me by a letter made to a friend of yours to perſuade with me, that I ſhould be ruled by my uncle, who ſaith, he will beſtow his goods very largely upon me, if I would not ſtand too high in mine own conceit. But my good brother, I hope ye do not judge ſo evil of me, that I ſhould have a faith to ſell for money. For though he or you were able to give me the treaſure of the whole country, yet, I thank my Lord God, I do judge it but an heap of dung, in reſpect of the treaſure hid within; yet I do eſteem a buckle of your ſhoe, if it come with good will. And for to be counſelled and ruled by him or you, or any other of my friends, I do not, neither have refuſed it, if they require no more of me than what is in my power, and that which belongeth to a mortal man. But if they require of me any thing which appertaineth to God duly, there is neither high or low, friend or foe, that ſhall get it from me, nor yet the angels in heaven.

For though I be not learned (as the vain men of the world call learning), yet, thanks be to God, I have learned out of God's book to know him from his creatures, and Chriſt from his ſacraments, and to make a difference between the merits of Chriſt's paſſion and his ſupper, and a difference between the water of baptiſm and the Holy Ghoſt, and not to mix and mingle all things confuſedly together: ſo that if one aſk me a queſtion, or a reaſon of my faith, I muſt ſay thus: I believe as the holy church believeth: If he aſk me what is the order of that faith, I ſhould be ſo ignorant that I could not diſcern God from his creatures, nor Chriſt from his ſacraments. If I ſhould ſo monſtrouſly utter my faith, that I were not able to judge between Chriſt's birth and his burial; nor, which were firſt, of his mortification, and his glorification, who would believe that my faith were ſound?

For ſome affirm that Chriſt did not give to his apoſtles a mortal and a paſſible body, but an immortal and glorified body, ſo that he ſhould have a glorified body before his death, and ſo his glorification was before his reſurrection; and that he was riſen before he was crucified, and crucified before his baptiſm; and then they may as well ſay, he was baptized before his birth, and born before he was conceived, and conceived before he was promiſed, and that were even right Antichriſt to turn all things backward, and then ſay, O ye muſt believe, for God is almighty, he can do all things, &c. Truth it is that God is almighty indeed, and yet I may not believe things contrary to his word, that Chriſt's body was glorified before he died: for God's omnipotency doth not ſtand in things contrary to his will, but in performing his will at his pleaſure in time. Neither doth he require of us to judge or believe of his almighty power, that he hath made the end of the world to come before the beginning, or yet the fruit to come before the bloſſom, and yet is he nevertheleſs almighty.

But if peradventure you ſhall think with yourſelf, Why they are learned; it were marvel but they ſhould know what is the truth, as well as others which never kept any ſuch ſtudy, &c. To that I anſwer, that if they had ſtudied God's word, the author of truth, as they have done logic, and Duns, with the legend of lyes, they ſhould have been as expert in the truth, as they be now in bald reaſons. But thus hath God fulfilled his promiſe, that ſuch ſhould be deluded with lyes, who would not believe nor walk in his truth.

And again, this is a good cauſe to make us think ſurely, that it was the cauſe that God gave them over at the firſt to error, after the apoſtles time by little and little, as they grew in ſin. For ſeeing we had his truth now among us a few years, becauſe we did not obey it, we ſee what a ſudden change God hath brought upon us for the ſake of our ſins. And why ſhould we not think that this and ſuch like diſobedience was the cauſe that God took his word from all Chriſtendom at the firſt, and caſt a darkneſs upon all them that would not walk in his light? For it is evident enough to ſee how unlike their doings be to Chriſt and his apoſtles: and that ſeen, either we muſt judge Chriſt's doings very ſlender, and theirs good, or elſe that they be indeed the very Antichriſts, who ſhould come and turn all things out of frame. Thus I have been bold to trouble you, which I hope will not be altogether in vain. Pray for me as I do for you.

Another Letter to his Brother.

GOD, who is the giver of all goodneſs, and that freely for his love to us (not only without our deſerts, but even contrary to the ſame), grant you, my brother, ſuch increaſe of godly knowledge and love to the virtues thereunto belonging, as may give you ſuch a reliſh of heavenly things, that all the treaſures of earthly things may ſavour to you, as indeed they are, moſt vain and uncertain, ſo ſhall ye never take them to be better than they really are. Yea, whether God take them from us, or give them to us, we ſhall know ourſelves neither richer nor poorer before God. But if we lay up in our hearts the treaſure of his word, we ſhall not only enrich ourſelves againſt the time of need, but alſo arm ourſelves againſt the battle with weapons and harneſs, which is invincible, and cloath ourſelves againſt the marriage. For behold, the Lord hath called us a long time to the feaſt, and blown the trumpet to prepare for the battle. Let us know the time of our viſitation, leſt the Lord ſitting on his mount, bewail our deſtruction, which he deſireth not, but becauſe he is juſt to puniſh ſuch as continue in ſin, even as he is merciful to forgive the repentant that turn in time; for ſo is God that cannot deny himſelf.

Let us therefore in this day, while it is called to-day, hear his voice, and not harden our hearts by reſiſtance of his will, leſt he ſwear in his wrath that we ſhall not enter into his reſt. Let us count it ſufficient that we have ſpent the time paſt (as St. Peter ſaith) after the will of the Gentiles, in eating and drinking, chambering, and wantonneſs, and in abominable idolatry, &c. and now let us aſſay a new life, and trade our members in virtue another while, leſt peradventure we might run paſt any return in the contrary. But if we now return and ſincerely lay hold of his word in deed and verity, as we have a long time done in talk and liberty, then will God heap upon us ſuch an aſſurance of conſcience, as ſhall kindle our conſolation in him, ſo that all treaſure ſhall be dung to the excellent knowledge of our Saviour. Dear brother, my heart's deſire and prayer to God is, that we may together enjoy the bliſs of eternal inheritance by one ſpiritual regeneration and new birth, as we are joined by nature. But alas, the way and means thereunto hath been much neglected by me, I will not ſay by you, for I had rather ye ſhould accuſe yourſelf: for no doubt the beſt of us both hath not ſought for wiſdom in God's word, as ſome in the world whom we know have ſought for money: therefore they ſhall be our judges, if we do not learn by them: yea the very ant, as Solomon ſaith, doth teach us to provide for the time to come; for ſhe provideth in ſummer againſt winter.

This was the beſt token I have for you now, which though it be ſimple, yet ſhall it declare partly my heart's deſire towards you, which is even as to mine own ſoul. Let nothing diſmay you for my cauſe: but be ye ſure I ſhall have victory in the truth, which truth is ſtronger than kings, wine, or women. For as Zorobabel ſaith, Wine is unrighteous, the king is unrighteous, women are unrighteous, yea, all the children of men are unrighteous; but the truth endureth, and is always ſtrong, and conquereth for ever without end: therefore this is to deſire you and all other my friends that wiſh me good, to pray that God will always keep me in his truth, as he hath begun; which prayer, if it be of ſuch a mind as laboureth to depart from evil, ſhall be to me the greateſt pleaſure under heaven. For I deſire nothing in compariſon of God's truth, I thank him of his mercy, who hath ſo wrought: for I take it as a ſure ſeal of the endleſs joy which ſhall hereafter follow; which God bring us unto when his will and pleaſure is, Amen. From Canterbury.

By yours, Nicholas Sheterden.

Another Letter of Mr. Nicholas Sheterden to his Mother.

O My good mother, whom I love with reverence in the Lord, and according to my duty, I deſire your favourable bleſſing and forgiveneſs of all my miſdeeds towards you. Oh my good mother, in few words, I wiſh you the ſame ſalvation, which I hope myſelf to feel, and partly taſte of before this come to you to read; and in the reſurrection, I verily believe to have it more perfectly in body and ſoul joined together for ever: and in that day God grant that you may ſee my face with joy: but, dear mother, beware of that great idolatry, and blaſphemous maſs. O let not that be your God, which mice and worms can devour. Behold I call heaven and earth to record, that it is no God, yea, the fire that conſumeth it, and the moiſtneſs that cauſeth it to mould; and I take Chriſt's teſtament to witneſs, that it is none of his ordinances, but a mere invention of men, and a ſnare to catch the blood of innocents; and now that God hath ſhewed it unto you, be warned in time. O give over old cuſtoms, and become new in the truth. What ſtate ſoever your father be in, leave that to God; and let us follow the counſel of his word. Dear mother, embrace it with hearty affection, read it with obedience, let it be your paſtime; but yet caſt off all carnal affections, and love of worldly things: ſo ſhall we meet in joy at the laſt day, or elſe I bid you farewel for evermore: O farewel, my friends and lovers all, God grant me to ſee your faces in joy. Amen.

A Letter to his Wife.

I Wrote unto you as one that longed more to hear of your health, than of all worldly treaſure, willing you to intreat Eſau the elder brother by nature gently, giving to him his own, yea, and offer him one of the droves, and ſay they be Jacob's, and are ſent for a preſent to my lord Eſau, but he will not take it, &c. Now my beloved, ye know the bleſſing of our Father is, that the elder ſhall ſerve the younger, and wiſdom our mother hath taught us the ſame; and I know ye do complain of your ſervant the fleſh, that he is rebellious, diſobedient, and untoward: unruly and crookedly ye think he doth his ſervice: but yet behold, how ſhall ye plead your cauſe before an indifferent judge? For if it be true that his ſervice be not according to his duty, as it is many times found in ſervants; yet, I ſay, can you ſhew your cauſe to no indifferent judge, but he ſhall object againſt you that he is not kept like a ſervant, but he lacketh both meat and drink, and other neceſſaries meet and due for a ſervant: ſo ſhall ye take more ſhame of your own complaint, than remedy or advantage againſt your ſervant, and it ſhall be a cloak for him to hide all his rebellion and untoward ſervice, becauſe ye have miſuſed him. And therefore my ſentence is, that ye patiently bear with him in ſmall faults, and amend your own great faults, as oppreſſion, cruelty and covetouſneſs, requiring more than a ſervant can do, eſpecially being tired with labour, ſtarved with hunger, and lamed with ſtripes. And theſe things amended, if he do his ſervice negligently (as no doubt ſometimes he will), yet then ye may boldly correct him with diſcretion; and ſometimes if he do not his taſk, ye may make him go to bed ſupperleſs; but yet beat him not with durable ſtrokes, neither with-hold his meat in due time, and pinch him not by the belly continually, but let him have ſomething to joy in: only watch him, and keep him from doing of harm. Though he be but a ſtranger in the life that is in God: yet be good to ſtrangers, for we are all ſtrangers in darkneſs, and captives in ſin, as well ſoul and ſpirit, being in Egypt, as now the fleſh is yet unbaptized with the terrible red ſea of death; and remember that one law abideth for the ſtranger, I mean one reward abideth for body and ſoul in the land of everlaſting reſt. And therefore intreat him gently, and deal with him juſtly now: for the time will come that the yoke of bondage ſhall be taken from his neck, and he ſhall be a fellow heir with your younger brother.

Circumciſe him therefore, but do not miſuſe him, nor keep him from his own, but deal mercifully with the ſtranger, that he may ſay, Oh of what underſtanding heart is this people! Who hath God, or where is God ſo nigh as to theſe? God make you wiſe and politic in heart, victorious in the field of this world, to rule the nation with a rod: but kill not the Gibeonites, with whom peace is taken; but let them draw water, and hew wood, but give them their meat and drink due for labourers, and be glad becauſe your diſeaſe is ſo remedied; for it is better and eaſier for a thirſty labouring man to drink, than for a drunken man to tell a ſober tale. Yea, it is a token that ye have earneſtly followed your labour, and not kept company with drunkards and belly-gods: and therefore be glad, I ſay, yea, and be glad again; for great is your reward in heaven; yea, bleſſed ſhall they be, that in this your zeal ſhall meet you, and withdraw your hand from revenging yourſelf upon that churliſh Nabal: which thing I hope to do now with theſe ſweet raiſins, and frails of figs, I being of one houſe with your ſervant Nabal, I dare ſay to you that churliſhneſs is his name: but revenge not, for the Lord ſhall do it in his due time. Farewel, mine own heart.

Yours in bonds at Weſtgate,

Nicholas Sheterden.

The next day after the condemnation of theſe aforeſaid, which was the 26th day of July, W. Coker, W. Hopper of Crambrook, Henry Laurence, Richard Wright of Aſhford, W. Stere of Aſhford, were likewiſe condemned for the ſame articles. But becauſe the execution of theſe martyrs pertaineth not to this month, more ſhall be ſaid of them when we come to the following month of Auguſt.

Nicholas Hall and Chriſtopher Waid, Martyrs.

THE ſame month of July Nicholas Hall bricklayer, and Chriſtopher Waid of Dartford, ſuffered death, who were condemned by Maurice biſhop of Rocheſter about the laſt day of June. The ſix articles adminiſtered to them were of the ſame ordinary courſe and effect with the other articles before ſpecified, the brief ſum whereof were theſe.

1. Firſt, that they were chriſtian men, and profeſſed the catholic determinations of our mother holy church.

2. That they which maintain or hold otherwiſe than our holy mother the catholic church doth, are heretics.

3. That they hold and maintain, that in the ſacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, is not the very body and blood of Chriſt. And that the ſaid very body of Chriſt is verily in heaven only, and not in the ſacrament.

4. Item, that they have and do hold and maintain, that the maſs, as it is now uſed in the catholic church, is naught and abominable.

5. Item, that they have been and be amongſt the people of that juriſdiction vehemently ſuſpected upon the premiſſes, and thereupon indicted, &c.

To theſe articles they anſwered as follows: Firſt, Granting themſelves chriſtian men, and acknowledging the determination of the holy church, that is, of the congregation or body of Chriſt; ſave that Hall denied to call the catholic and apoſtolic church his mother, becauſe he found not this word Mother, in the ſcripture.

To the ſecond they granted. To the third article, as touching the very body and blood of Chriſt to be under the forms of bread and wine in ſubſtance, they would not grant, only affirming the very body of him to be in heaven, and the ſacrament to be a token or remembrance of Chriſt's death; Nicholas Hall adding moreover, and ſaying, That whereas before he held the ſacrament to be but only a token or remembrance of Chriſt's death, now he ſaid, that there is neither token nor remembrance, becauſe it is now miſuſed and clean turned from Chriſt's inſtitution, &c. And concerning the maſs in the fourth article, to be abominable, Chriſtopher Waid, with the other, anſwered, that as they had confeſſed before, ſo they would not now go from what they had ſaid. To the fifth article, for the people's ſuſpicion they made no great account nor ſticking to grant to the ſame.

And thus much concerning the articles and anſwers of theſe good men. Which being received, immediately ſentence of condemnation was pronounced by the ſaid Maurice the biſhop againſt them, the copy of which ſentence as it runneth much after the common courſe in condemning all the other ſervants of Chriſt, ſo the ſame being exemplified before in the ſtory of Mr. Rogers, (Page 97.) needeth not here to be repeated. Nicholas Hall was bu nt at Rocheſter about the 19th day of July.

Furthermore, with the aforeſaid Hall and Waid, in the ſame month of July, three others were condemned by Maurice biſhop of Rocheſter, whoſe names were Joan Beach widow, John Harpol of Rocheſter, and Margery Polley. Of which Margery Polley, touching her examination and condemnation, here followeth in ſtory.

The Condemnation of Margery Polley, Widow and Martyr.

MArgery Polley widow, ſometime wife of Richard Polley of Pepingbery, was accuſed and brought before the ſaid Maurice biſhop of Rocheſter, about the beginning of the month of June. Which biſhop, according to the pontifical ſolemnity of that church, riſing up out of the chair of his majeſty, in the high ſwelling ſtile after his ordinary manner to daſh the ſilly poor woman, beginning in theſe words: "We Maurice, by the ſufferance of God, biſhop of Rocheſter, proceeding of our mere office in a cauſe of hereſy, againſt thee Margery Polley, of the pariſh of Pepingbery, of our dioceſe and juriſdiction of Rocheſter, do lay and object againſt thee all and ſingular theſe articles enſuing. To which, and to every parcel of them, we require of thee a true, full, and plain anſwer, by virtue of thine oath thereupon to be given, &c.

Thus the oath firſt being adminiſtered, and the articles commenced againſt her, which articles were the ſame that were miniſtered to Nicholas Hall and Waid before, ſhe ſo framed her anſwers again, eſpecially anſwering to the third and fourth articles, that ſhe neither allowed the deity of their ſacrament, nor the abſurdity of their maſs. For which ſentence was read againſt her about the beginning of June, and ſhe condemned for the ſame. But becauſe her death followed not upon the ſame, we will therefore defer the tractation thereof to the due place and time, firſt ſetting down in order of hiſtory the execution of Chriſtopher Waid abovementioned.

The Martyrdom of Chriſtopher Waid.

CHriſtopher Waid of Dartford in the county of Kent, linen-weaver, was condemned by Maurice biſhop of Rocheſter, and appointed to be burnt at Dartford aforeſaid. At the day appointed for his execution, which was in the month of July, there was carried out of town, betimes in the morning, in a cart, a ſtake, and therewith many bundles of reeds, to a place a quarter of a mile out of the town, called the Brimth, into a gravel-pit thereby, the common place of the execution of felons. Thither alſo was brought a load of broom-faggots, with other faggots and tall wood. Unto which place the people of the country reſorted in great numbers, and there waited his coming; inſomuch as divers fruiterers came thither with horſe loads of cherries, and ſold them. About ten of the clock the ſheriff came riding with a great many other gentlemen and retinue, appointed to aſſiſt him therein, and with them Chriſtopher Waid, Margery Polley of Tunbridge riding pinioned by him, both ſinging of a pſalm; which Margery, as ſoon as ſhe eſpied afar off the multitude gathered about the place where he ſhould ſuffer, waiting his coming, ſhe ſaid unto him very loud and chearfully, You may rejoice, Waid, to ſee ſuch a company gathered to celebrate your marriage this day.

And ſo paſſing by the place, which joined to the high-way, they were ſtraightway carried down to the town, where ſhe was kept till the ſheriff returned from Waid's execution. Mr. Waid being made ready, and ſtripped out of his cloaths in an inn, a fair long white ſhirt was brought unto him from his wife, which being put on, and he pinioned, was led up on foot again to the aforeſaid place. When he was come to the ſtake, he took it in his arms, and kiſſed it, ſetting his back unto it, and ſtanding in a pitch barrel which was taken from the beacon, being hard by; then a ſmith brought a hoop of iron, and with two ſtaples made him faſt to the ſtake under his arms.

As ſoon as he was thus ſettled, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, he ſpake with a chearful and loud voice the laſt verſe of the 86th Pſalm; "Shew ſome good token upon me, O Lord, that they which hate me may ſee it, and be aſhamed: becauſe thou, Lord, haſt helped me, and comforted me." Near to the ſtake was a little hill, upon the top whereof were ſet up four ſtays, quadrangle wiſe, with a covering round about like a pulpit: into which place, as Waid was thus praying at the ſtake, entered a friar with a book in his hand; whom when Waid eſpied, he cried earneſtly unto the people, to take heed of the doctrine of the whore of Babylon, exhorting them to embrace the doctrine of the goſpel preached in King Edward's days. While he was thus ſpeaking to the people, the ſheriff interrupted him, ſaying, Be quiet, Waid, and die patiently. I am quiet, ſaid he, I thank God, Mr. Sheriff, and ſo truſt to die. All this while the friar ſtood ſtill looking over the coverlet, as though he would have uttered ſomewhat: but Waid mightily admoniſhed the people to beware of that doctrine; which when the friar perceived, whether he was amazed, or could have no audience of the people, he withdrew out of the place immediately, without ſpeaking any word, and went away down to the town. the reeds being ſet about him, he pulled them, and embraced them in his arms, always with his hands making a hole againſt his face, that his voice might be heard, which his tormentors perceiving, they caſt faggots at the ſame hole; but notwithſtanding he ſtill, as he could, put them off, his face being hurt with the end of a faggot caſt thereat. Then fire being put unto him, he cried unto God often, Lord Jeſus, receive my ſoul; without any token or ſign of impatience in the fire, till at length after the fire was thoroughly kindled, he was heard by no man to ſpeak, ſtill holding up his hands together over his head towards heaven even when he was dead and altogether roaſted, as though they had been ſtayed up with a prop ſtanding under them.

This ſign did God ſhew upon him, whereby his very enemies might perceive, that God had, according to his prayer, ſhewed ſuch a token upon him, even to their ſhame and confuſion. And thus was the order of this godly martyr's execution, this was his end. Whereby God ſeemed to confound and ſtrike with the ſpirit of dumbneſs the friar, that locuſt which was riſen up to have ſpoken againſt him; and alſo no leſs wonderfully ſuſtained thoſe hands which he lifted up to him for comfort in his torment.

The Apprehenſion, Examination, Condemnation, and Burning of Dirick Carver, and John Launder, who ſuffered Martyrdom for the Teſtimony of the Goſpel.

THE 22d day of July Dirick Carver, late of the pariſh of Brighthelmſtone in the county of Suſſex, was burnt at Lewes in the ſaid county. And the day following John Launder, late of Godſtone in the county of Surry, was burnt at Steyning. Theſe two men were, with others, about the latter end of the month of October, in the year 1554. apprehended by Edward Gage, gentleman, as they were at prayers in the dwelling houſe of the ſaid Dirick, and by him were ſent up to the queen's council, who, after examination, ſent them as priſoners to Newgate, there to attend the leiſure of Bonner biſhop of London. From whence (upon the biſhop's receipt of a letter from the lord marquis of Wincheſter, now lord treaſurer) they were brought by the keeper of the priſon on the 8th of June next after into the biſhop's chamber at his houſe in London; and there (being examined upon divers points of religion) they made their ſeveral confeſſions, ſubſcribing and ſigning them with their own hands: which being read, the biſhop objected unto them certain other articles, cauſing them to ſwear truly and directly to anſwer thereunto: which articles they confeſſed to be true, referring themſelves chiefly to their former confeſſions.

This done, after long perſuaſion and fair exhortations, they were demanded whether they would ſtand to their anſwers. To whom Launder ſaid, I will never go from theſe anſwers as long as I live. The other alſo confirmed the ſame; and therefore they were commanded to appear again before the biſhop in the conſiſtory at Paul's the tenth day of the ſame month. Which articles and confeſſion, with the forementioned letter, do here enſue.

A Letter from the Marquis of Wincheſter, Lord Treaſurer, to Bonner Biſhop of London, touching the Examination of the ſaid Priſoners.

AFTER my right hearty commendations to your good lordſhip, I ſhall not forget your livery of black againſt this time; no more I ſhall Mr. Dean, to whom I wrote to make the ſermon, who muſt now aſſuredly do it: for my lord Chicheſter cannot attend it. To whom I have given like knowledge by my letter now ſent; and your lordſhip muſt command the ſextons of your church to be in a readineſs for ringing in the time of ſervice. And if ye be not furniſhed with black apparel for the prieſt, deacon, and ſub-deacon, I muſt have knowledge thereof, that it may be taken of the queen's ſtuff, whereof I pray you let me be advertiſed.

And ye have ſent Bradford to Newgate, as a man convicted of hereſy before you: but as I perceive ye have not ſent me a Significavit, and therefore you muſt ſend me one, that I may proceed with him, and that ſhall I do, as ſoon as I am anſwered by you.

There be divers like priſoners that came from Suſſex, that be not yet examined before you, lying now in Newgate, who muſt be examined by you, ſince they be come to London, and ſo I pray they may be, and I certified of your proceedings, that I may follow, which I ſhall do, thanking your lordſhip heartily for my conies, truſting to recompenſe your lordſhip again ſhortly with twice as many. From my houſe this ſeventh of June, 1555.

Your loving friend, Wincheſter.

The Confeſſion of Dirick Carver, before Bonner Biſhop of London.

DIRICK CARVER, beer-brewer of Brighthelmſtone, in the county of Suſſex, where he hath dwelt about eight or nine years, born in the village of Dilſon by Stockom in the land of Luke, about forty years of age, and now priſoner in Newgate, where he hath remained and continued at the council's commandment, ſince Allhallows-day laſt paſt, being examined concerning his faith and belief in the ſacrament of the altar, ſaith, that he hath and doth believe, that the very ſubſtance of the body and blood of Chriſt is not in the ſaid ſacrament, and that there is no other ſubſtance remaining in the ſaid ſacrament after the words ſpoken by the prieſt, but only the ſubſtance of bread and wine.

Item, Being examined concerning the maſs in Latin now uſed in the church of England, he believeth that there is no ſacrifice in the ſaid maſs, and that there is in it no ſalvation for a chriſtian man, except it ſhould be ſaid in the mother tongue, that he might underſtand it; and concerning the ceremonies of the church, he ſaith and believeth that they be not profitable to a chriſtian man.

Item, Being examined concerning auricular confeſſion, he anſwereth, That he hath believed, and doth believe, that it is neceſſary to go to a good prieſt for good counſel; but the abſolution of the prieſt, laying his hand upon any man's head, as is now uſed, is nothing profitable to a chriſtian man's ſalvation. And further he ſaith, that he hath not been confeſſed, nor received the ſacrament of the altar, ſince the coronation of the queen that now is.

Item, Concerning the faith and religion now taught, ſet forth and believed in the church of England, he anſwereth and believeth, that the faith and doctrine now taught, ſet forth, and uſed in the ſaid church of England, is not agreeable to God's word. And furthermore he ſaith, that biſhop Hooper, Cardmaker, Rogers, and others of their opinion, who were lately burnt, were good chriſtian men, and preached the true doctrine of Chriſt, as he believeth; and ſaith that they ſhed their blood in the ſame doctrine, which was by the power of God, as he ſaith and believeth.

And further being examined, he ſaith, That ſince the queen's coronation, he hath had the Bible and Pſalter in Engliſh read in his houſe at Brighthelmſtone divers times, and likewiſe ſince his coming to Newgate: but the keeper hearing thereof, took them away; and alſo ſaid, that about a twelvemonth ago, he had the Engliſh proceſſion ſaid in his houſe, with other Engliſh prayers. And further ſaid, That Thomas Iveſon, John Launder, and William Veſie, being priſoners with him in Newgate, were taken with this examinate in his houſe at Brighthelmſtone, as they were hearing the goſpel then read in Engliſh, a little before Allhallows day laſt, and brought into the court: and being examined thereupon by the council, were committed by them to priſon in Newgate.

The Confeſſion of John Launder, before Bonner Biſhop of London.

JOHN LAUNDER of the pariſh of Godſtone, in the county of Surry, huſbandman, aged 25 years, born at Godſtone aforeſaid, being examined, doth confeſs and ſay, That about two days before laſt Allhallowntide this examinate and one Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveſon, William Veſie, with divers other perſons, to the number of twelve (being all together in their prayers, ſaying the ſervice in Engliſh, ſet forth in the time of king Edward the ſixth, in the houſe of the ſaid Dirick Carver, ſituated at Brighthelmſtone in Suſſex), were apprehended by one Mr. Edward Gage, and by him ſent up to London to the king and queen's council, and by them (upon his examination) committed to Newgate, where he with his ſaid fellows hath ever ſince remained.

And further being examined, he doth confeſs and ſay, that the occaſion of his coming to the ſaid Brighthelmſtone, was upon ſome buſineſs there to be done for his father: and ſo being there, and hearing that the ſaid Dirick was a man that did much favour the goſpel, this examinate did reſort to his houſe and company, whom before that time he did never ſee or know, and by reaſon of that his reſort he was apprehended as before: And further doth confeſs and believe, that there is here in earth one whole and univerſal catholic church, whereof the members be diſperſed through the world; and doth believe alſo, that the ſame church doth ſet forth and teach only two ſacraments, namely, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the ſupper of our Lord. And whoſoever doth teach or uſe any more ſacraments, or yet any ceremonies, he doth not believe that they be of the catholic church, but doth abhor them from the bottom of his heart: And doth further ſay and believe, that all the ſervice, ſacrifices and ceremonies, now uſed in this realm of England (yea and in all other parts of the world, which have been uſed after the ſame manner), be erroneous and naught, and contrary to Chriſt's inſtitution, and the determination of Chriſt's catholic church, whereof he believeth that he himſelf is a member.

Alſo he doth confeſs and believe, that in the ſacrament now called the ſacrament of the altar, there is not really and trully contained, under the forms of bread and wine, the very natural body and blood of Chriſt in ſubſtance: but his belief and faith therein is as followeth, to wit, That when he doth receive the material bread and wine, he doth receive the ſame in a remembrance of Chriſt's death and paſſion, and ſo receiving it he doth eat and drink Chriſt's body and blood by faith, and none other ways, as he believeth.

And moreover he doth confeſs, ſay and believe, that the maſs now uſed in the realm of England, or elſewhere in all Chriſtendom, is naught and abominable, and directly againſt God's word, and his catholic church; and that there is nothing ſaid or uſed in it good and profitable. For he ſaith, that albeit the Gloria in excelſis, the creed, the Sanctus, Pater noſter, Agnus, and other parts of the maſs be of themſelves good and profitable, yet the ſame being uſed amongſt other things that be naught and ſuperfluous in the maſs, the ſame good things do become naught alſo, as he believeth.

And he doth believe and confeſs, that auricular confeſſion is not neceſſary to be made to any prieſt, or to any other creature, but every perſon ought to acknowledge and confeſs his ſins only to God; and alſo that no man hath any authority to abſolve any one from his ſins; and alſo believeth, that the right and true way (according to the ſcripture), after a man hath fallen from grace to ſin, to ariſe to Chriſt again, is to be ſorry for his offences, and to do the ſame or the like no more; and not to make any auricular confeſſion of them to the prieſt, or to take abſolution for them at the prieſt's hand. All which his ſaid opinions he hath believed theſe ſeven or eight years paſt, and in that time hath divers times openly argued and defended the ſame, as he ſaith, &c.

Upon Monday, being the tenth day of June, theſe two perſons, with others, were brought by the keeper unto the biſhop's conſiſtory (as it was before commanded) at one of the clock in the afternoon, where the biſhop, firſt beginning with the ſaid Dirick Carver, cauſed his confeſſion to be openly read unto him, aſking him whether he would ſtand to the ſame. To whom the ſaid Dirick anſwered, that he would: for your doctrine, ſaid he, is poiſon and ſorcery. If Chriſt were here, you would put him to a worſe death than he was put to before.

You ſay that you can make a God; ye can make a pudding as well. Your ceremonies in the church be beggary and poiſon. And further I ſay, that auricular confeſſion is contrary to God's word, and very poiſon: with divers other ſuch like words.

The biſhop ſeeing his conſtancy, and that neither his accuſtomed flatteries, nor yet his cruel threatenings, could once move this good man to incline to their idolatry, pronounced his uſual and general bleſſing, as well towards Dirick Carver, as alſo on the ſaid John Launder, although ſeverally; who remained as conſtant as the other: and therefore were both delivered to the ſheriffs, who were there preſent, but afterwards were conveyed to the places above named, and there moſt joyfully gave their bodies to be burned in the fire, and their ſouls into the hands of Almighty God, by Jeſus Chriſt, who hath aſſured them to a better hope of life.

Dirick Carver was a man whom the Lord had bleſſed as well with temporal riches, as with his ſpiritual treaſures; which yet were no clog or hindrance unto his true profeſſing of Chriſt (God by his grace ſo working in him), of which there was ſuch havock made by the greedy raveners of that time, that his poor wife and children had little thereof. During his impriſonment, although he was well ſtricken in years (and, as it were, paſt the time of learning), yet he ſo diligently ſpent his time, that being at his firſt apprehenſion utterly ignorant of any letter of the book, he could before his death perfectly read any printed Engliſh. Whoſe zeal and induſtry is worthy of no ſmall commendation and therefore I thought it good not to paſs it over in ſilence, but it is recommended for the good example and encouragement of others.

Moreover, at his coming into the town of Lewes to be burnt, the people called to him, beſeeching God to ſtrengthen him in the faith of Jeſus Chriſt. He thanked them, and prayed to God that of his mercy he would ſtrengthen them in the like faith. And when he came to the ſign of the Star, the people flocked about him, where the ſheriff ſaid, that he had found him a faithful man in all his anſwers. And as he came to the ſtake, he kneeled down and made his prayers, and the ſheriff made haſte.

Then his book was thrown into the barrel, and when he had ſtripped himſelf (as a joyful ſervant of God), he went into the barrel himſelf. And as ſoon as ever he came in, he took up the book and threw it among the people, and then the ſheriff commanded in the name of the king and queen, on pain of death, to throw in the book again. And immediately the holy martyr began to ſpeak with a joyful voice, ſaying:

Dear brethren and ſiſters, I call you all to witneſs, that I am come to ſeal Chriſt's goſpel with my blood, becauſe I know that it is true: it is well known to you all, that it it hath been truly preached here in Lewes, and in all places of England, and now it is not. And becauſe I will not deny God's goſpel, and be obedient to man's laws, I am condemned to die. Dear brethren and ſiſters, as many of you as do believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, unto everlaſting life, ſee you do the works appertaining to the ſame. And as many of you as do believe in the pope of Rome and his laws, which he ſets forth in theſe days, you do believe to your utter condemnation, and, except the infinite mercy of God prevent it, you ſhall burn in the eternal flames of hell.

Immediately the ſheriff ſpake unto him, and ſaid, If thou doſt not believe on the pope, thou art damned body and ſoul. And further the ſheriff ſaid unto him, Speak to thy God, that he may deliver thee now, or elſe to ſtrike me down, to the example of this people: but this pious man ſaid, The Lord forgive you your ſayings.

And then he ſpake again to all the people there preſent with a loud voice, ſaying, Dear brethren, and all you whom I have offended in words or in deed, I aſk you for the Lord's ſake to forgive me, and I heartily forgive all you who have offended me in thought, word, or deed. And he ſaid further in his prayer, O Lord my God, thou haſt written, "He that will not forſake wife, children, houſe, and all that ever he hath, and take up thy croſs and follow thee, is not worthy of thee." But thou, Lord, knoweſt that I have forſaken all, to come unto thee: Lord, have mercy upon me, for unto thee I commend my ſpirit; and my ſoul doth rejoice in thee. Theſe were the laſt words of that faithful ſervant of Chriſt, before the fire was put to him. And when the fire came to him, he cried, O Lord, have mercy upon me, and ſprung up in the fire, calling upon the name of Jeſus; and ſo he ended this life.

Thomas Iveſon, Martyr.

THomas Iveſon of Godſtone in the county of Surry, carpenter, was burnt about the ſame month at Chicheſter; whoſe apprehenſion, examination, and condemnation (foraſmuch as it was at the ſame time, and in the ſame form with Dirick Carver and John Launder), I do here omit, referring the reader to their hiſtory and proceſs before mentioned; except only this his ſeparate confeſſion and private anſwers made before biſhop Bonner at his laſt examination in the conſiſtory, I thought not to omit, who being examined upon the aforeſaid articles, anſwered as followeth.

The Anſwers of Thomas Iveſon to the Objections of Bonner Biſhop of London, in a Chamber at his Houſe in the Month of July.

1. FIRST, That he believeth, that there is but one catholic, univerſal, and whole church of Chriſt through the whole world, which hath held, and doth hold the true faith, and all the neceſſary articles of chriſtian belief, and all the ſacraments of Chriſt, with the true uſe and adminiſtration of the ſame.

2. Item, That he is neceſſarily bounden to believe and give credit, in all the ſaid faith, articles of the belief, religion, and the ſacraments of Chriſt, and the adminiſtration of the ſame.

3. Item, That that faith, religion, and adminiſtration of ſacraments, which now is believed, uſed, taught and ſet forth in this our church of England, is not agreeing with the truth and faith of Chriſt, nor with the faith of the ſaid catholic and univerſal church of Chriſt.

4. Item, Concerning the ſacrament of the altar, he believeth that it is a very idol, and deteſtable before God, as it is now adminiſtered.

5. Item, That the maſs is naught, and not of the inſtitution of Chriſt, but that it is of man's invention: and being demanded, whether any thing uſed in the maſs be good, he ſaid that he would anſwer no further.

6. Item, That he had not received the ſacrament of the altar ſince it had been adminiſtered as now it is in England, neither was confeſſed at any time within theſe ſeven years; nor heard maſs for the ſame ſpace.

7. Item, That auricular confeſſion is not neceſſary to be made to a prieſt; for he cannot forgive, nor abſolve him from ſins.

8. Item, Concerning the ſacrament of baptiſm, that it is a ſign and token of Chriſt, as circumciſion was, and no otherwiſe; and he believeth that his ſins are not waſhed away thereby, but his body only waſhed: for his ſins be waſhed away only by Chriſt's blood.

9. Item, That there be in the catholic church of Chriſt only two ſacraments, that is to ſay, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the ſupper of the Lord, and no more, which are not rightly uſed at this preſent time in England, and therefore be unprofitable.

10. Item, He believeth that all the ceremonies now uſed in the church of England, are vain, ſuperfluous, ſuperſtitious and naught.

Furthermore, the ſaid Iveſon being earneſtly perſuaded to recant, ſaid in this wiſe, I would not recant and forſake my opinion and belief for all the goods in London: I do appeal to God's mercy, and will be none of your church, nor ſubmit myſelf to the ſame: and that I have ſaid, I will ſay again. And if there came an angel from heaven to teach me any other doctrine than that which I am now in, I would not believe him. Which anſwer thus made, he was condemned as an heretic, and with the ſame perſons was committed to the ſecular power, as they term it, and at the place above-mentioned was burned, perſevering ſtill in his conſtant faith unto the end.

John Aleworth, who died in Priſon.

IN the latter end of this month of July, John Aleworth died in priſon at the town of Reading, being there in bonds for the teſtimony of the goſpel. Whom, although the catholic prelates (according to their uſual ſolemnity) excluded out of their catholic burial, yet we ſee no cauſe why to exclude him out of the number of Chriſt's holy martyrs, and heirs of his holy kingdom.

James Abbes, Martyr.

AMONG many that endeavoured in theſe troubleſome days to keep a good conſcience, there was one James Abbes, a young man, who was inforced to have his part with his brethren in wandering, and going from place to place, to avoid the peril of apprehending. But at length he was caught by the hands of wicked men, and brought before Dr. Hopton biſhop of Norwich: who examining him of his religion, and charging him therewith both with threats and fair ſpeeches, at laſt the ſaid James Abbes did yield to their naughty perſuaſions, although his conſcience conſented not thereto.

Now when he was diſmiſſed, and ſhould go from the biſhop, the biſhop calling him again, gave him a piece of money, either lx d. or xx d. whether I know not; which when the ſaid James had received, and was gone from the biſhop, his conſcience began to throb, and inwardly to accuſe his fact: in which combat with himſelf (being piteouſly vexed), he went immediately to the biſhop again, and there threw him his ſaid money which he had received at his hand, and ſaid, he repented that he ever gave his conſent to their wicked perſuaſions, and in taking of his money.

Now this being done, the biſhop with his chaplains laboured afreſh to win him again, but in vain; for he would not yield for their perſuaſions (although he had played Peter before through infirmity), but ſtood manfully in his maſter's quarrel to the end, and abode the force of the fire in the conſuming of his body to aſhes; which tyranny of burning was done in Bury, the ſecond of Auguſt 1555.

A Diſcourſe of the Apprehenſion, Examination, and Condemnation of John Denley, Gentleman, John Newman, and Patrick Packingham.

IN the midſt of this tempeſtuous rage of malignant adverſaries, perſecuting and deſtroying the poor flock of Chriſt, many there were, which though they were not ſpiritual men, yet thought to help forward for their parts, and, as one would ſay, to heap up more coals to this furious flame of perſecution, whether of a blind zeal, or a paraſitical flattery, I know not. Amongſt which one was Edmund Tyrel, Eſq; and at that time a juſtice of peace within the county of Eſſex, an aſſiſtant to the cruel murderers of God's ſaints: who as he came from the burning of ſome pious martyrs, met with John Denley, gentleman, and John Newman (both of Maidſtone in Kent) travelling upon the way, and going to viſit ſome of their friends in the ſaid county of Eſſex. And upon the ſight of them, as he yet braggeth, apprehended them upon ſuſpicion, and ſearched them; and finding the confeſſions of their faith about them in writing, ſent them up unto the queen's commiſſioners, directing alſo unto one of the ſame commiſſioners theſe his favourable letters in their behalf. The copy whereof here may appear as followeth.

A Copy of Edmund Tyrel's Letter to one of the Queen's Commiſſioners.

SIR, with moſt hearty commendations unto you, theſe ſhall be to advertiſe you, that I have received a letter from Sir Nicholas Hare and you, and others of their majeſties commiſſioners, by a ſervant of the king and queen's, named John Failes, for certain buſineſs about S. Oſyth's, which I could not immediately go about, for that I had received a letter from the council, to aſſiſt the ſheriff for the execution of the heretics, the one at Raleigh, and the other at Rochford, which was done on Tueſday laſt.

And as I came homeward, I met with two men: Even as I ſaw them, I ſuſpected them, and then I did examine and ſearch them, and found about them certain letters which I have ſent you, and alſo a certain writing in paper, what their faith was. And they confeſſed to me, that they had forſaken and fled out of their country for religion's ſake; and ſince they have been in many countries, by their own confeſſion, which I have ſent you: for which I thought it good (as they came from London, and that there may be more found of them than at preſent I can inform you) to ſend them to you, whereby you and others of the king and queen's commiſſioners there might try them, ſo that their lewdneſs may thoroughly be known; for I think theſe have cauſed many to trouble their conſciences. So this hath been ſome hindrance to me, wherefore I could not go about thoſe matters expreſſed in your letters: but to-morrow at noon I intend by God's grace to accompliſh your letters, with as much diligence as I can. May the Holy Trinity ever have you in his keeping. I beſeech you (maſter) to be ſo good as to diſcharge theſe poor men that bring theſe priſoners up as ſoon as may be. And thus moſt heartily farewel. From Raimeſden Park, the 12th of June 1555.

By your aſſured to command,

Edmund Tyrel.

Foraſmuch as in this letter mention is made of a certain writing found about them, containing an account of their faith, the contents whereof here enſueth.

Certain Notes collected and gathered out of the Scriptures by John Denley, Gentleman, with a Confeſſion of his Faith, touching the Sacrament of Chriſt's Body and Blood, found in his Pocket at the Time of his Apprehenſion.

"Chriſt is in the ſacrament, as he is where two or three are gathered together in his name."

THE difference of doctrine between the faithful and the papiſts concerning the ſacrament is, that the papiſts ſay, that Chriſt is corporally under, or in the forms of bread and wine; but the faithful ſay, that Chriſt is not there, neither corporally nor ſpiritually; but in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine, he is ſpiritually, but not corporally.

For figuratively he is in the bread and wine, and ſpiritually he is in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine; but really, carnally, and corporally he is only in heaven, from whence he ſhall come to judge the quick and the dead.

"My belief in the ſacrament of the bleſſed body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt."

AS concerning the ſacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, my belief is this, that the bread and wine is appointed unto a ſacrament; and that after thanks be given to God the Father, then it doth repreſent unto me the very body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; not that the bread is the body, or the wine the blood, but that I in faith do ſee that bleſſed body of our Saviour broken on the croſs, and his precious blood plenteouſly ſhed for the redemption of my ſins. Alſo in faith I hear him call us unto him, ſaying, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are laden, and I will refreſh you," Iſa. 55. alſo Matt. 11. &c. In faith I come unto him, and I am refreſhed, ſo that I believe that all that do come to the table of the Lord in this faith, fear and love, being ſorry for their offences, intending earneſtly to lead a godly converſation in this vale of miſery, do receive the fruit of the death of Chriſt, which fruit is our ſalvation.

I do underſtand (ſpiritually) that as the outward man doth eat the material bread which comforteth the body, ſo doth the inward man (through faith) eat the body of Chriſt, believing that as the bread is broken, ſo was Chriſt's body broken on the croſs for our ſins; which comforteth our ſouls unto life everlaſting, and ſignifying thereby, that even as that bread was divided among them, ſo ſhould his body and fruit of his paſſion be diſtributed unto as many as believed in his words. But the bread broken and eaten in the ſupper, admoniſheth, and putteth us in remembrance of his death, and ſo exciteth us to thankſgiving, to laud and praiſe God for the benefits of our redemption.

And thus we there have Chriſt preſent; in the inward eye and ſight of our faith we eat his body and drink his blood; that is, we believe ſurely that his body was crucified for our ſins, and his blood ſhed for our ſalvation.

Chriſt's body and blood is not contained in the ſacramental bread and wine, as the papiſts have ſaid, and as ſome yet do ſay, as ye read in theſe ſcriptures following: Firſt read in Matth. 9. Luke 5. Matth. 24, and 26. Mark 16. Luke 24. John 13. Luke 23. in the end. John 14, 15, 16, 17. Acts 1. 3. 7. 9. Rom. 8. Pſal. 8. 1 Cor. 10, 11. Exod. 12. Coloſſ. 1. Epheſ. 1. 4. Phil. 2. 1. 1 Theſſ. 1. 4. Heb. 1. 5. 8. 9. 10. 12. 1 Pet. 3. Pſal. 11. 47. 103. 10.

"Chriſt's

" Chriſt's material body is not in all places, as theſe ſcriptures do teſtify hereafter."

Firſt read St. Matthew the laſt, Mark the laſt, Luke the laſt, John 11. 20, 21. Theſe places of the ſcriptures do plainly declare, that his body that was born of the virgin Mary, cannot be in more places than one, and that is in heaven, on the right hand of God, and not in the ſacrament, nor in all places, as the papiſts have affirmed, and yet do affirm.

Therefore whoſoever they be that do worſhip the creatures of bread and wine, do commit idolatry, and make abominable idols of them, and take the glory from God, and give it to his creatures, which is contrary to the mind of God, as theſe ſcriptures hereafter do teſtify: firſt in Exod. 20. 22, 23, 24. Lev. 19. Deut. 4. 6. 32. Pſalm 80. Iſa. 45. Mal. 2. Matt. 4. Luke 4. Acts 14. Rev. 14. Pſalm 98. 1 Cor. 1. Epheſ. 4. 1 Tim. 2. 1 John 5. Rev. 19. 22.

John Denley.

Now to return to the commiſſioners again: they receiving theſe priſoners before-mentioned, after they ſaw they could little prevail with their own perſuaſions, ſent them to biſhop Bonner, to be handled after his fatherly and charitable diſcretion. Which how diſcreet and favourable it was, as well the hiſtory of others, as alſo the ſequel of this doth manifeſtly declare. For the 28th of June then next following he cauſed the ſaid Denley and Newman, with one Patrick Packingham, to be brought into his chamber within his houſe or palace, there examining them upon their confeſſions (which Tyrel had found about them), objecting alſo unto them certain other articles of his own. To which they all anſwered in effect one thing, although Denley anſwered more largely than the others, and therefore I thought his anſwers ſufficient to lay down, as containing the ſubſtance of all the reſt, except that Packingham had one article of no great force objected to him, which the others had not.

This done, the biſhop began with his accuſtomed perſuaſions; to whom Mr. Denley replied, God ſave me from your counſel, and keep me in the mind I am now in, for what you count hereſy I take to be the truth: and thereupon they were commanded to appear in the biſhop's conſiſtory the fifth day of July then next coming, in the afternoon, where theſe articles were objected againſt them.

Articles objected by Edmund Bonner, Biſhop of London, againſt John Denley, John Newman, and Patrick Packingham, jointly and ſeverally, the 28th of June, 1555.

FIRST, That the ſaid D. now is of the dioceſe of London, and the juriſdiction of the biſhop of London.

Secondly, That the ſaid D. hath not believed, nor doth believe, that there is any catholic church of Chriſt here in earth.

Thirdly, That the ſaid D. hath not believed nor doth believe, that this church of England is any part or member of the ſaid catholic church.

Fourthly, That the ſaid D. hath believed and doth believe, that the maſs now uſed in this realm of England is naught, and full of idolatry and evil, and plain againſt God's word, and therefore he the ſaid D. hath not heard it, nor will hear it.

Fifthly, That the ſaid D. hath believed, and doth ſo believe, that auricular confeſſion uſed now in this realm of England, is not good, but contrary to God's word.

Sixthly, That the ſaid D. hath believed, and doth ſo believe, that abſolution given by the prieſt hearing confeſſion, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but contrary to the ſame.

Seventhly, That the ſaid D. hath believed, and doth ſo believe, that chriſtening of children, as it is now uſed in the church of England, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but againſt it: likewiſe confirming of children, giving of orders, ſaying of mattins and even-ſong, anointing of ſick perſons, making of holy bread and holy water, with the reſt of the church.

Eighthly, That the ſaid D. hath believed, and doth ſo believe, that there are but two ſacraments in Chriſt's catholic church, that is to ſay, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the altar.

Ninthly, That the ſaid D. hath believed, and doth ſo believe, that foraſmuch as Chriſt is aſcended up into heaven, therefore the very body of Chriſt is not in the ſacrament of the altar.

Tenthly, That thou Patrick Packingham, now being of the age of twenty-one at leaſt, being within the houſe of the biſhop of London at Paul's, and by him brought to the great chapel to hear maſs there, the ſaid 23d day of June, in the year of our Lord 1555. didſt unreverently ſtand in the ſaid chapel, having thy cap on thy head all the time of maſs; and didſt alſo refuſe to receive holy water and holy bread at the hands of the prieſt, there contemning and deſpiſing both the maſs, and the ſaid holy water and holy bread.

Anſwers to the foregoing Articles.

TO the firſt article I anſwer, It is very true.

To the ſecond article I anſwer, That it is not true: for I believe the holy catholic church, which is built upon the foundation of the prophets and apoſtles, Chriſt being the head; which holy church is the congregation of faithful people diſperſed through the whole world, which church doth truly preach God's holy word; and doth alſo adminiſter the two ſacraments, that is to ſay, baptiſm and the ſupper of the Lord, according to his bleſſed word.

To the third article I anſwer, That I do believe that this church of England, uſing the faith and religion which is now uſed, is no part or member of the aforeſaid catholic church, but is the church of Antichriſt, the biſhop of Rome being the head thereof: for it is plain, that they have altered the teſtament of God, and ſet up a teſtament of their own deviſing, full of blaſphemy and lyes: for Chriſt's teſtament is, that he would have all things done to the edifying of the people, as it appeareth when he taught them to pray, Matt. 6. and alſo it appeareth by St. Paul, 1 Cor. 14. for he ſaith, that " He that propheſieth, ſpeaketh unto men for their edifying, for their exhortation, and for their comfort; he that ſpeaketh with the tongue, profiteth himſelf: he that propheſieth, edifieth the congregation."

Alſo he ſaith, " Even ſo likewiſe when ye ſpeak with tongues, except ye ſpeak words that have ſignification, how ſhall it be underſtood what is ſpoken? for ye ſhall but ſpeak in the air: that is as much as to ſay, in vain. Alſo he ſaith, Thou verily giveſt thanks well, but the other is not edify'd. I thank my God, I ſpeak with tongues more than you all: yet I had rather in the congregation to ſpeak five words with underſtanding, to the information of others, than ten thouſand words with the tongue. Alſo he ſaith, Let all things be done to edification.

Alſo it is written in the 46th Pſalm, " For God is king of all the earth: O ſing praiſes unto him with underſtanding," &c. So it doth appear, that this church of England now uſed, is not built upon Chriſt, if St. Paul's words be true, and alſo the Pſalms; therefore this church is not built upon the prophets, apoſtles, nor Chriſt, as I have before declared.

To the fourth article I anſwer, and I do believe (as I ſaid before) That the maſs now uſed in this realm of England, land, is naught, and abominable idolatry and blaſphemy againſt God's holy word; for Chriſt in his holy ſupper inſtituted the ſacrament of bread and wine, to be eaten together in remembrance of his death till he come, and not to have them worſhipped, and make an idol of them: for God will not be worſhipped in his creatures, but we ought to give him praiſe for his creatures, which he hath created for us. For he ſaith in the ſecond commandment, "Thou ſhalt not make to thyſelf any graven image, nor the likeneſs of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, thou ſhalt not bow down to them, nor worſhip them." So it appeareth by this commandment, that we ought not to worſhip the ſacrament of bread and wine, for it is plain idolatry; for he ſaith, No ſimilitude; therefore, Thou ſhalt not bow down to them nor worſhip them. I pray what do you call kneeling down, holding up the hands, knocking of the breaſt, putting off the cap, and making courteſy, with other like ſuperſtition? you would make men to be ſo blind as to think that this is no worſhipping.

Peradventure you will object and ſay, You do not worſhip the bread and wine, but Chriſt's body which was born of the virgin Mary, contained under the forms of bread and wine. But that is a very lye; for Chriſt's body that was born of the virgin Mary is in heaven, if St. Paul's words be true, as undoubtedly they are: for he ſaith in the tenth of the Hebrews, "But this man, after he had offered one ſacrifice for ſins, is ſet down for ever on the right hand of God, and from henceforth tarrieth till his foes be made his footſtool." Alſo in the 9th chapter he ſaith, "For Chriſt is not entered into holy places made with hands, which are ſimilitudes of true things, but he is entered into very heaven, to appear now in the ſight of God for us, &c. Alſo Phil. 3. But our converſation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Saviour, even the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c. 1 Theſſ. 1. For they themſelves ſhew of you, what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from images to ſerve the living God, and to look for his Son from heaven, whom he raiſed from death, even Jeſus, which delivered us from the wrath to come, &c. Alſo John 16. I went out from the Father, and came into the world. Again, I leave the world, and go to the Father, &c. John 17. Now I am not in the world, and they are in the world, and I come to thee." All theſe places of ſcripture, with many more, plainly prove to them that have ears to hear, that Chriſt's body, which was born of the virgin Mary, is in heaven, and not in the ſacramental bread and wine, and therefore it is idolatry to worſhip them, &c.

To the fifth article I anſwer, That I do believe (as I ſaid before) that auricular confeſſion is not good, as it is now uſed. Touching my ſins, wherein I have offended God, I muſt ſeek to him for remiſſion thereof, for our Saviour ſaith in the 11th of St. Matthew, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are laden, I will eaſe you, &c. The prodigal ſon, Luke 15. ſaith, I will ariſe and go to my Father, and I will ſay to him, Father, I have ſinned againſt heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy ſon, &c. Pſalm 31. I ſaid I will acknowledge mine offences, and accuſe myſelf unto the Lord, and ſo thou forgaveſt the iniquity of my ſin, &c. Job 13. But I will reprove mine own ways in his ſight: he ſhall make me whole, and there may no hypocrite come before him. Syrach 34. ſaith, Who can be cleanſed of the unclean? And there was but one of the ten lepers that were cleanſed, that came to Chriſt to give him thanks. He aſked for the other nine. But if I have offended my neighbour, I muſt reconcile myſelf to him; and if I be a notorious ſinner, after the firſt and ſecond admonition, it ought to be declared to the congregation, and the miniſter of the congregation hath power by the word to excommunicate me, and I am to be taken as an heathen perſon, not for a day, or for forty days, but until ſuch time as I do openly in the congregation acknowledge my fault, then the miniſter hath power by the word to preach to me or them the remiſſion of our ſins in the blood of Jeſus Chriſt, as it is written in the 13th of the Acts of the apoſtles, and Matt. 18. I know no more of any other confeſſion.

To the ſixth article, I the ſaid John Denley have anſwered in the fifth.

To the ſeventh article I anſwer, that as touching the ſacrament of baptiſm, which is the chriſtening of children, it is altered and changed; for St. John uſed nothing but the preaching of the word and the water, as it doth appear when Chriſt required to be baptized of him, and others alſo who came to John to be baptized, as it appeareth, Matt. 3. Mark 1. Luke 3. And Acts 1. the chamberlain ſaid: See, here is water, what hindereth me to be baptized? It appeareth here that Philip had preached unto him; for he ſaid, Here is water. We do not read that he aſked for any cream, oil, or ſpittle, or conjured water, or conjured wax, nor chriſm or ſalt, for it ſeemeth that Philip had preached no ſuch things to him; for he would as well have aſked for them as for water: and the water was not conjured, but even as it was before. Alſo Acts 10. "Then anſwered Peter, Can any man forbid water, that theſe ſhould not be baptized? &c. Acts 16. And Paul and Silas preached unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his houſe: and he took them the ſame hour of the night, and waſhed their wounds, and ſo was he baptized, and all they of his houſhold ſtraitway," where ye ſee nothing but preaching the word and the water. The like alſo is to be ſaid of the reſt of the ceremonies of your church.

To the eighth article I anſwer ſhortly, that there be no more ſacraments than two; baptiſm, and the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, except ye will make the rainbow a ſacrament: for there is no ſacrament but what hath a promiſe annexed to it.

To the ninth article, I anſwer you, That ye have my mind written already: for it was found about me when I was taken: and alſo ye know my mind in the fourth article, plainly expreſſed concerning the bodily preſence: for Chriſt's body is in heaven, and will not be contained in ſo ſmall a piece of bread. And as the words which Chriſt ſpake are true indeed, ſo muſt they alſo be underſtood by other places of ſcripture which Chriſt ſpake himſelf, and alſo the apoſtles after him. And thus I make an end.

By me, John Denley.

The firſt day of the month of July, the ſaid three priſoners were brought into the conſiſtory in Paul's church, where he proceeded againſt them after the uſual form and manner of law, reading firſt their confeſſions, articles, and anſwers, and then tempting them ſometimes with fair promiſes, at other times with threatenings, which indeed were generally his chief arguments and reaſons. In the end, ſeeing their unmoveable conſtancy, upon the fifth of July he condemned them as heretics, and delivered them to the ſheriffs of London, as to his common executioners, who kept them till they were commanded by writ to ſend them to their ſeveral places of ſuffering; and accordingly Mr. Denley was ſent to Uxbridge, where he was burnt on the 8th day of Auguſt: and being ſet in the fire, with the burning flames about him, he ſung a pſalm.

Then cruel Dr. Story being there preſent, commanded one of the tormentors to throw a faggot at him, wherewith being ſo hurt that his face bled, he left ſinging, and clapt both his hands upon his face. Truly, quoth Dr. Story to him that hurled the faggot, thou haſt marred a good old ſong.

Yet notwithſtanding all this, he put his hands abroad in the flames, and ſung again, reſigning his ſpirit into the hands of God through his Son Jeſus Chriſt.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Denley at Uxbridge, which was the 8th of Auguſt, ſoon after Patrick Packingham ingham alſo ſufferedat the ſame town about the 28th of the ſaid month. This Packingham was charged by Bonner (as ye heard before in the tenth article) for his behaviour in the biſhop's chapel, who at the maſs time there ſtanding, would not put off his cap, which was taken for a heinous offence. Packingham being much perſuaded by Bonner to recant, proteſted in theſe words to the biſhop, That the church which he believed was no catholic church, but was the church of Satan, and therefore he would never turn to it, &c.

Furthermore as concerning the other, which was John Newman, pewterer, dwelling at Maidſtone in Kent, he was burnt the laſt day of Auguſt, at Saffron-walden in the county of Eſſex, whoſe examination and confeſſion of his faith and belief, for which he was cruelly perſecuted and burnt, here followeth.

The Examination of John Newman.

JOHN NEWMAN, when apprehended, was firſt examined by Dr. Thornton ſuffragan of Dover, and others, at Tenterden. From thence he was carried to Bonner, and there condemned with Denley and Packingham. But becauſe his examination and anſwers before the ſuffragan came not then to my hands, I thought here in this place to beſtow them, rather than they ſhould utterly be ſuppreſſed. And firſt what his anſwer was by writing to the ſaid ſuffragan, after his apprehenſion, you ſhall hear by the tenor of his own words as follow:

IT may pleaſe you to underſtand, that for the ſpace of all the time of king Edward's reign, we were diligently inſtructed with continual ſermons, made by ſuch men whoſe faith, wiſdom, learning, and virtuous living, was commended unto all men under the king's hand and ſeal, and under the hands of the whole council. Theſe men taught diligently a long time, perſuading us by the allegations of God's word, there was no tranſubſtantiation, nor corporal preſence in the ſacrament. Their doctrine was not believed by us ſuddenly, but by their continual preaching, and alſo by our continual prayer unto God that we might never be deceived; but if it were true, that God would incline our hearts unto it: and if it were not true, that we might never believe it. We weighed that they laboured with God's word, and we aſked the advice of our friends, neither could we find that they preached falſe doctrine. We conſidered alſo, as we did learn, that the king's grace and his council, and the moſt part of the whole realm, believed as they taught, becauſe no man preached the contrary. Alſo we know that the preachers were commanded by the king and laws of the realm, to preach unto us ſuch doctrine as was agreeable to the authority of God's word, and no other; and by their diligent ſetting of it forth by the king's commandment, and the conſent of the whole council, and by the authority of the parliament, we embraced it, and received it as a very infallible truth, taught unto us for the ſpace of ſeven years. Wherefore, until ſuch time as our conſciences are otherwiſe taught and inſtructed by God's word, we cannot with ſafeguard of our conſciences take it, as many ſuppoſe at this time. And we truſt in God that the queen's merciful highneſs, neither yet her moſt honourable council, will in a matter of faith uſe compulſion or violence, becauſe faith is the gift of God, and cometh not of man, neither of man's laws, neither at ſuch time as men require it, but at ſuch time as God giveth it.

The Examination and Anſwers of John Newman before Dr. Thornton and others.

FIRST one of the doctors began, whoſe name John Newman doth not expreſs, aſking in this wiſe.

Doctor. How ſay you to this? "This is my body which is given for you."

Newman. It is a figurative ſpeech, one thing ſpoken, and another meant; as Chriſt ſaith, "I am a vine, I am a door, I am a ſtone, &c." Is he therefore a material ſtone, a vine, or a door?

Doctor. This is no figurative ſpeech. For he ſaith, "This is my body which is given for you," and he ſaith not ſo of the ſtone, vine, or door; but that is a figurative ſpeech.

Newman. Chriſt ſaith, "This cup is the New Teſtament in my blood." If ye will have it ſo meant, then let them take and eat the cup.

Doctor. Nay, that is not ſo meant; for it is a common phraſe of ſpeech among ourſelves: We ſay to our friend, Drink a cup of drink, and yet we meant he ſhould drink the drink in the cup.

Newman. Why, if ye will have the one ſo underſtood, ye muſt ſo underſtand the other.

Doctor. Nay, it is a common uſe of ſpeech, to ſay, drink a cup of ale or beer. And therefore it is no figurative ſpeech.

Newman. The often uſing of a thing doth not make a thing otherwiſe than it is; but whereſoever one thing is ſpoke, and another meant, it is a figurative ſpeech.

Doctor. Well, we will not ſtand hereabout. How ſay ye of the real preſence? Is not Chriſt's natural body there that was born of the virgin Mary?

Newman. No, I do not ſo believe, neither can I ſo believe; for the ſoul of man doth not feed upon natural things as the body doth.

Doctor. Why, how then doth it feed?

Newman. I think the ſoul of man doth feed as the angels in heaven, whoſe feeding is only the pleaſure, joy, felicity, and delectation that they have of God: and ſo the ſoul of man doth feed and eat, through faith, the body of Chriſt.

Collins. Yea, but if the body do not feed upon natural things, the ſoul cannot continue with the body: therefore the body muſt needs feed upon natural things, that both may live together.

Newman. I grant it to be true; but yet the ſoul doth live otherwiſe than the body which doth periſh: therefore natural things do but feed the body only. I pray you what did Judas receive at the ſupper?

Collins. Marry, Judas did receive the very body of Chriſt, but it was to his damnation.

Newman. Why, was the devil entered into him before? Then he had not the devil and Chriſt in him at one time.

Collins. Nay, the devil did enter into him afterward.

Newman. Yea, and before too: What do ye think he had but one devil? Nay, I think he had rather a legion of devils at the latter end.

Collins. Well, put caſe it be ſo: what ſay you to that?

Newman. Marry, if Chriſt and the devil were both in Judas at once, I pray you how did they two agree together?

Collins. We grant that they were both in Judas at that time: for Chriſt may be where the devil is, if he will; but the devil cannot be where Chriſt is, except it pleaſe Chriſt.

Newman. Chriſt will not be in an unclean perſon that hath the devil.

Thornton. Why, will ye not believe that Chriſt was in hell? and ye will grant that the devil is there; and ſo might he be in Judas, if it pleaſe him.

Newman. Chriſt would not ſuffer Mary Magdalen to touch him which ſought him at his grave, and did love him entirely; much leſs will he ſuffer an ungodly man to receive him into his unclean body.

Thornton. Yes, ſeeing God may do all things, he may do what he liſt, and be where he will. And doth not the Pſalm ſay; He is in hell, and in all places? Why ſhould we then doubt of his being there?

Newman. Though his Godhead be in all places, yet that is not ſufficient to prove that his humanity is in all places.

Thornton. No, do you not believe that God is omnipotent, and may do all things?

Newman. I do believe that God is almighty, and may do all that he will do.

Thornton. Nay, but if he be omnipotent, he may do all things, and there is nothing impoſſible for him to do.

Newman. I know God is almighty, and can do all that he will; but he cannot make his Son a lyar, he cannot deny himſelf, nor can he reſtore virginity once violated and defiled.

Thornton. What is that to your purpoſe? God doth not defile virginity; we ſpeak but of things that God doth.

Newman. Why, will ye have the humanity of Chriſt in all places as the Deity is?

Thornton. Yea, he is in all places as the Deity, if it pleaſe him.

Newman. I promiſe you that ſeemeth to me a very great hereſy, for heaven and earth are not able to contain the divine power of God, for it is in all places, as here and in every place: and yet ye ſay, that whereſoever the Deity is, there is alſo the humanity; and ſo ye will make him no body, but a fantaſtical body, and not a body indeed.

Thornton. Nay, we do not ſay he is in all places as the Deity is, but if it pleaſe him he may be in all places with the Deity.

Newman. I promiſe you, that ſeemeth to me as great an hereſy as ever I heard in my life, and I dare not grant it, leſt I ſhould deny Chriſt to be a very man, and that were againſt all the ſcriptures.

Thornton. Tuſh, what ſhall we ſtand reaſoning with him? I dare ſay he doth not believe that Chriſt came out of his mother, not opening the matrice. Do you believe that Chriſt roſe from death, and came through the ſtone?

Newman. I do believe that Chriſt roſe from death; but I do not believe that he came through the ſtone, neither doth the ſcripture ſo ſay.

Thornton. Lo, how ſay you? he doth not believe that Chriſt came through the ſtone; and if he doth not believe this, how ſhall he believe the other? If he could believe this, it were eaſy for him to believe the other.

Newman. The ſcripture doth not ſay he went through the ſtone, but it ſaith the angel of God came down, and rolled away the ſtone, and for fear of him the keepers became even as dead men.

Thornton. Ah fool, fool, that was becauſe the woman ſhould ſee that he was riſen again from death.

Newman. Well, the ſcripture maketh as much for me, as it doth for you, and more too.

Thornton. Well, let us not ſtand any longer about this. Back again to the real preſence. How ſay ye, is the body of Chriſt really in the ſacrament, or no?

Newman. I have anſwered you already.

Thornton. Well, do ye not believe that it is there really?

Newman. No, I believe it not.

Thornton. Well, will ye ſtand to it.

Newman. I muſt needs ſtand to it, till I be perſuaded by a further truth.

Thornton. Nay, ye will not be perſuaded, but ſtand to your own opinion.

Newman. Nay, I ſtand not to mine own opinion, God I take to witneſs, but only to the ſcriptures of God, and that can all thoſe that ſtand here witneſs with me, and nothing but the ſcriptures: and I take God to witneſs, that I do nothing of preſumption, but that that I do is only my conſcience, and if there be a further truth than I ſee, except it appear a truth to me, I cannot receive it as a truth. And ſeeing faith is the gift of God, and cometh not of man; for it is not you that can give me faith, nor no man elſe: therefore I hope ye will bear the more with me, ſeeing it muſt be wrought by God, and when it ſhall pleaſe him to open a further truth to me, I ſhall receive it with all my heart, and embrace it.

Thornton had many other queſtions which I did not bear away; but as I do underſtand, theſe are the chiefeſt; as for taunts, fooliſh and unlearned, he lacked none. Praiſe God for his gifts, and God increaſe in us ſtrength.

The arguments of John Newman.

If the body of Chriſt were really and bodily in the ſacrament, then whoſoever received the ſacrament, received alſo the body.
The wicked receiving the ſacrament, receive not the body of Chriſt.
Ergo, The body of Chriſt is not really in the ſacrament.

Argument.

They which eat the fleſh, and drink the blood of Chriſt, dwell in him, and he in them.
The wicked dwell not in Chriſt, nor he in them.
Ergo, The wicked eat not the fleſh, nor drink the blood of Chriſt.

Argument.

They that have Chriſt dwelling in them, bring forth much fruit, John 15. "He that dwelleth in me, and I in him, bringeth forth much fruit."
The wicked bring forth no fruit of goodneſs.
Ergo, They have not Chriſt's body dwelling in them.

Argument.

Where remembrance is of a thing, there is imported the abſence thereof.
Remembrance of Chriſt's body is in the ſacrament, "Do this in remembrance of me."
Ergo, Chriſt's body there is imported to be abſent.

Marry they will ſay, we ſee him not with our outward eyes, but he is commended under the forms of bread and wine, and that we ſee is nothing but a quality or an accident. But let them ſhew me a quality or an accident without a ſubſtance, and I will believe them. And thus much concerning Newman's examinations and arguments.

The faith of John Newman, dwelling at Maidſtone in Kent, who was by Occupation a Pewterer.

"The Lord is the protector of my life. The juſt ſhall live by faith; and if he withdraw himſelf, my ſoul ſhall have no pleaſure in him.

MY faith is, that there is one God, which is without beginning, and without ending. This God created all things viſible and inviſible. And after that he had made both heaven and earth, with all other creatures, he made man, and ſet him in the place which he had prepared for him, which place he called Eden: he gave to Adam his commandments and precepts, and ſaid, Whenſoever thou doſt the thing which I forbid, thou ſhalt ſurely die the death; yet did man for all this diſobey God his creator, and after his ſin he fled from God, and himſelf, and was in a miſerable deſperate caſe. But God, ſeeing man in his miſerable eſtate, becauſe he and all his poſterity ſhould not continue in death, promiſed Adam that the woman's ſeed ſhould break the ſerpent's head; whereby is meant, that the Son of God ſhould become man, and deſtroy the devil, who by his ſubtle perſuaſions had deceived Adam. Then did Adam, by faith, take hold of God's promiſe, and became the ſervant of righteouſneſs, through the faith which he had in the promiſe of the woman's ſeed. So did Abel, Seth, Enoch, and Noah, with faithful Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, and the reſt of the faithful until Chriſt's time: as St. Paul ſaith, "They did all eat of one ſpiritual meat, and did all all drink of one ſpiritual drink; they did drink of that ſpiritual rock that followed them, which rock was Chriſt that ſaveth us." And when the time was full come, God ſent his Son made of a woman, that is, he took fleſh of the virgin Mary, and became man; not the ſhadow of a man, nor a fantaſtical man, but a very natural man in all points, ſin only excepted; which God and man is Chriſt the promiſed woman's ſeed. This Chriſt was here converſant among men for the ſpace of thirty years and more; and when the time was come that he ſhould go to his Father, he gave unto us the myſtery of our redemption, that we through faith ſhould eat his body, and drink his blood, that we might feed on him through faith to the end of the world. After this Chriſt offered up his body on the croſs to pacify his Father, and to deliver us from the thraldom of the devil, in which we were through ſin original and actual. And with that one ſacrifice of his body once offered on the croſs, he hath made perfect for ever all them that are ſanctified. He deſcended into hell, the third day he aroſe again from death, and was converſant at certain times with his diſciples for the ſpace of forty days after he roſe from death. Then in the ſight of all his diſciples he aſcended into heaven: and as his diſciples ſtood looking upward, and beholding him how he went into heaven, two men ſtood by them in white apparel, which alſo ſaid; "Ye men of Galilee, why ſtand ye gazing up into heaven? This Jeſus which is taken up from you into heaven, ſhall ſo come even as ye have ſeen him go into heaven." St. Peter alſo ſaith, that the heavens muſt receive him, until the time that all things which God hath ſpoken by the mouth of all his prophets ſince the world began, be reſtored again; which is the latter day, when he ſhall come to judge the quick and the dead. I do believe in the Holy Ghoſt, which is the Spirit of God, proceeding from the Father and the Son, which Holy Spirit is one God with them. I believe that there is an holy church, which is the company of the faithful and elect people of God, diſperſed abroad throughout the whole world, which holy church or congregation doth not look for Chriſt here, nor Chriſt there, neither in the deſert, nor in the ſecret places whereof Chriſt warneth us, but, as St. Paul ſaith, in heaven, where he ſitteth on the right hand of God the Father; they ſet their affections on things that are above, and not on things that are on earth. For they are dead concerning the things of this world, and their life is hid with Chriſt in God: and when Chriſt which is their life ſhall ſhew himſelf, then ſhall they alſo appear with him in glory. I believe that there is a communion of ſaints, even the fellowſhip of the faithful people which are diſperſed abroad throughout the whole world, and are of one mind: they follow Chriſt their head, they love one another as Chriſt loved them, and are knit together in one, even in Chriſt; which church or congregation hath forgiveneſs of ſins through Chriſt, and ſhall enter without ſpot before the face of God into his glory. For as Chriſt being their head hath entered pure and clean, ſo they entering by him, ſhall be like him in glory. And I am certain and ſure, that all they which do die, ſhall riſe again and receive their bodies. In them ſhall they ſee Chriſt come in his glory, to judge the quick and the dead. At whoſe coming all men ſhall appear and give a reckoning of their doings; he ſhall ſeparate the good from the bad; he ſhall ſay to them which are his elect, "Come, ye bleſſed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning;" but to the others that have always reſiſted his will, he ſhall ſay: "Depart from me, ye curſed, into everlaſting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels."

Thus have I briefly declared my faith, which were no faith at all if I doubted of it. This faith therefore I deſire God to increaſe in me. Pfaiſe God for his gifts.

And thus have ye the martyrdom, with the confeſſion of the bleſſed man, and witneſs of the Lord's truth, who for that gave his life, as is before declared.

Likewiſe Richard Hook about the ſame time, and for the ſame matter, gave his life at Chicheſter.

The Examinations, Anſwers, and Condemnation of William Coker, William Hopper, Henry Laurence, Richard Colliar, Richard Wright, William Stere, before the Biſhop of Dover, and Dr. Harpsfield Archdeacon of Canterbury.

MEntion was made a little before in the ſtory of Mr. Bland and Nicholas Sheterden, of certain other Kentiſh-men, who being the ſame time with them called forth and examined by Thornton biſhop of Dover, Dr. Harpsfield, Richard Faucet, and Robert Collins: yet notwithſtanding, becauſe the condemnation and execution of them was deferred a little longer, till the latter end of the month of Auguſt; coming therefore now to the time of ſuffering, we will briefly touch ſome part of their examinations and anſwers, as we find them in the regiſters. The names of theſe were W. Coker, W. Hopper, H. Laurence, R. Colliar, Richard Wright, William Stere. What the articles objected to Mr. Bland and them were, ye heard before [Page 298.] To which articles they ſeverally anſwered for themſelves in effect as followeth.

Firſt, William Coker ſaid, he would anſwer no otherwiſe than he had already anſwered; and being offered to have longer reſpite of ſix days after, he refuſed to take it; and ſo, upon the ſame, ſentence of condemnation was read againſt him, the 11th of July.

William Hopper firſt ſeemed to grant to the faith and determination of the Roman church, but calling himſelf better to mind, conſtantly ſtuck to the truth, and was condemned the next week after, the 16th of July.

Henry Laurence, examined the ſaid 16th of July, and partly deferred to the 2d of Auguſt, anſwered to the articles objected againſt him; firſt denying auricular confeſſion, and that he neither had, nor would receive the ſacrament, becauſe, ſaith he, the order of the holy ſcriptures is changed in the order of the ſacrament.

Moreover, the ſaid Laurence was charged for not putting off his cap, when the ſuffragan made mention of the ſacrament, and did reverence to the ſame: the ſaid Laurence anſwered in theſe words, What? ye ſhall not need to put off your cap: for it is not ſo holy, that you need to put off your cap thereunto.

Further, being oppoſed concerning the verity of the ſacrament given to Chriſt's diſciples, he affirmed, that even as Chriſt gave his very body to his diſciples, and confeſſed it to be the ſame; ſo likewiſe Chriſt himſelf ſaid, he was a door, &c. adding moreover, that as he had ſaid before, ſo he ſaith ſtill, that the ſacrament of the altar is an idol, and no remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion, and contrary he knoweth not. At laſt, being required to ſubſcribe his anſwers, he wrote theſe words under the bill of their examinations, "Ye are all of Antichriſt, and him ye fol—" and here his hand was hindered from writing any further: belike he would have written out [follow], &c. And ſo, upon the ſame, ſentence was given againſt him the ſecond of Auguſt.

Richard Colliar of Aſhford above-mentioned, having the 16th of Auguſt to appear, examined of the ſacrament of the popiſh altar, anſwered and ſaid, that he did not believe, that after the conſecration there is the real and ſubſtantial body of Chriſt, but only bread and wine, and that it is moſt abominable, moſt deteſtable, and moſt wicked to believe otherwiſe, &c. Upon this, ſentence was read againſt him, and he condemned the 16th of Auguſt. After his condemnation he ſang a Pſalm. Wherefore the prieſts and their officers railed at him, ſaying he was out of his wits.

Richard Wright, the ſame place and day above-mentioned, appearing, and required by the judgewhat he believed of the real preſence in the ſacrament, anſwered again, that as touching the ſacrament of the altar and the maſs, he was aſhamed to ſpeak of it, or to name it, and that he allowed it not, as it was uſed in the church. Againſt whom the ſentence was alſo read the day and place aforeſaid.

William Stere of the aforeſaid pariſh of Aſhford, likewiſe detected and accuſed, was brought to appear the ſaid 16th day of Auguſt, where he in the ſaid chapter-houſe of Canterbury, being required to make anſwer to the poſitions laid unto him by the judge, made anſwer again, That he ſhould command his dog, and not him: and further declared, that Dick of Dover had no authority to ſit againſt him in judgment; and aſked where his authority was? who then ſhewed him certain bulls and writings from Rome, as he ſaid. William Stere denying that to be of ſufficient force, the ſaid Dick alſo ſaid he had authority from the queen. Then the martyr alledging that the archbiſhop of Canterbury (who was then in priſon) was his dioceſan, urged him to ſhew his authority from the archbiſhop, or elſe he denied his authority to be ſufficient. And as touching the ſacrament of the altar, he found it not, he ſaid, in the ſcripture, and therefore he would not anſwer thereunto.

And moreover, the judge ſpeaking of the ſacrament of the altar, with reverence, and putting off his cap, William Stere told him, that he needed not to reverence that matter ſo highly. And thus (ſaying to the judge, that he was a bloody man, &c.) the ſentence was pronounced againſt him; and after the ſentence was read, he ſaid, that the ſacrament of the altar was the moſt blaſphemous idol that ever was, &c.

And thus theſe ſix heavenly martyrs and witneſſes to the truth, being condemned by the bloody ſuffragan and archdeacon of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Faucet, were burnt all together in the ſame town of Canterbury, at three ſtakes in one fire, about the latter end of Auguſt.

The copy of their ſentence condemnatory, you may find before in the ſtory of Mr. John Rogers; for the papiſts in their condemnations follow one manner of ſentence againſt all they have condemned through their unmerciful tyranny.

The Perſecution of ten Martyrs together, ſent by certain of the Council to Bonner to be examined.

AFTER the burning of theſe ſix above-named, next followeth the perſecution of ten other true ſervants of God, the names of whom are as follow.

Elizabeth Warne,	William Hale,
George Tankerfield,	Thomas Leyes,
Robert Smith,	George King,
Stephen Harwood,	John Wade,
Thomas Fuſt,	Joan Laſhford.

The priſons of London beginning now to be repleniſhed with God's ſaints, and ſtill more and more coming in, the council and commiſſioners, thinking to make ready diſpatch with the poor priſoners, cauſed theſe ten to be ſent with their letter directed to Bonner biſhop of London, by him to be examined, and rid out of the way. The copy of which letter, with their names ſubſcribed, here followeth to be read and noted.

A Letter ſent by the Commiſſioners to Dr. Bonner Biſhop of London.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordſhip, we ſend you here John Wade, William Hale, George King, Thomas Leyes of Thorp in Eſſex, Thomas Fuſt hoſier, Robert Smith painter, Stephen Harwood brewer, George Tankerfield cook, Elizabeth Warne, Joan Laſhford of London, ſacramentaries; all which we deſire your lordſhip to examine, and to order according to the eccleſiaſtical laws: praying your lordſhip to appoint ſome of your officers to receive them at this bearer's hands. And thus moſt heartily fare your lordſhip well. From London, this 2d of July.

Your lordſhip's loving friends,

Nich. Hare, Rich. Rede,
Will. Roper, Will. Cooke.

The Hiſtory of Elizabeth Warne, Widow, burnt at Stratford Bow.

NOW ſeverally to proſecute the ſtories of theſe ten martyrs aforenamed: firſt we will begin with the hiſtory of Elizabeth Warne, widow, who in the month of Auguſt was burnt at Stratford Bow, near London; ſhe was the late wife of John Warne upholſter and martyr, who alſo was burnt the latter end of the May before, as in his ſtory is recorded [Page 200.]

This Elizabeth Warne had been apprehended amongſt others, the firſt day of January, in a houſe in Bow churchyard in London, as they were gathered together in prayer, and at that preſent was carried to the Compter, where ſhe remained till the 11th day of June: at which time ſhe was brought to Newgate, and was confined there till the ſecond day of July. Then ſhe was ſent by the king and queen's commiſſioners, unto Bonner biſhop of London, who the ſixth day of the ſaid month cauſed her with divers others (as Robert Smith, George Tankerfield, &c.) to be brought before him into his palace, and there examined her upon ſundry articles, ſuch as were commonly adminiſtered unto the poor ſaints and martyrs of God, as you may more plainly perceive by other more large and ample proceſſes before-mentioned.

The chief objection that he uſed towards her, or the moſt of thoſe, was touching the real and corporal preſence of the body and blood of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, as the chief ground and the moſt profitable foundation for their catholic dignity. Many other matters he objected againſt them, as for not coming to the church, for ſpeaking againſt the maſs, for deſpiſing their ceremonies and new-found ſacraments, with divers other fond and trifling toys, not worthy to be mentioned.

In the end, when ſhe had been divers times brought before him and other his adherents, and there earneſtly exhorted to recant, ſhe ſaid, Do what ye will; for if Chriſt were in an error, then am I in an error. Upon which anſwer, ſhe was condemned as an heretic, the 12th day of the ſame month of July, and ſo delivered to the ſecular power, as they term it, to be by them put to death, which was done in the ſame month.

The chief procurer of her death was Dr. Story, being (as it is thought) ſomewhat related to her, or elſe to her late huſband. Who, at the firſt apprehenſion of his ſaid kinſwoman, endeavoured by all means to get her pardon, and accordingly applied to Dr. Martin, then one of the king and queen's commiſſioners in matters of religion (himſelf being as yet not made commiſſioner), and by this his ſuit obtained her deliverance for that preſent, as Dr. Martin himſelf (the author hereof) hath reported; yet afterwards, upon what occaſion God only knoweth, except upon ſome burning charity, the ſaid Dr. Story obtaining to be one of the commiſſioners, cauſed not only the ſaid John Warne, but alſo his wife, and and afterwards his daughter, to be again apprehended, never leaving them till he had brought them all to aſhes. Such was the rage of that devout catholic, and white child of the mother church, that neither kindred nor any other conſideration could prevail with him, although it did (at his requeſt) with others, who in reſpect of him were but ſtrangers unto them. The Lord, if it be his will, turn his heart, or elſe rid his poor church from ſuch an Hydra, as, thanked be God, now he hath.

George Tankerfield, Martyr.

GEorge Tankerfield, of London, cook, born in the city of York, about the age of 27 or 28 years, was in the days of king Edward a papiſt, till the time queen Mary came in, and then perceiving the great cruelty which the papiſts uſed, was brought into a miſdoubt of their doings, and began (as he ſaid) in his heart to abhor them. And as concerning the maſs, whereof he had but a doubtful opinion before, and much ſtriving with himſelf in that caſe; at length he fell to prayer, deſiring God in mercy to open to him the truth, that he might be thoroughly perſuaded therein, whether it were of God, or no: if not, that he might utterly hate it in his heart, and abhor it: which the Lord mercifully heard, and, according to his prayer, daily working more and more in him to deteſt and abhor the ſame; and ſo he was moved to read the Teſtament, whereby (as is ſaid) the Lord enlightened his mind with the knowledge of the truth, working a lively faith in him to believe the ſame, and utterly to deteſt all popery, and ſo he came no more to their doings: and not only that, but alſo this lively faith (as he ſaid) kindled ſuch a flame in him, as would not be kept in, but utter itſelf by the confeſſion thereof, reproving his own former doings to his friends, exhorting them likewiſe to repent and turn to the truth with him; thus they began to ſmell him out, and at length he was ſent for as followeth.

It pleaſed God to ſtrike him with ſickneſs, whereby he lay long ſick; and on a certain day to take the air abroad, he roſe up, and went and walked into the Temple fields to ſee the ſhooters. In the mean time, Mr. Beard came to his houſe and enquired for him, pretending to his wife, that he came only to have him dreſs a banquet at the lord Paget's. His wife, becauſe of his apparel (which was very brave) took him to be ſome honeſt gentleman, and with all ſpeed prepared herſelf to fetch her huſband, having a good hope he ſhould now earn ſome money: and leſt this gentleman ſhould be tired with tarrying, ſhe fetched him a cuſhion to ſet him ſoft, and laid a fair napkin before him, and ſet bread thereon, and came to her huſband; who when he heard it, ſaid, A banquet, woman! indeed it is ſuch a banquet as will not be very pleaſant to the fleſh, but God's will be done. And when he came home, he ſaw who it was, and called him by his name, which when his wife perceived, and wherefore he came, like a tall woman would play Peter's part, and inſtead of a ſword took a ſpit, and had run him through, had not the conſtable which Mr. Beard had ſent for by his man, came in and reſcued him: yet ſhe ſent a brickbat after him, and hit him on the back. And ſo Tankerfield was delivered to the conſtable, and brought to Newgate about the laſt day of February, 1555, by the ſaid Beard, yeoman of the guard, and Simon Ponder pewterer, conſtable of St. Dunſtan's in the Weſt, ſent in by Roger Chomley knight, and Dr. Martin.

Tankerfield being thus brought to priſon by his adverſaries, at length with the others before named was brought to his examination before biſhop Bonner. Who, after his accuſtomed manner, ordered his articles and poſitions unto him, the copy and tenor of which his ordinary articles ye may read above expreſſed.

No. 24.

To theſe articles he anſwered again, conſtantly declaring his mind concerning auricular confeſſion, and alſo the ſacrament of the popiſh altar, and likewiſe the maſs, &c. Firſt, that he was not confeſſed to any prieſt five years paſt, nor to any other but only to God: and further denying that he would hereafter be confeſſed to any prieſt, for that he found it not in Chriſt's book, and took it only to be a council.

And concerning the ſacrament, commonly called here in England of the altar, he confeſſed, that he neither had nor did believe, that in the ſaid ſacrament there is the real body and blood of Chriſt, becauſe that the body is aſcended into heaven, and there doth ſit at the right hand of God the Father.

And moreover he ſaid, that the maſs now uſed in the church of England was naught, and full of idolatry and abomination, and againſt the word of God; affirming alſo, that there are but two ſacraments in the church of Chriſt, baptiſm and the ſupper of the Lord, &c. And to theſe aſſertions he ſaid he would ſtand; and ſo he did to the end.

And when at laſt the biſhop began to read the ſentence, firſt exhorting him with many words to revoke his profeſſed opinion (which they called damnable and heretical), he notwithſtanding reſiſted all their perſuaſions, anſwering the biſhop again in this manner: I will not, ſaid he, forſake mine opinions, except you, my lord, can refel them by ſcriptures; and I care not for your divinity; for you condemn all men, and prove nothing againſt them. And after many fair words of exhortation, which Bonner then uſed, to convert, or rather pervert him, he anſwered boldly again, ſaying moreover, That the church whereof the pope is ſupreme head, is no part of Chriſt's catholic church; and adding thereunto, and pointing to the biſhop, ſpake to the people, ſaying, Good people beware of him, and ſuch as he is, for theſe be the people that deceive you, &c.

Theſe and many other words he ſpake; whereupon the biſhop, reading the ſentence of condemnation, gave him to the ſecular power.

And ſo this good man being carried to St. Alban's, there ended his life with much patience and conſtancy, the 26th day of Auguſt, for the defence of the truth, which at length will have the victory.

Notes concerning George Tankerfield, after he was carried to St. Alban's to ſuffer Martyrdom.

IMprimis, He was brought to St. Alban's by the high ſheriff of Hertfordſhire, Edward Brocket, Eſquire, and Mr. Pulter of Hitchen, who was under ſheriff.

Item, Their inn was the Croſs-keys, where there was a great concourſe of people to ſee and hear the priſoner, among which multitude ſome were ſorry to ſee ſo pious a man brought to be burned, others praiſed God for his conſtancy and perſeverance in the truth. Contrariwiſe, ſome there were which ſaid, it was pity he did ſtand in ſuch opinions: and others, both old women and men cried againſt him; one called him heretic, and ſaid it was pity that he lived. But George Tankerfield ſpake unto them ſo effectually out of the word of God, lamenting their ignorance, and proteſting unto them his unſpotted conſcience, that God did mollify their hardened hearts, inſomuch that ſome of them departed out of the chamber with weeping eyes.

Item, There came to him a certain ſchoolmaſter (who retained unto Sir Thomas Pope, knight), this man had a communication with George Tankerfield, the day before he was coming to St. Alban's, concerning the ſacrament of the altar, and other points of the popiſh religion: but as he urged Tankerfield with the authority of the doctors, wreſting them after his own will; ſo on the other ſide, Tankerfield anſwered him mightily by the ſcriptures, not wreſted after the mind of any man, but being interpreted after the will of the Lord Jeſus, &c. So that as he would not allow ſuch allegations as Tankerfield brought out of the ſcriptures without the opinions of the doctors; ſo again Tankerfield would not credit his doctrine to be true, except he could confirm it by the ſcriptures. In the end, Tankerfield prayed him that he would not trouble him in ſuch matters, for his conſcience was eſtabliſhed, &c. and ſo he departed from him, wiſhing him well, and proteſting that he meant him no more hurt than his own ſoul.

Item, When the hour drew on apace that he ſhould ſuffer, he deſired the wine-drawer, that he might have a pint of malmſey and a loaf, that he might eat and drink that in remembrance of Chriſt's death and paſſion, becauſe he could not have it adminiſtered to him by others in ſuch manner as Chriſt commanded; and then he kneeled down, making his confeſſion unto the Lord with all which were in the chamber with him; and after he had prayed earneſtly unto the Lord, and had read the inſtitution of the holy ſupper by the Lord Jeſus out of the evangeliſts, and out of St. Paul, he ſaid, O Lord, thou knoweſt it, I do not this to derogate authority from any man, or in contempt of thoſe which are thy miniſters, but only becauſe I cannot have it adminiſtered according to thy word, &c. and when he had ſpoke theſe and ſuch like words, he received it with giving of thanks.

Item, When ſome of his friends deſired him to eat ſome meat, he ſaid he would not eat that which ſhould do others good that had more need, and that had longer time to live than he.

Item, He prayed his hoſt to let him have a good fire in the chamber; he had ſo, and then he ſitting on a form before the fire, put off his ſhoes and hoſe, and ſtretched out his leg to the flame; and when it had touched his foot, he quickly withdrew his leg, ſhewing how the fleſh did perſuade him one way, and the ſpirit another way. The fleſh ſaid, O thou fool, wilt thou burn and needeſt not? The ſpirit ſaid, Be not afraid, for this is nothing in reſpect of fire eternal. The fleſh ſaid, Do not leave the company of thy friends and acquaintance which love thee, and will let thee lack nothing. The ſpirit ſaid, The company of Jeſus Chriſt and his glorious preſence doth exceed all fleſhly friends. The fleſh ſaid, Do not ſhorten thy time, for thou mayeſt live, if thou wilt, much longer. The ſpirit ſaid, This life is nothing unto the life in heaven which laſteth for ever, &c. And all this time the ſheriffs were at a gentleman's houſe at dinner, not far from the town, whither alſo reſorted many knights and gentlemen out of the country, becauſe his ſon was married that day; and until they returned from dinner, the priſoner was left with his hoſt, to be kept and looked unto. And George Tankerfield all that time was kindly and lovingly intreated by his hoſt; and conſidering that his time was ſhort, his ſaying was, That although the day was never ſo long, yet at the laſt it ringeth to evening ſong.

Item, About two of the clock, when the ſheriffs were returned from dinner, they brought George Tankerfield out of his inn unto the place where he ſhould ſuffer, which is called Romeland, being a green place near the weſt end of the abbey church: unto which when he was come, he kneeled down by the ſtake that was ſet up for him, and after he had ended his prayers he aroſe, and with a joyful faith he ſaid, that although he had a ſharp dinner, yet he hoped to have a joyful ſupper in heaven.

Item, While the faggots were ſet about him, there came a prieſt unto him, and perſuaded him to believe on the ſacrament of the altar, and he ſhould be ſaved. But George Tankerfield cried out vehemently, and ſaid, I defy the whore of Babylon, I defy the whore of Babylon: Fie of that abominable idol: Good people, do not believe him; good people; do not believe him. And then the mayor of the town commanded to ſet fire to the heretic, and ſaid, If he had but one load of faggots in the whole world, he would give them to burn him. There was a certain knight by, who went unto Tankerfield, and took him by the hand, and ſaid, Good brother, be ſtrong in Chriſt; this he ſpake ſoftly; and Tankerfield ſaid, O Sir, I thank you, I am ſo, I thank God. Then fire was ſet unto him, and he deſired the ſheriff and all the people to pray for him; the moſt part did ſo. And ſo embracing the fire, he bathed himſelf in it, and calling on the name of the Lord Jeſus he was quickly out of pain.

The Hiſtory and Examinations of Robert Smith, Martyr.

Robert Smith was brought to Newgate the fifth of November, by John Matthew, yeoman of the guard of the queen's ſide, by the command of the council. Robert Smith firſt gave himſelf to ſervice in the houſe of Sir Thomas Smith knight, being then provoſt of Eaton: from thence he was preferred to Windſor, having there in the college a clerkſhip of ten pounds a year. Of ſtature he was tall and ſlender, active about many things, but chiefly delighting in the art of painting, which many times rather for his mind's ſake, than for any gain, he did practiſe and exerciſe. In religion he was fervent, after he had once taſted the truth: wherein he was much confirmed by the preaching of Mr. Turner of Windſor, and others. Whereupon at the coming in of queen Mary he was deprived of his clerkſhip by her viſitors; and not long after he was apprehended, and brought to examination before Bonner, as here followeth, written and teſtified with his own hand.

The firſt Examination of Robert Smith before Biſhop Bonner.

About nine of the clock in the morning I was among the reſt of my brethren brought to the biſhop's houſe; and firſt of all I was brought before him into his chamber, to whom the biſhop ſaid as followeth, after he had aſked my name.

Bonner. How long is it ſince ye were confeſſed to any prieſt?

Smith. Never ſince I had years of diſcretion. For I never ſaw it needful, neither commanded by God to come to ſhew my faults to any of that ſinful number whom ye call prieſts.

Bonner. Thou ſheweſt thyſelf even at thy firſt ſpeech to be a rank heretic, who being weary of painting, art entered into divinity, and ſo fallen, through thy departing from thy vocation, into hereſy.

Smith. Although I have underſtanding in the ſaid occupation, yet (I praiſe God) I have had little need all my life hitherto to live by the ſame, but have lived without the ſame in mine own houſe as honeſtly in my vocation as ye have lived in yours, and yet uſed the ſame better than ever you uſed the pulpit.

Bonner. How long is it ſince ye received the ſacrament of the altar, and what is your opinion in the ſame?

Smith. I never received the ſame ſince I had years of diſcretion, nor never will, by God's grace; neither do eſteem the ſame in any point, becauſe it hath not God's ordinance, neither in name, nor in other uſage, but rather is ſet up and erected to mock God withal.

Bonner. Do ye not believe that it is the very body of Chriſt that was born of the virgin Mary, naturally, ſubſtantially, and really, after the words of conſecration?

Smith. I ſhewed you before it was none of God's ordinances, as ye uſe it; then much leſs to be God, or any part of his ſubſtance, but only bread and wine erected to the uſe aforeſaid; yet nevertheleſs, if ye can prove it to be be the body that ye ſpake of, by the word, I will believe it; if not, I will, as I do, account it a deteſtable idol, not God; but contrary to God and his truth.

Then after many raging words and vain objections, Bonner ſaid, There was no remedy, but I muſt be burned.

Smith. Ye ſhall do no more unto me, than ye have done to better men than either of us both. But think not thereby to quench the Spirit of God, neither thereby to make your matter good. For your ſore is too well ſeen to be healed ſo privily with blood. For even the very children have all your deeds in deriſion; ſo that although ye patch up one place with authority, yet ſhall it break out in forty to your ſhame.

Bonner. Then after much ado, and many railing ſentences, he ſaid, throwing away the paper of mine examination; Well, even now, by my troth, even in good earneſt, if thou wilt go to confeſſion I will tear this paper in pieces.

Smith. To which I anſwered; It would be too much to his ſhame to ſhew it to men of diſcretion.

After which anſwer, I was carried down to the garden with my jaylor, and there remained till my brother Harwood was examined; and then being again brought up before the ſaid Bonner, he demanded if I agreed with Harwood in his confeſſion upon theſe articles following.

Bonner. What ſay you to the catholic church? Do ye not confeſs there is one in earth?

Smith. Yes verily, I believe that there is one catholic church, or faithful congregation, which, as the apoſtle ſaith, is built upon the prophets and apoſtles, Chriſt Jeſus being the head corner-ſtone: which in all her words and works maintaineth the word, and bringeth the ſame for her authority, and without it doth nothing, nor ought to do, of which I am aſſured I am by grace made a member.

Bonner. Ye ſhall underſtand, that I am bound when my brother offendeth, and will not be reconciled, to bring him before the congregation: now if your church be the ſame, where may a man find it, to bring his brother before the ſame?

Smith. It is written in the Acts of the apoſtles, that when the tyranny of the biſhops was ſo great againſt the church in Jewry, they were fain to aſſemble in houſes and ſecret places, as they now do; and yet were they nevertheleſs the church of God: and ſeeing they had their matters redreſſed being ſhut up in a corner, may not we do the like now-a-days?

Bonner. Yea, their church was known full well. For St. Paul writ to the Corinthians, to have the man puniſhed and excommunicated, that had committed evil with his father's wife. Whereby we may well perceive it was a known church; but yours is not known.

Smith. Then could you not perſecute it as you do: but as ye ſay the church of God at Corinth was manifeſt both to God and St. Paul; even ſo is this church of God in England, whom ye perſecute, both known to God, and alſo even to the very wicked, although they know not, nor will not know their truth nor converſation; yea, and your ſinful number have profeſſed their verity, and maintained the ſame a long ſeaſon.

Bonner. Well, thou ſayeſt that the church of God was only at Corinth, when St. Paul writ unto them, and ſo will I put in writing, ſhall I?

Smith. I do greatly marvel, my lord, that ye are not aſhamed to lay ſnares for your brethren on this manner. This is now the third ſnare you have laid for me. Firſt, to make me confeſs that the church of England is not the church of Chriſt. Secondly, to ſay it is not known. Thirdly, to ſay the church of God is not univerſal, but particular. And this is not the office of a biſhop. For if an innocent had come in your way, you would have done your beſt, I ſee, to have entangled him.

Well friend, ſaid Dr. Harpsfield, you are no innocent, as it appeareth.

Smith. By the grace of God I am that I am; and this grace in me, I hope, is not in vain.

Well, ſaid Bonner, laughing, tell me how ſayeſt thou of the church?

Smith. I told you whereon the true church is built, and I affirm in England to be the congregation of God, and alſo in omnem terram; as it is written, "Their ſound is gone forth into all lands," and this is the afflicted and perſecuted church, which ye ceaſe not to impriſon, ſlay and kill. And in Corinth was not all the congregation of God, but a number of thoſe holy and elect people of God. For neither Paul nor Peter were preſent at Corinth when they wrote, and yet were they of the church of God, as many thouſands more which alſo communicate in that Holy Spirit.

Bonner. What call ye catholic, and what call ye church?

Smith. Catholic is univerſal, and church is a congregation knit together in unity.

Then after much like talk, it was laid to my charge, that my fellow and I ſpake one thing. For which I praiſed God, and was ſent again to a garden. Where, after a while as I and my brother Harwood had been together, came one of my lord's chaplains, that much deſired to commune with me, demanding firſt if I were a priſoner.

Smith. I am in this fleſh a priſoner, and ſubject to my maſter and yours; but I hope yet the Lord's free man through Chriſt Jeſus.

Doctor. I do much deſire to talk with you lovingly, becauſe ye are a man that I much lament; with many other ſweet words.

To which I anſwered, Sub melle latet venenum. And after much ado about his God, I compelled him to ſay, that it muſt needs enter into the belly, and ſo fall into the draught. To which he anſwered.

Doctor. What derogation was it to Chriſt, when the Jews ſpit in his face?

Smith. If the Jews, being his enemies, did ſpit in his face, and we being his friends throw him into the draught, which of us have deſerved the greateſt damnation? Then by your argument, he that doth injury to Chriſt, ſhall have a moſt plenteous ſalvation.

Then the doctor ſtarted away, and would have his humanity incomprehenſible, making a compariſon between the ſoul of man and the body of Chriſt, bringing in, to ſerve his turn, which way Chriſt came in among his diſciples, the doors being ſhut?

Smith. Although it be ſaid that when he came the doors were ſhut, yet have I as much to prove, that the doors opened at his coming, as ye have to prove he came through the door. For that Almighty God who brought the diſciples out of priſon, which yet when ſearch was made, were found ſhut, was able to let Chriſt in at the door, although it were ſhut: and yet it maketh not for your purpoſe; for they ſaw him, heard him, and felt him; and that ye cannot ſay ye do, neither is he in more places than one at the ſame time.

At which anſwer when he had made many ſcoffings, he went from me, and we were carried into my lord's hall, where we were baited by my lord's band of ſervants, almoſt all the day, until our keeper ſeeing their miſorder, ſhut us all up in a handſome chamber, while my lord went into his ſynagogue to condemn Mr. Denley and John Newman.

Then they brought my lord mayor up into the chamber where my lord intended to ſup, to hear the matter; and I was the firſt that was called; where my lord mayor being ſet with the biſhop and one of the ſheriffs, wine was walking on every ſide, whilſt I ſtood before them like a mute; which made me remember how Pilate and Herod were made friends, but no man was ſorry for Joſeph's ſeph's hurt. But after my lord had well drank, my articles were ſent for and read, and he demanded whether I did ſay as was written.

Smith. That I have ſaid, I have ſaid, and what I have ſaid I do mean utterly.

Bonner. Well, my lord mayor, your lordſhip hath heard in ſome meaſure, what a ſtout heretic this is, and that his articles have deſerved death: yet nevertheleſs foraſmuch as they report me to ſeek blood, and call me Bloody Bonner, whereas, God knoweth, I never ſought any man's blood in all my life, I have kept him from the conſiſtory this day, whither I might have brought him juſtly: and yet here before your lordſhip I deſire him to turn, and I will with all ſpeed diſpatch him out of trouble; and this I profeſs before your lordſhip and all this audience.

Smith. Why, my lord, do you put on this fair viſor before my lord mayor, to make him believe that ye ſeek not my blood, to cloak your murders through my ſtoutneſs, as ye call it? Have ye not had my brother Tomkins before you, whoſe hand when you had burnt moſt cruelly, (Page 150.) ye burnt alſo his body, and not only him, but a great many of the members of Chriſt, men that feared God, and lived virtuouſly, and alſo the queen's majeſty's moſt true ſubjects, as their goods and bodies have made manifeſt? and ſeeing in theſe ſaints ye have ſhewed ſo little mercy, ſhall it ſeem to my lord and this audience, that you ſhew me more favour? No, no, my lord. But if ye mean as ye ſay, why then do you examine me of what I am not bound to anſwer you?

Bonner. Well, what ſayeſt thou by the ſacrament of the altar? Is it not the very body of Chriſt's fleſh, blood, and bone, as it was born of the virgin?

Smith. I have anſwered, that it is none of God's order nor a ſacrament, but man's own vain invention; and ſhewed him the Lord's inſtitution. But when he was ſo earneſt before the audience, declaring that we knew nothing, bringing out his "Hoc eſt corpus meum," to lay in my diſh: I proved before the audience that it was a dead god, declaring the diſtinction appointed between the two creatures of bread and wine, and that a body without blood hath no life. At which Harpsfield found himſelf much offended, and took the tale out of my lord's mouth, ſaying, Harpſ. I will prove by the ſcriptures, that ye blaſpheme God in ſo ſaying; for it is given in two parts, becauſe there are two things ſhewed, that is to ſay, his body and his paſſion, as ſaith St. Paul: and therefore the bread is his body, and the wine the repreſentation of his death and blood-ſhedding.

Smith. Ye falſify the word, and rack it to ſerve your purpoſe. For the wine was not only the ſhewing of his paſſion, but the bread alſo. For our Saviour ſaith, "So oft as ye do this, do it in remembrance of me." And St. Paul ſaith, "So oft as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye ſhall ſhew the Lord's death till he come." And here is as much reverence given to the one as to the other. Wherefore if the bread be his body, the cup muſt be his blood; and as well ye make his body in the cup, as his blood in the bread.

Then my lord roſe up, and went to the table, where the lord mayor deſired me to ſave my ſoul. To whom I anſwered, I hope it was ſaved through Chriſt Jeſus, deſiring him to have pity on his own ſoul, and remember whoſe ſword he carried.

At which I was carried into the garden, and there abode till the reſt of my friends were examined, and then were we ſent away to Newgate with many foul farewels, my lord biſhop giving the keeper a charge to lay me in Limbo.

Another Examination of Robert Smith before Biſhop Bonner.

UPON Saturday, at eight of the clock, I was brought to his chamber again, and there examined by him, as followeth.

Bonner. Thou Robert Smith, &c. ſayeſt that there is no catholic church here on earth.

Smith. Ye have heard me both ſpeak the contrary, and ye have written as a witneſs of the ſame.

Bonner. Yea, but I muſt aſk thee this queſtion: how ſayeſt thou?

Smith. Muſt ye of neceſſity begin with a lye? it maketh manifeſt that ye determine to end with the ſame. But there ſhall no lyars enter into the kingdom of God. Nevertheleſs, if ye will be anſwered, aſk mine articles that were written yeſterday, and they ſhall tell you that I have confeſſed a church of God, as well in earth as in heaven, and yet all one church, and one man's members, even Chriſt Jeſus.

Bonner. Well, what ſayeſt thou to auricular confeſſion? Is it not neceſſary to be uſed in Chriſt's church? and wilt thou not be confeſſed by the prieſt?

Smith. It is not needful to be uſed in Chriſt's church, as I anſwered yeſterday. But if it be needful for your church, it is to pick men's pockets; and ſuch pick-pocket matters are all the whole rabble of your ceremonies: for all that ye maintain is but money-matters.

Bonner. Why, how art thou able to prove that confeſſion is a pick-pocket matter? Art thou not aſhamed to ſay ſo?

Smith. I ſpeak by experience: for I have both heard and ſeen the fruits of the ſame. For firſt it hath been, we ſee, a betrayer of kings ſecrets, and the ſecrets of other men's conſciences; who being delivered, and glad to be diſcharged from their ſins, have given great ſums of money to prieſts to abſolve them, and ſing maſſes for their ſouls health.

And for example, I began to bring in a pageant, that by report was played at St. Thomas of Acres, and where I was ſometime a child waiting on a gentleman of Norfolk, which being bound in conſcience, through the perſuaſion of the prieſt, gave away a great quantity of his goods, and forgave unto one Mr. Greſham a large ſum of money, and to another as much. The prieſt for his part had a good ſhare, and the houſe had an annuity to keep him: which thing when his brother heard, he came to London, and after declaration made to the council, how by the ſubtilty of the prieſt he had robbed his wife and children, recovered a great part again, to the value of two or three hundred pounds, of Mr. Greſham and his other friend; but what he gave to the houſe could not be recovered. This ſtory I began to tell; but when my lord ſaw it favoured not to his purpoſe, he began to revile me, and ſaid; By the maſs, If the queen's majeſty were of my mind, thou ſhouldeſt not come to talk before any man, but ſhouldeſt be put into a ſack, with a dog in the ſame, and be thrown into a river.

Smith. I know you ſpeak by practice, as much as by ſpeculation: for both you and your predeceſſors have ſought all poſſible means to kill Chriſt ſecretly: record of Mr. Hunne, whom your predeceſſor cauſed to be thruſt in at the noſe with hot burning needles, and then to be hanged, and gave it out that the ſaid Hunne hanged himſelf: and alſo a good brother of yours, a biſhop of your profeſſion, having in his priſon an innocent man, whom becauſe he could not overcome by ſcripture, he cauſed him to be privately ſnarled, and his fleſh to be torn and plucked away with a pair of pincers, and bringing him before the people, ſaid, the rats had eaten him. Thus according to your oath is all your dealing, and hath been; and as you, taking upon you the office, do not without oaths open your mouth, no more do you without murder maintain your traditions.

Bonner. Ah, ye are a generation of lyars; there is not one true word that cometh out of your mouths.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I have ſaid that Jeſus Chriſt is dead for my ſins, and riſen for my juſtification; and this is no lye.

Then Bonner made his man to put in my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and would have had me recite it again: which when I would not do, he made his man to put in ſuch ſums as he imagined. At the end of this, Sir John Mordant came in, and ſat down to hear my examination. Then ſaid my lord, How ſayeſt thou, Smith, to the ſeven ſacraments? Believeſt thou not that they be God's order, that is to ſay, the ſacrament of, &c.

Smith. I believe that in God's church are but two ſacraments, that is to ſay, the ſacrament of regeneration, and the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper: and as for the ſacrament of the altar, and all your ſacraments, they may well ſerve your church, but God's church hath nothing to do with them, neither have I any thing to do to anſwer them, nor you to examine me of them.

Bonner. Why, is God's order changed in baptiſm? In what point do we diſſent from the word of God?

Smith. Firſt, in hallowing your water; in conjuring of the ſame; in baptizing children with anointing and ſpitting in their mouths, mingled with ſalt, and with many other lewd ceremonies, of which not one point is able to be proved in God's order.

Bonner. By the maſs, this is the moſt unſhamefaced heretic that ever I heard ſpeak.

Smith. Well ſworn, my lord, ye keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, ye catch me at my words: but I will watch thee as well, I warrant thee.

By my troth, my lord, ſaid Sir John Mordant, I never heard the like in all my life. But I pray you, my lord, mark well his anſwer for baptiſm. He diſalloweth therein holy ointment, ſalt, and ſuch other laudable ceremonies, which no chriſtian man will deny.

Smith. That is a ſhameful blaſphemy againſt Chriſt, ſo to uſe any mingle-mangle in baptizing young infants.

Bonner. I believe, I tell thee, that if they die before they be baptized, they be damned.

Smith. Ye ſhall never be ſaved by that belief. But I pray you, my lord, ſhew me, are we ſaved by water, or by Chriſt?

Bonner. By both.

Smith. Then the water died for our ſins; and ſo muſt ye ſay, that the water hath life, and it being our ſervant, and created for us, is our Saviour: This, my lord, is a good doctrine, is it not?

Bonner. Why, how underſtandeſt thou the ſcriptures? "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

And again, "Suffer (ſaith our Saviour) theſe children to come unto me;" and if thou wilt not ſuffer them to be baptized after the laudable order, thou hindereſt them to come unto Chriſt.

Smith. Where ye alledge St. John, "Except a man be born, &c." and will thereby prove the water to ſave, and ſo the deed or work to ſave and put away ſins, I will ſend you to St. Paul, which aſketh of the Galatians, "Whether they received the Spirit by the deeds of the law, or by the preaching of faith?" and there concludeth, that the Holy Ghoſt accompanieth the preaching of faith, and with the word entereth into the heart. So now if baptiſm preach to me the waſhing in Chriſt's blood, ſo doth the Holy Ghoſt accompany it, and it is unto me as a preacher and not a Saviour. And where ye ſay, I hinder the children to come unto Chriſt, it is manifeſt by our Saviour's words that ye hinder them to come, that will not ſuffer them to come unto him without the neceſſity of water. For he ſaith, Suffer them to come unto me, and not unto water; and therefore if ye condemn them, ye condemn both the merits and words of Chriſt. For our Saviour ſaith, "Except ye turn and become as children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And ſo brought I out many other examples, to make manifeſt that Chriſt hath cleanſed original ſin, bringing in examples out of the ſcriptures for the ſame.

Bonner. Then thou makeſt the water of none effect; then put away water.

Smith. "It is not (ſaith St. Peter) the waſhing away of the filth of the fleſh, but in that a good conſcience conſenteth unto God." And to prove that water only bringeth not the Holy Ghoſt, it is written in the 8th of the Acts, that Simon received water, but would have received the Holy Ghoſt for money. Alſo that the Holy Ghoſt hath come before baptiſm; it is written that John had the Holy Ghoſt in his mother's womb. Cornelius, Paul, and the queen Candace's ſervant, with many others, received the Holy Ghoſt before baptiſm. Yea, and although your generation have ſet at nought the word of God, and like ſwine turned his words upſide down, yet muſt his church keep the ſame in that order which he left them, which his church dare not break; and to judge children damned that he not baptized, it is wicked.

Mordant. By our lady, Sir, but I believe that if my child die without water, he is damned.

Bonner. Yea, and ſo do I, and all catholic men, good Mr. Mordant.

Smith. Well, my lord, ſuch catholic, ſuch ſalvation.

Bonner. Well, Sir, what ſay you to the ſacrament of orders?

Smith. Ye may call it the ſacrament of miſorders: for all orders are appointed of God. But as for your ſhaving, anointing, greaſing, poling, and rounding, there are no ſuch things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, my lord, if ye had grace and intelligence, ye would not ſo diſfigure yourſelf as ye do.

Bonner. Say'ſt thou ſo? now by my troth I will go ſhave myſelf to anger thee withal: and ſo ſent for his barber, who immediately came: and before my face at the door of the next chamber he ſhaved himſelf, deſiring me, before he went, to anſwer to theſe articles.

Bonner. What ſay you to holy bread and holy water, to the ſacrament of anointing, and to all the reſt of ſuch ceremonies of the church?

Smith. I ſay they be baubles for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exerciſe themſelves in; and therefore they may go among the refuſe. Then Mr. Mordant went away, and my lord went to be ſhaved, leaving there certain doctors, as he called them, to try what they could do, by whom I was baited for half an hour: of whom I alſo aſked this queſtion, Where were you all in the days of king Edward, that ye ſpake not that which ye ſpeak now?

Doct. We were in England.

Smith. Yea, but then ye had the faces of men, but now ye have put on lions faces again, as ſaith St. John, "Ye ſhew yourſelves as full of malice as you may be." For ye have for every time a vizor; yea, and if another king Edward ſhould ariſe, ye would then ſay, Down with the pope, for he is Antichriſt, and ſo are all his angels.

Then was I reviled, and ſent away, and brought in again before theſe men; and one of them that baited me before, aſked me if I diſallowed confeſſion?

Smith. Look in mine articles, and they ſhall ſhew you what I allow.

Doct. Your articles confeſs that you allow not auricular confeſſion.

Smith. I allow it not, becauſe the word alloweth it not, nor commandeth it.

Doct. Why it is written, Thou ſhalt not hide thy ſins and offences.

Smith. No more do I when I confeſs them to Almighty God.

Doct. Why ye cannot ſay that ye can hide them from God, and therefore you muſt underſtand the words are ſpoken to be uttered to them that do not know them.

Smith. Ye have made a good anſwer; then the prieſt muſt confeſs himſelf to me, as well as I to him; for I know his faults and ſecrets no more than he knoweth mine. But if you confeſs to the prieſt, and not unto God, ye ſhall have the reward that Judas had: for he confeſſed himſelf to the prieſt, and preſently went and hanged himſelf; and ſo as many as do not acknowledge their faults to God, are ſaid to hide them.

Doct. What did they that came to John to be baptized?

Smith. They came and confeſſed their ſins to Almighty God.

Doct. And not unto John?

Smith. If it were unto John, as ye are not able to prove, yet it was to God before John and the whole congregation.

Doct. Why, John was alone in the wilderneſs.

Smith. Why, and yet the ſcriptures ſay he had many diſciples, and that many phariſees and ſadducees came to his baptiſm. Here the ſcriptures and you agree not. And if they confeſſed themſelves to John, as ye ſay, it was to all the congregation, as St. Paul doth to Timothy, and to all that read his epiſtle, in opening to all the hearers, that he was not worthy to be called an apoſtle, becauſe he had been a tyrant. But as for ear-confeſſion, ye never heard it allowed by the word. For the prophet David made his confeſſion unto God, and ſaith, "I will confeſs my ſins unto the Lord." Daniel maketh his confeſſion unto the Lord; Judith, Toby, Jeremy, Manaſſeh, with all the forefathers, did even ſo. For the Lord hath ſaid, "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee." Knock, aſk, ſeek, with ſuch like; and this is the word of God; now bring ſomewhat of the word to help yourſelves withal. Then they raged, and called me dog, and ſaid I was damned.

Smith. Nay, ye are dogs, that becauſe holy things are offered, will ſlay your friends. For I may ſay with St. Paul, "I have fought with beaſts in the likeneſs of men." For here I have been baited theſe two days, of my lord and his great bulls of Baſan, and in his hall beneath have I been baited of the reſt of his band. With this came my lord from ſhaving, and aſked me how I liked him?

Smith. Forſooth, ye are even as wiſe as ye were before ye were ſhaven.

Bonner. How ſtandeth it, Mr. Doctors, have ye done any good?

Doct. No by my troth, my lord, we can do no good.

Smith. Then it is fulfilled which is written, "How can an evil tree bring forth good fruit?"

Bonner. Nay, naughty fellow, I ſet theſe gentlemen to bring thee home to Chriſt.

Smith. Such gentlemen, ſuch Chriſts; and as truly as they have that name from Chriſt, ſo truly do they teach Chriſt.

Bonner. Well, wilt thou neither hear them nor me?

Smith. Yes, I am compelled to hear you; but ye cannot compel me to follow you.

Bonner. Well, thou ſhalt be burnt at a ſtake in Smithfield, if thou wilt not turn.

Smith. And ye ſhall burn in hell, if ye repent not: but my lord, to put you out of doubt, becauſe I am weary, I will ſtrain courteſy with you: I perceive you will not with your doctors come unto me, and I am determined not to come unto you, by God's grace. For I have hardened my face againſt you as hard as braſs. Then after many railing ſentences I was ſent away.

And thus have I left the truth of mine anſwers in writing, gentle reader, being compelled by my friends to do it: that ye may ſee how the Lord hath according to his promiſe given me a mouth and wiſdom to anſwer in his cauſe, for which I am condemned, and my cauſe not heard.

The laſt Examination of Mr. Smith.

THE twelfth of July I was with my brethren brought into the conſiſtory, and mine articles read before my lord mayor and the ſheriffs, with all the aſſiſtants; to which I anſwered, as followeth.

Bonner. By my faith, my lord mayor, I have ſhewed him as much favour as any man living might do: but I perceive all is loſt, both in him and all his company.

At this word, which he coupled with an oath, Mr. Smith came in, and ſaid to the biſhop, My lord, it is written, "Ye muſt not ſwear."

Bonner. Ah Mr. Controller, are ye come? Lo, my lord mayor, this is Mr. Speaker, pointing to my brother Tankerfield; and this is Mr. Controller, pointing to me. And then beginning to read my articles, he perſevered till he came at my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and then demanded of my lord mayor, if he heard of the ſame before. To which he anſwered, No. To whom I ſaid:

Smith. My lord mayor, will it pleaſe you to hear me recite it, as I heard it (and I told it), and then ſhall you hear the truth. For this tale that my lord hath told is untrue.

Bonner. How ſay you, good Mr. Mordant, ſpake he not this here as it is written? Were ye not by?

Mordant. Yes, my lord, that it is: I heard him ſay it.

Smith. How heard you me ſay it, and were not preſent when I ſpake it? Should ſuch a man make a lye? It is manifeſtly proved that the prophet ſaith: "Even as the king ſaith, ſo ſaith the judge, that he may do him a pleaſure again:" And then my jailor was brought out for proof thereof, who there openly profeſſed, that neither Mr. Mordant, nor the doctors before-mentioned, were preſent when I ſpake it.

At which Mr. Mordant with bluſhing cheeks ſaid, he heard them read, and heard me affirm the ſame; which alſo was not true. Then my lord proceeded with the reſt of my articles, demanding of me, If I ſaid not as was written. To which I anſwered, No. And turning to my lord mayor, I ſaid, I require you, my lord mayor, in God's behalf, unto whom pertaineth your ſword and juſtice, that I may here before your preſence anſwer to theſe objections that are laid againſt me, and have the probation of the ſame; and if any thing that I have ſaid or will ſay, be proved (as my lord ſaith) hereſy, I ſhall not only with all my heart forſake the ſame, and cleave to the truth, but alſo recant whereſoever ye ſhall aſſign me, and all this audience ſhall be witneſs to the ſame.

Lord Mayor. Why, Smith, thou canſt not deny but this thou ſaidſt.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I deny that which he hath written, becauſe he hath both added to, and diminiſhed from the ſame: but what I have ſpoken, I will never deny.

Lord Mayor. Why thou ſpakeſt againſt the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar.

Smith. I denied it to be any ſacrament, and I do ſtand here to make probation of the ſame; and if my lord or any of his doctors be able to prove either the name or uſage of the ſame, I will recant mine error. Then ſpake my brother Tankerfield, and defended the probation of things which they called hereſy. To which the biſhop anſwered,

By my troth, Mr. Speaker, ye ſhall preach at a ſtake.

Smith. Well ſworn, my lord, ye keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, I am no ſaint.

Smith. No, my lord, nor yet good biſhop. For a biſhop, ſaith St. Paul, ſhould be faultleſs, and a dedicate veſſel unto God; and are ye not aſhamed to ſit in judgment, and be a blaſphemer, condemning innocents?

Bonner.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, ye are faultleſs.

Smith. My lord mayor, I require you in God's name, that I may have juſtice. We be here to-day a great many innocents wrongfully accuſed of hereſy. And I require you, if you will not ſeem to be partial, let me have no more favour at your hands, than the apoſtle had at the hands of Feſtus and Agrippa, who being heathens and infidels, gave him leave not only to ſpeak for himſelf, but alſo heard the probation of his cauſe. This require I at your hands, who being a chriſtian judge, I hope will not deny me that right, which the heathen have ſuffered: if ye do, then ſhall all this audience, yea, and the heathen ſpeak ſhame of your fact. For a city (ſaith our Saviour) that is built on a hill cannot be hid: if they therefore have the truth, let it come to light. For all that well do, come to the light; and they that do evil, hate the light.

Then my lord mayor hanging down his head, ſaid nothing, but the biſhop told me, I ſhould preach at a ſtake; and ſo the ſheriff cried, with the biſhop, Away with me.

Thus came I in before them four times, deſiring juſtice, but could have none: and at length my friends required the ſame with one voice, and could not have it; we had ſentence, and then being carried out, were brought in again, and received it ſeparately. But before the biſhop gave me ſentence, he told me in deriſion of my brother Tankerfield, a tale between a gentleman and his cook. To which I anſwered, My lord, ye fill the people's ears with fantaſies and fooliſh tales, and make a laughing matter at blood; but if ye were a true biſhop, ye ſhould leave theſe railing ſentences, and ſpeak the words of God.

Bonner. Well, I have offered to that naughty fellow, Mr. Speaker, your companion the cook, that my chancellor ſhould here inſtruct him, but he hath with great diſdain refuſed it. How ſayeſt thou, wilt thou have him inſtruct thee, and lead thee in the right way?

Smith. My lord, if your chancellor will do me any good and take any pains, as ye ſay, let him take mine articles in his hands, that ye have objected againſt me, and either prove one of them hereſy, or any thing that you do to be good: and if he be able ſo to do, I ſtand here with all my heart to him; if not, I have no need, I praiſe God, of his ſermon: for I come to anſwer for my life, and not to hear a ſermon.

Then began the ſentence, In Dei nomine. To which I anſwered, that he began in a wrong name, requiring of him where he learned in ſcripture to give ſentence of death againſt any man for his conſcience ſake? To which he made no anſwer, but went forward to the end, and immediately cried, Away with him. Then I turned to the mayor, and ſaid, Is it not enough for you, my lord mayor, and you that are the ſheriffs, that ye have left the ſtrait way of the Lord, but ye muſt condemn Chriſt cauſeleſs?

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, now ye cannot ſay, but I have offered you fair, to have inſtruction. And now, I pray thee, call me Bloody Biſhop, and ſay, I ſeek thy blood.

Smith. Well, my lord, if neither I nor any of this congregation do report the truth of your fact, yet ſhall theſe ſtones cry it out, rather than it ſhall be hidden.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

Woodroſe. Away with him, take him away.

Smith. Well, good friends, ye have ſeen and heard the great wrong that we have received this day, and ye are all witneſſes that we have deſired the probation of our cauſe by God's book, and it hath not been granted: but we are condemned, and our cauſe not heard. Nevertheleſs, my lord mayor, foraſmuch as ye have here exercited God's ſword cauſeleſs, and will not hear the right of the poor, I commit my cauſe to Almighty God, who will judge all men according to right, before whom we ſhall both ſtand without authority; and there will I ſtand in the right, and have true judgment, to your great confuſion, except ye repent, which the Lord grant you to do, if it be his will. And then was I with the reſt of my brethren carried away to Newgate.

Thus, gentle reader, as near as I can, I have ſet forth the truth of my examination, and the verity of mine unjuſt condemnation for the truth, praying to God that it may not be laid to the charge of thee, O England; requiring your hearty prayers to God for his grace and ſpirit of boldneſs, with hope even ſhortly to ſet to my ſeal at Uxbridge the 8th day of Auguſt, by God's grace: pray that it may be to his honour, my ſalvation, and your conſolation, I pray you.

Da gloriam Deo.

Robert Smith.

Thus art thou (good reader) not only to note, but alſo to follow in this man a ſingular example of chriſtian fortitude, who ſo valiantly ſtood in the defence of his maſter's cauſe: and as thou ſeeſt him here boldly ſtand in examination before the biſhop and doctors; ſo was he no leſs comfortable alſo in the priſon among his companions: which alſo is to be obſerved no leſs in his other fellow-priſoners, who being together in an outward room within Newgate, had godly conference with themſelves, with daily praying and public reading, which they to their great comfort uſed in that room together; amongſt whom Smith was the chief; whoſe induſtry was always ſolicitous, not only for them of his own company, but alſo his diligence was careful for other priſoners, whom he ceaſed not to diſſuade from their old accuſtomed iniquity; and many he converted to his religion. While he was in priſon, he wrote divers letters to his friends, ſome in verſe, and others in proſe. And the firſt are in verſe as follow.

"O ye that love the Lord, ſee that ye hate the thing that is evil."

THE God that giveth life and light,
And leadeth into reſt:
That breaketh bonds and bringeth out
The poor that are oppreſt:
And keepeth mercy for the meek,
His treaſure and his ſtore:
Increaſe thy life in perfect love,
Both now and evermore.
That as thou haſt begun to ground
In faith and fervent love;
Thou may'ſt be made a mighty mount
That never may remove.
That thine enſample may be ſhew'd
Among all thine increaſe:
That they may live and learn the like,
And paſs their time in peace.
Thy ſalutations that were ſent,
I heartily retain:
And ſend thee ſeventy times as much,
To thee and thine again.

And now becauſe I know the goal
That thou doſt moſt deſire:
I ſend thee here a paper full,
Is fined in the fire.
In hope thou wilt accept it well,
Although it be but ſmall;
Becauſe I have no other good,
To make amends withal.
For all thy free and friendly facts,
Which thy good will hath wrought,
I ſend thee ſurely for a ſhift
The thing that coſt me nought.
Abſtain from all ungodlineſs,
In dread direct your days;
Poſſeſs not ſin in any wiſe;
Beware of wicked ways.
Hold faſt your faith unfeignedly;
Build as you have begun:
And arm yourſelf in perfect faith,
To do as ye have done:
Leſt that the wicked make a mock
At what ye take in hand,
In leaving of the perfect rock,
To build upon the ſand.
Beware of filthy phariſees,
Their building is in blood:
Eat not with them in any wiſe,
Their leaven is not good.
Their ſalt is all unſavoury:
And under good intents
They maintain all their knavery,
And murder innocents.
They ſeek to ſit in Chriſt his ſeat,
And put him out of place:
And make all means that may be made,
His doings to deface.
They keep him down with bills and bats,
That made the blind to ſee:
They make a god for mice and rats,
And ſay the ſame is he.
They look like ſheep, and act like wolves,
Their baits be all for blood:
They kill and ſlay the ſimple ſouls,
And rob them of their good.

The dark illuſions of the devil
Have dimmed ſo their eyes,
That they cannot abide the truth
To ſtir in any wiſe.
And if ye keep the perfect path
(As I have hope you do)
Ye ſhall be ſure to have ſuch ſhame
As they may put you to.
For, all that lead a godly life,
Shall ſurely ſuffer loſs:
Likewiſe the world will ſeek their ſhame,
And make them kiſs the croſs.
Ye ſhall be killed all, ſaith Chriſt:
Your ſorrows ſhall not ceaſe:
And yet in your afflictions,
I am your perfect peace.
For in the world ye ſhall have woe;
Becauſe ye are unknown:
Alſo becauſe ye hate the world,
The world will love his own.
Be fervent therefore to the death,
Againſt all their decrees:
And God ſhall ſurely fight for thee,
Againſt thine enemies.
Commit your cauſe unto the Lord,
Revenge not any ill;
And thou ſhalt ſee the wicked want,
When thou ſhalt have thy will,
For all afflictions that may fall,
That they can ſay or do:
They are not ſure of all the wealth
That we attain unto.
For I have ſeen the ſinners ſpread
Their branches like a bay;
And yet ere one could turn his head,
Were wither'd clean away.
Beware that money make you not
In riches to ariſe
Againſt the goodneſs of the Lord,
Among the worldly wiſe.
For many miſchiefs it hath made,
That may not be expreſs'd:
And many ills it hath begun,
Which may not be redreſs'd.
For money maketh many a one
In riches to rebel:
And he that maketh gold a god,
He hath a ſoul to ſell.
It maketh kings to kill and ſlay,
And waſte their wits in war;
In leaving of the wolf at home,
To hunt the fox afar.
And where they ſhould ſee juſtice done,
And ſet their realm in reſt;
By money they be made a means
To ſee the poor oppreſt.
It maketh lords obey the laws,
That they do ill and naught;
It maketh biſhops ſuck the blood
That God hath dearly bought.
And where they ſhould be faithful friends,
And fathers to their flock,
By money they do turn about,
Ev'n like a weathercock.
The prieſt doth make a money mean,
To have again his whores:
To put away his wedded wife,
And children out of doors.
It holdeth back the huſbandman,
Which may not be forborn:
And will not ſuffer him to ſow,
And caſt abroad his corn.
In like caſe it doth let again,
When that the ſeed they ſow:
It choaketh up the corn again,
So that it cannot grow.
The huſband he would have a wife,
With nobles new and old:
The wife would have the huſband hang'd,
That ſhe might have his gold.
It maketh murd'rers many a one,
And beareth much with blood:
The child would ſee the parents ſlain,
To ſeize upon their good.
And though it be a bleſſed thing,
Created in the kind;
It is a neceſſary ill
Annexed to the mind.
For whoſo playeth with the pitch,
His fingers are defil'd;
And he that maketh gold a god,
Shall ſurely be beguil'd.
Be friendly to the fatherleſs,
And all that are oppreſt:
Aſſiſt them always out of hand,
And ſee them ſet at reſt.
In all your doings and your deeds,
Let mercy ſtill remain;
For with the meaſure that ye mete,
Shall ye be met again,
Be always lowly in your life;
Let love enjoy her own:
The higheſt trees are ſeldom ſure,
And ſooneſt overthrown.
The lions lack and ſuffer ſore.
In hunger and in thirſt:
And they that do oppreſs the poor,
Continue ſtill accurſt.
The bee is but a little beaſt
In body or in ſight,
And yet ſhe bringeth more increaſe
Than either crow or kite.
Therefore beware in any wiſe,
Keep well your watch alway:
Be ſure of oil within your lamp;
Let not your light decay.
For death deſpiſeth them that lack,
And hateth them that have;
And treadeth down the rich and poor
Together in the grave.
Exhort your children to be chaſte,
Rebuke them for their ill,
And let them not in any wiſe
Be wedded to their will.
Laugh not with them, but keep them low.
Shew them no merry chear,
Leſt thou do weep with them alſo:
But bring them up in fear.
And let your light and living ſhine,
That ye be not ſuſpected
To have the ſame within yourſelf,
For which they are corrected.
Be meek and modeſt, in a mean
Let all your deeds be done,
That they which are without the law
May ſee how right ye run.
Keep well the member in your mouth,
Your tongue ſee that ye tame;
For out of little ſparks of fire
Proceedeth out a flame.
And as the poiſon doth expreſs
The nature of the toad;
Ev'n ſo the tongue doth manifeſt
The heart that feareth God.
For therewith bleſs we God above,
And therewith curſe we men;
And thereby murders do ariſe,
Through women now and then.
And ſeeing God hath giv'n a tongue,
And put it under power,
The ſureſt way it is, to ſet
A hatch before the door.
For God hath ſet you in a ſeat
Of double low degree;
For unto God, and then to man,
A ſubject for to be.
I write not that I ſee in you
Theſe things to be ſuſpected,
But only ſet before your face,
How ſin ſhould be corrected.
For fleſh and blood I know ye are,
As other women be;
And if ye dwell in fleſh and blood,
There is infirmity.
Receive a warning willingly,
That to thy teeth is told:
Account the gift of greater price
Than if he gave thee gold.
A wiſe man will, ſaith Solomon,
A warning ſoon embrace:
A fool will ſooner (as he ſaith)
Be ſmitten on the face.
And as your members muſt be dead
From all things that are vain:
Ev'n ſo by baptiſm ye are born
To live with Chriſt again.
Thus farewel, free and faithful friend;
The Lord that is above
Increaſe in thee a perfect faith,
And lead thee in his love.
And as I pray with perfect love,
And pour out bitter tears
For you and all that are at large
Abroad among the briers;
Ev'n ſo I pray thee to prefer
My perſon and my bands,
Unto the everlaſting God
That hath me in his hands.
That I may paſs out of this pond,
Wherein I am oppreſt,
Incloſed in a clod of clay,
That here can have no reſt.
That as he hath begun in me
His mercies many one,
I may attain to overtake
My brethren that are gone.
That when the death ſhall do his worſt,
Where he ſhall point a place,
I may be able like a man
To look him in the face.
For though he catch away my cloak,
My body into duſt:
Yet am I ſure to have a ſoul,
When death hath done his worſt.
And though I leave a little duſt
Diſſolved without blood;
I ſhall receive it ſafe again,
When God ſhall ſee it good.
For my Redeemer I am ſure
Doth live for evermore,
And ſitteth high upon the heavens,
For whom I hunger ſore.
Ev'n as the deer with deadly wounds
Eſcaped from the ſpoil,
Doth haſte by all the means he may
To ſeek unto the ſoil;
Of whom I hope to have a crown,
That always ſhall remain;
And to enjoy a perfect peace
For all my woe and pain.
The God that giveth all increaſe,
And ſeeketh ſtill to ſave,
Abound in thee that perfect peace,
Which I do hope to have.
And I beſeech the living God
To hold thee in his hands,
And wiſh thee ev'n with all my heart,
The bleſſing of my bands;
Which I eſteem of higher price
Than pearl or precious ſtone;
And ſhall endure for evermore,
When earthly things are gone.
For though the fire do conſume
Our treaſure and our ſtore,
Yet ſhall the goodneſs of the Lord
Endure for evermore.
And where thou art a friend to him
That is to me full dear,
That God of might make thee amends,
When all men ſhall appear.
That hath ſhewed mercy to the meek,
And rid them out of pain:
And thus the Lord poſſeſs thy ſpirit,
Till we do meet again.

If thou wilt have a recompence,
Abide ſtill in obedience.

The Exhortation of Robert Smith to his Children, commonly ſet out in the Name of Mr. Rogers.

GIVE ear, my children, to my words,
Whom God hath dearly bought:
Lay up my law within your heart,
And print it in your thought.
For I your father have foreſeen
The frail and filthy way,
Which fleſh and blood would follow fain
Even to their own decay.
For all and every living beaſt
Their crib do know full well:
But Adam's heirs, above the reſt,
Are ready to rebel:
And all the creatures on the earth
Full well can keep their way:
But man, above all other beaſts,
Is apt to go aſtray.
For earth and aſhes is his ſtrength,
His glory and his reign;
And unto aſhes at the length
Shall he return again.
For fleſh doth flouriſh like a flower,
And grow up like the graſs,
And is conſumed in an hour,
As it is brought to paſs
In me, the image of your years,
Your treaſure and your truſt:
Whom ye do ſee before your face,
Diſſolved into duſt.

For

For as you ſee your father's fleſh
Converted into clay:
Even ſo ſhall ye, my children dear,
Conſume and wear away.
The ſun and moon, and all the ſtars,
That ſerve the day and night:
The earth and ev'ry earthly thing
Shall be conſumed quite.
And all the worſhip that is wrought,
That hath been heard or ſeen,
Shall clean conſume and come to nought,
As it had never been.
Therefore that ye may follow me,
Your father and your friend,
And enter into that ſame life,
Which never ſhall have end:
I leave you here a little book,
For you to look upon:
That you may ſee your father's face
When I am dead and gone.
Who for the hope of heav'nly things,
While he did here remain,
Gave over all his golden years
In priſon and in pain;
Where I among mine iron bands,
Incloſed in the dark,
Not many days before my death
Did dedicate this work,
To you mine heirs of earthly things,
Which I have left behind:
That ye may read and underſtand,
And keep it in your mind.
That as you have been heirs of that
Which once ſhall wear away:
Even ſo ye may poſſeſs the part
Which never ſhall decay.
In following of your father's foot,
In truth and alſo love:
That ye may likewiſe be his heirs
For evermore above.
And in example to your youth,
To whom I wiſh all good,
I preach you here a perfect faith,
And ſeal it with my blood.
Have God always before your eyes,
In all your whole intents:
Commit not ſin in any wiſe,
Keep his commandments.
Abhor that arrant whore of Rome,
And all her blaſphemies;
And drink not of her decretals,
Nor yet of her decrees.
Give honour to your mother dear,
Remember well her pain:
And recompenſe her in her age,
In like with love again.
Be always aiding at her hand,
And let her not decay:
Remember well your father's fall,
That ſhould have been her ſtay.
Give of your portion to the poor,
As riches do ariſe;
And from the needy naked ſoul
Turn not away your eyes.
For he that will not hear the cry
Of ſuch as are in need:
Shall cry himſelf and not be heard,
When he would hope to ſpeed.
If God have giv'n you great increaſe,
And bleſſed well your ſtore:
Remember ye are put in truſt,
To miniſter the more.
Beware of foul and filthy luſt,
Let whoredom have no place:
Keep clean your veſſels in the Lord,
That he may you embrace.
Ye are the temples of the Lord,
For ye are dearly bought:
And they that do defile the ſame,
Shall ſurely come to nought.
Poſſeſs not pride in any caſe,
Build not your neſts too high:
But have always before your face,
That ye be born to die.
Defraud not him that hired is,
Your labours to ſuſtain;
But give him always out of hand,
His penny for his pain.
And as ye would that other men
Againſt you ſhould proceed;
Do ye the ſame again to them
When they do ſtand in need.
And part your portion with the poor,
In money and in meat:
And feed the fainted feeble ſoul,
With that which ye ſhould eat,
That when your members lacketh meat
And cloathing to your back,
Ye may the better think on them
That now do live and lack.
Aſk counſel alſo at the wiſe,
Give ear unto the end:
Refuſe not you the ſweet rebuke
Of him that is your friend.
Be thankful always to the Lord,
With prayer and with praiſe:
Deſire you him in all your deeds,
For to direct your ways:
And ſin not like that ſwiniſh ſort,
Whoſe bellies being fed,
Conſume their years upon the earth
From belly unto bed.
Seek firſt, I ſay, the living God;
Set him always before;
And then be ſure that he will bleſs
Your baſket and your ſtore.
And thus if you direct your days
According to this book,
Then ſhall they ſay that ſee your ways,
How like me you do look.
And when you have ſo perfectly,
Upon your fingers ends,
Poſſeſſed all within your book,
Then give it to your friends.
And I beſeech the living God,
Repleniſh you with grace,
That I may have you in the heav'ns,
And ſee you face to face.
And though the ſword have cut me off,
Contrary to my kind,
That I could not enjoy your love,
According to my mind:
Yet I do hope when that the heav'ns
Shall vaniſh like a ſcroll,
I ſhall receive your perfect ſhape,
In body and in ſoul.
And that I may enjoy your love,
And you enjoy the land,
I do beſeech the living God
To hold you in his hand.
Farewel, my children, from the world,
Where ye muſt yet remain:
The Lord of hoſts be your defence,
Till we do meet again.
Farewel, my love, and loving wife,
My children and my friends:
I hope to God to have you all
When all things have their ends.
And if you do abide in God,
As you have now begun;
Your courſe I warrant will be ſhort,
Ye have not far to run.
God grant you ſo to end your years
As he ſhall think it beſt;
That ye may enter into heav'n,
Where I do hope to reſt.

Written at the Requeſt of a Lady in her Book.

IF you will walk the way
That Chriſt hath you aſſign'd,
Then learn this little verſe,
Which I have left behind.
Be fervent in the truth,
Although it bear the blame;
Likewiſe apply your youth
To ſtick unto the ſame:
That when old age is come,
And death begins to call,
The truth may be your ſtaff,
To ſtay you up withal.
And though it bring rebuke,
And make you kiſs the croſs,
Yet is it a reward
To all that ſuffer loſs.
For here we do lay out
The things that be but vain;
But we are ſure to reap
The things that do remain.
For all that ye do loſe,
Is but a ſinful ſlime,
And like unto a roſe
That tarrieth but a time.
But if ye carry Chriſt,
And walk the perfect way,
Ye ſhall poſſeſs the gold,
That never ſhall decay.
And all your father's goods
Shall be your recompence,
If ye confeſs the word
With double diligence.
Not only for to hear
His pure and perfect word,
But alſo to embrace
The fire and the ſword.
And if ye keep this path,
And do not run a-crook,
Then ſhall ye meet the man
That writ this in your book,
In that eternal joy,
That always ſhall remain:
Thus farewell, faithful friend,
Till we do meet again.

Legem pone.

TEACH me, O Lord, to walk thy ways,
My living to amend,
And I ſhall keep it all my days,
Even to my life's end.
Give me a mind to underſtand,
So ſhall I never ſtart:
But I ſhall keep all thy precepts,
Ev'n wholly with my heart.
Make me to go a perfect pace
In what I have begun:
For all my love and my delight,
Is in thy ways to run.
Incline my heart unto thy ways,
Set thou thereon my thought:
And let me not conſume my days,
To covet what is naught.
O quicken me in all thy ways,
The world now to deſpiſe:
And from all fond and fooliſh toys
Turn thou away mine eyes.
O plant in me thy perfect word,
Which is to me ſo dear:
Lay up thy laws within my heart,
To keep me ſtill in fear.
And rid me of that great rebuke
Which I do fear full ſore;
For all thy judgments and thy law
Endure for evermore.
Behold, O Lord, in thy precepts
Is all my whole delight:
O quicken me in all thy ways,
That I may walk aright.

To his Brother.

AS nature doth me bind,
Becauſe thou art my blood,
According to my kind,
To give thee of my good.
That thou may'ſt have in mind
How I have run my race,
Although thou ſtay'ſt behind
But for a little ſpace.
I give thee here a pearl,
The price of all my good,
For which I leave my life,
To buy it with my blood.
More worth than all the world,
Or aught that I can note,
Although it be be-clad
In ſuch a ſimple coat.
For when I had obtain'd
This pearl of ſuch a price,
Then was I ſure I gain'd
The way for to be wiſe.
It taught me how to fight,
My fleſh for to deſpiſe,
To ſtick unto the light,
Alſo to leave the lyes.
In ſending out my ſeed
With bonds and bitter tears,
That I might reap with joy
In everlaſting years:
And have for all my loſs,
My travail and my pain,
A thouſand times and more
Of better goods again.
And for becauſe the good
That hath been got and gain'd,
And that the Lord's elect
Hath evermore obtain'd,

Is cloſed in this book
Which I do give to thee:
Wherein I have my part,
As thou thyſelf may'ſt ſee.
In which I hope thou haſt
A ſtock alſo in ſtore:
And wilt not ceaſe to ſail,
Till God hath made it more.
I will thee to beware,
Be ſure thou keep it well:
For if thou do it loſe,
Thy part ſhall be in hell.
And here I teſtify
Before the living God,
That I deteſt to do
The things that are forbid.
And as my judgment is,
My body to be brent,
My heart is ſurely ſet
Therewith to be content.
And ſince it is his will
To put in me his power,
Upon his holy hill
To fight againſt this whore;
Full well I am content,
If he allow it ſo,
To ſtand with all my might
The whore to overthrow.
Even with a willing mind,
The death I will outface:
And as I am aſſur'd
The battle to embrace.
That they which hear the truth,
How I have paſt the pike,
May ſet aſide their youth,
And learn to do the like.

And though it be my lot
To let her ſuck my blood,
Yet am I well aſſured,
It ſhall do her no good.
For ſhe is ſet to kill
The things ſhe thinks accurſt,
And ſhall not have her fill
Of blood until ſhe burſt.
And when thou ſhalt perceive,
Or hear of my deceaſe,
Pray to the living God
That I may paſs in peace.
And when I am at reſt,
And rid out of my pain;
Then will I do the like
For thee to God again.
And to my woful wife,
And widow deſolate,
Whom I do leave behind,
In ſuch a ſimple ſtate:
Encompaſſed with tears,
And mournings many one;
Be thou her ſtaying ſtaff
When I am dead and gone.
My mouth may not expreſs
The dolours of my mind.
Nor yet my heavineſs
To leave her here behind.
But as thou art my bone,
My brother and my blood,
So let her have thy heart,
If it may do her good.
I took her from the world,
And made her like the croſs:
But if ſhe hold her own,
She ſhall not ſuffer loſs.

For where ſhe had before
A man unto her make,
That by the force of fire
Was ſtrangled at a ſtake;
Now ſhall ſhe have a king
To be her helping hand:
To whom pertain all things
That are within the land.
Alſo my daughter dear,
Whom I bequeath to thee,
To be brought up in fear,
And learn the A B C.
That ſhe may grow in grace
And ruled by thy rod:
To learn and lead her life
Within the fear of God.
And always have in mind,
Thy brother being dead,
That thou art left behind,
A father in my ſtead.
And thou, my brother dear,
Who art my mother's ſon,
Come forth out of all fear,
And do as I have done:
And God ſhall be thy guide,
And give thee ſuch increaſe,
That in the flame of fire
Thou ſhalt have perfect peace,
Into eternal joy,
And paſs out of all pain;
Where we ſhall meet with mirth,
And never part again.

If thou wilt do my daughter good,
Be mindful of thy brother's blood.

To all which love God unfeignedly, and intend to lead a godly Life, according to his Goſpel, and to perſevere in his Truth unto the End.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

Be not afraid, moſt dearly beloved in our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, at theſe moſt perilous days, wherein by the ſufferance of God, the prince of darkneſs is broken looſe, and rageth in his members againſt the elect of God with all cruelty, to ſet up again the kingdom of Antichriſt: againſt whom ſee that ye be ſtrong in faith, to reſiſt his moſt deviliſh doctrine with the pure goſpel of God, arming yourſelves with patience to abide whatſoever ſhall be laid to your charge for the truth's ſake, knowing that thereunto ye be called, not only to believe in him, but alſo to ſuffer for him. O how happy are ye that in the ſight of God are counted worthy to ſuffer for the teſtimony of Chriſt! Quiet therefore yourſelves, O my loving brethren, and rejoice in him for whom ye ſuffer: for unto you do remain the unſpeakable joys, which neither the eye hath ſeen, nor the ear hath heard, neither the heart of man is able to comprehend in any wiſe. Be not afraid of the bodily death, for your names are written in the book of life. And the prophets do record, that in the ſight of the Lord precious is the death of his ſaints. Watch therefore and pray, that ye be not prevented in the day of temptation. Now cometh the day of your trial, wherein the waters rage, and the ſtormy winds blow. Now ſhall it appear, whether ye have built upon the fleeting ſand, or upon the immoveable rock Chriſt, which is the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets: whereon every houſe that is built, groweth into an holy temple of the Lord, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghoſt. Now approacheth the day of your battle, wherein it is required that ye ſhew yourſelves the valiant ſoldiers of Chriſt Jeſus, with the armour of God, that ye may be able to ſtand faſt againſt all the crafty aſſaults of the devil. Chriſt is your captain, and ye be his ſoldiers, whoſe cognizance is the croſs, to which he willingly humbled himſelf even unto the death, and thereby ſpoiled his enemies, and now he triumpheth over them in the glory of his Father, making interceſſion for them that here do remain to ſuffer the afflictions that are to be fulfilled in his myſtical body.

It behoveth therefore every one that will be counted his ſcholar, to take up his own croſs and follow him, as ye have him for enſample: and I aſſure you that he being on your ſide, nothing ſhall be able to prevail againſt you. And that he will be with you even to the world's end, ye have his promiſe in Matthew 28. He will go forth with his hoſt as a conqueror to make a conqueſt. He is the man that ſitteth on the white horſe, crowned with immortality, and ye brethren are his fellowſhip, whereof he is the head. He hath your heart in his hand, as a bow bent after his godly will; he ſhall direct the ſame according to the riches of his glory, into all ſpiritual and heavenly cogitations. He is faithful, and will not ſuffer you to be further aſſaulted than he will give you ſtrength to overcome, and in the moſt danger he will make a way that ye may be able to bear it.

Shrink not therefore, dear hearts, when ye ſhall be called to anſwer for the hope that is in you: for we have the Comforter, even the Spirit of truth which was ſent from the heavens to teach us: He ſhall ſpeak in us, he ſhall ſtrengthen us: what is he then that ſhall be able to confound us? Nay, what tyrant is he that now boaſteth himſelf of his ſtrength to do miſchief, whom the Lord ſhall not with the ſame Spirit, by the mouth of his ſervants, ſtrike down to hell fire? Yea, ſuddenly will the Lord bring down the glory of the proud Philiſtines, by the hands of his ſervant David. Their ſtrength is in the ſpear and ſhield, but our help is in the name of the Lord, which made both heaven and earth. He is our buckler and wall, a ſtrong tower of defence. He is our God, and we are his people. He ſhall bring the counſels of the ungodly to nought. He ſhall take them in their own net. He ſhall deſtroy them in their own inventions. The right hand of the Lord ſhall work this wonder. His power is known among the children of men. Their fathers have felt it, and are confounded. In like manner ſhall they know that there is no counſel againſt the Lord, when their ſecrets are opened to the whole world, and are found to be againſt the living God. Work they never ſo craftily, build they never ſo ſtrongly, yet down ſhall their rabble fall, and the builders themſelves ſhall then be ſcattered upon the face of the earth, earth, as accurſed of God. The juſt ſhall ſee this and be glad, and praiſe the name of the Lord, that ſo marvellouſly hath dealt with his ſervants, as to bring their enemies under their feet. Then ſhall the fearful ſeed of Cain tremble and quake. Then ſhall the mocking Iſhmaelite be caſt out of door. Then ſhall the proud Nimrod ſee his labour loſt. Then ſhall the beaſt of Babylon be trodden under foot. Then ſhall the ſcribes and phariſees for madneſs fret and rage. Then ſhall their painted wiſdom be known for extreme folly. Then ſhall the bloody dragon be void of his prey. Then ſhall the whore of Babylon receive double vengeance. Then ſhall they ſcratch their crowns for the fall of their miſtreſs harlot, whom they now ſerve for filthy lucre; when no man will buy their wares any more. Then ſhall the popiſh prieſthood cry alas, with care, even when the Lord ſhall help his ſervants; which day is not far off, the day wherein the kingdom of Antichriſt ſhall have an end, and never riſe any more. In the mean time abide in certain and ſure hope, cleaving to the promiſes of God, which in their own time ſhall be fulfilled.

Acquit yourſelves like men againſt the enemies of God in all humility of mind, be ſtrong in ſpirit to acknowledge one God, one holy Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, one only, everlaſting and ſufficient ſacrifice for the remiſſion of ſins, even the precious body of the Lord Jeſus once offered for all and for ever. Who now ſitteth at the right hand of God, and from thence ſhall he come to judge both the quick and the dead at the laſt day; and until that time occupieth the bleſſed body none other place to dwell in, to be kept in, to be encloſed in, but only in the heavens, even in the glorious Majeſty of God, perſonally abiding there in the fleſh, not coming down from thence till the laſt hour. And as he never ceaſeth to be man, ſo doth he never loſe the ſimilitude of man; his body there hath his lineaments, he leaveth them not, ſo hath that body there his highneſs, and ſhrinketh not, and his bodily ſhape he altereth not at any time. He is, in that he took of the virgin Mary, a natural man in all conditions, except ſin.

And what he took of his bleſſed mother, by the working of the Holy Ghoſt, he took it for ever, and will not exchange the ſame for any other. He took the ſhape of a man with the ſubſtance of his manhood, in one ſacred womb. There were they two coupled together by the Holy Ghoſt, never to be divided aſunder. He retaineth the one with the other inſeparably. As he will not alter the ſubſtance of his fleſh into the ſubſtance of bread, no more will he alter the ſhape of his body into the form of bread. There cannot be a greater abſurdity againſt the truth, than to think that he would leave the ſhape that he took in the virgin's womb, being an accident unto his manhood, and join unto the ſame a wafer-cake baked in an oven, or between a pair of irons. As he is in heaven very man, one only mediator between God and man, even the Man Chriſt Jeſus, he it is that is the propitiation for our ſins. Be bold therefore to confeſs this moſt pure and apoſtolical doctrine; and alſo that all favour, mercy, and forgiveneſs cometh only by him. He only of God the Father was made for us all wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification and redemption. All theſe are the gifts of God the Father, freely given unto us by Chriſt Jeſus God and man, through faith in his blood, and not by the merits of men; gifts they are, I ſay, freely given unto us of favour, without our deſert, by believing, and not by deſerving. To this do the law and the prophets witneſs.

This doctrine have all the bleſſed martyrs of Chriſt's church witneſſed with their blood to be true. To this truth have all the conſciences of all true believers ſubſcribed ever ſince the aſcenſion of Chriſt. This witneſs is not of man, but of God. What better quarrel then can ye have to give your lives for, than the truth itſelf? That man that giveth his life for the truth, taketh the readieſt way to life. He that hath the pope's curſe for the truth, is ſure of Chriſt's bleſſing. Well then, my brethren, what ſhall now hinder you from going forward as ye have begun? Nay, rather run with the runners, that ye may obtain the appointed glory. Hold on the right way, look not back; have the eye of your heart fixed upon God, and ſo run, that ye may get hold of it. Caſt away all your worldly pelf, and worldly reſpects, as the favour of friends, the fear of men, ſenſual affection, reſpect of perſons, honour, praiſe, ſhame, rebuke, wealth, poverty, riches, lands, poſſeſſions, carnal fathers and mothers, wife and children, with the love of your ownſelves; and in reſpect of that heavenly treaſure ye look for, let all theſe be denied, and utterly refuſed of you, ſo that in no condition they do abate your zeal, or quench your love towards God. In this caſe make no account of them, but rather repute them as vile in compariſon of everlaſting life. Away with them as thorns that choak the heavenly ſeed of the goſpel, where they be ſuffered to grow. They are burdens of the fleſh, which encumber the ſoul. Exchange them therefore for advantage. Doth not he gain, that findeth heavenly and immortal treaſure, for earthly and corruptible riches? Loſeth that man any thing, who is forſaken of his carnal father and mother, when he is received of God the Father, to be his child and heir in Chriſt? Heavenly for earthly, immortal for mortal, permanent for tranſitory, is infinite gain to a chriſtian conſcience.

Therefore, as I began, I exhort you in the Lord, not to be afraid. Shrink not, my brethren; miſtruſt not God; be of good comfort; rejoice in the Lord; hold faſt your faith, and continue to the end. Deny the world, and take up your croſs, and follow him who is your leader, and is gone before. If you ſuffer with him, you ſhall reign with him. What way can you glorify the name of your heavenly Father better, than by ſuffering death for his Son's ſake? What a ſpectacle ſhall it be to the world to behold ſo godly a fellowſhip as you ſervants of God, in ſo juſt a quarrel as the goſpel of Chriſt is, with ſo pure a conſcience, ſo ſtrong a faith, and ſo lively a hope, to offer yourſelves to ſuffer moſt cruel torments at the hands of God's enemies, and ſo to end your days in peace, to receive in the reſurrection of the righteous, life everlaſting?

Be ſtrong therefore in your battle: the Lord God is on your ſide, and his truth is your cauſe; and againſt you be none but the enemies of the croſs of Chriſt, as the ſerpent and his ſeed, the dragon with his tail, the marked men of the beaſt, the offſpring of the phariſees, the congregation malignant, the generation of vipers, murderers, as their father the devil hath been from the beginning. To conclude, ſuch are they as the Lord hath always abhorred, and in all ages reſiſted and overthrown. God, from whom nothing is hid, knoweth what they are. He that ſearcheth the hearts of men, hath found out them to be crafty, ſubtil, full of poiſon, proud, diſdainful, ſtiff-necked, devourers, raveners, and barkers againſt the truth, filthy and ſhameleſs: and therefore doth the Spirit of God, by the mouths of his holy prophets and apoſtles, call them by the names of foxes, ſerpents, cockatrices, lions, leopards, bulls, bears, wolves, dogs, ſwine, beaſts; teaching us thereby to underſtand, that their natural inclination is, to deceive, poiſon, and deſtroy (as much as in them lieth) the faithful and elect of God, but the Lord with his right arm ſhall defend his little flock againſt the whole rabblement of theſe worldlings, who have conſpired againſt him: he hath numbered all the hairs of his children's head, ſo that one of them ſhall not periſh without his fatherly will. He keepeth the ſparrows, much more will he preſerve them whom he hath purchaſed with the blood of the immaculate Lamb. He will keep them unto the hour appointed, wherein the name of God ſhall be glorified in his ſaints. In the mean time let them work their wills, let them envy, let them malign, let them blaſpheme, let them curſe, betray, whip, ſcourge, hang and burn: for by theſe means

God will try his elect as gold in the furnace; and by theſe fruits ſhall they alſo bring themſelves to be known what they be, for all their ſheep-ſkins. For as he that in ſuffering patiently for the goſpel of God, is thereby known to be of Chriſt; even ſo is the perſecutor of him known to be a member of Antichriſt. Beſides this, their extreme cruelty ſhall be a means the ſooner to provoke God to take pity upon his ſervants, and to deſtroy them that ſo tyrannically treat his people; as we may learn by the hiſtories, as well in the bondage of Iſrael under Pharaoh in Egypt, as alſo in the miſerable captivity of Judah in Babylon: where, when the people of God were in moſt extreme thraldom, then did the Lord ſtretch forth his mighty power to deliver his ſervants. Though God for a time ſuffer them to be exalted in their own pride, yet ſhall they not eſcape his vengeance. They are his rods; and when he hath worn them to the ſtumps, he will caſt them in the fire; this ſhall be their final reward. In the mean while our duty is, patiently to abide the will of God, which worketh all things for the beſt.

Thus dealeth he with us, partly for our trial, partly alſo for our ſins, which we moſt grievouſly have committed to the great ſlander of his goſpel, whereby the name of God was evil ſpoken of among his enemies; for which he now puniſheth us with his fatherly corrections in this world, that we ſhould not be damned with the world. By this means he ſeeketh his ſheep that were loſt, to bring them home to the fold again. By this way ſeeketh he to reform us, that we may be like unto him after the image of his Son Jeſus Chriſt, in all holineſs and righteouſneſs before him. Finally, this way uſeth his godly wiſdom, to make us thereby to know him, and ourſelves in him, that aforetime had in a manner forgotten him, praiſed be his name therefore. And as for thoſe Balaamites who now moleſt us, commit them to the hands of God, give him the vengeance, and he will reward them. Fall ye to prayer, and let theſe belly-gods prate. For he is in heaven, and ſleepeth not, that keepeth Iſrael. He is in heaven that made the ſeas calm, when the diſciples were afraid. Let us now faithfully call upon him, and he will hear us. Let us cry unto the Lord, for he is gracious and merciful. When we are in trouble he is with us, he will deliver us, and he will glorify us. If we come unto him, we ſhall find him turned unto us. If we repent of our wickedneſs done againſt him, then ſhall he take away the plague that he hath deviſed againſt us.

Let us therefore earneſtly repent, and bring forth the worthy fruits of repentance. Let us ſtudy to be his, then ſhall we not need to fear what theſe hypocrites do againſt us, who with their pretended holineſs deceive the hearts of the ſimple, and abuſe the authority of God in his princes, cauſing them (by their procurement) to teſtify their ambitious prelacy, and to erect up their idol again with the Romiſh maſs. God, in whoſe hands are the hearts of kings, open the heart of the queen's highneſs, to eſpy them out what they be, and ſo to weed them out, that they be no longer ſuffered to trouble the congregation of God, and to poiſon the realm with pope-holy doctrine. God Almighty for his Son Jeſus Chriſt's ſake deliver the queen's highneſs, and this her church and realm, from theſe proud prelates, who are as profitable in the church of Chriſt as a pole-cat in the midſt of a warren of conies.

To conclude, my brethren, I commit you to God, and to the power of his word; which is able to eſtabliſh you in all truth. His Spirit be with you, and work alway that ye may be mindful of your duties towards him, whoſe ye are both body and ſoul. Whom ſee that ye love, ſerve, dread, and obey, above all worldly powers, and for nothing under the heavens defile your conſcience before God. Diſſemble not with his word; God will not be mocked, nay, they that diſſemble with him deceive themſelves. Such ſhall the Lord deny, and caſt out at the laſt day: ſuch, I ſay, as bear two faces in one hood, ſuch as deny the known truth; ſuch as obſtinately rebel againſt him. All ſuch, with their partakers, ſhall the Lord deſtroy. God defend you from all ſuch, and make you perfect unto the end. Your ſorrow ſhall be turned into joy.

Another Letter ſent to his Wife.

THE God and Father eternal, who brought again from death our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, keep thee, dear wife, now and ever, Amen; thy parents, and all thy friends. I praiſe God for his mercy, I am in the ſame ſtate that ye left me in, rather better than worſe, looking daily for the living God, before whom I hunger full ſore to appear, and receive the glory, of which I truſt thou art willing to be partaker. I give God moſt hearty thanks therefore, deſiring thee of all loves, to ſtand in that faith which thou haſt received; and let no man take away the ſeed that Almighty God hath ſown in thee, but lay hands on everlaſting life which ſhall ever abide, when both the earth and all earthly friends ſhall periſh, deſiring them alſo to receive thankfully our trouble which is momentary and light, and as St. Paul ſaith, not worthy to be compared with thoſe things which God hath prepared for us; that we patiently carrying our croſs, may attain to the place where our Saviour Chriſt is gone before, to which I beſeech God of his mercy bring us ſpeedily. I have been much troubled about your deliverance, fearing much the perſuaſion of worldlings, and have found a friend, who will (I truſt) find a means for you, if you be not already provided, deſiring you in any caſe to abide ſuch order, as thoſe my friends ſhall appoint in God. And bear well in mind the words which I ſpake at our parting, that as God hath found us, and alſo elected us as worthy to ſuffer for him, we may endeavour ourſelves to follow uprightly in this our vocation, deſiring you to preſent my hearty commendations to all our friends, and eſpecially to your parents, keeping your ſentiments cloſe in any wiſe. Give moſt hearty thanks to my friend, who is come to Windſor only for our cauſe. Continue in prayer. Do well. Be faultleſs in all things. Beware of abominations. Keep yourſelf clean from ſin. Pray for me, as I do for you. I have ſent you a piece of gold for a token, and moſt entirely deſire you to ſend me word if ye lack any thing. The Lord Jeſus preſerve you and yours, Amen. From Newgate, April 15.

By your huſband here and in heaven,
Robert Smith.

The ſaid Robert Smith, the valiant and conſtant martyr of Chriſt, being thus repleniſhed, as ye have heard, with the fortitude of God's Spirit, was condemned at London by Bonner their biſhop, on the 12th day of July; and ſuffered at Uxbridge the 8th day of Auguſt; who as he had been a comfortable inſtrument of God to all them that were in priſon with him: ſo now alſo being at the ſtake, he did no leſs comfort the people, there ſtanding about him, willing them to think well of his cauſe, and not to doubt but that his body dying in that quarrel, ſhould riſe again to life. And, ſaid he, I doubt not but God will ſhew you ſome token thereof. At length he being well nigh half burnt, and all black with fire, cluſtered together as in a lump like a black coal, all men thinking him for dead, ſuddenly roſe upright before the people, lifting up the ſtumps of his arms, and clapping the ſame together, declaring a rejoicing heart unto them; and ſo bending down again, and hanging over the fire, ſlept in the Lord, and ended this mortal life.

A Sententious Letter written by Robert Smith, to Anne Smith his Wife.

SEEK firſt to love God, dear wife, with your whole heart, and then ſhall it be eaſy to love your neighbour.

Be

Be friendly to all creatures, and eſpecially to your own ſoul.

Be always an enemy to the devil and the world, but eſpecially to your own fleſh.

In hearing of good things, join the ears of your head and heart together.

Seek unity and quietneſs with all men, but eſpecially with your conſcience; for he will not eaſily be intreated.

Love all people, but eſpecially your enemies.

Hate the ſins that are paſt, but eſpecially thoſe to come.

Be as ready to further your enemy, as he is to hinder you, that ye may be the child of God.

Defile not that which Chriſt hath cleanſed, leſt his blood be laid to your charge.

Remember that God hath hedged in your tongue with the teeth and lips, that it might ſpeak under correction.

Be ready at all times to look to your brother's eye, but eſpecially in your own eye: For he that warneth others of what he himſelf is guilty, doth give his neighbour the clear wine, and keepeth the dregs to himſelf.

Beware of riches and worldly honour; for without underſtanding, prayer, and faſting, it is a ſnare, and alſo poverty, all which are like to conſuming fire, of which if a man take a little, it will warm him, but if he take too much, it will conſume him. For it is hard for a man to carry fire in his boſom, and not be burnt.

Shew mercy to the ſaints for Chriſt's ſake, and Chriſt ſhall reward you for the ſaints ſake. Among all other priſoners, viſit your own ſoul: for it is incloſed in a perilous priſon.

If you will love God, hate evil, and ye ſhall obtain the reward of well doing.

Thus fare you well, good Anne. Have me heartily commended to all that love the Lord unfeignedly. I beſeech you have me in your prayer while I am living, and I am aſſured the Lord will accept it. Bring up my children and yours in the fear of God, and then ſhall I not fail but receive you together in the everlaſting kingdom of God, which I go unto.

Your huſband,

Robert Smith.

If ye will meet with me again,
Forſake not Chriſt for any pain.

Another Letter ſent to his Wife.

THE grace of Almighty God be always with you, and comfort, ſtrengthen, and eſtabliſh you in all things, that what his bleſſed will is, ye may follow faithfully, to his honour, my comfort, and your own ſalvation, and the good example to our poſterity.

I have received your letter, and, I praiſe God, without any danger: nevertheleſs, if God's marvellous goodneſs had not brought it to my hands by Peter the keeper, there might have riſen a great trouble upon the ſame. For ye well know George is a wicked man, utterly without all fear of God; and if he had gotten it, the council would have ſurely ſeen it. But Peter, like an honeſt man, never opened it. Wherefore I deſire you from henceforth let your letters be delivered at Chancery-lane end, to my ſiſter Tankerfield, and ſhe may deliver them ſafe into my hand. We are very ſtraitly kept, I praiſe God of his mercy. Nevertheleſs Almighty God is always with us. I have ſent ye what ye wrote for. The two nutmegs that ſhould have gone by Nicholas to our friends, I ſend now, and deſire them to accept as a poor priſoner's gift, until God give more largely. Thomas Iveſon ſendeth you a penny, I pray you give him thanks for the ſame, and Dirick alſo. I have ſent you of that little that I have, two pieces of Spaniſh money. The Lord Jeſus have you in his cuſtody, and ſend you good ſpeed. In any caſe keep yourſelf cloſe, I doubt much of your walkings. Have my hearty commendations to your parents, and deſire them with you to have me in their prayers. Be fervent in prayer, pray, pray, pray, that God would of his mercy put up his ſword, and look on his people. Tell my brother, with commendations, that the next comer ſhall bring up the epiſtle and exhortation. I have written all this fortnight for my lady, yea, and almoſt done nothing elſe. I would have ſent him the articles of William Flower, and my talk with him, if I could have delivered it from the priſon. The Holy Ghoſt keep you. I wiſh ye could make a means for your money to ſend a cheeſe to Peter, for I find much kindneſs at his hand. Ye ſhall always hear of me at Tankerfield's houſe. All the congregation ſalute you. Fare you moſt heartily well.

I have not yet, tell my brother, ſpoke with the perſon. There is come a moſt ſtrict commandment, that no man muſt come to us, becauſe Tooly curſed the pope at the gallows. They thought it to be our counſel.

Yours, and ever yours,

Robert Smith.

Another Letter ſent to his Wife.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be with you, dear wife, now and ever, Amen, and prevent your ways through his Holy Spirit, that ye may in all your words and works pleaſe God, and eſchew evil, to his honour and your ſalvation; that they which ſee your converſation may in all things learn to do the like, even to the utter ſhame and confuſion of the wicked and ungodly, Amen.

I ſent you by Mr. Alexander a purſe with money. I have certain tokens for you, ſent by my fellow-priſoners to you, that is, from Mr. Haukes 12 d. from Mr. Simſon 12 d. from his wife 4 d. from Mr. Watts five new groats; from Mr. Ardeley 12 d. from Mr. Bradford 12 d. which men are all gone to death, except Mr. Bradford, who ſtill remaineth. There is alſo gone to death Nicholas Chamberlain, Thomas Oſmond, William Bamford. There is alſo condemned this Monday, Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveſon, John Launder, and William Vaſſay is reprieved. Pray to God to have mercy upon his people; and bid my brother, if he can conveniently, come down on Monday next; if he cannot well do it, let him abide at home. Commend me heartily to your parents. I have ſent each of them a token, a bowed groat, and deſire them for God's ſake to help us with their prayers. Have little Katherine in mind. Commend me unto all good friends. Continue in prayer. Beware of vanity. Let not God be diſhonoured in your converſation, but, like a good matron, keep your veſſel in holineſs. The peace of God remain with you for ever, Amen.

My brother Iveſon ſendeth to you a token, to your mother a token, and to Katherine a token, three-pence. John Launder ſendeth you a piece of Spaniſh money. Father Herault a piece of ſix-pence. William Andrew ſendeth you a race of ginger; and I ſend your mother one, and a nutmeg. I ſend Katherine comfits for a token, to eat. I have ſent you a key-clog for a token.

Your huſband, Robert Smith.

A Letter ſent to his Friend.

THE eternal God keep you in his fear. I have hearty commendations to you and your huſband, beſeeching Almighty God to preſerve you in well-doing, and in perfect knowledge of his Chriſt, that you may be found faultleſs in the day of the Lord. I have heard ſay, that my friend is given over to vanity; it breaketh my heart, not only to hear that he ſo doth, but alſo teacheth others, that it is no crime to go to all abomination, which now ſtand in the idols temples: nevertheleſs, dear friend, be ye not moved to follow ſinners, for they have no inheritance with God and Chriſt. But look, that by going into the idol temple, ye defile not the temple of God; for light hath no fellowſhip with darkneſs. But look what the Lord hath commanded, that do. For if not going to church were without perſecution, they would not learn you that leſſon. But all things that are ſweet to the fleſh, are allowed of the fleſhly. The Lord ſhall reward every man according to his works, and he that leadeth into captivity, ſhall go into captivity; and he that by the fleſhly man is led in the fleſh, ſhall of the fleſh reap corruption. The Lord Jeſus give thee his Holy Spirit, Amen.

I have ſent thee an epiſtle in metre, which is not to be laid up in thy coffer, but in thy heart.

Seek peace, and enſue it. Fear God, love God with all thy heart, with all thy ſoul, and with all thy ſtrength.

Thy friend, and all men's in Chriſt Jeſus,
Robert Smith.

Scribbled in much haſte from Newgate the twelfth of May.

Robert Smith to all the faithful Servants of Chriſt, exhorting them to be ſtrong under Perſecution.

COntent thyſelf with patience,
With Chriſt to bear the croſs of pain,
Which can and will thee recompence,
A thouſandfold with joys again.
Let nothing cauſe thy heart to quail,
Launch out thy boat, hale up thy ſail,
Put from the ſhore:
And be thou ſure thou ſhalt attain
Unto the port that ſhall remain
For evermore.

The Martyrdom of Stephen Harwood, and Thomas Fuſt.

ABOUT this time alſo died theſe two martyrs of God, Stephen Harwood at Stratford, and Thomas Fuſt at Ware. Who, as they were both burnt much about the ſame time (though not at the ſame place) with the aforeſaid Robert Smith and George Tankerfield, ſo were they likewiſe examined and openly condemned together with them; and as the proceedings againſt them all were alike, I thought it needleſs to repeat the ſame; only there is one thing more to be added concerning Thomas Fuſt, who at his laſt appearance on the twelfth of July, being moved by the biſhop to revoke his opinion, anſwered thus; No, my lord, for no truth cometh out of your mouth, but all lyes: ye condemn men, and will not hear the truth. Where can you find any anointing or greaſing in God's book? I ſpeak nothing but the truth, and I am certain that it is the truth that I ſpeak. This anſwer of Thomas Fuſt only I find noted by the regiſter; and how unfaithful theſe regiſters have been (I mean in omitting thoſe things that were moſt worthy of note, in order to render the martyrs ridiculous to the people) is very evident in many places of this hiſtory. But to be ſhort, when they had made their anſwers, both he and Stephen Harwood were, for their faithful perſeverance, condemned together by the biſhop in his accuſtomed pity, to be burnt as heretics, and ſo (as you have heard before) they finiſhed their martyrdom, the one at Stratford, and the other at Ware, in the month of Auguſt, and year aboveſaid.

The Martyrdom of William Hale, at Barnet.

OF the ſame company with thoſe ten before recorded, who were ſent to biſhop Bonner by Sir Nicholas Hare and other commiſſioners, in the company of George Tankerfield and Robert Smith, was alſo William Hale of Thorp in the county of Eſſex, who likewiſe being examined with the reſt, the twelfth of July, received with them alſo the ſentence of condemnation; giving this exhortation withal to the lookers-on: Ah, good people, ſaid he, beware of this idolater, and this Antichriſt (pointing to the biſhop of London), and ſo he was delivered to the ſheriffs to be burnt as an heretic, who ſent him to Barnet, where about the latter end of Auguſt he moſt conſtantly ſealed up his faith with the conſuming of his body by cruel fire, yielding his ſoul to the Lord Jeſus his only and moſt ſure Redeemer.

George King, Thomas Leyes, and John Wade, who fell ſick in Priſon, and dying were buried in the Fields.

YE heard before of ten ſundry perſons ſent out of Newgate by Mr. Hare and other commiſſioners, to be examined by Bonner biſhop of London: of whom ſix already have been executed in ſeveral places, as hath been ſhewed; whoſe names were Elizabeth Warne, George Tankerfield, Robert Smith, Stephen Harwood, Thomas Fuſt, and William Hale. The other three, namely, George King, Thomas Leyes, and John Wade, falling ſick in Lollard's Tower, were ſo weak that they were removed into ſundry houſes within the city of London, and there died, and were thrown out into the fields, and there buried in the night by ſome of the faithful brethren, when none in the day-time durſt do it, Propter metum Judæorum. The laſt that remained of this company aforeſaid was Joan Layſh, or Layſhford, the daughter-in-law of John Warne and Elizabeth Warne, martyrs: but becauſe ſhe was reprieved to another time, her ſtory and martyrdom we will defer till the month of January the next year following.

William Andrew.

THE like catholic charity was alſo ſhewed upon William Andrew of Horſley, in the county of Eſſex, carpenter, who was brought to Newgate the firſt day of April, 1555. by John Motham conſtable of Maulden in Eſſex. The firſt and principal promoter of him was the lord Rich, who ſent him firſt to priſon. Alſo Sir Richard Southwell, knight, was another great enemy to him, as appeareth by a letter written by him to Bonner, which here followeth.

A Letter from Sir Richard Southwell to Bonner Biſhop of London.

MAY it pleaſe your lordſhip to underſtand, that the lord Rich did about ſeven or eight weeks paſt, ſend up unto the council one William Andrew of Thorp, within the county of Eſſex, an arrogant heretic. Their pleaſure was to command me to commit him to Newgate, where he remaineth; and, as I am informed, hath infected a number in that priſon with his hereſy. Your lordſhip ſhall do very well if it pleaſe you to convent him before you, and to take order with him as his caſe doth require. I know the council meant to have writ herein unto your lordſhip, but by occaſion of other buſineſs, the thing hath been omitted. Wherefore knowing their good pleaſure, I did adviſe the keeper of Newgate to wait on you with theſe few lines. And ſo referring the reſt to your virtuous conſideration, I remain your your lordſhip's to command, this twelfth day of June, 1555.

Richard Southwell.

This William Andrew being twice examined before biſhop Bonner, there manfully ſtood in the defence of his religion. At length, by the ſevere uſage he met with in Newgate priſon, he there loſt his life, which otherwiſe would have been taken away by fire: and ſo after the popiſh manner he was caſt out into a field, and by night was privily buried by the hands of good men and faithful brethren.

The Martyrdom of Robert Samuel, Miniſter of Barford in Suffolk.

MR. Foſter, a juſtice, dwelling at Cabdock near Ipſwich in the county of Suffolk, being in continual hatred againſt the truth and the profeſſors of the ſame, did not only not ceaſe day nor night to ſtudy how to bring thoſe into thraldom and captivity, that were honeſt and piouſly inclined to religion; but alſo whatſoever they were that once came into his claws, could not eaſily eſcape without clog of conſcience or loſs of life, ſo greedy was he of blood. Among many whom he had troubled, there was one Samuel, in king Edward's days a very godly and faithful preacher of God's word, who for his valiant and conſtant behaviour in his ſermons, ſeemeth worthy of high admiration. He was miniſter at Barford in Suffolk, where he induſtriouſly and ſucceſsfully taught the flock which the Lord had committed to his charge, ſo long as the time would ſuffer him to do his duty.

At laſt being removed from the miniſtry, and put from his benefice (as many other good paſtors were), when he could not avoid the raging violence of the time, yet would he not give over his care that he had for his flock, but would teach them privily and by ſtealth, when he could not openly do ſo. At which time order was taken by the queen, to be publiſhed by the commiſſioners, that all prieſts which had been married in king Edward's days. ſhould put away their wives from them, and be compelled to return again to their chaſtity and ſingle life. This decree Mr. Samuel would not ſtand to, becauſe he knew it to be manifeſtly wicked and abominable; but determining with himſelf, that God's laws were not to be broke for man's traditions, ſtill kept his wife at Ipſwich, and gave his diligence in the mean time to the inſtructing of others which were about him, as occaſion ſerved. At laſt Mr. Foſter having intelligence hereof, being a great doer in thoſe parts, ſpared no time nor diligence, but quickly ſent his ſpies abroad, laying cloſe wait for Mr. Samuel, that if he came home to his wife at any time, they might apprehend him, and carry him to priſon.

In concluſion, when ſuch as ſhould betray him eſpied him at home with his wife, they brought word to the officer, who came to the houſe, and beſet it with a great company, and ſo took him in the night ſeaſon, becauſe they durſt not do it in the day-time for fear of trouble and tumult, although good Mr. Samuel did not withſtand them at all, but meekly yielded himſelf into their clutches of his own accord. When they had thus caught him, they put him into Ipſwich gaol, where he patiently ſpent his time among his pious brethren, ſo long as he was permitted to continue there. Howbeit not long after, being taken from thence, he was carried (through the malice of the wicked ſort) to Norwich, where Dr. Hopton biſhop of that dioceſe, or Dr. Dunnings his chancellor, exerciſed great cruelty againſt him, as indeed they were men in that time of perſecution, as had not their matches for cruel tormenting the bodies of the martyrs among all the reſt; and eſpecially through the procuring of Dunnings. For although the others were ſharp enough in their generation, yet could they be ſatisfied with impriſonment and death, and could go no farther. Neither did I ever yet hear of any beſides theſe, who ſo far exceeded all bounds of pity and compaſſion in tormenting their poor brethren, as this biſhop did; in ſuch ſort, that many of them he perverted, and brought quite from the truth, and ſome from their wits alſo.

The biſhop therefore, or elſe his chancellor, thinking that he might as eaſily prevail with Mr. Samuel, as he had done with the others before, kept him in a very cloſe priſon at his firſt coming, where he was chained bolt-upright to a great poſt, in ſuch ſort, that ſtanding only on tip-toe, he was fain to ſtay up the whole poiſe or weight of his body thereby. And to make amends for the cruelty or pain that he ſuffered, they added a far more grievous torment, keeping him without meat and drink, whereby he was unmercifully vexed through hunger and thirſt; ſaving that he had every day allowed two or three mouthfuls of bread, and three ſpoonfuls of water, to the end rather that he might be reſerved to farther torment than that they would preſerve his life. O worthy conſtancy of the martyr! O pitileſs hearts of papiſts, worthy to be complained of, and to be accuſed before God and nature! O the wonderful ſtrength of Chriſt and his members! Whoſe heart, though it had been made of adamant ſtone, would not have relented at the intolerable vexations, and extreme pains above nature? How often would he have drunk his own water; but his body was ſo dried up with his long emptineſs, that he was not able to make one drop.

At laſt when he was brought forth to be burnt, which was but a trifle in compariſon of thoſe pains that he had paſſed, there were ſeveral that heard him declare what ſtrange things had happened unto him during the time of his impriſonment: to wit, that after he had been famiſhed or pined with hunger two or three days together, he then fell into a ſleep, as it were one half in a ſlumber, at which time one clad all in white ſeemed to ſtand before him, which adminiſtered comfort unto him by theſe words: "Samuel, Samuel, be of good cheer, and take a good heart unto thee. For after this day ſhalt thou never be either hungry or thirſty." Which came to paſs accordingly, for ſoon after he was burned; and from that time till he ſuffered, he felt neither hunger nor thirſt. And this he declared, to the end, as he ſaid, that all men might behold the wonderful works of God. Many other matters concerning the great comfort he had of Chriſt in his afflictions he could utter, he ſaid, beſides this, but that ſhamefacedneſs and modeſty would not ſuffer him to utter it. And yet if it had pleaſed God, I wiſh he had been leſs modeſt in that behalf, that the love and care that Chriſt hath of his ſervants, might have the more appeared thereby unto us by ſuch preſent arguments, for the more plentiful comfort of the godly, though there be ſufficient teſtimonies of the ſame in the holy ſcriptures already.

No leſs memorable it is, and worthy alſo to be noted concerning the three ladders which he told to divers, he ſaw in his ſleep ſet up towards heaven; of which there was one ſomewhat longer than the reſt, but yet at length they became one, joining (as it were) all three together. This was a forewarning revealed unto him, declaring undoubtedly the martyrdom firſt of himſelf, and from the death of two honeſt women, who were brought forth and ſuffered in the ſame town not long after.

As this pious martyr was going to the ſtake, a certain maid came to him, who took him about the neck and kiſſed him, which being marked by them that were preſent, was ſought for the next day after to be had to priſon and burned, as the very party herſelf informed me: Howbeit, as God of his goodneſs would have it, ſhe eſcaped their fiery hands, keeping herſelf ſecret in the town a good while after. But as this maid, called Roſe Nottingham, was marvellouſly preſerved by the providence of God: ſo there were two other honeſt women that fell into the rage and fury of that time. The one was a brewer's wife, the other was a ſhoe-maker's wife, but both together now eſpouſed to a new huſband, Chriſt.

With theſe two this maid aforeſaid was very familiar and well acquainted, who on a time giving counſel to one of them, that ſhe ſhould convey herſelf away while ſhe had time and ſpace, ſeeing ſhe could not away with the queen's proceedings; had this anſwer at her hands again: I know well, ſaith ſhe, that it is lawful enough to fly away, which remedy you may uſe if you pleaſe. But my caſe ſtandeth otherwiſe. I am tied to an huſband, and have beſides young children at home; and then I know not how my huſband, being a carnal man, will take my departure from him; therefore I am minded, for the love of Chriſt and his truth, to ſtand to the extremity of the matter.

And ſo the next day after Mr. Samuel ſuffered, theſe two pious wives, the one named Anne Potten, the other Joan Trunchfield, wife of Michael Trunchfield ſhoemaker of Ipſwich, were apprehended, and both had to priſon together. Who, as they were both by ſex and nature ſomewhat tender, ſo were they at firſt leſs able to endure the ſtraitneſs of the priſon, and eſpecially the brewer's wife was caſt into marvellous great agonies and troubles of mind thereby. But Chriſt beholding the weak infirmity of his ſervant, did not fail to help her when ſhe was in this neceſſity. So at length they both ſuffered after Samuel, Feb. 19. 1556. as ſhall be by God's grace declared hereafter. And theſe, no doubt, were thoſe two ladders, which being joined with the third, Samuel ſaw ſtretched up into heaven. This bleſſed Samuel, the ſervant of Chriſt, ſuffered the 31ſt of Auguſt, Anno 1555.

The report goeth among ſome that were there preſent, and ſaw him burn, that his body in burning did ſhine as bright and white as new tried ſilver in the eyes of them that ſtood by, as I am informed by ſome that were there, and did behold the ſight.

Mr. Robert Samuel's Letter of Exhortation to the patient ſuffering of Affliction for the Cauſe of Chriſt.

A Man knoweth not his time, but as the fiſh is taken with the angle, and as the birds are caught with the ſnare, ſo are men caught and taken in the perilous time when it cometh upon them. The time cometh; the day draweth near, Ezekiel 7. Better it were to die (as the preacher ſaith), that to live and ſee the miſerable works which are done under the ſun; ſuch ſudden and ſtrange mutation, ſuch woful, heinous, and lamentable diviſions ſo faſt approach, and none, or very few thoroughly repent. Alas, for this ſinful nation, a people of great iniquity and ſeed of ungraciouſneſs, corrupting their ways. They have forſaken the Lord, they have provoked the Holy One of Iſrael to anger, and are gone backward. Who now liveth not in ſuch ſecurity and reſt as though all dangers were clean overpaſt? Who now blindeth and buffeteth not Chriſt, which ſeeth me, and ſeeth me not? Yea, who liveth not now in ſuch felicity, worldly pleaſures and joys, wholly ſeeking the world, providing, and craftily ſhifting for the earthly clod and carnal appetites, as though ſin were clean forgotten, overthrown, and devoured? Like hoggiſh Gergeſites, now are we more afraid and aſhamed of Chriſt our Meſſias, fearing the loſs of our filthy pigs, I mean our tranſitory goods, and diſquieting our ſinful and mortal bodies in this ſhort, uncertain, and miſerable life, than of a legion of devils, ſeducing and driving us from hearing, reading, and believing Chriſt, God's eternal Son, and his word, the power to ſave our ſouls, unto vanities, lyes, and fables, and to this bewitching world.

O perilous abundance of goods, too much ſaturity of meats, wealth and quietneſs, which deſtroyed with ſo many ſouls, thoſe goodly cities, Sodom and Gomorrah! Jeroboam, ſo long as he was but a poor man, nor yet advanced to his dignity, lived in the laws of God, and without reprehenſion: but brought once to wealth and a proſperous ſtate, he became a wicked and moſt ſhameful idolater. And what made the covetous young man ſo loth to follow Chriſt, when he was bidden to forſake but worldly wealth which he then enjoyed? Woe be unto theſe falſe illuſions of the world, baits of perdition, hooks of the devil, which have ſo ſhamefully deceived and ſeduced full many from the right path unto the Lord, into the high-ways of confuſion and perpetual perdition.

We might now worthily, dear chriſtians, lament and bewail our heavy eſtate, miſerable condition, and ſorrowful chance: yea, I ſay, we might well accuſe ourſelves, and with Job curſe theſe our turbulent, wicked, and bloody laſt days of this world, were it not that we both ſee and believe, and find in God's ſacred book, that God hath reſerved a remnant in all ages, I mean the faithful, as many as have been from the beginning of the world exerciſed, whetted, and poliſhed with divers afflictions, troubles and toſſings, caſt and daſhed againſt all perils and dangers, as the very droſs and out-caſts of the earth, and yet will in no wiſe halt between God and Baal; for God verily abhorreth two men in one: he cannot away with them that are between both, but caſteth them away as a filthy vomit. Chriſt will not part ſpoil with his mortal enemy the devil; he will have all, or loſe all: he will not permit the devil to have the ſervice of the body, and he to ſtand contented with the heart and mind: but "He will be glorified both in your bodies and in your ſpirits, which are his," as St. Paul ſaith, 1 Cor. 6. For he hath made, bought all, and dearly paid for all, as St. Peter ſaith, "With his own immaculate body hath he clean diſcharged your bodies from ſin, death, and hell, and with his moſt precious blood paid your ranſom and full price once for all and for ever."

Now what harm, I pray you, or what loſs ſuſtain you by this? Why are you, O vain men, more afraid of Jeſus your gentle Saviour, and his goſpel of ſalvation, than of a legion of cruel devils, going about with falſe deluſions utterly to deſtroy you both ſouls and bodies? Think you to be more ſure than under your captain, Chriſt? Do you promiſe yourſelves to be more quiet in Satan's ſervice, than in Chriſt's religion? Eſteem you more theſe tranſitory and pernicious pleaſures, than God and all his heavenly treaſures? O palpable darkneſs, horrible madneſs, and wilful blindneſs, without compariſon, too much to be ſuffered any longer! We ſee and will not ſee; we know and will not know; yea, we ſmart and will not feel, and that our conſcience well knoweth. O miſerable and brainleſs ſouls, which would for fooliſh pleaſures and ſlippery wealth loſe the royal kingdom and permanent joys of God, with the everlaſting glory which he hath prepared for them that truly love him, and renounce the world. The children of the world live in pleaſure and wealth; and the devil, who is their god, and prince of this world, keepeth their wealth which is proper unto them, and letteth them enjoy it. But let us, which be of Chriſt, ſeek and enquire for heavenly things, which by God's promiſe and mercy in Chriſt ſhall be peculiar unto us. Let, I ſay, the Cretians, Epicures, and ſuch other beaſtly Belials and carnal people, paſs for things that be pleaſant for the body, and do appertain to this tranſitory life: "Yet ſhall they once (as the kingly prophet ſaith) run about the city of God, to and fro, howling like dogs, deſiring one ſcrap of the joys of God's elect," but all too late, as the rich glutton did.

Let us therefore paſs for thoſe things that do pertain to the Spirit, and are celeſtial. "We muſt be here (ſaith St. Paul) not as inhabiters, and home-dwellers, but as ſtrangers;" not as ſtrangers only, but after the mind of Paul, as painful ſoldiers appointed by our governor, to fight againſt the governor of darkneſs of this world, againſt ſpiritual craftineſs in heavenly things. The time is come; we muſt to it; the judgment muſt begin firſt at at the houſe of God. Began they not firſt with the green and ſappy tree? And what followed then on the dry branches? Jeremy, ſpeaking in the perſon of God, ſaith; "In the city wherein my name is invocated, will I begin to puniſh:" but as for you (meaning the wicked), ſhall you be as innocents, and not once touched? Nay, the dregs of God's wrath, the bottom of all ſorrows, are reſerved unto them in the end: but God's houſhold ſhall drink the flour of the cup of his mercy. And therefore let us ſay with Ezechias; "Play the men and ſhrink not: let us comfort ourſelves, for the Lord is with us our helper, and fighteth for us. The Lord is (ſaith he) with you, when you be with him; and when you ſeek him, he will be found of you: and again, when you forſake him, he will forſake you."

Wherefore we ought not to be diſmayed, or diſcourage ourſelves, but rather to be of good comfort; not to be ſad, but merry: not ſorrowful, but joyful, in that God of his goodneſs will vouchſafe to take us as his beloved children, to ſubdue our ſinful luſts, our wretched fleſh and blood unto his glory, the promoting of his holy word, and edifying of his church. What if the earthly houſe of this our habitation (St. Paul meaning the body) be deſtroyed? We know aſſuredly we ſhall have a building not made with hands, but everlaſting in heaven, with ſuch joys as faith taketh not, hope toucheth not, and charity apprehendeth not. They paſs all deſires and wiſhes. Gotten they may be by Chriſt, eſteemed they cannot be. Wherefore the more affliction and perſecution the word of God bringeth, the more felicity and greater joy abideth in heaven. But the worldly peace, idle eaſe, wealthy pleaſure, and this preſent and pleaſant tranſitory life and felicity, which the ungodly fooliſhly imagine to procure unto themſelves by perſecuting and thruſting away the goſpel, ſhall turn unto their own trouble, and at laſt unto horrible deſtructions and mutations of realms and countries; and after this life, if they repent not, unto their perpetual infelicity, perdition, and damnation. For they had rather with Nabal, and his temporal pleaſures, deſcend to the devil, than with poor Chriſt, and his bodily troubles, aſcend unto the kingdom of God his Father. "But an unwiſe man (ſaith the Pſalmiſt) comprehendeth them not, neither doth the fooliſh underſtand them;" that is, theſe bloody perſecutors grow up and flouriſh like the flower and graſs in the field. But unto this end do they ſo flouriſh, that they might be cut down and caſt into the fire for ever. For as Job ſaith, "Their joy laſteth but the twinkling of an eye," and death ſhall lie gnawing upon them as doth the flock upon the paſture; yea, the cruel worm, late repentance (as St. Mark ſaith), ſhall lie gnawing, tormenting, and accuſing their wretched conſcience for evermore.

Let us therefore (good chriſtians) be conſtant in obeying God rather than men. For although they ſlay our ſinful bodies (yea, rather our deadly enemies) for God's verity; yet they cannot do it, but by God's ſufferance and good will, to his praiſe and honour, and to our eternal joy and felicity. For our blood ſhed for the goſpel ſhall preach it with more fruit, and greater furtherance, than did our mouths, lives, and writings, as did the blood of Abel, Stephen, with many others. What though they laugh Chriſt and his word to ſcorn, who ſit in the chair of perverſe peſtilent ſcorners? To whom, as to the wiſe gentiles of the world, the goſpel of Chriſt is but fooliſhneſs, as it was to the Jews a ſlander and a ſtumbling ſtone, whereat they now being fallen, have provoked the wrath and vengeance of God upon them.

Theſe are the days of vengeance, ſaith Luke, that all things written may be fulfilled. And ſurely it ſhall be no leſs than a huge ſtorm of evils that ſhall come upon us, becauſe that a long and obſtinate maliciouſneſs of us hath gone before, crying in the ears of the Lord God of hoſts, who ſo many times and ſo many ways have been provoked with the unſpeakable riches of his goodneſs, his patience, and long-ſuffering, to amendment, and have nevertheleſs contemned the ſame, and proceeded forward to worſe and worſe, provoking and ſtirring the preſence of God's Majeſty to anger.

Now therefore ſaith God by the mouth of his prophet, "I will come unto thee, and I will ſend my wrath upon thee:" upon thee, I ſay, O England, and puniſh thee according to thy ways, and reward thee after thine abominations. Thou haſt kindled the fire of God's wrath, and haſt ſtirred up the coals. For thou waſt once enlightened, and hadſt taſted of the heavenly gift, and waſt become partaker of the Holy Ghoſt, and hadſt taſted of the good word of God: Yea, it is yet in thy mouth, ſaith the prophet. Alas, O England, thou kneweſt thy Lord and Maſter's will, but didſt not do it; Thou muſt therefore, ſaith he, ſuffer many ſtripes, and many ſharp ſtrokes, and walk in the glittering and hot flame of thine own fire, and on the coals that thou haſt kindled. This cometh to thee from my hand, ſaith the Lord, namely, that thou ſhalt ſleep in ſorrow, yea, even ſo thou ſhalt. The plain truth telleth the tale, the immutable juſtice of the everliving God, and the ordinary courſe of his plagues from the beginning confirmeth the ſame. The joy of our heart, ſaith Jeremy, is gone, our glory is fallen away, our merry ſinging is turned into mourning, the garland of our head is fallen: Alas and weal away, that ever we ſinned ſo ſore!

Let all the wicked enemies of Chriſt, and all the unbelievers, look to be tormented and vexed with all helliſh furies, and clean without hope of God's accounting day, who know not God in Chriſt to be their very righteouſneſs, their life, their only ſalvation and alone Saviour, nor believe in him. They muſt, as St. John ſaith, needs abide and periſh with their ſins in death and in eternal damnation. But we be the children of ſaints, as the elder Toby did anſwer, and look for another life, which God ſhall give to all them who change not their faith, and ſhrink not from him. Rejoice therefore, ye chriſtian afflicted brethren, for they cannot take our ſouls and bodies out of the hands of the Almighty, which be kept as in the boſom of our moſt ſweet and loving Father: and if we abide faſt in Chriſt, and turn not away like weathercocks, ſurely we ſhall live for ever. Chriſt affirmeth the ſame, ſaying, "My ſheep hear my voice, I know them, they hearken unto me, and to no ſtrangers, and I give them everlaſting life; for they ſhall not be loſt, and no man ſhall pluck them out of my hands:" no nor yet this flattering world with all his vain pleaſures, nor any tyrant with his great threats and ſtout brags can once move them out of the way of eternal life. What conſolation and comfort can we have more pleaſant and effectual than this? God is on our ſide and fighteth for us; he ſuffereth, he ſmarteth, and is afflicted with us. As the world can do nothing againſt his might, neither in taking away or diminiſhing from his glory, nor putting him from his celeſtial throne; ſo neither can it hurt any one of his children without his good will. For we are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones, and as dear to him as the apple of his eye.

Let us therefore with an earneſt faith lay faſt hold on the promiſes in the goſpel, and let us not be ſeparated from the ſame by any temptation, tribulation, or perſecution. Let us conſider the verity of God to be invincible, inviolable, and immutable, promiſing and giving us his faithful ſoldiers life eternal. It is he only that hath deſerved it for us: it is his only benefit, and of his only mere mercy, and unto him only muſt we render thanks. Let not therefore the vain fantaſies and dreams of men, and fooliſh gaudy toys of the world, nor the crafty deluſions of the devil, drive and ſeparate us from our hope of the crown of righteouſneſs that is laid up in ſtore for us againſt the laſt day. O that happy and joyful day, I mean to the faithful, when Chriſt by his covenant ſhall grant and give unto them that overcome and keep his words to the end, that they may aſcend and ſit in ſeats with him, as he aſcended and ſitteth on the throne with his Father. The ſame body and ſoul that is now with Chriſt afflicted, ſhall then with Chriſt be glorified: now in the butchers' hands, as ſheep appointed to die; then ſitting at God's table with Chriſt in his kingdom, as God's honourable and dear children; where we ſhall have heavenly riches for earthly poverty, ſaturity of the pleaſant preſence of the glory of God, for hunger and thirſt; celeſtial joys in the company of angels, for ſorrows, troubles, and cold irons; and life eternal, for bodily death. O happy ſouls! O precious death and evermore bleſſed, right dear in the eyes of God; to you the ſpring of the Lord ſhall ever be flouriſhing. Then (as ſaith Iſaiah) "the redeemed ſhall return and come again into Sion, praiſing the Lord, and eternal mercies ſhall be over their heads: they ſhall obtain mirth and ſolace; ſorrow and woe ſhall be utterly vanquiſhed." Yea, I am he, ſaith the Lord, that in all things giveth you everlaſting conſolation. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, be glory and praiſe for ever, Amen.

Robert Samuel.

Another Letter written to the Chriſtian Congregation by R. Samuel, where he declareth the Confeſſion of his Faith.

"The belief of the heart juſtifieth, and the knowledge with the mouth maketh a man ſafe," Rom. 10.

"Fear not the curſe of men, be not afraid of their blaſphemies and revilings; for worms and moths ſhall eat them up like cloth and wool, but my righteouſneſs ſhall endure for ever, and my ſaving health from generation to generation," Iſaiah 51.

CONſidering with myſelf theſe perilous times, periſhing days, and the unconſtant and miſerable ſtate of man, the decay of our faith, the ſiniſter report and falſe ſlander of God's moſt holy word, theſe urgent cauſes in conſcience do conſtrain me to confeſs and acknowledge my faith and meaning in Chriſt's holy religion, as St. Peter teacheth me, ſaying, "Be ready always to give an anſwer to every man that aſketh you a reaſon of the hope that is in you, and that with meekneſs and fear, having a good conſcience, that when they backbite you as evildoers, they may be aſhamed, foraſmuch as they have falſly accuſed your good converſation in Chriſt."

As touching my doctrine, for that little talent that God hath given me, God I take to record, mine own conſcience and mine auditory knoweth, that I neither in doctrine nor manners willingly taught any other thing than I received of the holy patriarchs, prophets, Chriſt and his apoſtles. For it were not only ſin, but alſo the very part of a curſed miſcreant, to deny, belye, or betray the innocency of that heavenly doctrine, or to be aſhamed to confeſs and ſtand to the defence of the ſame; ſeeing that Chriſt planted it with his moſt precious blood, and all good men have more eſteemed the true and infallible word of God, than all this tranſitory world, or their own mortal lives. And I believe this doctrine of the patriarchs, prophets, Chriſt and his apoſtles, to be ſufficient and abſolutely perfect to inſtruct and teach me, and all the holy church, of our duty towards God, the magiſtrates, and our neighbours.

Firſt and principally I do aſſuredly believe, without any doubting, that there is one Deity or Divine Eſſence, and Infinite Subſtance; which is both called, and is indeed God Everlaſting, unbodily, unpartible, unmeaſurable in power, wiſdom, and goodneſs, the maker and preſerver of all things, as well viſible as inviſible; and yet there be three diſtinct perſons, all of one Godhead, or Divine Being, and all of one power, co-equal, conſubſtantial, co-eternal, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt.

I believe in GOD the Father Almighty, &c. As touching God the Father of heaven, I believe as much as holy ſcripture teacheth me to believe. The Father is the firſt Perſon in the Trinity, firſt cauſe of our ſalvation, who hath bleſſed us with all manner of bleſſings in heavenly things by Chriſt, who hath choſen us before the foundations of the world were laid, that we ſhould be holy and without blame before him; who hath predeſtinated and ordained us to be his children of adoption, through Chriſt Jeſus; in him, as it is ſaid, we live, we move, and have our being; he nouriſheth, feedeth, and giveth meat to every creature.

And in Jeſus Chriſt his only Son our Lord. I believe that the Word, that is, the Son of God, the ſecond Perſon in the Trinity, did take man's nature in the womb of the bleſſed virgin Mary: So that there be in him two natures, a Divine Nature and an human nature, in the unity of one Perſon inſeparable, conjoined and knit in one Chriſt, truly God, and truly man, the expreſs and perfect image of the inviſible God, wherein the will of God the Father apparently ſhineth, and wherein man, as it were in a glaſs, may behold what he ought to do, that he may pleaſe God the Father.

Born of the virgin Mary; truly ſuffering his paſſion, crucified, dead, and buried, to the intent to bring us again into favour with God the Father Almighty, and to be a ſacrifice, and oblation, not only for original ſin, but alſo for the actual ſins of the whole generation of mankind. For all the works, merits, deſervings, doings, and obedience of man towards God, although they be done by the Spirit of God, in the grace of God, yet being thus done, be of no validity, worthineſs, nor merit before God, except God for his mercy and grace account them worthy for the worthineſs and merits of Jeſus Chriſt.

The ſame Chriſt went down to the hells, and truly roſe again the third day, and aſcended into the heavens, that he might there ſtill reign and have dominion over all creatures; and from thence ſhall come, &c.

I believe in the Holy Ghoſt, co-equal with God the Father and the Son, and proceeding from them both; by whoſe virtue, ſtrength, and operation, the true catholic church, which is the community and ſociety of ſaints, is guided in all truth and verity, and kept from all errors and falſe doctrine, the devil, and all power of ſin. Which church is ſanctified and hallowed with the precious blood and Spirit of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; which hath alſo her ſign and mark, that ſhe heareth and followeth the voice of her only and true paſtor Chriſt, and no ſtrangers. This church alſo is the houſe of God, the congregation of the living God, the pillar of truth, the lively body of Chriſt, a church both in name and in deed.

I believe the remiſſion of ſins, by the only means and merits of Chriſt's death and paſſion; who is made unto us of God, that only ſacrifice and oblation offered once for all and for ever, for all them that be ſanctified.

I believe the reſurrection of the body, whereby in the laſt day all men ſhall riſe again from death, the ſouls joined again to the bodies, the good to everlaſting life, the wicked to everlaſting pain and puniſhment. And nothing may more certainly eſtabliſh and confirm our faith, that we ſhall riſe again immortal both in body and ſoul, than the reſurrection of Chriſt our Saviour, and firſt fruits of the dead. Now that Chriſt our head is riſen, we being his body and members muſt follow our head. Death, hell, and ſin cannot ſeparate or pluck us from him. For as the Son cannot be divided nor ſeparated from the Father, nor the Holy Ghoſt from them both; no more may we, being the faithful members of Chriſt, be ſeparated from Chriſt. And for a confirmation of our reſurrection, Chriſt would be ſeen after his reſurrection in his moſt glorious body, his wounds being handled and felt, ſpeaking and teaching, eating and drinking, &c. We look (ſaith St. Paul) for Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour, who ſhall change our vile bodies, and conform them to his glorious body, by the ſame power and virtue whereby he able to ſubdue all things: even like as the grain of wheat ſown in the ground is firſt putrified and brought, as it were, to nothing, yet after that it ſpringeth up afreſh with a more goodly colour, form, and beauty than it had before. The body is ſown in corruption, and riſeth in incorruption; it is ſown in diſhonour, and riſeth in glory.

Thus I verily know, and aſſuredly believe the reſurrection of our bodies, and to have life eternal by Chriſt, and for Chriſt's ſake. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, ſaith Chriſt, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that ſent me, hath everlaſting life, and ſhall not come into damnation, but is eſcaped from death to life. It is Chriſt that died once for our ſins, and is riſen again, never more to die: It is he that ſwallowed up death, and hath caſt it under his feet for ever. What now can death do unto us? Verily nothing elſe, but for a little time ſeparate our precious ſouls from our wretched bodies, that divine ſubſtance from a maſs of ſin, that eternal life from a body of death, and ſo ſend our ſouls out of this miſerable, wretched and ſorrowful life, cumbered with all calamities, unto that moſt bleſſed felicity and joys eternal.

As concerning the holy and reverend ſacraments of Chriſt's church, which are two in number, the ſacrament of baptiſm, and the ſupper of the Lord: I believe them to be, as St. Paul calleth them, confirmations or ſeals of God's promiſes, which have added to them a promiſe of grace; and therefore they are called viſible ſigns of inviſible grace.

The ſacrament of baptiſm is a mark of Chriſt's church, a ſeal and confirmation of our acceptation into the grace and favour of God for Chriſt's ſake. For his innocency, his righteouſneſs, his holineſs, his juſtice, is ours, given us of God; and our ſins and unrighteouſneſs, by his obedience and abaſing of himſelf to the death of the croſs, are his, whereof baptiſm is the ſign, ſeal and confirmation.

Baptiſm is alſo a ſign of repentance, to teſtify that we are born to the waves of perils, and changes of life, to the intent that we ſhould die continually, as long as we live, from ſin, and riſe again like new men unto righteouſneſs, Rom. 6.

The other ſacrament, which is the ſupper of our Saviour Chriſt, whereby the church of Chriſt is known, I believe to be a remembrance of Chriſt's death and paſſion, a ſeal and confirmation of his moſt precious body given unto death, even to the vile death of the croſs, wherewith we are redeemed and delivered from ſin, death, hell and damnation. It is a viſible word, becauſe it worketh the ſame thing in the eyes, which the word worketh in the ears. For like as the word is a means to the ears, whereby the Holy Ghoſt moveth the heart to believe, Rom. 10. ſo this ſacrament is a means to the eyes, whereby the Holy Ghoſt moveth the heart to believe: it preacheth peace between God and man; it exhorteth to mutual love and all godly life, and teacheth to contemn the world for the life to come, when as Chriſt ſhall appear, which now is in heaven, and no-where elſe as concerning his human body.

Yet do I believe aſſuredly, that his very body is preſent in his moſt holy ſupper at the contemplation of our ſpiritual eyes, and ſo verily eaten with the mouth of our faith. For as ſoon as I hear theſe moſt comfortable and heavenly words ſpoke and pronounced by the mouth of the miniſter: "This is my body which is given for you:" When I hear (I ſay) this heavenly harmony of God's infallible promiſes and truth; I look not upon, neither do I behold bread and wine; for I take and believe the words ſimply and plainly, even as Chriſt ſpake them. For hearing theſe words, my ſenſes be wrapt and utterly excluded; for faith wholly taketh place, and not fleſh, nor the carnal imaginations of our groſs, fleſhly, and unreverent eating after the manner of our bodily food, which profiteth nothing at all, as Chriſt witneſſeth, John 6. but with a ſorrowful and wounded conſcience, an hungry and thirſty ſoul, a pure and faithful mind, do fully embrace, behold, and feed, and look upon that moſt glorious body of Chriſt in heaven, at the right hand of God the Father, very God and very man, which was crucified and ſlain, and his blood ſhed for our ſins, there now making interceſſion, offering and giving his holy body for me, for my body, for my ranſom, for my full price and ſatisfaction, who is my Chriſt, and all that ever he hath; and by this ſpiritual and faithful eating of this lively and heavenly bread, I feel the moſt ſweet ſap and taſte of the fruits, benefits, and unſpeakable joys of Chriſt's death and paſſion, fully digeſted into the bowels of my ſoul. For my mind is quieted from all worldly adverſities, turmoilings, and troubles, my conſcience is pacified from ſin, death, hell and damnation; my ſoul is full, and hath even enough, and will no more; for all things are but loſs, vile dung, droſs, and vain vanity, for the excellent knowledge ſake of Chriſt Jeſus my Lord and Saviour.

Thus now is Chriſt's fleſh my very meat indeed, and his blood my very drink indeed, and I am become fleſh of his fleſh, and bone of his bones. Now I live, yet not I, but Chriſt liveth in me: yea, I dwell in him, and he in me; for through faith in Chriſt, and for Chriſt's ſake we are one, that is, of one conſent, mind and fellowſhip with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, John 17. Thus am I aſſured and fully perſuaded, and on this rock have I built, by God's grace, my dwelling and reſting place for body and ſoul, life and death. And thus I commit my cauſe unto Chriſt the righteous and juſt judge, who will another day judge theſe debates and controverſies; whom I humbly beſeech to caſt his tender and merciful eyes upon the afflicted and ruinous churches, and ſhortly to reduce them into a godly and perpetual concord, Amen.

Thus do I believe, and this is my faith and my underſtanding in Chriſt my Saviour, and his true and holy religion. And this whoſoever is aſhamed to do among this adulterous and ſinful generation, of him ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.

Robert Samuel.

William Allen, Martyr.

NOW after the ſuffering of Robert Samuel, about the beginning of September, William Allen was burnt in Walſingham, a labouring man, ſome time ſervant to John Houghton of Somerton. He being brought before the biſhop, and aſked the cauſe why he was impriſoned, anſwered, That he was put in priſon becauſe he would not follow the croſs, ſaying, that he would never go on proceſſion.

Then being willed by the biſhop to return again to the catholic church; he anſwered, That he would turn to the catholic church, but not to the Romiſh church: And ſaid, That if he ſaw the king and queen, and all others follow the croſs, or kneel down to the croſs, he would not. For which, ſentence of condemnation was given againſt him the 12th of Auguſt, to be burnt at Walſingham about the beginning of September, who declared ſuch conſtancy at his martyrdom, and had ſuch credit with the juſtices, by reaſon of his upright and well-tried converſation among them, that he was ſuffered to go untied to his ſuffering, and there being faſtened with a chain, ſtood quietly without ſhrinking until he died.

The Martyrdom of Roger Coo, of Melford in Suffolk, firſt examined by the Biſhop of Norwich, and by him condemned, Auguſt 12. 1555.

ROger Coo being brought before the biſhop, was firſt aſked by him why he was impriſoned.

Coo. At the juſtices commandment.

Biſhop. There was ſome cauſe why.

Coo.

Coo. Here is my accuſer, let him declare.

And his accuſer ſaid, that he would not receive the ſacrament.

Then the biſhop ſaid, that he thought he had tranſgreſſed a law.

But Coo anſwered, that there was no law to tranſgreſs.

The biſhop then aſked, What he ſaid to the law that then was?

Coo anſwered, That he had been in priſon a long time, and knew it not.

No, ſaid his accuſer, nor will not. My lord, aſk him when he received the ſacrament.

When Coo heard him ſay ſo, he ſaid, I pray you, my lord, let him ſit down and examine me himſelf.

But the biſhop would not hear that, but ſaid, Coo, why will ye not receive?

He anſwered him, That the biſhop of Rome had changed God's ordinances, and given the people bread and wine inſtead of the goſpel, and the belief of the ſame.

Biſhop. How prove you that?

Coo. Our Saviour ſaid, "My fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him;" and the bread and wine doth not ſo.

Biſhop. Well, Coo, thou doſt ſlander our holy fathers. Did not Chriſt take bread, give thanks, and break it, and ſaid, "This is my body?"

Yes, ſaid he; and ſo he went further with the text, ſaying, "Which ſhall be given for you: Do this in remembrance of me."

Biſhop. You have ſaid the truth.

Then Coo replied further, and ſaid, Chriſt commanded to do this in remembrance of him, and not to ſay this in remembrance of him, neither did the Holy Ghoſt ſo lead the apoſtles, but taught them to give thanks, and to break bread from houſe to houſe, and not to ſay as the biſhop ſaid.

Biſhop. How prove you that?

Coo. It is written in the ſecond of the Acts.

Then the biſhop's chaplain ſaid it was true.

The biſhop aſked him if he could ſay his creed.

He anſwered yea, and ſo ſaid part of the creed; and then after he ſaid he believed more; for he believed the Ten Commandments, that it was meet for all ſuch as look to be ſaved, to be obedient unto them.

Biſhop. Is not the holy church to be believed alſo?

Coo. Yes, if it be built upon the word of God.

The biſhop ſaid to Coo, that he had charge of his ſoul.

Coo. Have ye ſo, my lord? Then if ye go to the devil for your ſins; where ſhall I become?

Biſhop. Do you not believe as your father did? Was not he an honeſt man?

Coo. It is written, that after Chriſt hath ſuffered, "There ſhall come a people with the prince that ſhall deſtroy both city and ſanctuary." I pray you ſhew me, whether this deſtruction was in my father's time, or now?

The biſhop not anſwering his queſtion, aſked him whether he would not obey the king's laws?

Coo. As far as they agree with the word of God, I will obey them.

Biſhop. Whether they agree with the word of God or not, we be bound to obey them, if the king were an infidel.

Coo. If Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego had ſo done, Nebuchadnezzar had not confeſſed the Living God.

Biſhop. Theſe two and twenty years we have been governed by ſuch kings.

Coo. My lord, why were ye then dumb, and did not ſpeak or bark?

Biſhop. I durſt not, for fear of death. And thus they ended.

But after this done, it was reported that I railed; wherefore I recollected, and wrote down my railing (as they called it) that light ſhould not be taken for darkneſs, nor ſin for holineſs, and the devil for God, who ought to be feared and honoured both now and ever, Amen.

This Roger Coo, an aged father, after his ſundry troubles and conflicts with his adverſaries, at length was committed to the fire at Yexford, in the county of Suffolk, where he moſt bleſſedly ended his aged years, in the month of September, 1555.

Thomas Cob, of Havervill, Butcher, Martyr.

THomas Cob, of Haverhill, butcher, was condemned on the 12th day of Auguſt, and executed in the month of September. Being brought and examined by Michael Dunnings, the bloody chancellor of Norwich; firſt, whether he believed that Chriſt is really and ſubſtantially in the ſacrament of the altar; anſwered, That the body of Chriſt, born of the virgin, was in heaven, and otherwiſe (he ſaid) he would not anſwer, becauſe he had read it in the ſcripture, that Chriſt did aſcend, and did never deſcend ſince; and therefore ſaid, that he had not learned in the ſcripture, that Chriſt ſhould be in the ſacrament.

Furthermore, being demanded whether he would obey the laws of the realm of England, made for the unity of faith, or no: he anſwered, That his body ſhould be at the king and queen's commandment ſo far as the law of God would ſuffer, &c. In fine, he being condemned, was burnt in the town of Thetford, in September, 1555.

The Martyrdom of George Catmer, Robert Streater, Anthony Burward, George Brodbridge, and James Tutty.

NOW to return from Norfolk and Suffolk into the dioceſe of Canterbury, where we ſhall treat of five worthy martyrs, whoſe blood in the ſame year and month of September was ſpilt for the true teſtimony of Chriſt and his goſpel. The names of whom are as follow.

George Catmer of Hith, Robert Streater of Hith, Anthony Burward of Calete, George Brodbridge of Bromfield, James Tutty of Brenchley.

Who upon the third day of Auguſt were brought before Dr. Thornton the aforeſaid biſhop of Dover, and his accomplices, and there were both jointly and ſeverally examined upon certain articles, touching the ſacrament of the altar, auricular confeſſion, and other ſuch like.

To which the ſaid Catmer (being firſt examined) made anſwer on this wiſe; Chriſt, ſaid he, ſitteth in heaven on the right hand of God the Father; and therefore I do not believe him to be in the ſacrament of the altar; but he is in the worthy receiver ſpiritually: and the ſacrament, as you uſe it, is an abominable idol.

Next unto him Robert Streater was called forth, who being alſo aſked, Whether he did believe the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, ſaid, that he did not ſo believe; for you do maintain hereſy and idolatry (quoth he) in that ye teach to worſhip a falſe god in the ſacrament, incloſed in a box. It is you that are the malignant church; for in your church there are twenty things uſed againſt the law of God.

The like objection was likewiſe made againſt Anthony Burward, who alſo ſaid that their ſacrament was made an idol.

After him, it was demanded of George Brodbridge what he ſaid to thoſe articles. Who anſwered, that he would not be confeſſed of a prieſt, becauſe he could not forgive give his own ſins. And further ſaid, that in the ſacrament of the altar there is not the real body of our Saviour Chriſt, but bread given in the remembrance of him. Moreover, as for your holy bread, your holy water, and your maſs, I do (quoth he) utterly defy them.

And laſt of all, James Tutty made and confirmed the foregoing anſwers.

And therefore they were all five condemned as heretics, and accordingly were all burnt at Canterbury in one fire, about the ſixth day of September then next following.

Although the rage and vehemency of this terrible perſecution in queen Mary's days did chiefly light in London, Eſſex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Kent, as hath been partly already declared; yet notwithſtanding, few parts of the realm were free from this fatal ſtorm, but in almoſt all places ſome were put to death for the ſame righteous cauſe. And now to begin with the dioceſe of Litchfield and Coventry, where we ſhall juſt mention two perſons, namely, Thomas Hayward and John Goreway, who were both condemned as heretics, and were burnt at Litchfield about the middle of September.

The Hiſtory of Robert Glover, Gentleman, and Mr. John Glover his Brother, in the Dioceſe of Litchfield.

Robert Glover, gentleman, was likewiſe apprehended, and put to death in the month of September, in the dioceſe of Litchfield and Coventry. Of whoſe apprehenſion and troubles I cannot well treat, without mentioning ſome things relative to John Glover his brother, becauſe the commiſſion was chiefly ſent down for John, and not for Robert (although it pleaſed God that John eſcaped, and Robert in his ſtead was apprehended), therefore I thought it neceſſary to comprehend them both in one ſtory. In deſcribing ſome part of their virtuous inſtitution and order of life, I ſhall firſt begin with John the eldeſt brother: who being a gentleman, and heir to his father in the town of Mancetor, was endowed with fair poſſeſſions and worldly goods, but much more plentifully enriched with God's heavenly grace, and inward virtues: which grace ſo wrought in him, that he, with his other brethren Robert and William, not only received and embraced the happy light of Chriſt's holy goſpel, but alſo moſt zealouſly profeſſed, and no leſs diligently in their lives and converſation followed the ſame.

John Glover was a man of very tender conſcience, and ſeemed to have a deeper taſte and contemplation of heavenly things, and more mortified from worldly cares than the others were. His ſpiritual conflicts were very extraordinary; and becauſe the conſideration of them is both worthy of memory, and the example may work experience to the comfort of the godly, it may not be amiſs to rehearſe ſome part of them. It pleaſed God ſo to lay his heavy hand of inward afflictions and grievous paſſions upon him, that though he ſuffered not the pains of the outward fire, as his brother and other martyrs did; yet if we conſider what he ſuffered inwardly, and that for a long time, he may well be counted a martyr with his brother Robert, being no leſs deſirous with him of the ſame martyrdom; yea, and in compariſon may ſeem to be chronicled for a double martyr.

For as the ſaid Robert was ſpeedily diſpatched with the ſharp and extreme torments of the fire in a ſhort time; ſo this no leſs bleſſed ſaint of God, what, and how much more grievous pangs, what ſorrowful torments, what boiling heats of the fire of hell he inwardly felt, no tongue is able to expreſs. Being young, I remember I was once or twice with him, who partly by his talk I perceived, and partly by mine own eyes ſaw, to be ſo worn and conſumed by the ſpace of five years, that he could hardly digeſt any meat, enjoy the quietneſs of ſleep, or pleaſure of life; yea, and almoſt no kind of ſenſes were left in him. And truly I have often greatly wondered at the miraculous operation of Chriſt ſhewed upon him, who unleſs he had relieved in time his poor wretched ſervant ſo far worn, with ſome opportune conſolation now and then, it could not be poſſible for him to ſubſiſt under ſuch intolerable agonies. And yet the occaſion thereof was of no great moment neither. But nothing is more common amongſt the holieſt and beſt of men, by how much the more devout and watchful they are, (having the fear of God before their eyes), ſo much the more they miſtruſt and ſuſpect themſelves; whereby it cometh to paſs, that they are often ſo terrified and perplexed with ſmall matters (in compariſon) as though they were huge mountains; whereas on the contrary, others there be whom the blackeſt and moſt heinous crimes will nothing touch or move.

The occaſion of this was, That he being firſt called by the light of the Holy Spirit to the knowledge of the goſpel, and having received a wonderful ſweet and feeling ſenſe of Chriſt's heavenly kingdom, his mind, after that, falling a little to ſome cogitation of his former affairs belonging to his vocation, began by and by to miſdoubt himſelf upon occaſion of theſe words written in the ſixth chapter to the Hebrews; "For it is impoſſible for thoſe who were once enlightened, and have taſted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghoſt, and have taſted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come; if they ſhall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance: ſeeing they crucify to themſelves the Son of God afreſh, and put him to an open ſhame." Upon the conſideration of which words, he fully perſuaded himſelf that he had ſinned againſt the Holy Ghoſt: even ſo much, that had he been in hell, he could hardly deſpair much more of his ſalvation. Every good man may readily judge, by himſelf, what terrors, boilings, and convulſions turmoiled in the mean time in his woeful breaſt: although it be hard for any man to judge of the miſery thereof, but he who hath by experience felt the like.

Now in comparing the torments of all martyrs with his pains, I pray you what pains, puniſhment, and flames would he not willingly have ſuffered, to have had ſome ſmall eaſe and refreſhment? Being under ſuch intolerable agonies of mind, that he could have no enjoyment of his food, yet was he compelled to eat againſt his appetite, on purpoſe to defer the time of his damnation as long as he could, thinking with himſelf that he muſt needs be thrown into hell, as ſoon as the breath went out of his body. However, he thought Chriſt pitied his caſe, and was ſorry for him; yet he could not (as he imagined) help, becauſe of the verity of the word, which ſaid, "It is impoſſible for thoſe who were once enlightened," &c.

And this I mention not to open his wounds, and expoſe his misfortunes, but to encourage all good men by his example to glorify the Son of God, who ſuffereth none to be tempted above his ſtrength, but ſo tempereth and ſeaſoneth the aſperity of evils, that what ſeemeth to us intolerable, he doth not only alleviate, that we may bear it, but alſo turneth it more to our advantage than we can imagine: which manifeſtly appeared in this good ſervant of God, and in no man more. And although (as we have ſaid) he ſuffered many years theſe ſharp temptations and ſtrong buffetings of Satan; yet the Lord, who graciouſly preſerved him all the while, did not only at laſt rid him out of all diſcomfort, but alſo framed him thereby to ſuch mortification of life, as the like probably hath not been ſeen, in ſuch ſort as he being like one placed in heaven already, and dead to this world, both in word and meditation led a life altogether celeſtial, abhorring in his mind all prophane doings. Neither was his talk any thing different from the fruits of his life, never throwing out an idle, vile, or vain word. The moſt part of his lands he diſtributed to the uſe of his brethren, and committed the reſt to the guiding of his ſervants and officers, whereby he might the more quietly give himſelf up to his godly ſtudy, as to a continual Sabbath reſt. This was about the latter end of king Henry's reign, and continued in the time of king Edward the ſixth.

After this, in the perſecuting days of queen Mary, as ſoon as the biſhop of Coventry heard of his fame, and of his being ſo ardent and zealous in the goſpel of Chriſt, he immediately wrote a letter to the mayor and officers of Coventry to apprehend him as ſoon as poſſible. But by the good providence of God, it happened otherwiſe: for God diſpoſeth all things after his own ſecret pleaſure, who ſeeing his old and truſty ſervant ſo many years with ſo extreme and many torments broken and dried up, would in no wiſe heap too many ſorrows upon one poor ſilly wretch: neither would he commit him to the flames of fire, who had been already baked and ſcorched with the ſharp fires of inward affliction, and had ſuſtained ſo many burning darts and conflicts of Satan ſo many years: God therefore of his divine providence, thinking it too much that one man ſhould be ſo overcharged with ſo many plagues and torments, did graciouſly provide, that Robert his brother being both ſtronger in body, and alſo better furniſhed with helps of learning to anſwer the adverſaries (being a Maſter of Arts in Cambridge), ſhould ſuſtain that conflict, and even ſo it came to paſs.

For as ſoon as the mayor of Coventry had received the biſhop's letters for the apprehending of Mr. John Glover, he forthwith ſent private notice to the ſaid John to convey himſelf away: who with his brother William was not ſo ſoon departed out of his houſe, but that yet in the ſight of the ſheriff and others, the ſearchers came and ruſhed in to take him, according to the biſhop's order.

But when the perſon they ſought for could not be found, one of the officers going into an upper chamber, found there Robert the other brother lying on his bed, and ſick of a long diſeaſe; who was by him immediately brought before the ſheriff. Which ſheriff, notwithſtanding, favouring Robert and his cauſe, would indeed fain have diſmiſſed him, and wrought what means he could, ſaying, that he was not the man for whom they were ſent: yet nevertheleſs being terrified with the ſtout words of the officer, contending with him to have him detained till the biſhop's coming, he was conſtrained to carry him away againſt his will, and ſo laid him faſt while the biſhop came. And thus much by way of preamble, concerning the worthy remembrance of Mr. John Glover.

Now to enter upon the matter which principally we have in hand, that is, to conſider the ſtory and martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover; as the whole narration was ſent in a letter of his own writing to his wife, concerning the manner of his being handled; therefore it ſeemeth beſt, for the more credit of the matter, to exhibit his own letter, the contents whereof are as follow.

Mr. Robert Glover's Letter to his Wife, containing the whole Deſcription of his Troubles.

THE peace of conſcience which paſſeth all underſtanding, the ſweet conſolation, comfort, ſtrength and boldneſs of the Holy Ghoſt be continually increaſed in your heart, through a fervent, earneſt, and ſtedfaſt faith in our moſt dear and only Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

I thank you heartily (moſt loving wife) for your letters ſent to me in my impriſonment. I read them with tears more than once or twice, with tears (I ſay) for joy and gladneſs, that God had wrought in you ſo merciful a work; firſt, an unfeigned repentance; ſecondly, an humble and hearty reconciliation; thirdly, a voluntary ſubmiſſion and obedience to the will of God in all things. Which when I read in your letters, and judged them to proceed from the bottom of your heart, I could not but be thankful to God, rejoicing with tears for you, and theſe his great mercies poured upon you.

Theſe your letters, and the hearing of your moſt godly proceedings and conſtant doings from time to time, much relieved and comforted me at all times, and ſhall be a goodly teſtimony with you at the great day, againſt many worldly and dainty dames, who ſet more by their own pleaſure and pelf in this world, than by God's glory, little regarding (as it appeareth) the everlaſting health of their own ſouls or others. My prayer ſhall be whilſt I am in this world, that God, which of his great mercy hath begun his good work in you, will finiſh it to the glory of his name; and by the mighty power and inſpiration of his Holy Spirit ſo ſtrengthen, eſtabliſh, and confirm you in all his ways to the end, that we may together ſhew forth his praiſes in the world to come, to our unſpeakable conſolation everlaſtingly, Amen.

So long as God ſhall lend you continuance in this miſerable world, above all things give yourſelf continually to prayer, lifting up, as St. Paul ſaith, clean or pure hands without anger, wrath, or doubting, forgiving (as he ſaith alſo), if you have any thing againſt any man, as Chriſt forgiveth us. And that we may be the better willing to forgive, it is good often to call to remembrance the multitude and greatneſs of our ſins, which Chriſt daily and hourly pardoneth and forgiveth us; and then we ſhall, as St. Peter affirmeth, be ready to cover and hide the offences of our brethren, be they never ſo many. And becauſe God's word teacheth us, not only the true manner of praying, but alſo what we ought to do, or not to do, in the whole diſcourſe and practice of this life, what pleaſeth or diſpleaſeth God, and that, as Chriſt ſaith, "The word of God that he hath ſpoken, ſhall judge in the laſt day:" Let your prayers be to this end eſpecially, That God of his great mercy would open and reveal more and more daily to your heart, the true ſenſe, knowledge, and underſtanding of his moſt holy word, and give you grace, in your living, to expreſs the fruits thereof.

And foraſmuch as it is, as the Holy Ghoſt calleth it, the word of affliction, that is, it is ſeldom without hatred, perſecution, peril, danger of loſs of life and goods, and whatſoever ſeemeth pleaſant in this world, as experience teacheth you in this time: call upon God continually for his aſſiſtance always, as Chriſt teacheth, caſting your accounts what it is like to coſt you, endeavouring yourſelf, through the help of the Holy Ghoſt, by continuance of prayer, to lay your foundation ſo ſure, that no ſtorm or tempeſt ſhall be able to overthrow or caſt it down; remembering always (as Chriſt ſaith) Lot's wife; that is, to beware of looking back to that thing that diſpleaſeth God. And becauſe nothing diſpleaſed God ſo much as idolatry, that is, falſe worſhipping of God, otherwiſe than his word commandeth: look not back (I ſay) nor turn not your face to their idolatrous and blaſphemous maſs, manifeſtly againſt the word, practice, and example of Chriſt; as it is moſt manifeſt to all that have any taſte of the true underſtanding of God's word, that there remaineth nothing in the church of England, at this preſent, profitable or edifying to the church and congregation of the Lord, all things being done in an unknown tongue, contrary to the expreſs commandment of the Holy Ghoſt.

They object that they be the church, and therefore they muſt be believed. My anſwer was, The church of God knoweth and acknowledgeth no other head but Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God, whom ye have refuſed, and choſen the man of ſin, the ſon of perdition, enemy to Chriſt, the devil's deputy and lieutenant, the pope.

Chriſt's church heareth, teacheth, and is ruled by his word, as he ſaith, "My ſheep hear my voice. It you abide abide in me, and my word in you, you be my disciples." Their church repelleth God's word, and forceth all men to follow their traditions.

Christ's church dare not add or diminish, alter or change his blessed testament; but they be not afraid to take away all that Christ instituted, and go a whoring (as the scripture saith), with their own inventions: to glory and rejoice in the works of their own hands.

The church of Christ is, hath been, and shall be in all ages under the cross, persecuted, molested, and afflicted, the world ever hating them, because they be not of the world. But these persecute, murder, slay and kill such as profess the true doctrine of Christ, be they in learning, living, conversation, and other virtues never so excellent.

Christ and his church reserved the trial of their doctrine to the word of God, and gave the people leave to judge thereof by the same word, "Search the scriptures." But this church taketh away the word from the people, and suffereth neither learned nor unlearned to examine or prove their doctrine by the word of God.

The true church of God laboureth by all means to resist and withstand the lusts, desires, and motions of the world, the flesh and the devil: These for the most part give themselves to all voluptuousness, and secretly commit such things, which (as St. Paul saith) it is shame to speak of.

By these and such like manifest probations, they declare themselves to be none of the church of Christ, but rather of the synagogue of Satan. It shall be good for you oftentimes to confer and compare their proceedings and doings with the practice of those whom the word of God doth teach to have been true members of the church of God, and it shall work in you both knowledge, erudition and boldness to withstand with suffering their doings. I likened them therefore to Nimrod, whom the scripture calleth a mighty hunter, or a stout champion, telling them that that which they could not have by the word, they would have by the sword, and be the church whether men will or no; and called them with good conscience, as Christ called their forefathers, the children of the devil; and as their father the devil is a lyar and a murderer, so their kingdom and church (as they call it) standeth by lying and murdering.

Have no fellowship with them therefore, my dear wife, nor with their doctrine and traditions, lest you be partaker of their sins, for whom is reserved a heavy damnation, without speedy repentance. Beware of such as shall advertise you to bear with the world for a season as they do. There is no dallying with God's matters: "It is a fearful thing (as St. Paul saith) to fall into the hands of the living God." Remember the prophet Elias, "Why halt ye on both sides?" Remember what Christ saith, "He that putteth his hands to the plough, and looketh back, is not worthy of me." And seeing God hath hitherto allowed you as a good soldier in the forefront, play not the coward, neither draw back to the rearward. St. John numbereth among them that shall dwell in the fiery lake, such as be fearful in God's cause. Set always before your eyes the examples of such as have behaved themselves boldly in God's cause, as Stephen, Peter, Paul, Daniel, the three children, the widow's sons, and in your days Anne Askew, Laurence Saunders, John Bradford, with many other faithful witnesses of Christ. "Be afraid in nothing (saith St. Paul) of the adversaries of Christ's doctrine, which is to them the sign of perdition, but to you of eternal salvation." Christ commandeth the same, saying, "Fear them not." Let us not follow the example of him which asked time first to take leave of his friends. If we so do, we shall find few of them that will encourage us to go forward in our business, please it God never so much. We do not read that James and John, Andrew and Simon, when they were called, put off the time till they had known their fathers or friends pleasure. But the scripture saith, "They forsook all, and by and by followed Christ." Christ likened the kingdom of God to a precious pearl, which whosoever findeth, selleth all that he hath to buy it. Yea, whosoever hath but a little taste or glimmering how precious a treasure the kingdom of heaven is, will gladly forego both life and goods for the obtaining of it. But the most part now-a-days are like Esop's cock, which when he had found a precious stone, wished rather to have found a barley-corn. So ignorant are they how precious a jewel the word of God is, that they choose rather the things of this world, which, being compared to it, are less in value than a barley-corn.

If I would have given place to worldly reasons, these might have moved me: first, the leaving of you and my children; the consideration of the state of my children, being yet tender of age, and young, apt and inclinable to virtue and learning, and so have the more need of my assistance, being not altogether destitute of gifts to help them withal; possessions above the common sort of men; because I was never called to be a preacher or minister; and (because of my sickness) fear of death in imprisonment before I should come to my answer, and so my death to be unprofitable.

But these and such like, I thank my heavenly Father (who of his infinite mercy inspired me with his Holy Spirit, for his Son's sake my only Saviour and Redeemer), prevailed not in me: but when I had by the wonderful permission of God fallen into their hands, at the first sight of the sheriff, nature a little abashed; yet before I came to the prison, by the working of God, and through his goodness, fear departed. I said to the sheriff at his coming to me, What matter have you, Mr. Sheriff, to charge me withal? He answered, You shall know when you come before the masters; and so taking me with him, I expected to have been carried before the masters, and to have heard what they could have burdened me withal: but, contrary to my expectation, I was committed forthwith to the jail, not being called to my answer, little justice being shewed therein. But the less justice a man findeth at their hands, the more consolation in conscience shall he find from God: for whosoever is of the world, the world will love him.

After I came into prison, and had reposed myself there awhile, I wept for joy and gladness, my belly full, musing much of the great mercies of God, and (as it were) saying to myself after this sort: O Lord, who am I, on whom thou shouldest bestow this thy great mercy, to be numbered among the saints that suffer for the gospel sake? And so beholding and considering on the one side my imperfection, unableness, sinful misery, and unworthiness, and on the other side the greatness of God's mercy, to be called to so high promotion, I was, as it were, amazed and overcome for a while with joy and gladness, concluding thus with myself in my heart; O Lord, thou shewest power in weakness, wisdom in foolishness, mercy in sinfulness; who shall hinder thee to choose where and whom thou wilt? As I have zealously loved the confession of thy word, so I ever thought myself to be most unworthy to be partaker of the affliction for the same.

Not long after Mr. W. Brasbridge, Mr. C. Phineas, Mr. N. Hopkins came unto me, persuading with me to be dismissed upon bonds. To whom my answer was (to my remembrance) after this sort: Forasmuch as the masters have imprisoned me, having nothing to burden me withal; if I should enter into bonds, I should in so doing accuse myself; and seeing they have no matter to lay to my charge, they may as well let me pass without bonds as with bonds.

Secondly, If I shall enter bonds, covenant and promise to appear, I shall do nothing but excuse, colour and cloak their wickedness, and indanger myself nevertheless, being bound by my promise to appear. They alledged many worldly persuasions to me, to avoid the present peril, and also how to avoid the forfeiture if I brake brake my promiſe. I ſaid unto them, I had caſt up my pennyworth, by God's help. They undertook alſo to make the bond eaſy.

And when they were ſomewhat importunate, I ſaid to Mr. Hopkins, That liberty of conſcience was a precious thing; and took, as it were, a pauſe, lifting up my heart to God earneſtly for his aid and help, that I might do the thing that might pleaſe him. And ſo when they had let their ſuit fall, my heart (methought) was wonderfully comforted. Mr. Dudley communed with me in like manner; whom I anſwered in effect as I did before.

Afterward debating the matter with myſelf, theſe conſiderations came into my head; I have from time to time with good conſcience (God I take to record), moved all ſuch as I had conference withal to be no dalliers in God's matters, but to ſhew themſelves, after ſo great a light and knowledge, hearty, earneſt, conſtant and ſtable in ſo maniſeſt a truth, and not to give place one jot contrary to the ſame. Now thought I, if I ſhall withdraw myſelf, and make any ſhifts to pull my own neck out of the collar, I ſhall give great offence to my weak brethren in Chriſt, and advantage to the enemies to ſlander God's word. It will be ſaid, He hath encouraged others to be earneſt and fervent, to fear no worldly perils or dangers, but he himſelf will give no ſuch example.

Wherefore I thought it my bounden duty, both to God and man, being (as it were) by the great goodneſs of God marvellouſly called and appointed hereunto, to ſet aſide all fear, perils and dangers, all worldly reſpects and conſiderations, and like as I had heretofore, according to the meaſure of my ſmall gift within the compaſs of my vocation and calling, from the bottom of my heart unfeignedly moved, exhorted and perſuaded all that profeſs God's word, manfully to perſiſt in the defence of the ſame, not with ſword and violence, but with ſuffering and loſs of life, rather than to defile themſelves again with the whoriſh abomination of the Romiſh Antichriſt; ſo the hour being come, with my fact and example to ratify, confirm and proteſt the ſame to the hearts of all true believers: and to this end, by the mighty aſſiſtance of God's Holy Spirit, I reſolved myſelf with much peace of conſcience, willingly to ſuſtain whatſoever the Romiſh Antichriſt ſhould do againſt me, and the rather, becauſe I underſtood the biſhop's coming to be at hand, and conſidered that poor men's conſciences would be then ſharply aſſaulted. So I remained priſoner in Coventry, for the ſpace of ten or eleven days, being never called to my anſwer by the maſters, contrary to the laws of the realm, they having neither ſtatute, law, proclamation, letter, warrant, nor commandment for my apprehenſion. They would have laid all the matter upon the ſumner; who being examined, denied it before their faces, as one of my friends told me, ſaying, that he had no commandment concerning me, but for my elder brother. God lay not their extreme doings againſt me to their charge at the great day.

The ſecond day after the biſhop's coming to Coventry, Mr. Warren came to the Guildhall, and ordered the chief jailer to carry me to the biſhop. I laid to Mr. Warren's charge the cruel ſeeking of my death: and when he would have excuſed himſelf, I told him he could not wipe his hands ſo; he was guilty of my blood before God, as though he had murdered me with his own hands.

And ſo he departed from me, ſaying, I needed not to fear, if I would be of his belief. God open his eyes if it be his will, and give him grace to believe this, which he and all of his inclination ſhall find (I fear) too true for their parts; that is, that all they which cruelly, maliciouſly, and ſpitefully perſecute, moleſt, and afflict the members of Chriſt for their conſcience ſake, and for the true teſtimony of Chriſt's word, and cauſe them moſt unjuſtly to be ſlain and murdered, without ſpeedy repentance ſhall dwell with the devil and his angels in the fierce lake everlaſtingly, where they ſhall wiſh and deſire, cry and call, but in vain (as their right companion did) to be refreſhed by them whom in this world they contemned, deſpiſed, diſdained, as ſlaves, miſers and wretches.

When I came before the biſhop in Mr. Denton's houſe, he began with this proteſtation; That he was my biſhop for lack of a better, and willed me to ſubmit myſelf.

I ſaid to him, I am not come to accuſe myſelf: what have you to lay to my charge?

He aſked me, whether I was learned? I anſwered, Smally learned.

Mr. Chancellor ſtanding by, ſaid, I was a Maſter of Arts.

Then my lord laid to my charge my not coming to the church.

Here I might have dallied with him, and put him to his proofs, foraſmuch as I had not been in his dioceſe for a long ſeaſon, neither were any of the citizens able to prove any ſuch matter againſt me. Notwithſtanding I anſwered him through God's merciful help, that I neither had, nor would come to their church as long as their maſs was uſed there, to ſave (if I had them) five hundred lives. I deſired him to ſhew me one jot or tittle in the ſcriptures for the proof and defence of the maſs.

He anſwered, He came to teach, and not to be taught.

I was content (I told him) to learn of him, ſo far as he was able to teach me by the word of God.

Biſhop. Who ſhall judge the word?

Glover. Chriſt was willing that the people ſhould judge his doctrine by ſearching the ſcriptures, and ſo was Paul; methinks you ſhould claim no further privilege nor preheminence than they had.

Thus ſpake Robert Glover, offering him further, that he was content that the primitive church next to the apoſtles time ſhould judge between the biſhop and him. But the biſhop refuſed that. Then he ſaid he was his biſhop, and therefore he muſt believe him.

Glover. If you ſay black is white, my lord, muſt I ſay ſo too, and believe the ſame becauſe you ſay it is ſo? Mr. Chancellor here noted me to be arrogant, becauſe I would not give place to my biſhop.

Glover. If you will be believed becauſe you be a biſhop, why find you fault with the people that believed biſhop Latimer, biſhop Ridley, and biſhop Hooper, and the reſidue of them that were biſhops?

Biſhop. Becauſe they were heretics.

Glover. And may not you err as well as they? I expected my lord to uſe ſome learned arguments to perſuade me; but inſtead of that, he oppreſſed me only with his authority. He ſaid I diſſented from the church, and aſked me where my church was before king Edward's time?

I deſired him to ſhew me where their church was in Elias's time, and what outward ſhew it had in Chriſt's time.

Biſhop. Elias's complaint was only of the ten tribes that fell from David's houſe, whom he called heretics.

Glover. You be not able to ſhew any prophets that the other two tribes had at that ſame time.

My lord making no anſwer to that, Mr. Rogers, one of the maſters of the city, cometh in the mean ſeaſon, taking upon him as though he would anſwer to the text. But my lord forthwith commanded me to be committed to ſome Tower, if they had any beſides the common jail, ſaying, He would at the end of his viſitation of his dioceſe, weed out ſuch wolves. Mr. Rogers willed him to content himſelf for that night, till they had taken further order for me. Even where it pleaſeth you, ſaid I to my lord, I am content; and ſo I was returned at that time to the common jail again from whence I came.

On the Friday morning, being the next day, I had warning by one of the priſoners to prepare myſelf to ride with my fellow-priſoners the ſame day to Litchfield, there to be beſtowed at the biſhop's pleaſure. Which tidings at firſt ſomething diſcouraged me, fearing leſt I ſhould ſhould by means of my great ſickneſs, through hard uſage (which I expected), have died in priſon before I ſhould come to anſwer: but immediately with God's word I rebuked this infidelity in myſelf, and by the ſame corrected mine own diſtruſt in the following manner. What make I of God? Is not his power as great in Litchfield as in Coventry? Doth not his promiſe extend as well to Litchfield as to Coventry? Was he not with Habakkuk, Daniel, Miſaach, and Jeremy, in their moſt dangerous impriſonments? He knoweth what things we have need of. He hath numbered all the hairs of our head. The ſparrow falleth not to the ground, without our heavenly Father's will; much more will he care for us if we be not faithleſs, whom he hath made worthy to be witneſſes of his truth. So long as we put our truſt in him, we ſhall never be deſtitute of his help, neither in priſon, in ſickneſs, nor in health, neither in life nor in death, neither before kings, biſhops, or the devil himſelf, much leſs one of his miniſters, ſhall be able to prevail againſt us. With ſuch meditations I grew chearful, of good conſolation and comfort: ſo that hearing one ſay that they could not provide horſes enow for us, I ſaid, Let them carry us in a dung-cart for lack of horſes, if they pleaſe, I am willing for my part.

Notwithſtanding, at the requeſt of my friends, I wrote to Mr. Mayor and his brethren, briefly requiring them that I might make anſwer here to ſuch things as ſhould be laid to my charge: the contents of which letter were theſe.

A Letter of Mr. Robert Glover to the Mayor of Coventry and his Brethren.

I Beſeech you to underſtand, that it is not unknown, as well to the keeper of the jail, as to the inhabitants about me where I dwell, that I am a man ſubject to very great ſickneſs, and have been for the ſpace of ſeven years and more, ſo that it is not like that I ſhall be removed without great peril and danger of life. And becauſe I was here committed toward by your appointment, I would gladly here anſwer to ſuch things as ſhould be laid to my charge. If I may obtain this of you, I have cauſe thankfully to acknowledge your indifferency; if otherwiſe, I pray God it be not laid to your charge at the great day, where every man ſhall have juſt judgment without reſpect of perſon.

Your priſoner in the Lord, always of mindful of you in my prayers,

Robert Glover.

But receiving no anſwers to my letters, I conjectured, that when the biſhop and the chancellor had ſeen them, they moved them rather to have me away, being more deſirous (as I ſuppoſe) to have had me diſpatched privily in priſon, than to bring me openly to my anſwer; as did in ſome meaſure appear by the treatment I met with at my firſt coming to priſon.

Certain ſerjeants and conſtables of Coventry being appointed to have the conveying of us to Litchfield, to be delivered there to one Jephcot the chancellor's man, ſent from Coventry with us for the ſame purpoſe, we were commanded to be on horſeback about eleven or twelve of the clock on Friday, being market-day, that we might be the more gazed at: and to ſet the people's hearts more againſt us, they did proclaim a letter concerning a proclamation made for calling in and diſannulling of all ſuch books as truly expound and interpret the ſcriptures. We came to Litchfield about four of the clock at night, and had leave to repoſe ourſelves for ſupper-time. We put in at the ſign of the Swan, where we were entertained friendly and gently.

After ſupper Jephcot repaired to us, whom we intreated that upon ſureties we might reſt ourſelves that night, being unprovided of any thing to help ourſelves withal in the priſon at that preſent. He ſeemed willing at firſt, but afterwards (whether by perſuaſion, but I rather ſuppoſe out of policy, till he could gather a multitude to ſtare and gaze upon us, and alſo that we ſhould provide nothing to eaſe ourſelves withal) he revoked his promiſe, and ſo by conſent we were carried to priſon, in the ſight of a great multitude of people. I deſired Jephcot before to execute his office with mercy, telling him that they ſhould have judgment without mercy, that ſhewed no mercy. And this mercy I found at his hand.

He put me into a priſon that ſame night, where I continued till I was condemned, in a place next the dungeon, where was ſmall room, ſtrong building, and very cold, with little light, and there he allowed me a bundle of ſtraw inſtead of my bed, without chair, form, or any thing elſe to eaſe myſelf withal. God of his mercy gave me great patience through prayer that night, ſo that if it had been his pleaſure, I could have been contented to have ended my life: but Jephcot and one Perſey the biſhop's man, who afterwards was my continual keeper for the moſt part, came to me in the morning, to whom I ſaid, This is a great extremity, God ſend us patience; and no more.

Then they were content that I ſhould have a bed of my own procuring. But I was allowed no help, neither night nor day, nor company of any man, notwithſtanding my great ſickneſs; nor yet paper, pen nor ink, or books, except my New Teſtament in Latin, and a Prayer-book which I privily ſtole in.

Within two days after, Mr. Chancellor and Mr. Temſey a prebendary there, came to me into my priſon. Mr. Chancellor exhorted me to conform myſelf to my lord and to the church. He wiſhed no more hurt to my ſoul than to his own: belike becauſe I had laid to his charge at Coventry the ſeeking of my blood unjuſtly and wrongfully.

Now thus the ſecond time I anſwered Mr. Chancellor to his exhortation, That I refuſed not to be ruled by that church, that was content to be ordered and governed by the word of God.

Chancellor. How know you the word of God, but by the church?

Glover. The church ſheweth which is the word of God, therefore the church is above the word of God.

This is no good reaſon in learning, ſaid I to Mr. Chancellor. For it is like unto this; John ſhewed the people who was Chriſt: Ergo, John was above Chriſt. Or elſe, I have a man that knoweth not the king, and I tell him who was the king, am I therefore above the king?

Mr. Chancellor ſaid, he came not to reaſon with me; and ſo departed. And I remained for the ſpace of eight days without any further conference with any man, until the biſhop's coming; in which time I gave myſelf continually to prayer, and meditation of the merciful promiſes of God made unto all, without exception of perſon, that call upon the name of his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt. I found in myſelf daily amendment of health of body, increaſe of peace in conſcience, and many conſolations from God, by the help of his Holy Spirit, and ſometimes as it were a taſte and glimmering of the life to come; all for his only Son Jeſus Chriſt's ſake: to him be all praiſe for ever and ever.

The enemy ceaſed not many times ſundry ways to aſſault me, often objecting to my conſcience mine own unworthineſs, through the greatneſs of the benefit to be counted among the number of them that ſhould ſuffer for Chriſt, for his goſpel ſake. Againſt him I replied with the word of God on this ſort, What were all thoſe whom God had choſen from the beginning, to be his witneſſes, and to carry his name before the world? Were they not men, as Paul and Barnabas ſaid, as well ſubject to wickedneſs, ſin, and imperfections, as other men be? Even ſuch were Noah, Abraham, David, and all the reſt. "Who gave firſt unto him," as Paul ſaith. And alſo ſpeaking to every man: "What haſt thou that thou receivedſt not?" Likewiſe John, "All have received of his fulneſs:" they were no bringers of any goodneſs to God, but altogether receivers. They choſe not God firſt, but he choſe them. They loved not God firſt, but he loved them firſt. Yea, he both loved and choſe them when they were his enemies, full of ſin and corruption, and void of all goodneſs. He is and will be ſtill the ſame God, as rich in mercy, as mighty, as able, as ready, as willing to forgive ſins without reſpect of perſons, to the world's end, of all them that call upon him. "The Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him: to all that call upon him in truth." God is near, he is at hand, he is with all, with all (I ſay), and refuſeth none, excepteth none that faithfully in true repentance call upon him, in what hour, what place, or what time ſoever it be. It is no arrogancy nor preſumption in any man, to burthen God (as it were) with his promiſe, and of duty to claim and challenge his aid, help and aſſiſtance in all our perils, dangers and diſtreſs, calling upon him, not in the confidence of our own godlineſs, but in the truſt of his promiſes made in Chriſt, in whom and by whom, and for whoſe ſake, whoſoever boldly approacheth to the mercy-ſeat of the Father, is ſure to receive whatſoever is expedient or neceſſary, either for body or ſoul, in a more bountiful manner, than he can well wiſh, or dare deſire. His word cannot lye, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee, and thou ſhalt praiſe me."

I anſwered the enemy alſo on this manner; I am a ſinner, and therefore unworthy to be a witneſs of his truth. What then? muſt I deny his word, becauſe I am not worthy to profeſs it? what bring I to paſs in ſo doing, but add ſin to ſin? what is greater ſin, than to deny the truth of Chriſt's goſpel? as Chriſt himſelf beareth witneſs, "He that is aſhamed of me or of my words, of him I alſo will be aſhamed before my Father and all his angels. I might alſo for the like reaſon neglect obedience to any of God's commandments.

When I am provoked to pray, the enemy may ſay to me, I am not worthy to pray, therefore I ſhall not pray: and ſo in like manner of all the commandments, I ſhall not forbear ſwearing, ſtealing, or murdering, becauſe I am not worthy to keep any commandment of God. Theſe be the deluſions of the devil, and Satan's ſuggeſtions, which muſt be overcome by continual prayer, and with the word of God applied according to the meaſure of every man's gift, againſt all aſſaults of the devil.

At the biſhop's firſt coming to Litchfield, after mine impriſonment. I was called into a by-chamber next to my priſon, to my lord. Before whom when I came, and ſaw none but his officers, chaplains and ſervants, except it were an old prieſt, I was partly amazed, and lifted up my heart to God for his merciful help and aſſiſtance.

My lord aſked me how I liked my impriſonment: I gave him no anſwer touching that queſtion. He proceeded to perſuade me to be a member of his church, which had continued ſo many years. As for your church (ſaid he to me), it was not known but lately in king Edward's time.

I profeſs myſelf to be a member of that church (ſaid I) that is built upon the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, Jeſus Chriſt being the head corner-ſtone; and ſo alledged the place of St. Paul to the Epheſians. And this church hath been from the beginning (I ſaid), though it bear no glorious ſhew before the world, being ever, for the moſt part, under the croſs and affliction, contemned, deſpiſed, and perſecuted. My lord contended, on the other ſide, that they were the church.

So cried all the clergy (ſaid I) againſt the prophets of Jeruſalem, ſaying, "The church of the Lord, the church of the Lord." And always when I was about to ſpeak any thing, my lord cried, Hold thy peace, I command thee by the virtue of thy obedience to hold thy peace, calling me a proud arrogant heretic.

I deſired my lord to lay ſomething to my charge in particular, and then to convince me with ſome ſcriptures and good learning.

Then my lord began to move certain queſtions. I refuſed to anſwer him in corners, requiring that I might make my anſwer openly. He ſaid, I ſhould anſwer him there. I ſtood with him upon that point till he ſaid I ſhould go to priſon again, and there have neither meat nor drink till I had anſwered him.

Then I lifted up my heart to God, that I might ſtand and agree with the doctrine of his moſt holy word.

The firſt queſtion was this, How many ſacraments Chriſt inſtituted to be uſed in the church?

The ſacrament of baptiſm, ſaid I, and the ſacrament that he inſtituted at his laſt ſupper.

No more? ſaid he.

Then ſaid I, To all thoſe that declare a true and unfeigned repentance, a ſure hope, truſt and confidence in the death of Chriſt, to ſuch, miniſters (I grant) have authority to pronounce, by the power of God's word, the remiſſion of ſins.

Here interrupting me, he would needs bear me in hand that I called this a ſacrament: I would not greatly contend with him in that point, becauſe the matter was of no great weight or importance; although he in ſo doing did me wrong, for I called it not a ſacrament.

He aſked me further, Whether I allowed their confeſſion?

I anſwered, No.

Then the biſhop would know my mind, what I thought of the preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament.

I anſwered, That their maſs was neither ſacrifice nor ſacrament, becauſe (ſaid I) you have taken away the true inſtitution, which when you reſtore again, I will tell you my judgment concerning Chriſt's body in the ſacrament.

And thus much did this worthy martyr of God leave behind him in his own hand-writing, concerning the manner of his uſage in priſon, and alſo of his conflicts with the biſhop and his chancellor. More examinations he had (no doubt) with the biſhop in the public conſiſtory, when he was brought forth to be condemned, which he would alſo have left unto us, if either length of life, or leiſure of time, or haſte of execution, had permitted him to finiſh what he intended; but by reaſon of the writ of his burning being come down from London, want of time did neither ſerve him ſo to do, neither yet could I get the records of his laſt examination, whereſoever they are become.

Only this which I could learn by the relation of one Auguſtine Bernher, a miniſter, and a familiar friend of his, concerning the going to his death, I can report; That the ſaid Mr. Robert Glover, after he was condemned by the biſhop, and was now at a point to be delivered out of this world, it ſo happened, that two or three days before, his heart being lumpiſh, and deſolate of all ſpiritual conſolation, felt in himſelf no aptneſs or willingneſs, but rather a heavineſs and dullneſs of ſpirit, full of much diſcomfort to bear the bitter croſs of martyrdom ready to be laid upon him.

Whereupon fearing in himſelf leſt the Lord had utterly withdrawn his wonted favour from him, made his moan to this Auguſtine his friend above-mentioned, ſignifying unto him how earneſtly he had prayed day and night unto the Lord, and yet could receive no motion nor ſenſe of any comfort from him.

Unto whom the ſaid Auguſtine anſwering again, deſired him patiently to wait the Lord's pleaſure, and howſoever his preſent feeling was yet, ſeeing his cauſe was juſt and true, he exhorted him conſtantly to ſtick to the ſame, ſame, and to play the man, nothing miſdoubting but the Lord in his good time would viſit him, and ſatisfy his deſire with plenty of conſolation: whereof (he ſaid) he was right certain and ſure; and therefore deſired him, whenſoever any ſuch feeling of God's heavenly mercies ſhould begin to touch his heart, that then he ſhould ſhew ſome ſignification thereof, whereby he might witneſs with him the ſame; and ſo departed from him.

The next day, when the time came of his martyrdom, as he was going to the place, and was come within ſight of the ſtake (although all the night before praying for ſtrength and courage he could feel none), ſuddenly he was ſo mightily repleniſhed with God's holy comfort and heavenly joys, that he cried out, clapping his hands to Auſtin, and ſaying theſe words, "Auſtin, He is come, He is come!" &c. and that with ſuch joy and alacrity, as one ſeeming rather to be riſen from ſome deadly danger to liberty of life, than as one paſſing out of the world by any pains of death. Such was the change of the marvellous working of the Lord's hand upon that good man.

Cornelius Bungey, Fellow-Martyr with Mr. Robert Glover.

IN the ſame fire with Mr. Glover, Cornelius Bungey of Coventry was likewiſe burnt, who was condemned by the ſaid biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield. As concerning the articles which were objected to him, the effect thereof was this.

Firſt, It was objected againſt him, that theſe three years laſt, in the city of Coventry and Litchfield, and places thereabout, he did hold, maintain, argue and teach, that the prieſt hath no power here to abſolve any ſinner from his ſins.

Secondly, That by baptiſm ſins are not waſhed away, becauſe he ſaid that the waſhing of the fleſh purgeth the fleſh outwardly, and not the ſoul.

Thirdly, That there be in the church only two ſacraments, that is, baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper.

Fourthly, That in the ſacrament of the popiſh altar, was not the real body and blood of Chriſt, but the ſubſtance of bread and wine there remaining ſtill, becauſe St. Paul called it bread and wine, &c.

Fifthly, That he within the compaſs of the ſaid years and time, did hold, maintain, and defend, that the pope is not the head of the viſible church here on earth, &c.

Sixthly, That he was of the dioceſe and juriſdiction of the biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, &c.

Seventhly, That the premiſſes are true, manifeſt and notorious, and that upon the ſame there hath been and is a public voice and fame, as well in the places above rehearſed, as in other quarters alſo about, &c.

To which articles he anſwered again;

To the firſt he granted, and to every part thereof, meaning after the popiſh manner of abſolution.

To the ſecond he granted firſt, after revoked the ſame.

To the third alſo he granted, adding withal, that in ſcripture there is no more contained.

To the fourth, touching the ſacrament, he granted, and to every part thereof.

To the fifth concerning the pope likewiſe.

Alſo to the ſixth he granted, and likewiſe to the ſeventh.

Upon theſe articles and his anſwers to the ſame, the ſaid Radulph the biſhop read the ſentence, and ſo committed him alſo, after condemnation of Mr. Robert Glover, to the ſecular power.

Thus this aforeſaid Cornelius, falſly condemned by the biſhop beforementioned, ſuffered at the ſame ſtake with the chriſtian martyr Mr. Robert Glover at Coventry, about the twentieth day of September.

The Hiſtory of John Glover and William Glover, who were excommunicated after their Death, and buried in the Fields.

JOhn and William Glover, the two brothers of Robert Glover, the martyr, ought not to be omitted in this hiſtory, although they were not called to finiſh their courſe in fire, as their brother and other martyrs were; yet they were caſt out of the church, and excommunicated even after they were dead, and denied chriſtian burial.

And firſt concerning Mr. John Glover the eldeſt brother, what inward ſtorms and agonies he ſuſtained by the ghoſtly enemy, ye have partly heard before deſcribed: now what his bodily enemies wrought againſt him, remaineth to be declared. Whoſe rage and malice, although God reſtrained, that they could little prevail againſt him ſo long as his life endured, yet after his deceaſe, having power upon him, what they did ye ſhall now underſtand.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover, although John Glover, ſeeing his brother to be apprehended for him, had ſmall joy of his life for the great ſorrow of his heart, wherewith he was ſore oppreſſed, and would gladly have put himſelf in his brother's ſtead, if his friends had not otherwiſe perſuaded him, ſhewing that in ſo doing he might entangle himſelf, but could do his brother no good. He thus remained in great care and vexation, yet notwithſtanding endured as well as he could, till at length about the latter end of queen Mary, there was a new ſearch made for the ſaid John Glover.

Whereupon the ſheriffs, with their under officers and ſervants, being ſent to ſeek him, came into his houſe where he and his wife were. It chanced as he was in the chamber by himſelf, the officers burſting into the houſe, and ſearching other rooms, came to the chamber door where John Glover was, who being within, and holding the latch ſoftly with his hand, perceived and heard the officers buſtling about the door, among whom one of the ſaid officers having the ſtring in his hand, was ready to draw and pluck at the ſame.

In the mean time another coming by (whoſe voice he heard and knew), bade them come away, ſaying they had been there before. Whereupon they departing thence, went to ſearch other corners of the houſe, where they found Agnes Glover his wife, who being carried to Litchfield, and there examined before the biſhop, at length, after much ado, was conſtrained to give place to their tyranny. John Glover in the mean time, partly for care of his wife, partly through cold taken in the woods where he did lie, took an ague, whereupon not long after he left his life, which the cruel papiſts ſo long had ſought for.

Thus by the mighty protection of the Almighty Lord, how John Glover was delivered and defended from the hands of the perſecuting enemies during all the time of his life, ye have heard. Now what befel after his death, both to him and his brother William, is worthy to be remembered. Who after he was dead, and buried in the church-yard without prieſt or clerk, Dr. Dracot, then chancellor, ſix weeks after, ſent for the parſon of the town, and demanded how it happened that he was there buried. The parſon anſwered, that he was then ſick, and knew not of it. Then the chancellor commanded the parſon to go home, and to cauſe the body of the ſaid John Glover to be taken up, and to be caſt over the wall into the highway: the parſon again anſwered, that he had been ſix weeks in the earth, and ſo ſmelled, that none were able to endure it. Well, quoth Dr. Dracot, then take this bill, and pronounce him in the pulpit a damned ſoul, and a twelvemonth after take up his bones (for then the fleſh will be conſumed), and caſt them over the wall, that the carts and horſes may tread upon them, and then I will come and hallow again that place in the church-church-yard where he was buried. Recorded by the parſon of the town, who told the ſame to Hugh Burrows, dwelling at Fynden, in Derbyſhire, and to Mr. Robert Glover's wife, by whoſe credible information we received the ſame.

Not much unlike uſage was practiſed alſo by theſe catholic children of the mother church upon the body of William the third brother, whom after it had pleaſed Almighty God about the ſame ſeaſon to call out of this vale of miſery, the well diſpoſed people of the town of Weme in Shropſhire, where he died, brought the body into the pariſh church, intending there to have it buried. But one Bernard being then curate of the ſaid church (and yet is, as I hear ſay, to this day), to ſtop the burial thereof, rode to the biſhop named Ralph Baine, to certify him of the matter, and to have his advice therein. In the mean time the body lying there a whole day, in the night-time one Richard Morice, a taylor, would have interred him. But then came John Thorlyne, of Weme, with ſome others, and would not ſuffer the body to be buried; expreſſing to us the contrary examples of good Tobit; for as he was religious in burying the dead, ſo this man putteth religion in not burying the dead; ſo that after he had lain there two days and one night, the aforeſaid Bernard the curate came with the biſhop's letter, the contents of which letter, being copied out word for word, here followeth.

A Copy of the Biſhop's Letter, written to the Pariſh of Weme.

UNderſtanding that one Glover, an heretic, is dead in the pariſh of Weme, which Glover hath, all the time of my being in this country, been known for a rebel againſt our holy faith and religion, a contemner of the holy ſacraments and ceremonies uſed in the holy church, and hath ſeparated himſelf from the holy communion of all good chriſtian men, and never required to be reconciled to our mother holy church, nor in his laſt days did call for his ghoſtly father, but died without all rites belonging to a chriſtian man; I thought it good not only to command the curate of Weme, that he ſhould not be buried in chriſtian man's burial, but alſo will and command all the pariſh of Weme, that no man procure, help, nor ſpeak to have him buried in holy ground: but I do charge and command the churchwardens of Weme in ſpecial, and all the pariſh of the ſame, that they aſſiſt the ſaid curate in defending and hindering, and procuring that he be not buried in the church, or within the walls of the church-yard: and likewiſe I charge thoſe that brought the body to the place, to carry it away again, and that at their charge, as they will anſwer at their peril. At Eccleſch, this ſixth of September, 1558.

By your Ordinary, Radulph,
Coventry and Litchfield.

By virtue of this aforeſaid letter, ſo it fell out, that they who brought the corpſe thither, were obliged to carry it back again at their own charges. But as the body was corrupted and ſmelt ſo ſtrong, that no man could well come near it, they were forced to draw it with horſes into a broom-field, and there he was buried.

Witneſſes of the godly end of the ſaid William Glover, dying in the true faith and confeſſion of Chriſt: Mr. Nowell dean of Litchfield, George Wileſtone and his wife, Thomas Conſtantine, Roger Wydhouſe, John Prynne, George Torpelley, &c.

The like example of charitable affection in theſe catholic churchmen, is alſo to be ſeen and noted in the burying one Edward Burton, Eſq; who in the ſame dioceſe of Cheſter, departing out of this world the very day before queen Elizabeth was crowned, required of his friends, as they would anſwer for it, that his body ſhould be buried in his pariſh church (which was St. Chad's in Shrewſbury), ſo that no maſs-monger ſhould be preſent thereat. Which thing being declared to the curate of that pariſh, named Sir John Marſhall, and the body being withal brought to the burial, upon the ſame day when the queen was crowned, the curate being therewith offended, ſaid plainly, that he ſhould not be buried in the church there.

Whereunto one of the friends of the deceaſed, named George Torpelley, anſwering again, ſaid, That God would judge him in the laſt day, &c. Then ſaid the prieſt, Judge God or devil, the body ſhall not come there. And ſo they buried him in his own garden, where he is, no doubt, as near the kingdom of heaven, as if he had been buried in the midſt of the church.

Moreover, in the ſaid county of Salop, I find that one Oliver Richardine of the pariſh of Whitchurch, was burnt in Haverford-weſt, Sir John Ygone being ſheriff the ſame time, which ſeemeth to be about the laſt year of king Henry the eighth. Whoſe name, as it was not mentioned before, I thought here to give ſome little touch of him, having now in hand to ſpeak of the perſecution within the dioceſe of Coventry and Litchfield.

The Martyrdom of William Wolſey, and Robert Pygot, Painter.

WIlliam Wolſey and Robert Pygot, both inhabitants of the town of Wiſbich, were the next condemned after the ſuffering of Robert Glover and Cornelius Bungey. Theſe two bleſſed martyrs were judged and condemned at Ely, by John Fuller, the biſhop's chancellor of Ely, Dr. Shaxton his ſuffragan: Robert Stewart, dean of Ely; John Chriſtopherſon, dean of Norwich, October 9, 1555. The ſaid William Wolſey, who was then a conſtable, was brought into trouble by the procurement of one Richard Everard, gentleman, a juſtice appointed for thoſe days, who extremely handled the ſaid William Wolſey, and cauſed him to put in ſureties for his good behaviour and appearance at the next general ſeſſions held within the Iſle of Ely.

Being called again at the next ſeſſions, he was ſtill conſtrained to put in new ſureties, which at length he refuſed to do, and ſo was commanded to jail at the aſſize held at Ely, in Lent.

In the Eaſter week following, Dr. Fuller the chancellor, with Chriſtopherſon, and one Dr. Yong, came to confer with him, who laid earneſtly to his charge that he was out of the catholic faith, willing him to meddle no further with the ſcriptures, than it did become ſuch a lay-man as he was, to do. The ſaid William Wolſey ſtanding ſtill a great while, ſuffering them to ſay their pleaſure, at laſt he anſwered in this wiſe; Good Mr. Doctor, what did our Saviour Chriſt mean when he ſpake theſe words written in the 23d chapter of St. Matthew's goſpel? "Wo be unto you, ſcribes and phariſees, hypocrites; for ye ſhut up the kingdom of heaven againſt men; for ye neither go in yourſelves, neither ſuffer ye them that are entering, to go in."

Yea, ſaith Dr. Fuller, you muſt underſtand, that Chriſt ſpake to the ſcribes and phariſees.

Nay, Mr. Doctor, (ſaid Wolſey) Chriſt ſpake even to you, and your fellows here preſent, and to all others ſuch as you be.

Away Mr. Doctor, ſaid Chriſtopherſon, for you can do no good with this man. Yet, ſaith Dr. Fuller, I will leave thee a book to read, I promiſe thee, of a learned man's doctrine, that is to ſay, of Dr. Watſon's doing (who was then biſhop of Lincoln).

Wolſey receiving the ſame book, did diligently read it over, which in many places did manifeſtly appear contrary to the known truth of God's word. At length, a fort-a fortnight or three weeks following, the ſaid Dr. Fuller reſorting again to the priſon to confer with the ſaid Wolſey, aſked him how he liked the ſaid book (thinking that he had won him by the reading of the ſame); who anſwered, him and ſaid, Sir, I like the book no otherwiſe than I thought before I ſhould find it. Whereupon the chancellor taking his book, departed home.

At night when Dr. Fuller came to his chamber to look on it, he found in many places, contrary to his mind, the book raſed with a pen by the ſaid Wolſey. Which he ſeeing, and being vexed therewith, ſaid, O this is an obſtinate heretic, and hath quite marred my book.

Then the aſſizes to be held at Wiſbich drawing nigh, Dr. Fuller cometh again to the ſaid Wolſey, and ſpake unto him on this manner: Thou doſt much trouble my conſcience, wherefore I pray thee depart, and rule thy tongue, ſo that I hear no more complaint of thee, and come to the church when thou wilt; and if thou be complained upon, ſo far as I may, I promiſe thee I will not hear of it.

Mr. Doctor, ſaid Wolſey, I was brought hither by a law, and by a law I will be delivered.

Then being brought to the ſeſſions before named, Wolſey was laid in the caſtle at Wiſbich, he and all his friends thinking, that he ſhould have ſuffered there at that preſent time, but it proved otherwiſe.

Then Robert Pygot, the painter, being at liberty, was there preſented by ſome evil diſpoſed perſons (ſworn men as they called them), for not coming to the church.

The ſaid Pygot being called in the ſeſſions, would not abſent himſelf, but there did plainly appear before Sir Clement Hygham being judge, who ſaid unto him; Ah, are you the holy father the painter? How chance ye came not to the church? Sir, quoth the painter, I am not out of the church, I truſt in God.

No, Sir, ſaid the judge, this is no church, this is a hall. Yea, Sir, ſaid Pygot, I know very well it is a hall: but he that is in the true faith of Jeſus Chriſt, is never abſent, but preſent in the church of God.

Ah Sirrah, ſaid the judge, you are too high learned for me to talk withal, wherefore I will ſend you to them that are better learned than I, ſtraightways commanding him to the jail where Wolſey lay. So the ſeſſions being broke up and ended, the ſaid Wolſey and Pygot were carried again to Ely in priſon, where they both remained till the day of their death.

In the mean time ſome of their neighbours of Wiſbich being at Ely, came to ſee how they did. There came thither alſo a chaplain of biſhop Goodrick's, a Frenchman born, one Peter Valentius, who ſaid to the ſaid Wolſey and Pygot: My brethren, according to my office I am come to talk with you, for I have been amner here theſe twenty years and above. Wherefore I muſt deſire you, my brethren, to take it in good part that I am come to talk with you, I promiſe you not to pull you from your faith. But I both require and deſire in the name of Jeſus Chriſt, that you ſtand to the truth of the goſpel and word, and I beſeech the Almighty God, for his Son Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, to preſerve both you and me in the ſame unto the end. For I know not myſelf (my brethren) how ſoon I ſhall be at the ſame point that you are. Thus with many other like words he made an end, cauſing all that were there preſent to water their cheeks, contrary to the expectation they all had of him. God be praiſed therefore.

Then within a ſhort time after, Pygot and Wolſey were called to judgment about the 9th day of October, before Dr. Fuller then chancellor, with old Dr. Shaxton, Chriſtopherſon and others in commiſſion, who laid earneſtly to their charge for their belief in divers articles, but eſpecially the ſacrament of the altar. Whereunto their anſwer was, That the ſacrament of the altar was an idol, and that the natural body and blood of Chriſt was not preſent really in the ſaid ſacrament; and to this opinion they ſaid they would ſtick, perfectly believing the ſame to be no hereſy that they had affirmed, but the very truth, whereunto they would ſtand. Then the doctors ſaid, that they were out of the catholic faith.

Then Dr. Shaxton ſaid unto them, Good brethren, remember yourſelves, and become new men, for I myſelf was in this fond opinion that you are now in, but I am now become a new man.

Ah, ſaid Wolſey, are you become a new man? wo be to thee, thou wicked new man, for God ſhall juſtly judge thee.

Dr. Fuller then ſpake, ſaying, This Wolſey is an obſtinate fellow, and one that I could never do good upon. But as for the painter, he is a man quiet and indifferent (as far as I perceive), and is ſoon reformed, and may very well be delivered for any ill opinion I find in him.

Then Chriſtopherſon called for pen and ink, and wrote theſe words following; I Robert Pygot do believe, that after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the prieſt, there remaineth no more bread and wine, but the very body and blood of Chriſt really and ſubſtantially, the ſelf-ſame that was born of the virgin Mary: and reading it to the painter, he ſaid thus, Doſt thou believe all this according as it is written?

No, Sir, ſaid the painter, that is your faith, and not mine.

Chriſtopher. Lo, Dr. Fuller, you would have let this fellow go, he is as much an heretic as the other. And ſo immediately judgment was given upon them to die. Which done, after the ſentence read, they were ſent again to priſon, where they lay till the day of their death. On which day, one Peacock, a bachelor of divinity, being appointed to preach, took his text out of the firſt epiſtle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, chap. 5. of one that had lived inordinately by abuſing his father's wife; likening the ſaid Pygot and Wolſey to the ſame man, oftentimes ſaying, that ſuch members muſt be cut off from the congregation, moſt maliciouſly reporting the ſaid Wolſey to be clean out of the faith, and in many places quite denying the ſcriptures.

So his ſermon being ended, the aforeſaid Pygot and Wolſey were brought to the place of execution, and ſo bound to the ſtake with a chain, thither came one Sir Richard Collinſon a prieſt, at that time deſtitute of any abiding place or ſettled benefice, who ſaid unto Wolſey; Brother Wolſey, the preacher hath openly reported in his ſermon this day, that you are quite out of the catholic faith, and deny baptiſm, and that you do err in the holy ſcripture; wherefore I beſeech you for the certifying of my conſcience, with others here preſent, that you declare in what place of the ſcripture you do err or find fault.

Wolſey. I take the eternal and everlaſting God to witneſs, that I do err in no part or point of God's book, the holy bible, but hold and believe in the ſame to be moſt firm and ſound doctrine in all points moſt worthy for my ſalvation, and for all other chriſtians to the end of the world. Whatſoever mine adverſaries report of me, God forgive them therefore. With that came one to the fire with a great ſheet full of books to burn, like as they had been New Teſtaments. O, ſaid Wolſey, give me one of them, and Pygot deſired another, both of them clapping them cloſe to their breaſts, ſaying the 106th Pſalm, deſiring all the people to ſay Amen, and ſo received the fire moſt thankfully. Witneſſes and informers hereof were, Robert Scortred, Robert Crane, Edward Story, Robert Kendall, Richard Beſt, &c.

Concerning the ſtory of William Wolſey, I received moreover from the univerſity of Cambridge, by a credible perſon, and my faithful friend William Fulke, this relation, which I thought in this place not improper to be notified to the reader in order and form as followeth.

There were two godly martyrs burnt at Ely, the one named Wolſey, the other Pygot. In theſe two appeared a different diſpoſition of ſpirit. Pygot was mild, humble, and modeſt, promiſing that he would be conformable to his perſecutors, if they could perſuade him by the ſcripture. Wolſey was ſtout, ſtrong, and vehement, as one having the fullneſs of the Spirit, and deteſted all their doings, as of whom he was ſure to receive nothing but cruelty and tyranny. He was wonderfully jealous over his companion, fearing leſt his gentle nature would have been overcome by the flattering enticements of the world, and therefore the ſame day that they were burnt, when they would have talked with him alone, he pulled him away from them almoſt by force. He was ſo deſirous to glorify God with his ſuffering, that being wonderful ſore tormented in the priſon with the tooth-ach, he feared nothing more than that he ſhould depart before the day of execution (which he called his glad day) were come.

This Wolſey being in priſon at Ely, was viſited by Thomas Hodilo, brewer in Ely. To him he delivered certain money to be diſtributed (as he appointed) part to his wife, and part to his kinsfolks and friends, and eſpecially ſix ſhillings and eight-pence to be delivered to one Richard Denton, a ſmith, dwelling at Wells, in Cambridgeſhire, within the juriſdiction of the iſle of Ely, with his commendation, that he marvelled that he tarried ſo long behind him, ſeeing that he was the firſt that delivered him the book of ſcripture into his hand, and told him that it was the truth, deſiring him to make haſte after as faſt as he could.

This Thomas Hodilo, both to avoid the danger of the time, and to have a witneſs of his doings herein, delivered the ſaid ſum of money to one Mr. Laurence, a preacher in Eſſex (who then reſorted often to his houſe), to be diſtributed as Wolſey had appointed; which thing he performed, riding from place to place. And when this ſix ſhillings and eight-pence was delivered to Richard Denton, with the commendation aforeſaid: his anſwer was this, I confeſs it is true, but, alas! I cannot burn. This was almoſt one whole year after Wolſey was burnt. But he that could not burn for the cauſe of Chriſt, was afterwards burnt againſt his will, even after Chriſt had given peace to his church. For in the year of our Lord 1564, on Tueſday being the 18th day of April, his houſe was ſet on fire, and he going to ſave his goods, periſhed in the flames, with two others that were in the ſame houſe.

Witneſſed by Tho. Hodilo and Will. Fulke.

Not much unlike this, was the example of Mr. Weſt, chaplain to biſhop Ridley, who refuſing to die in the cauſe of Chriſt with his maſter, ſaid maſs againſt his conſcience, and died ſoon after.

The Hiſtory of Dr. Nicholas Ridley and Mr. Hugh Latimer, both Biſhops, Preachers, and Martyrs of Chriſt, with their Conferences and Sufferings deſcribed.

ON the 16th of October, 1555 (the day on which William Wolſey and Thomas Pygot ſuffered at Ely), thoſe two famous and ſingular captains, the principal pillars of Chriſt's church, Dr. Nicholas Ridley, biſhop of London, and Mr. H. Latimer, ſometime biſhop of Worceſter, were cruelly burnt in one fire at Oxford. Men, ever memorable for their piety, learning, and incomparable ornaments and gifts of grace, joined with no leſs commendable ſincerity of life, as the whole realm can ſufficiently teſtify; ſo it needeth not greatly that we ſhould ſtand exactly at this time in ſetting forth a full deſcription of the ſame, but only to comprehend briefly in a few words, touching the order of their lives, ſo much as neceſſarily ſerveth to the due inſtruction of the reader, and maketh to the uſe of this preſent hiſtory, in declaring firſt their beginning and bringing up, then their ſtudies and acts in the univerſity, their preferments alſo by their ſtudies to higher dignity, at laſt their care and trouble in ſetting forth religion, and in maintaining the ſame to the ſhedding of their blood. And firſt to begin with the life of Dr. Ridley, whoſe ſtory here enſueth.

Among many other worthy hiſtories and notable acts of ſuch as of late days have been troubled, murdered and martyred for the true goſpel of Chriſt in queen Mary's reign, the tragical ſtory and life of Dr. Ridley, I thought good to commend to chronicle, and leave to perpetual memory; beſeeching thee (gentle reader) with care and ſtudy well to peruſe, diligently to conſider, and deeply to print the ſame in thy breaſt, ſeeing him to be a man beautified with ſuch excellent qualities, ſo ghoſtly inſpired, and godly learned, and now written doubtleſs in the book of life, with the bleſſed ſaints of the Almighty, crowned and enthroned amongſt the glorious company of martyrs. Firſt, deſcending of a ſtock right worſhipful, he was born in the county of Northumberland, who being a child, learned his grammar with great dexterity in Newcaſtle, and was removed from thence to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he in ſhort time became ſo famous, that for his ſingular aptneſs, he was called to higher functions and offices of the univerſity, by degrees attaining thereunto; and was called to the head of Pembroke-Hall, and there made doctor of divinity. After this, departing from thence, he travelled to Paris, and at his return was made chaplain to king Henry the eighth, and promoted afterwards by him to the biſhoprick of Rocheſter, and from thence tranſlated to the ſee and biſhoprick of London in king Edward's days.

In which calling and offices he ſo diligently occupied himſelf by preaching and teaching the true and wholeſome doctrine of Chriſt, that no good child was more ſingularly loved by his dear parents, than he by his flock and dioceſe. Every holiday and Sunday he preached in ſome one place or other, except he were otherwiſe hindered by weighty affairs and buſineſs, to whoſe ſermons the people reſorted ſwarming about him like bees, and coveting the ſweet flowers and wholeſome juice of the fruitful doctrine, which he did not only preach, but ſhewed the ſame by his life, as a glittering lanthorn to the eyes and ſenſes of the blind, in ſuch pure order and chaſtity of life (declining from evil deſires and concupiſcences), that even his very enemies could not reprove him in any one jot thereof.

Beſides this, he was very well learned, his memory was great, and he of ſuch reading withal, that of right he deſerved to be compared to the beſt of this our age, as his notable works, pithy ſermons, and his ſundry diſputations in both the univerſities can well teſtify, and alſo his very adverſaries will ſay the ſame themſelves.

Beſides all this, he was wiſe of counſel, deep of wit, and very politic in all his doings. How merciful and careful he was to reduce the obſtinate papiſts from their erroneous opinions, and by gentleneſs to win them to the truth, his gentle ordering and courteous handling of Dr. Heath, late archbiſhop of York, being priſoner with him in king Edward's time in his houſe one year, ſufficiently declareth. In fine, he was ſuch a prelate, and in all points ſo good, pious and ſpiritual a man, that England may juſtly rue the loſs of ſo worthy a treaſure. And thus much concerning theſe public matters.

Now I will ſpeak ſomething further particularly of his perſon and conditions. He was a man right comely and well proportioned in all points, both in complexion and lineaments of the body. He took all things in good part, bearing no malice nor rancour from his heart, but ſtraitways forgetting all injuries and offences done againſt him. He was very kind and natural to his kinſfolk, and yet not bearing with them any otherwiſe than right would require, giving them always for a general rule, yea to his own brother and ſiſter, that they doing evil ſhould ſeek or look for nothing at his hand, but ſhould be as ſtrangers and aliens to him, and they to be his brother and ſiſter, who uſed honeſty and a godly trade of life.

He

He uſed all kinds of ways to mortify himſelf, and was much given to prayer and contemplation: For duly every morning, as ſoon as his apparel was put upon him, he went forthwith to his bed-chamber, and there upon his knees prayed the ſpace of half an hour; which being done, immediately he went to his ſtudy (if no other buſineſs came to interrupt him), where he continued till ten of the clock, and then came to the common prayer, daily uſed in his houſe. The prayers being done, he went to dinner; where he uſed little talk, except otherwiſe occaſion had been miniſtered, and then it was ſober, diſcreet and wiſe, and ſometimes merry, as cauſe required.

The dinner done, which was not very long, he uſed to ſit an hour or thereabouts talking, or playing at the cheſs: that done, he returned to his ſtudy, and there would continue, except ſuitors, or buſineſs abroad were occaſion of the contrary, until five of the clock at night, and then would come to common prayer, as in the forenoon; which being finiſhed, he went to ſupper, behaving himſelf there as at his dinner before. After ſupper recreating himſelf in playing at cheſs the ſpace of an hour, he would then return again to his ſtudy; continuing there till eleven of the clock at night, which was his common hour of going to bed, then ſaying his prayers upon his knees as in the morning when he roſe. Being at his manor of Fulham, as ſometimes he uſed to be, he read daily a lecture to his family at the common prayer, beginning at the Acts of the apoſtles, and ſo going through all the epiſtles of St. Paul, giving to every man that could read a New Teſtament, hiring them beſides with money to learn by heart certain principal chapters, but eſpecially the 13th chapter of the Acts of the apoſtles, reading alſo unto his houſhold oftentimes the 101ſt Pſalm, being marvellous careful over his family, that they might be a ſpectacle of all virtue and honeſty to others. To be ſhort, as he was godly and virtuous himſelf, ſo nothing but virtue and godlineſs reigned in his houſe, feeding them with the food of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

Now remaineth a word or two to be declared of his gentle nature and kind behaviour to old Mrs. Bonner, mother to Dr. Bonner ſometime biſhop of London, which I thought good to mention, as well for the rare clemency of Dr. Ridley, as the unworthy inhumanity and ungrateful diſpoſition again of Dr. Bonner. Biſhop Ridley being at his manor of Fulham, always ſent for the ſaid Mrs. Bonner, dwelling in a houſe adjoining to his houſe, to dinner and ſupper, with one Mrs. Mungey, Bonner's ſiſter, ſaying, Go for my mother Bonner; who coming, was always placed in the chair at the head of the table. being ſo gently treated, welcomed and taken, as though ſhe had been his own mother, being never diſplaced from her ſeat, although the king's council had been preſent; ſaying, when any of them were there (as ſeveral times they were), By your lordſhip's favour, this place of right and cuſtom is for my mother Bonner. But how well he was recompenſed for this his ſingular kindneſs, and gentle pity afterwards at the hands of the ſaid Dr. Bonner, almoſt the leaſt child that goeth on the ground can declare. For who afterwards was more enemy to Dr. Ridley than Dr. Bonner and his? Who more went about to ſeek his deſtruction than he? recompenſing this his gentleneſs with extreme cruelty: as well appeared by the ſtrict handling of Dr. Ridley's own ſiſter, and her huſband George Shipſide from time to time: whereas the gentleneſs of the other permitted Bonner's mother, ſiſter, and others of his kindred, not only quietly to enjoy all that which they had from biſhop Bonner, but alſo entertained them in his own houſe, ſhewing much courteſy and friendſhip daily unto them: whereas on the other ſide, biſhop Bonner being reſtored again, would not ſuffer the brother and ſiſter of biſhop Ridley, and others of his friends, not only not to enjoy that which they had by their ſaid brother biſhop Ridley, but alſo curriſhly, without all order of law or honeſty, wreſted from them all the livings they had.

And yet being not therewith ſatisfied, he ſought all the means he could to work the death of the foreſaid Shipſide, ſaying, that he would make twelve godfathers to go upon him; which indeed had been brought to paſs, at the time he was priſoner at Oxford, had not God otherwiſe wrought his deliverance by the means of Dr. Heath, then biſhop of Worceſter. Witneſſed by George Shipſide.

Whereby all good impartial readers may eaſily underſtand what great diverſity there was in the diſpoſition of theſe two natures. Inſomuch that as the one excelled in mercy and piety, ſo the other again, as much, or more, excelled in churliſh ingratitude, and deſpiteful diſdain. But of this matter enough.

Now concerning God's vocation, how Dr. Ridley was firſt called to the ſavouring and favouring of Chriſt and his goſpel, partly by his diſputation before, and by his other treatiſes it may appear, that the firſt occaſion of his converſion was by reading of Bertram's book of the ſacrament, whom alſo the conference with archbiſhop Cranmer, and with Peter Martyr, did not a little confirm in that behalf. Who now by the grace of God, being thoroughly won and brought to the true way, as he was before blind and zealous in his old ignorance, ſo was he conſtant and faithful in the right knowledge which the Lord had opened unto him (as well appeared by his life and doctrine during all the time of king Edward), and ſo long he did much good, when power and authority defended the goſpel, and ſupported the peace and happineſs of the church. But after it pleaſed God (in his wiſe providence) to bereave us of our ſtay, in taking from us that precious prince king Edward, the whole ſtate of the church of England was left deſolate and open to the enemies hand: ſo that biſhop Ridley, after the coming in of queen Mary, was one of the firſt that hands were laid on, and committed to priſon, as before hath been ſufficiently declared: firſt in the Tower, and from thence tranſlated with the archbiſhop of Canterbury and Mr. Latimer to Oxford, and with them incloſed in the common priſon of Bocardo, but at length being ſeparated from them, he was committed to cuſtody in the houſe of one Iriſh, where he remained till the day of his martyrdom, which was from the year of our Lord 1554, till October 16, 1555.

As for his diſputations at Oxford, his determination at Cambridge, his reaſons and conference in the Tower at the lieutenant's table, enough hath been ſaid already. Beſides, he had other conferences in priſon, both with Dr. Cranmer and Mr. Latimer, as here followeth to be read.

Conference between Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer in Priſon upon the Objections of Antonian, meaning by that Name ſome Popiſh Perſecutor, as Wincheſter, alluding thereby to the Story of Victor. lib. 3. De Perſecut. Aphri.

Dr. Ridley to Mr. Latimer.

IN writing again ye have done me an unſpeakable pleaſure, and I pray that the Lord may requite it you in that day. For I have received great comfort at your words: but yet I am not ſo filled withal, but that I thirſt much more now than before, to drink more of the cup of yours, wherein ye mingle unto me profitable with pleaſant. I pray you, good father, let me have one draught more to comfort my ſtomach. For ſurely except the Lord aſſiſt me with his gracious aid, in the time of his ſervice, I know I ſhall play but the part of a white-livered knight. But truly my truſt is in him, that in mine infirmity he ſhould try himſelf ſtrong, and that he can make the coward in his cauſe, to fight like a man.

Sir, now I daily look when Diotrephes with his warriors ſhall aſſault me: wherefore I pray you, good father, for for that you are an old ſoldier, and an expert warrior, and God knoweth I am but a young ſoldier, and as yet of ſmall experience in theſe feats, help me, I pray you, to buckle my harneſs. And now I would have you to think, that theſe darts are caſt at my head by ſome of Diotrephes', or Antonius' ſoldiers.

Lat. Except the Lord help me, ye ſay. Truth it is. For without me, ſaith he, ye can do nothing, much leſs ſuffer death by our adverſaries, through the bloody law now prepared againſt us. But it followeth, If you abide in me, and my word abide in you, aſk what you will, and it ſhall be done for you. What can be more comfortable? Sir, you make anſwer yourſelf ſo well, that I cannot better it. Sir, I begin now to ſmell what you mean by travailing thus with me; you uſe me as Bilney once did, when he converted me, pretending as though he would be taught by me, he ſought ways and means to teach me, and ſo do you. I thank you therefore moſt heartily. For indeed you miniſter armour unto me, whereas I was unarmed before and unprovided, ſaving that I give myſelf to prayer for my refuge.

The firſt objection of the Antonian.

All men marvel greatly, why you, after the liberty you have granted unto you, more than the reſt, do not go to maſs, which is a thing much eſteemed of all men, yea, of the queen herſelf.

Rid. Becauſe no man that layeth hand on the plough and looketh back, is fit for the kingdom of God, and alſo for the ſelf-ſame cauſe why St. Paul would not ſuffer Titus to be circumciſed, which is, that the truth of the goſpel might remain with us uncorrupt, Gal. 2. And alſo, if I build again the things which I deſtroyed, I make myſelf a treſpaſſer. This is likewiſe another cauſe: leſt I ſhould ſeem by outward fact to allow the thing, which I am perſuaded is contrary to ſound doctrine, and ſo ſhould be a ſtumbling-block unto the weak. But woe be unto him by whom offence cometh: it were better for him that a mill-ſtone were hanged about his neck, and he caſt into the midſt of the ſea.

The ſecond objection of the Antonian.

What is it then that offendeth you ſo greatly in the maſs, that you will not vouchſafe once either to hear it or ſee it? And from whence cometh this new religion upon you? Have not you uſed in times paſt to ſay maſs yourſelf?

Rid. I confeſs unto you my fault and ignorance; but know you that for theſe matters I have done penance long ago, both at Paul's Croſs, and alſo openly in the pulpit at Cambridge, and I truſt God hath forgiven me this mine offence: for I did it ignorantly. But if you be deſirous to know, and will vouchſafe to hear what things do offend me in the maſs, I will rehearſe thoſe things which be moſt clear, and ſeem moſt manifeſtly to repugn againſt God's word, and they be theſe: The ſtrange tongue, the want of the ſhewing of the Lord's death the breaking of the Lord's commandment of having a communion; the ſacrament is not communicated to all under both kinds, according to the word of the Lord; the ſign is ſervilely worſhipped for the thing ſignified; Chriſt's paſſion is injured, foraſmuch as this maſs-ſacrifice is affirmed to remain for the purging of ſins; to be ſhort, the manifold ſuperſtitions, and trifling fooleries which are in the maſs, and about the ſame.

Lat. Better a few things well pondered, than to trouble the memory with too much; you ſhall prevail more with praying than with ſtudying, though mixture be beſt, for ſo one ſhall alleviate the tedioufneſs of the other. I intend not to contend much with them in words, after a reaſonable account of my faith given: for it will be but in vain. They will ſay as their fathers ſaid, when they have no more to ſay: We have a law, and by our law he ought to die. Be ye ſtedfaſt and unmoveable, ſaith St. Paul; and again, Stand faſt: and how oft is this repeated, If ye abide, if ye abide, &c. But we ſhall be called obſtinate, ſturdy, ignorant, heady, and what not: ſo that a man hath need of much patience, having to do with ſuch men.

The third objection of the Antonian.

But you know how great a crime it is to ſeparate yourſelf from the communion or fellowſhip of the church, and to make a ſchiſm, or diviſion. You have been reported to have hated the ſect of the Anabaptiſts, and always to have impugned the ſame. Moreover, this was the pernicious error of Novatus, and of the heretics called [Cathari], that they would not communicate with the church.

Rid. I know that the unity of the church is to be retained by all means, and the ſame to be neceſſary to ſalvation. But I do not take the maſs, as it is at this day, for the communion of the church, but a popiſh device, whereby both the commandment and inſtitution of our Saviour Chriſt, for the oft frequenting of the remembrance of his death, is eluded, and the people of God are miſerably deluded. The ſect of the Anabaptiſts, and the hereſy of the Novations, ought of right to be condemned, foraſmuch as without any juſt or neceſſary cauſe they wickedly ſeparated themſelves from the communion of the congregation, for they did not alledge that the ſacraments were unduly adminiſtered, but turning away their eyes from themſelves, wherewith according to St. Paul's rule they ought to examine themſelves, and caſting their eyes ever upon others, either miniſters, or communicants with them, they always reproved ſomething for which they abſtained from the communion, as from an unholy thing.

Lat. I remember that Calvin beginneth to confute the Interim after this ſort with this ſaying of Hilary, The name of peace is beautiful, and the opinion of unity is fair: but who doubteth that to be the true and only peace of the church, which is Chriſt? I would you had that little book, there ſhould you ſee how much is to be given to unity. St. Paul, when he requireth unity, joineth with it, according to Jeſus Chriſt, no further. Diotrephes now of late did always harp upon unity, unity. Yea, Sir, ſaid I, but in verity, not in popery. Better is diverſity, than an unity in popery. I had nothing again but ſcornful taunts, with commandment to the Tower.

The fourth objection of the Antonian.

But admit there be in the maſs, that peradventure might be amended, or at leaſt made better: yea, ſeeing you will have it ſo, admit there be a fault; if you do not conſent thereto, why do you trouble yourſelf in vain? Do you not know both by Cyprian and Auguſtine, that communion of ſacraments doth not defile a man, but conſent of deeds?

Rid. If it were any one trifling ceremony, or if it were ſome one thing of itſelf indifferent (although I would wiſh nothing ſhould be done in the church which doth not edify the ſame), yet for the continuance of the common quietneſs I could be content to bear it. But foraſmuch as things done in the maſs tend openly to the overthrow of Chriſt's inſtitution, I judge that by no means either in word or deed I ought to conſent unto it. As for that which is objected out of the fathers, I acknowledge it to be well ſpoken, if it be well underſtood. But it is meant of them which ſuppoſe they are defiled, if any ſecret vice be either in the miniſters, or in them that communicate with them; and is not meant of them which do abhor ſuperſtition, and wicked traditions of men, and will not ſuffer the ſame to be thruſt upon themſelves, or upon the church, inſtead of God's word and the truth of the goſpel.

Lat. The very marrow-bones of the maſs are altogether deteſtable, and therefore by no means to be borne withal; ſo that of neceſſity the mending of it is to abolifh it for ever. For if you take away oblation and adoration, which do hang upon conſecration and tranſubſtantiation, ſtantiation, moſt of the papiſts will not ſet a button by the maſs, as a thing which they eſteem not, but for the gain that followeth thereon. For if the Engliſh communion which of late was uſed, were as gainful to them, as the maſs hath been heretofore, they would ſtrive no more for their maſs: from thence groweth the grief.

The fifth objection of the Antonian.

Conſider into what dangers you caſt yourſelf, if you forſake the church; and you cannot but forſake it, if you refuſe to go to maſs. For the maſs is the ſacrament of unity; without the ark, there is no ſalvation. The church is the ark and Peter's ſhip. Ye know this ſaying well enough: He ſhall not have God to be his Father, which acknowledgeth not the church to be his mother. Moreover without the church (ſaith St. Auguſtine), be the life never ſo well ſpent, it ſhall not inherit the kingdom of heaven.

Rid. The holy catholic or univerſal church, which is the communion of ſaints, the houſe of God, the city of God, the ſpouſe of Chriſt, the body of Chriſt, the pillar and ſtay of the truth; this church I believe, according to the creed. This church I do reverence and honour in the Lord. But the rule of this church is the word of God, according to which rule we go forward unto life. And as many as walk according to this rule, I ſay with St. Paul, Peace be upon them, and upon Iſrael which pertaineth unto God. The guide of this church is the Holy Ghoſt. The marks whereby this church is known unto me in this dark world, and in the midſt of this crooked and froward generation, are theſe; The ſincere preaching of God's holy word, the due adminiſtration of the ſacraments, charity, and faithful obſerving of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, according to the word of God. And that church or congregation which is garniſhed with theſe marks, is in very deed that heavenly Jeruſalem, which conſiſteth of thoſe that be born from above. This is the mother of us all, and by God's grace I will live and die the child of this church. Forth of this (I grant) there is no ſalvation; and I ſuppoſe the reſt of the places objected are rightly to be underſtood of this church only. In times paſt (ſaith Chryſoſtom) there were many ways to know the church of Chriſt, that is to ſay, by good life, by miracles, by chaſtity, by doctrine, by adminiſtering the ſacraments. But from that time that hereſies did take hold of the church, it is only known by the ſcriptures, which is the true church. They have all things in outward ſhew, which the true church hath in truth. They have temples like unto ours.

And in the end concluded: Wherefore only by the ſcriptures do we know which is the true church. To that which they ſay, That the maſs is the ſacrament of unity, I anſwer; The bread which we break, according to the inſtitution of the Lord, is the ſacrament of the unity of Chriſt's myſtical body. For we being many are one bread and one body, foraſmuch as we all are partakers of one bread. But in the maſs the Lord's inſtitution is not obſerved; for we are not all partakers of one bread, but one devoureth all, &c. So that (as it is uſed) it may ſeem a ſacrament of ſingularity, and of a certain ſpecial privilege for one ſect of people, whereby they may be diſcerned from the reſt, rather than a ſacrament of unity, wherein our knitting together in one is repreſented.

Lat. Yea, what fellowſhip hath Chriſt with Antichriſt? Therefore it is not lawful to bear the yoke with papiſts. Come forth from among them, and ſeparate yourſelves from them, ſaith the Lord. It is one thing to be the church indeed, another thing to counterfeit the church. Would God it were well known what is the forſaking of the church. In the king's days that is dead, who was the church of England? The king and his favourers, or maſs-mongers in corners? If the king and the favourers of his proceedings, why be we not now the church, abiding in the ſame proceedings? If private maſs-mongers might be of the church, and yet contrary to the king's proceedings, why may not we as well be of the church contrary to the queen's proceedings? Not all that are covered with the title of the church, are the church indeed. Separate thyſelf from them that are ſuch, ſaith St. Paul; From whom? The text hath before, If any man follow other doctrine, &c. he is puffed up, and knoweth nothing, &c. Weigh the whole text, that ye may perceive what is the fruit of contentious diſputations: but wherefore are ſuch men ſaid to know nothing, when they know ſo many things? You know the old verſes,

Hoc eſt neſcire, ſine Chriſto plurima ſcire:
Si Chriſtum bene ſcis, ſatis eſt, ſi cætera neſcis.

That is, "This is to be ignorant, to know many things without Chriſt. If thou knoweſt Chriſt well, thou knoweſt enough, though thou know no more." Therefore would St. Paul know nothing but Jeſus Chriſt crucified, &c. As many as are papiſts and maſs-mongers, they may well be ſaid to know nothing. For they know not Chriſt, foraſmuch as in their maſſing they take much away from the benefit and merit of Chriſt.

The ſixth objection of the Antonian.

That church which you have deſcribed to me is inviſible, but Chriſt's church is viſible and known. For elſe why ſhould Chriſt have ſaid, Tell it unto the church. For he had commanded in vain to go unto the church, if a man cannot tell which it is.

Rid. The church which I have deſcribed is viſible, it hath members which may be ſeen; and alſo I have before declared, by what marks and tokens it may be known, but if either our eyes are ſo dazzled, that we cannot ſee, or that Satan hath brought ſuch darkneſs into the world, that it is hard to diſcern the true church; that is not the fault of the church, but either of our blindneſs or of Satan's darkneſs. But yet in this moſt deep darkneſs there is one moſt clear candle, which of itſelf alone is able to put away all darkneſs. Thy word is a candle unto my feet, and a light unto my ſteps.

The ſeventh objection of the Antonian.

The church of Chriſt is a catholic or univerſal church, diſperſed throughout the whole world; this church is the great houſe of God, in this are good men and evil mingled together, goats and ſheep, corn and chaff; it is the net which gathereth all kind of fiſhes: this church cannot err, becauſe Chriſt hath promiſed it his Spirit, which ſhall lead it into all truth, and that the gates of hell ſhall not prevail againſt it; that he will be with it unto the end of the world; whatſoever it ſhall looſe or bind upon earth, ſhall be ratified in heaven, &c. This church is the pillar and ſtay of the truth: this is it for which St. Auguſtine ſaith, he believeth the goſpel: but this univerſal church alloweth the maſs, becauſe the greater part of the ſame alloweth it. Therefore, &c.

Rid. I grant that the name of the church is taken after three divers manners in the ſcripture. Sometimes for the whole multitude of them who profeſs the name of Chriſt, of which they are alſo named Chriſtians. But as St. Paul ſaith of the Jew, Not every one is a Jew, that is a Jew outwardly, &c. neither yet all that be of Iſrael are counted the ſeed; even ſo not every one that is a chriſtian outwardly is a chriſtian indeed. For if any man have not the Spirit of Chriſt, the ſame is none of his. Therefore that church which is his body, and of which Chriſt is the head, ſtandeth only in living ſtones, and true chriſtians, not only outwardly in name and title, but inwardly in heart and in truth. But foraſmuch as this church (which is the ſecond taking of the church), as touching the outward fellowſhip, is contained within the great houſe, and hath with the ſame, outward ſociety of the ſacraments and miniſtry of the word, many things are ſpoken of that univerſal church (which St. Auguſtine calleth the mingled church), which cannot truly be underſtood but only of that pure part of the church. So that the rule of Ticonius concerning the mingled church, may here well take place; where there is attributed unto the whole church that which cannot agree to the ſame, but by reaſon of the one part thereof; that is, either for the multitude of good men, which is the very true church indeed; or for the multitude of evil men, which is the malignant church and ſynagogue of Satan. And there is alſo a third taking of the church; of which, although there be ſeldomer mention in the ſcriptures, in that ſignification, yet in the world, even in the moſt famous aſſemblies of Chriſtendom, this church hath borne the greateſt ſway. This diſtinction preſuppoſed of the three ſorts of churches, it is an eaſy matter, by a figure called Synecdoche, to give to the mingled and univerſal church, that which cannot truly be underſtood but only of the one part thereof. But if any man will ſtiffly affirm, that Univerſal doth ſo pertain unto Church, that whatſoever Chriſt hath promiſed to the church, it muſt needs be underſtood of that, I would gladly know of the ſame man, where that univerſal church was in the times of the patriarchs and prophets, of Noah, Abraham, and Moſes (at ſuch time as the people would have ſtoned him), of Elias, of Jeremiah, in the times of Chriſt, and the diſperſion of the apoſtles, in the time of Arius, when Conſtantius was emperor, and Felix biſhop of Rome ſucceeded Liberius. It is worthy to be noted, that Lyra writeth upon Matthew; The church (ſaith he) doth not ſtand in men by reaſon of their power or dignity, whether it be eccleſiaſtical or ſecular. For many princes and popes, and other inferiors, have been found to have fallen away from God. Therefore the church conſiſteth in thoſe perſons, in whom is true knowledge and confeſſion of the faith, and of the truth. Evil men (as it is in a gloſs of the decrees) are in the church in name, and not in deed. And St. Auguſtine (Contra Creſconium grammaticum) ſaith, Whoſoever is afraid to be deceived by the darkneſs of this queſtion, let him aſk counſel at the ſame church of it: which church the ſcripture doth point out without any doubtfulneſs. All my notes which I have written and gathered out of ſuch authors as I have read in this matter, and ſuch like, are come into the hands of ſuch as will not let me have the leaſt of all my written books; wherein I am inforced to complain of them unto God: for they ſpoil me of all my labours, which I have taken in my ſtudy theſe many years. My memory was never good, for help whereof I have uſed, for the moſt part, to gather out notes of my reading, and ſo to place them, that thereby I might have had the uſe of them when the time required. But who knoweth whether this be God's will, that I ſhould be thus ordered, and ſpoiled of the poor learning I had (as I thought) in ſtore, to the intent that I now deſtitute of that, ſhould from henceforth, with St. Paul, learn only to know Chriſt, and him crucified? The Lord grant me herein to be a good young ſcholar, and to learn this leſſon ſo well, that neither death nor life, wealth nor woe, &c. make me ever to forget that, Amen, Amen.

Lat. I have no more to ſay in this matter; for you yourſelf have ſaid all that is to be ſaid. That ſame vehement ſaying of St. Auguſtine, I would not believe the goſpel, &c. was wont to trouble many men; as I remember, I have read it well qualified of Philip Melancthon; but my memory is altogether ſlippery. This it is in effect; the church is not a judge, but a witneſs. There were ſome in his time that lightly eſteemed the teſtimony of the church, and the outward miniſtry of preaching, and rejected the outward word itſelf, ſticking only to their inward revelations. Such raſh contempt of the word provoked and drave St. Auguſtine into that exceſſive vehemency. In which after the bare ſound of the words, he might ſeem to ſuch as do not attain unto his meaning, that he preferred the church far before the goſpel, and that the church hath a free authority over the ſame; but that pious man never thought ſo. It were a ſaying worthy to be brought forth againſt the Anabaptiſts, who think the open miniſtry to be a thing not neceſſary, if they any thing eſteemed ſuch teſtimonies. I would not ſtick to affirm, that the moſt part of the great houſe, that is to ſay, of the whole univerſal church, may eaſily err. And again, I would not ſtick to affirm, that it is one thing to be gathered together in the name of Chriſt, and another thing to come together with a maſs of the Holy Ghoſt going before. For in the firſt, Chriſt ruleth; in the latter, the devil beareth the ſway; and how then can any thing be good that they go about? From this latter ſhall our ſix articles come forth again into the light, they themſelves being very darkneſs. But it is demanded, whether the ſounder or better part of the catholic church may be ſeen of men, or no? St. Paul ſaith, The Lord knoweth them that are his. What manner of ſpeaking is this in commendation of the Lord, if we knew as well as he who are his? Well, thus is the text: "The ſure foundation of God ſtandeth ſtill, and hath this ſeal, The Lord knoweth them that are his; and let every man that nameth the name of Chriſt depart from iniquity." Now how many are there of the whole catholic church of England who depart from iniquity? How many of the noblemen, how many of the biſhops or clergy, how many of the rich men or merchants, how many of the queen's counſellors, yea, how many of the whole realm? In how ſmall room then I pray you is the true church within the realm of England? And where is it? And in what ſtate? I had a conceit of mine own well grounded (as they ſay) when I began, but now it is fallen by the way.

The eighth objection of the Antonian.

General councils repreſent the univerſal church, and have this promiſe of Chriſt: "Where two or three be gathered together in my name, there am I in the midſt of them." If Chriſt be preſent with two or three, then much more where there is ſo great a multitude, &c. But in general councils maſs hath been approved and uſed. Therefore, &c.

Rid. Of the univerſal church, which is mingled of good and bad, thus I think; Whenſoever they which be chief in it, which rule and govern the ſame, and to whom the whole myſtical body of Chriſt doth obey, are the lively members of Chriſt, and walk after the guiding and rule of his word, and go before the flock towards everlaſting life, then undoubtedly councils gathered together of ſuch guides and paſtors of the chriſtian flock, do indeed repreſent the univerſal church; and being ſo gathered in the name of Chriſt, they have a promiſe of the gift and guiding of his Spirit into all truth. But that any ſuch council hath at any time allowed the maſs, ſuch an one was of late, in a ſtrange tongue, and ſtuffed with ſo many abſurdities, errors and ſuperſtitions; that I utterly deny, and affirm it to be impoſſible. For like as there is no agreement betwixt light and darkneſs, betwixt Chriſt and Belial; ſo ſurely ſuperſtition and the ſincere religion of Chriſt, will-worſhip, and the pure worſhipping of God, ſuch as God requireth of his, that is, in ſpirit and truth, can never agree together. But ye will ſay, where ſo great a company is gathered together, it is not credible but there are two or three gathered in the name of Chriſt. I anſwer, If there be one hundred good, and two hundred bad (foraſmuch as the decrees and ordinances are pronounced according to the greater number of the multitude of voices), what can the leſs number of voices avail? It is a known thing, and a common proverb; Oftentimes the greater part overcometh the better.

Lat. As touching general councils, at this preſent I have no more to ſay than you have ſaid. Only I refer you to your own experience, to think of our country parliaments and convocations, how and what ye have ſeen and heard. The greater part in my time did bring forth ſix articles; for then the king would have it ſo, being ſeduced of certain.

tain. Afterward the greater part did repel the ſame, our good Joſias willing to have it ſo. The ſame articles now again (alas) another great but worſe part hath reſtored. O what an uncertainty is this! But after this manner moſt commonly are man's proceedings, God be merciful unto us! Who ſhall deliver us from ſuch torments of mind? Therefore is death the beſt phyſician but unto the faithful, whom ſhe together and at once delivereth from all griefs. You muſt think this written upon this occaſion, becauſe you would needs have your paper blotted.

The ninth objection of the Antonian.

If the matter ſhould go thus, that in general councils men ſhould not ſtand to the greater number of the multitude (I mean of them which ought to give voices), then ſhould no certain rule be left unto the church, by which controverſies in weighty matters might be determined; but it is not to be believed, that Chriſt would leave his church deſtitute of ſo neceſſary a help and ſafeguard.

Rid. Chriſt, who is the moſt loving ſpouſe of his church, who alſo gave himſelf for it, that he might ſanctify it unto himſelf, did give unto it abundantly all things which are neceſſary to ſalvation; but yet ſo, that the church ſhould declare itſelf obedient unto him in all things, and keep itſelf within the bounds of his commandments, and further not to ſeek any thing which he teacheth not, as neceſſary unto ſalvation. Now further, for determination of all controverſies in Chriſt's religion, Chriſt himſelf hath left unto the church not only Moſes and the prophets, whom he willeth in all doubts to go unto, and aſk counſel at, but alſo the goſpels, and the reſt of the body of the New Teſtament; in which whatſoever is heard of Moſes and the prophets, and whatſoever is neceſſary to be known unto ſalvation, is revealed and opened.

So that now we have no need to ſay, Who ſhall climb up into heaven, or who ſhall go down into the depth, to tell us what is needful to be done? Chriſt hath done both, and hath commended to us the word of faith, which alſo is abundantly declared unto us in his word written; ſo that hereafter if we walk earneſtly in this way, to the ſearching out of the truth, it is not to be doubted, but through the certain benefit of Chriſt's Spirit, which he hath promiſed unto his, we may find it, and obtain everlaſting life. Should men aſk counſel of the dead for the living? ſaith Iſaiah. Let them go rather to the law and to the teſtimony, &c. Chriſt ſendeth them that be deſirous to know the truth, unto the ſcriptures, ſaying, Search the ſcriptures. I remember a like thing well ſpoken of St. Jerome; Ignorance of the ſcriptures is the mother and cauſe of all errors. And in another place, as I remember in the ſame author; The knowledge of the ſcriptures is the food of everlaſting life. But now methinks I enter into a very broad ſea, in that I begin to ſhew, either out of the ſcriptures themſelves, or out of the ancient writers, how much the holy ſcripture is of force to teach the truth of our religion. But this is it, that I am now about, that Chriſt would have the church his ſpouſe in all doubts to aſk counſel at the word of his Father written, and faithfully left, and commended unto it in both Teſtaments, the old and new. Neither do we read, that Chriſt in any place hath laid ſo great a burden upon the members of his ſpouſe, that he hath commanded them to go to the univerſal church. Whatſoever things are written, ſaith St. Paul, are written for our learning. And it is true, that Chriſt gave unto his church, ſome apoſtles, ſome prophets, ſome evangeliſts, ſome ſhepherds and teachers, to the edifying of the ſaints, till we come all to the unity of faith, &c. But that all men ſhould meet together out of all parts of the world, to define of the articles of our faith, I neither find it commanded by Chriſt, nor written in the word of God.

There is difference betwixt things pertaining to God or faith, and politic and civil matters. For in the firſt we muſt ſtand only to the ſcriptures, which are able to make us all perfect and inſtructed unto ſalvation, if they well be underſtood. And they offer themſelves to be well underſtood only to them, which have good wills, and give themſelves to ſtudy and prayer. Neither are there any men leſs apt to underſtand them, than the prudent and wiſe men of the world. But in the other, that is, in civil and political matters, oftentimes the magiſtrates do tolerate a leſs evil, for avoiding of a greater, as they which have this ſaying oft in their mouths; Better an inconveniency than a miſchief. And it is the property of a wiſe man, ſaith one, to diſſemble many things; and he that cannot diſſemble, cannot rule. In which ſayings they bewray themſelves, that they do not earneſtly weigh what is juſt, and what is not. Wherefore forſomuch as man's laws, if it be but in this reſpect only, that they be deviſed by men, are not able to bring any thing to perfection, but are inforced of neceſſity to ſuffer many things out of ſquare, and are compelled ſometimes to wink at the worſt things: ſeeing they know not how to maintain the common peace and quiet otherwiſe, they do ordain that the greater part ſhall take place. You know what theſe kind of ſpeeches mean, I ſpeak after the manner of men; ye walk after the manner of men, all men are lyars. And that of St. Auguſtine, If ye live after man's reaſon, ye do not live after the will of God.

The tenth objection of the Antonian.

If ye ſay that councils have ſometimes erred, or may err, how then ſhould we believe the catholic church? for that councils are gathered by the authority of the catholic church.

Rid. From may be, to be indeed, is no good argument. But from being, to may be, no man doubteth but it is a moſt ſure argument. But now that councils have ſometimes erred, it is manifeſt. How many councils were there in the eaſt parts of the world, which condemned the Nicene council? and all thoſe who would not forſake the ſame, they called by a ſlanderous name (as they thought) Homouſians. Was not Athanaſius, Chryſoſtom, Cyril, Euſtachius, men very well learned, and of godly life, baniſhed and condemned as famous heretics, and that by wicked councils? How many things are there in the canons and conſtitutions of the councils, which the papiſts themſelves do much miſlike? But here peradventure one man will ſay unto me, We will grant you this in provincial councils, or councils of ſome one nation, that they may ſometimes err, forſomuch as they do not repreſent the univerſal church; but it is not to be believed, that the general and full councils have erred at any time. Here if I had my books of the councils, or rather ſuch notes as I have gathered out of thoſe books, I could bring ſomething which ſhould ſerve for this purpoſe. But now ſeeing I have them not, I will recite one place only out of St. Auſtin, which, in my judgment, may ſuffice in this matter inſtead of many. Who knoweth not (ſaith he) that the holy ſcripture is ſo ſet before us, that it is not lawful to doubt of it, and that the letters of biſhops may be reproved by other men's words, and by councils, and that the councils themſelves which are gathered by provinces and countries, do give place to the authority of the general and full councils: and that the former and general councils are amended by the latter, when as by ſome experience of things, either what was ſhut up is opened, or that which was hid is known. Thus much out of St. Auſtin. But I will plead with our Antonian upon matter confeſſed. Here with us when as popery reigned, I pray you how doth that book, which was called, The biſhop's book, made in the time of king Henry the eighth, whereof the biſhop of Wincheſter is thought to be either the firſt father, or chief gatherer; how doth it (I ſay) ſharply reprove the Florentine council, in which was decreed the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, and that with the conſent of the emperor of Conſtantinople, and of the Grecians? So that in thoſe days our learned ancient fathers and biſhops of England did not ſtick to affirm, that a general council might err. But methinks I hear another man deſpiſing all that I have brought forth, and ſaying, Theſe which you have called councils, are not worthy to be called councils, but rather aſſemblies and conventicles of heretics. I pray you, Sir, why do you judge them worthy of ſo ſcandalous a name? Becauſe (ſaith he) they decreed things heretical, contrary to ſound doctrine and true godlineſs, and againſt the faith of chriſtian religion. The cauſe is weighty for which they ought of right ſo to be called. But if it be ſo that all councils ought to be deſpiſed which decree any thing contrary to ſound doctrine, and the true word, which is according to godlineſs, forſomuch as the maſs, ſuch as we had here of late, is openly againſt the word of God; forſooth, it muſt of neceſſity follow, that all ſuch councils, as have approved ſuch maſſes, ought of right to be ſhunned and deſpiſed, as conventicles and aſſemblies that ſtray from the truth.

Another man alledgeth unto me the authority of the biſhop of Rome, without which neither can the councils (ſaith he) be lawfully gathered, neither being gathered determine any thing concerning religion. But this objection is only grounded upon the ambitious and ſhameleſs maintenance of the Romiſh tyranny and uſurped dominion over the clergy; which tyranny we Engliſh men long ago, by the conſent of the whole realm, have expulſed and abjured. And how rightly we have done it, a little book ſet forth of both the powers, doth clearly ſhew. I grant that the Romiſh ambition hath gone about to challenge to itſelf, and to uſurp ſuch a privilege of old time. But the council of Carthage, in the year of our Lord 457, did openly withſtand it, and alſo the council at Milevite, in which St. Auſtin was preſent, did prohibit any appellations to be made to biſhops beyond the ſea.

The eleventh objection of the Antonian.

St. Auſtin ſaith, the good men are not to be forſaken for the evil, but the evil are to be borne withal for the good. Ye will not ſay (I ſuppoſe) that in our congregations all be evil.

Rid. I ſpeak nothing of the goodneſs or badneſs of your congregations; but I fight in Chriſt's quarrel againſt the maſs, which doth utterly take away and overthrow the ordinance of Chriſt. Let that be taken quite away, and then the partition of the wall that made the ſtrife ſhall be broken down. Now to the place of St. Auſtin, For bearing with the evil for the good's ſake, there ought to be added other words, which the ſame writer hath expreſſed in other places; that is, if thoſe evil men do caſt abroad no ſeeds of falſe doctrine, nor lead others to deſtruction by their example.

The twelfth objection of the Antonian.

It is perilous to attempt any new thing in the church, which lacketh example of good men. How much more perilous is it to commit any act, unto which the example of the prophets, of Chriſt, and of the apoſtles are contrary? But unto this your fact, in abſtaining from the church by reaſon of the maſs, the example of the prophets, of Chriſt, and of the apoſtles, are clear contrary: Therefore, &c. The firſt part of the argument is evident, and the ſecond part I prove thus. In the times of the prophets, of Chriſt, and his apoſtles, all things were moſt corrupt. The people were miſerably given to ſuperſtition, the prieſts deſpiſed the law of God; and yet notwithſtanding we read not that the prophets made any ſchiſms or diviſions; and Chriſt himſelf haunted the temple, and taught in the temple of the Jews. Peter and John went up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer; Paul after the reading of the law, being deſired to ſay ſomething to the people, did not refuſe to do it. Yea further, no man can ſhew, that either the prophets, or Chriſt, or his apoſtles, did refuſe to pray together with others, to ſacrifice, or to be partakers of the ſacrament of Moſes' law.

Rid. I grant the former part of your argument; and to the ſecond part I ſay, that although it contain many true things, as of the corrupt ſtate in the times of the prophets, of Chriſt, and the apoſtles, and of the temple being frequented by Chriſt and his apoſtles; yet notwithſtanding the ſecond part of your argument is not ſufficiently proved. For ye ought to have proved, that either the prophets, either Chriſt or his apoſtles did in the temple communicate with the people in any kind of worſhipping which is forbidden by the law of God, or repugnant to the word of God. But that can no where be ſhewed. And as for the church, I am not angry with it, and I never refuſed to go to it, and to pray with the people, to hear the word of God, and to do all other things whatſoever may agree with the word of God. St. Auſtin ſpeaking of the ceremonies of the Jews (I ſuppoſe in the epiſtle ad Januarium), although he grants they grievouſly oppreſſed that people, both for the number and bondage of the ſame, yet he calleth them burdens of the law, which were delivered unto them in the word of God, not preſumptions of men, which notwithſtanding if they were not contrary to God's word, might in ſome meaſure be borne withal. But now, ſeeing they are contrary to ſuch things as are written in the word of God, whether they ought to be borne by any chriſtian or no, let him judge who is ſpiritual, who feareth God more than man, and loveth everlaſting life more than this ſhort and tranſitory life. To that which was ſaid, that my fact lacketh example of the godly fathers that have gone before, the contrary is moſt evident in the hiſtory of Toby: of whom it is ſaid, that when all others went to the golden calves, which Jeroboam the king of Iſrael had made, he himſelf alone fled from their company, and got him to Jeruſalem unto the temple of the Lord, and there worſhipped the Lord God of Iſrael. Did not the man of God threaten grievous plagues both unto the prieſts of Bethel, and to the altar which Jeroboam had there made after his own fantaſy? Which plagues king Joſias, the true miniſter of God, did execute at the time appointed. And where do we read, that the prophets or the apoſtles did agree with the people in their idolatry, when as the people went a whoring with their hill-altars? For what cauſe, I pray you, did the prophets rebuke the people ſo much, as for their falſe worſhipping of God after their own minds, and not after God's word? For what was ſo much as that was? Wherefore the falſe prophets ceaſed not to malign the true prophets of God: therefore they beat them, they baniſhed them, &c. How elſe, I pray you, can you underſtand what St. Paul alledgeth, when he ſaith, "What concord hath Chriſt with Belial? or what part hath the believer with the infidel? or how agreeth the temple of God with images? for ye are the temple of the living God, as God himſelf hath ſaid; I will dwell among them, and will be their God, and they ſhall be my people. Wherefore, come out from among them, and ſeparate yourſelves from them (ſaith the Lord), and touch no unclean thing; ſo will I receive you, and be a Father unto you, and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters, ſaith the Lord God Almighty."

Judith, that holy woman, would not ſuffer herſelf to be defiled with the meats of the wicked. All the ſaints of God, which truly feared God, when they have been provoked to do any thing which they knew to be contrary to God's laws, have choſe to die rather than to forſake the laws of their God. Wherefore the Maccabees put themſelves in danger of death for the defence of the law, and at length died manfully in the defence of the ſame. If we do praiſe (ſaith St. Auguſtine) the Maccabees, and that with great admiration, becauſe they did ſtoutly ſtand even unto death, for the law of their country; how much more ought we to ſuffer all things for our baptiſm, for the ſacrament of the body and blood of of Chriſt, &c? But the ſupper of the Lord, ſuch a one (I mean) as Chriſt commandeth us to celebrate, the maſs utterly aboliſheth, and corrupteth moſt ſhamefully.

Lat. Who am I that I ſhould add any thing to this which you have ſpoken? Nay, I rather thank you that have vouchſafed to miniſter ſo plentiful armour to me, being otherwiſe altogether unarmed, ſaving that he cannot be left deſtitute of help, who rightly truſteth in the help of God. I only learn to die in reading of the New Teſtament, and am ever now and then praying unto my God, that he will be an helper unto me in time of need.

The thirteenth objection of the Antonian.

Seeing you are ſo obſtinately ſet againſt the maſs, that you affirm, becauſe it is done in a tongue not underſtood of the people, and for other cauſes, I cannot tell what; therefore is it not the true ſacrament ordained of Chriſt? I begin to ſuſpect you, that you think not catholicly of baptiſm alſo. Is our baptiſm, which we do uſe in a tongue unknown unto the people, the true baptiſm of Chriſt, or no? If it be, then the ſtrange tongue doth not hurt the maſs. If it be not the baptiſm of Chriſt, tell me how you were baptized. Or whether will ye (as the anabaptiſts do), that all which were baptized in Latin, ſhould be baptized again in the Engliſh tongue?

Rid. Although I would wiſh baptiſm to be given in the vulgar tongue for the people's ſake which are preſent, that they may the better underſtand their own profeſſion, and alſo be more able to teach their children the ſame, yet notwithſtanding there is not like neceſſity of the vulgar tongue in baptiſm, as in the Lord's ſupper. Baptiſm is given to children, who by reaſon of their age are not able to underſtand what is ſpoken unto them, what tongue ſoever it be. The Lord's ſupper is, and ought to be given to them that are at years of maturity. Moreover, in baptiſm, which is accuſtomed to be given to children in the Latin tongue, all the ſubſtantial points (as a man would ſay) which Chriſt commanded to be done, are obſerved. And therefore I judge that baptiſm to be a perfect and true baptiſm; and that it is not only not needful, but alſo not lawful for any man ſo baptized, to be chriſtened again. But yet notwithſtanding, they ought to be taught the catechiſm of the chriſtian faith, when they ſhall come to years of diſcretion; which catechiſm whoſoever deſpiſeth, or will not deſirouſly embrace and willingly learn, in my judgment he playeth not the part of a chriſtian man. But in the popiſh maſs are wanting certain ſubſtantials, that is to ſay, things commanded by the word of God to be obſerved in the miniſtration of the Lord's ſupper: of which there is ſufficient declaration made before.

Lat. Where you ſay [I would wiſh] ſurely I would wiſh that you had ſpoken more vehemently, and to have ſaid, It is of neceſſity, that all things in the congregation ſhould be done in the vulgar tongue, for the edifying and comfort of them that are preſent, notwithſtanding that the child itſelf is ſufficiently baptized in the Latin tongue.

The fourteenth objection of the Antonian.

Foraſmuch as I perceive you are ſo ſtiffly, I will not ſay obſtinately bent, and ſo wedded to your opinion, that no gentle exhortations, no wholeſome counſels, no other kind of means can call you home to a better mind, there remaineth that which in like caſes was wont be the only remedy againſt ſtiff-necked and ſtubborn perſons, that is, you muſt be hampered by the laws and be compelled to obey whether ye will or no, or elſe to ſuffer that which a rebel to the laws ought to ſuffer. Do you not know that whoſoever refuſeth to obey the laws of the realm, he bewrayeth himſelf to be an enemy to his country? Do not you know that this is the readieſt way to ſtir up ſedition and civil war? It is better that you ſhould bear your own ſin, than that through the example of your breach of the common laws, the common quiet ſhould be diſturbed. How can you ſay, you will be the queen's true ſubject, when as you do openly profeſs that you will not keep her laws?

Rid. O heavenly Father, the Father of all wiſdom, underſtanding, and true ſtrength, I beſeech thee for thy only Son our Saviour Chriſt's ſake, look mercifully upon me wretched creature, and ſend thy Holy Spirit into my breaſt, that not only I may underſtand according to thy wiſdom, how this peſtilent and deadly dart is to be borne off, and with what anſwer it is to be beaten back, but alſo when I muſt join to fight in the field for the glory of thy name, that then I being ſtrengthened with the defence of thy right hand, may manfully ſtand in the confeſſion of thy faith, and of thy truth, and continue in the ſame unto the end of my life, through the ſame our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

Now to the objection. I grant it to be reaſonable, that he which by words and gentleneſs cannot be made to yield to that is right and good, ſhould be bridled by the ſtrait correction of the laws: that is to ſay, He that will not be ſubject to God's word, muſt be puniſhed by the laws. It is true that is commonly ſaid, He that will not obey the goſpel, muſt be tamed and taught by the rigour of the law. But theſe things ought to take place againſt him, which refuſeth to do that is right and juſt according to true godlineſs, not againſt him which cannot quietly bear ſuperſtitions, but doth hate and deteſt from his heart ſuch kind of proceedings, and that for the glory of the name of God. To that which ye ſay, a tranſgreſſor of the common laws bewrayeth himſelf to be an enemy of his country, ſurely a man ought to look unto the nature of the laws, what manner of laws they be which are broken. For a faithful chriſtian ought not to think alike of all manner of laws. But that ſaying ought truly only to be underſtood of ſuch laws as are not contrary to God's word. Otherwiſe, whoſoever love their country in truth (that is to ſay, in God) they will always judge, if at any time the laws of God and man be the one contrary to the other, that a man ought rather to obey God than man. And they that think otherwiſe, and pretend a love to that country, foraſmuch as they make their country to fight as it were againſt God, in whom conſiſteth the only ſtay of their country, ſurely I do think that ſuch are to be judged moſt deadly enemies, and traitors to their country. For they that fight againſt God, which is the ſafety of their country, what do they elſe but go about to bring upon their country a preſent ruin and deſtruction? But they that do ſo are worthy to be judged enemies to their country, and betrayers of the realm. Therefore, &c.

But this is the readieſt way (ye ſay) to ſtir up ſedition, to trouble the quiet of the commonwealth; therefore are theſe things to be repreſſed in time by force of laws. Behold Satan doth not ceaſe to practiſe his old guiles and accuſtomed ſubtleties. He hath ever this dart in a readineſs to hurl againſt his adverſaries, to accuſe them of ſedition, that he may bring them, if he can, in danger of the higher powers. For ſo hath he by his miniſter always charged the prophets of God. Ahab ſaid unto Elias, "Art thou he that troubleth Iſrael?" The falſe prophets alſo complained to their princes of Jeremy, that his words were ſeditious, and not to be ſuffered: Did not the ſcribes and phariſees falſly accuſe Chriſt as a ſeditious perſon, and one that ſpake againſt Cæſar? Did they not at the laſt cry, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæſar's friend?" The orator Tertullus, how doth he accuſe Paul before Felix the high deputy? "We have found this man, ſaith he, a peſtilent fellow, and a ſtirrer of ſedition, unto all the Jews in the whole world, &c." But, I pray you, were theſe men, as they were called, ſeditious perſons? Chriſt, Paul, and the prophets? God forbid. But they were by falſe men falſely accuſed. And for what, I pray you?

but becauſe they reproved before the people their guiles, ſuperſtition and deceit. And when the others could not bear it, and would gladly have had them taken out of the way, they accuſed them as ſeditious perſons, and troublers of the commonwealth, that being by this means made hateful to the people and princes, they might the more eaſily be ſnatched up to be tormented, and put to death. But how far they were from all ſedition, their whole doctrine, life, and converſation doth well declare. For that which was objected laſt of all, that he cannot be a faithful ſubject to his prince, who profeſſeth openly that he will not obſerve the laws which the prince hath made; here I would wiſh that I might have an impartial judge, and one that feareth God, to whoſe judgment in this cauſe, I promiſe I will ſtand. I anſwer therefore, A man ought to obey his prince, but in the Lord, and never againſt the Lord. For he that knowingly obeyeth his prince againſt God, doth not a duty to the prince, but is a deceiver of the prince, and an helper unto him to work his own deſtruction. He is alſo unjuſt, who giveth not to the prince that which is the prince's, and to God that which is God's. Here cometh to my remembrance that notable ſaying of Valentinian the emperor for chuſing the biſhop of Milan. Set him (ſaith he) in the biſhop's ſeat, to whom if we (as man) do offend at any time, we may ſubmit ourſelves. Polycarp the moſt conſtant martyr, when he ſtood before the chief rulers, and was commanded to blaſpheme Chriſt, and to ſwear by the fortune of Cæſar, &c. he anſwered with a mild ſpirit; We are taught (ſaith he) to give honour unto princes, and thoſe powers which be of God; but ſuch honour as is not contrary to God's religion.

Hitherto ye ſee (good father) how I have in words only made as it were a flouriſh before the fight, which I ſhortly look for, and how I have begun to prepare certain kinds of weapons to fight againſt the adverſary of Chriſt, and to muſe with myſelf how the darts of the old enemy may be borne off, and after what manner I may ſmite him again with the ſword of the Spirit. I learn alſo hereby to accuſtom myſelf to armour, and to try how I can go armed. In Tindal where I was born, not far from the borders of Scotland, I have known my countrymen to watch night and day in their harneſs, ſuch as they had, and their ſpears in their hands, eſpecially when they had any private warning of the coming of the Scots. And ſo doing, although at every ſuch bickering ſome of them ſpent their lives, yet by ſuch means, like valiant men, they defended their country. And thoſe that ſo died, I think that before God they died in a good quarrel, and their offspring and progeny all the country loved them the better for their fathers ſake. And in the quarrel of Chriſt our Saviour, in the defence of his own divine ordinances, by which he giveth unto us life and immortality; yea, in the quarrel of faith and the chriſtian religion, wherein reſteth our everlaſting ſalvation, ſhall we not watch? Shall we not go always armed? Always looking when our adverſary (which like a roaring lion ſeeketh whom he may devour) ſhall come upon us by reaſon of our ſlothfulneſs? Yea, and woe be unto us, if he can oppreſs us unawares, which undoubtedly he will do, if he find us ſleeping. Let us awake therefore. "For if the good man of the houſe knew at what hour the thief would come, he would ſurely watch, and not ſuffer his houſe to be broken up." Let us awake therefore, I ſay: Let us not ſuffer our houſe to be broken up. Reſiſt the devil, ſaith St. James, and he will fly from you. Let us therefore reſiſt him manfully, and taking the croſs upon our ſhoulders, let us follow our captain Chriſt, who by his own blood hath dedicated and hallowed the way which leadeth unto the Father, that is to the light which no man can attain, the fountain of the everlaſting joys. Let us follow, I ſay, whither he calleth and inviteth us, that after theſe afflictions, which laſt but for a moment, whereby he trieth our faith, as gold by the fire, we may everlaſtingly reign and triumph with him in the glory of the Father, and that through the ſame our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour and glory now and for ever, Amen, Amen.

Good father, foraſmuch as I have determined with myſelf, to pour forth theſe my cogitations into your boſom, here, methinks, I ſee you ſuddenly lifting up your head towards heaven, after your manner, and then looking upon me with your prophetical countenance, and ſpeaking to me, with theſe or like words, Truſt not, my ſon (I beſeech you vouchſafe me the honour of this name; for in ſo doing I ſhall think myſelf both honoured and beloved of you), truſt not, I ſay, my ſon, to theſe word-weapons; for the kingdom of God is not in words, but in power. And remember always the words of the Lord. "Do not imagine beforehand, what and how you will ſpeak; for it ſhall be given you in that ſame hour what ye ſhall ſpeak. For it is not ye that ſpeak, but the Spirit of your Father which ſpeaketh in you." I pray you therefore, father, pray for me, that I may caſt my whole care upon him, and truſt upon him in all perils, For I know, and am ſurely perſuaded, that whatſoever I can imagine or think beforehand, it is nothing, except he aſſiſt me with his Spirit when the time is. I beſeech you therefore, father, pray for me, that ſuch a complete harneſs of the Spirit, ſuch a boldneſs of mind may be given to me, that I may out of a true faith ſay with David: "I will not truſt in my bow, and it is not my ſword that ſhall ſave me. For he hath no pleaſure in the ſtrength of an horſe, &c. but the Lord's delight is in them that fear him, and put their truſt in his mercy." I beſeech you pray, pray, that I may enter this fight only in the name of God, and that when all is paſt, I being not overcome, through his gracious aid may remain and ſtand faſt in him, till that day of the Lord, in which to them that obtain the victory ſhall be given the lively manna to eat, and a triumphant crown for evermore.

Now father, I pray you help me to buckle on this harneſs a little better. For ye know the deepneſs of Satan, being an old ſoldier, and you have collared with him ere now: bleſſed be God, that hath ever aided you ſo well. I ſuppoſe he may well hold you at the bay. But truly he will not be ſo willing (I think) to join with you as with us youngſters: Sir, I beſeech you, let your ſervant read this my babbling unto you, and now and then, as it ſhall ſeem unto you beſt, let your pen run on my book: ſpare not to blot my paper: I give you good leave.

Lat. Sir, I have cauſed my man not only to read your armour unto me, but alſo to write it out, for it is not only no bare armour, but alſo well-buckled armour. I ſee not how it could be better. I thank you even from the bottom of my heart for it, and my prayers you ſhall not lack, truſting that you do the like for me; for indeed there is the help, &c. Many things make confuſion in memory. And if I were learned as well as St. Paul, I would not beſtow much among them, further than to gall them, and ſpur-gall too, when and whereas occaſion were given, and matter came to mind; for the law ſhall be their ſhoot-anchor ſtay, and refuge. Therefore there is no remedy (namely, now when they have the maſter bowl in their hand, and rule the roaſt) but patience. Better it is to ſuffer what cruelly they will put upon us, than to incur God's high indignation. Wherefore (my good lord) be of good cheer in the Lord, with due conſideration what he requireth of you, and what he doth promiſe you. Our common enemy ſhall do no more than God will permit him. God is faithful, who will not ſuffer us to be tempted above our ſtrength, &c. Be at a point what ye will ſtand unto; ſtick unto that, and let them both ſay and do what they liſt. They can but kill the body, which otherwiſe is of itſelf mortal. Neither yet ſhall they do that when they liſt, but as God will ſuffer them, when the hour appointed is come. It will be but in vain to uſe many words with them, now they have a bloody and deadly law prepared for them. But it is very requiſite that ye give a reaſonable account of your faith, if they will quietly hear you; elſe, ye know, in a wicked place of judgment a man may keep ſilence, after the example of Chriſt. Let them not deceive you with their ſophiſtical ſophiſms and fallacies: you know that falſe things may have more appearance of truth, than things that be moſt true: therefore St. Paul giveth us a watch-word, Let no man deceive you with likelineſs of ſpeech. Neither is it requiſite that with the contentious ye ſhould follow ſtrife of words, which tend to no edification, but to the ſubverſion of the hearers, and vain bragging and oſtentation of the adverſaries. Fear of death doth moſt perſuade a great number. Be well aware of that argument; for that perſuaded Shaxton (as many men thought) after that he had once made a good profeſſion openly before the judgment-ſeat. The fleſh is weak, but the willingneſs of the ſpirit ſhall refreſh the weakneſs of the fleſh.

The number of the criers under the altar muſt needs be fulfilled; if we be ſeparated thereunto, happy be we. That is the greateſt promotion that God giveth in this world, to be ſuch Philippians to whom it is given not only to believe, but alſo to ſuffer, &c. But who is able to do theſe things? ſurely all our ability, all our ſufficiency is of God. He requireth and promiſeth. Let us declare our obedience to his will when it ſhall be requiſite in the time of trouble, yea, in the midſt of the fire.

When that number is fulfilled, which I ſuppoſe will be ſhortly, then have-at the papiſts, when they ſhall ſay Peace, all things are ſafe, when Chriſt ſhall come to keep his great parliament to redreſs all things that are amiſs. But he ſhall not come as the papiſts feign him, to hide himſelf, and to play bo-peep as it were under a piece of bread: but he ſhall come gloriouſly, to the terror and fear of all papiſts, but to the great comfort and conſolation of all that will here ſuffer for him. Comfort yourſelves and one another with theſe words.

Lo, Sir, here have I blotted your paper vainly, and played the fool egregiouſly; but ſo I thought better than not to do your requeſt at this time. Pardon me, and pray for me, pray for me I ſay, pray for me I ſay. For I am ſometimes ſo fearful, that I would creep into a mouſe-hole; ſometimes God doth viſit me again with his comfort. So he cometh and goeth, to teach me to feel and to know mine infirmity, to the intent to give thanks to him that is worthy, leſt I ſhould rob him of his due, as many do, and almoſt all the world. Fare ye well.

What belief is to be given to papiſts, may appear by their wracking, writing, wrenching, and monſtrouſly injuring of God's holy ſcripture, as appeareth in the pope's law. But I dwell here now in a ſchool of obliviouſneſs. Fare you well once again, and be you ſtedfaſt and unmoveable in the Lord. Paul loved Timothy marvellous well, notwithſtanding he ſaith unto him, "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the goſpel;" and again, "Harden thyſelf to ſuffer afflictions. Be faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life," ſaith the Lord.

A Letter ſent from Biſhop Ridley and his Fellow-Priſoners, to Mr. Bradford and his Fellow-Priſoners in the King's-Bench in Southwark, Anno 1554.

WELL beloved in Chriſt our Saviour, we all with one heart wiſh to you, with all thoſe that love God in deed and truth, grace and health, and eſpecially to our dearly beloved companions which are in Chriſt's cauſe, and the cauſe both of their brethren and of their own ſalvation, to put their neck willingly under the yoke of Chriſt's croſs. How joyful it was to us to hear the report of Dr. Taylor and of his godly confeſſion, &c. I aſſure you it is hard for me to expreſs.

Bleſſed be God, which was and is the giver of that, and of all godly ſtrength and ſupport in the time of adverſity. As for the rumours that have or do go abroad either of our relenting or maſſing, we truſt, that they which know God and their duty towards their brethren in Chriſt, will not be too light of belief. For it is not the ſlanderer's evil tongue, but a man's evil deed that can with God defile a man; and therefore with God's grace, ye ſhall never have cauſe to do otherwiſe than ye ſay ye do, that is, not to doubt but that we will, by God's grace, continue, &c. Like rumours as ye have heard of our coming to London, hath been here ſpread of the coming of certain learned men priſoners, hither from London: but as yet we know no certainty which of theſe rumours is, or ſhall be more true. Know ye that we have you in our daily remembrance, and wiſh you and all the reſt of our foreſaid companions well in Chriſt.

It would much comfort us, if we might have knowledge of the ſtate of the reſt of our moſt dearly beloved, which in this troubleſome time do ſtand in Chriſt's cauſe, and in the defence of the truth thereof. We have heard ſomewhat of Mr. Hooper's matter, but nothing of the reſt. We long to hear of father Crome, Dr. Sands, Mr. Saunders, Veron, Beacon, Rogers, &c. We are in good health, thanks be to God, and yet the manner of uſing us doth change as ſour ale in ſummer. It is reported to us by our keepers, that the univerſity beareth us heavily. A coal happened to fall in the night out of the chimney, and burnt a hole in the floor, and no more harm was done, the bailiff's ſervant ſitting by the fire. Another night there chanced (as Mr. Bailiffs told us), a drunken fellow to multiply words, and for the ſame he was ſet in Bocardo. Upon theſe things as is reported, there is a rumour riſen in the town and country about, that we would have broke the priſon with ſuch violence, as that if Mr. Bailiffs had not played the pretty men, we ſhould have made an eſcape. We had out of our priſon a wall that we might have walked upon, and our ſervants had liberty to go abroad in the town or fields, but now both they and we are reſtrained of both. My lord of Worceſter paſſed through Oxford, but he did not viſit us. The ſame day our reſtraint began to be more cloſe, and the book of the communion was taken from us by the bailiffs at the mayor's commandment, as the bailiffs did report to us. No man is licenſed to come unto us: before they might, that would ſee us upon the wall, but that is ſo grudged at, and ſo evil reported, that we are now reſtrained, &c. Sir, bleſſed be God, with all our evil reports, grudges and reſtraints, we are merry in God, all our care is and ſhall be (by God's grace) to pleaſe and ſerve him, of whom we look and hope, after theſe temporal and momentary miſeries, to have eternal joy and perpetual felicity with Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, Peter and Paul, and all the heavenly company of the angels in heaven, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. As yet there has no learned man, nor any ſcholar, been to viſit us ſince we came into Bocardo, which now in Oxford may be called a college of Quondams. For as ye know we are no fewer than three, and I dare ſay every one well contented with his portion, which I do reckon to be our heavenly Father's fatherly, good and gracious gift. Thus fare you well. We ſhall by God's grace one day meet together, and be merry. The day aſſuredly approacheth apace; the Lord grant that it may ſhortly come. For before that day come, I fear the world will wax worſe and worſe. But then all our enemies ſhall be overthrown and trodden under foot; righteouſneſs and truth then ſhall have the victory, and bear the bell away, whereof the Lord grant us to be partakers, and all that love truly the truth.

We all pray you, as we can, to cauſe all our commendations to be made unto all ſuch as ye know did viſit us and you when we were in the Tower, with their friendly remembrances and benefits. Mrs. Wilkinſon and Mrs. Warcup have not forgotten us, but ever ſince we came to Bocardo, with their charitable and friendly benevolence have comforted us: not that elſe we did lack (for God be bleſſed, he hath always hitherto ſufficiently provided vided for us), but that is a great comfort, and an occaſion for us to bleſs God, when we ſee that he maketh them ſo friendly to tender us, whom ſome of us were never familiarly acquainted withal.

Yours in Chriſt,
Nich. Ridley.

Biſhop Ridley's Letter to his Couſin.

GOD's Holy Spirit be with you now and ever, Amen.

When I call to remembrance, beloved couſin, the ſtate of thoſe that for fear of trouble, either for loſs of goods. will do in the ſight of the world thoſe things that they know and are aſſured are contrary to the will of God, I can do no leſs than lament their caſe, being aſſured the end thereof will be ſo pitiful (without ſpeedy repentance) that I tremble and fear to have it in remembrance. I would to God it lay upon ſome earthly burden, ſo that freedom of conſcience might be given unto them. I wrote (as God knoweth) not of preſumption, but only lamenting the ſtate of thoſe whom I thought now in this dangerous time ſhould have given both you and me comfortable inſtruction. But alas! inſtead thereof we have inſtructions to follow (I lament to rehearſe it) ſuperſtitious idolatry. Yea, and what is worſt of all, they will ſeek to prove it by the ſcriptures. The Lord for his mercy turn their hearts, Amen. Commend me, &c.

Yours, Nicholas Ridley.

Another Letter from Biſhop Ridley to Mr. Bradford,

BRother Bradford, I wiſh you and your company in Chriſt, yea, and all the holy brotherhood, that now with you in divers priſons ſuffereth and beareth patiently the croſs of Chriſt for the maintenance of his goſpel, grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Sir, conſidering the ſtate of this chivalry and warfare, wherein I doubt not but we be ſet to fight under Chriſt's banner, and his croſs, againſt our ghoſtly enemy the devil, and the old ſerpent ſatan, methinks I perceive two things to be his moſt perilous and moſt dangerous engines, which he hath to impugn the verity of Chriſt, his goſpel, and his faith; and the ſame two alſo be the moſt maſſy poſts and moſt mighty pillars, whereby he maintaineth and upholdeth this ſatanical ſynagogue. Theſe two, Sir, are they, in my judgment: the one, his falſe doctrine and idolatrical uſe of the Lord's ſupper; and the other, the wicked and abominable uſurpation of the primacy of the ſee of Rome. By theſe two ſatan ſeemeth to me principally to maintain and uphold his kingdom; by theſe two he driveth down mightily (alas, I fear me) the third part of the ſtars in heaven. Theſe two poiſonous rotten poſts he had ſo painted over with ſuch a pretence and colour of religion, of unity in Chriſt's church, of the catholic faith, and ſuch like, that the wily ſerpent is able to deceive (if it were poſſible) even the elect of God. Wherefore St. John ſaith, not without great cauſe, "If any man know not ſatan's ſubtilties and the profundities thereof, I will wiſh him no other burden to be laden withal.

Sir, becauſe theſe be his principal and main poſts whereupon ſtandeth all his falſhood, craft, and treachery, therefore according to the poor power that God hath given me, I have bended mine artillery to ſhoot at the ſame. I know it to be but little (God knoweth) that I can do, and of my ſhot I know they paſs not. Yet I will not, God willing, ceaſe to do the beſt I can, to ſhake thoſe cankered and rotten poſts. The Lord grant me good ſucceſs, to the glory of his name, and the furtherance of his goſpel. I have now already (I thank God) for this preſent time ſpent a good part of my powder in theſe ſcribblings, whereof this bearer ſhall give you knowledge. Good brother Bradford, let the wicked ſurmiſe and ſay what they liſt; know you for a certainty, by God's grace, without all doubt, that in the cauſe of Chriſt's goſpel, againſt and upon the aforeſaid enemies of God, I am fully determined to live and die. Farewel (dear brother) and I beſeech you and all the reſt of our brethren to have good remembrance of the condemned heretics (as they call them) of Oxford, in your prayers. The bearer ſhall certify you of our ſtate. Farewel in the Lord. From Bocardo.

Yours in Chriſt,
Nicholas Ridley.

Another Letter from Biſhop Ridley to Mr. Bradford and his Fellow Priſoners.

DEARLY beloved, I wiſh you grace, mercy, and peace.

According to your mind, I have run over all your papers, and what I have done (which is but ſmall) therein may appear. In two places I have put in two looſe leaves. I had much ado to read what was written in your great leaves, and I think ſomewhere I have altered ſome words, becauſe I could not perfectly read that which was written. Sir, what ſhall be beſt done with theſe things, now ye muſt conſider; for if they come in ſight at this time, undoubtedly they muſt go to the fire with their author: and as for any ſafeguard that your cuſtody can be unto them, I am ſure you look not for it. For as you have been partner of the work, ſo I am ſure you look for none other, but to have and receive like wages, and to drink of the ſame cup. Bleſſed be God, that hath given you liberty in the mean ſeaſon, that you may uſe your pen to his glory, and the comfort (as I hear ſay) of many. I bleſs God daily in you, and all your whole company, to whom I beſeech you commend me heartily. Now I love my countryman in deed and in truth, I mean Dr. Taylor, not for my earthly country's ſake, but for our heavenly Father's ſake, and for Chriſt's ſake, whom I heard ſay, he did ſtoutly in time of danger confeſs, and yet alſo for our country's ſake, and for all our mother's ſake; but I mean of the kingdom of heaven, and of heavenly Jeruſalem, and becauſe of the Spirit which bringeth forth in him, in you, and in our company ſuch bleſſed fruits of boldneſs in the Lord's cauſe, of patience and conſtancy. The Lord who hath begun this work in you all, perfect this his own deed, until his own day come, Amen.

And yet I perceived ye have not been baited, and the cauſe thereof God knoweth, which will let them do no more than is his good will and pleaſure to ſuffer them to do for his own glory, and to the profit of them which be truly his. For the Father, who guideth them that be Chriſt's to Chriſt, is more mighty than all they, and no man is able to pull them out of the Father's hands: except, I ſay, it pleaſe our Father, it pleaſe our maſter Chriſt to ſuffer them, they ſhall not ſtir one hair of your head.

My brother P. the bearer hereof, and Mr. Hooper's letters, would that we ſhould ſay what we think good concerning your mind: that is, not to anſwer, except ye might have impartial judges: we are (as ye know) ſeparated, and cannot conſult with one another, and we be ſo narrowly watched by the bailiffs about us, that we have no oportunity of private conference. And yet, as we hear, the ſcholars bear us more heavily than the townſmen. A wonderful thing, among ſo many, never yet a ſcholar offered any of us (ſo far as we know) any manner of favour, either for or in Chriſt's cauſe.

Now as concerning your demand of your counſel, for my part I do not miſlike that which I perceive ye are minded to do. For I look for none other, but if ye anſwer before the ſame commiſſioners that we did, ye ſhall ſhall be ſerved and handled as we were, though ye were as well learned as ever was either Peter or Paul. And yet further I think, that occaſion afterward may be given you, and the conſideration of the profit of your auditory may perchance move you to do otherwiſe.

Finally, determinately to ſay what ſhall be beſt, I am not able: but I truſt he, whoſe cauſe ye have in hand, ſhall put you in mind to do that which ſhall be moſt to his glory, the profit of his flock, and your own ſalvation. This letter muſt be common to you and Mr. Hooper, in whom and in his fellow-priſoner good father C— I bleſs God, even from the bottom of my heart; for I doubt not but they both do to our maſter Chriſt, true, acceptable, and honourable ſervice, and profitable to the flock; the one with his pen, and the other with his fatherly example of patience and conſtancy, and all manner of true godlineſs. But what ſhall I need to ſay to you? Let this be common among your brethren, among whom (I dare ſay) it is with you as it is with us, to whom all things here are common, meat, money, and whatſoever any of us hath, that can or may do another good. Although I ſaid the bailiffs and our hoſteſs do ſtrictly watch us, that we have no conference or intelligence of any thing abroad, yet God hath provided for every one of us, inſtead of our ſervants, faithful fellows, who are content to hear and ſee, and to do for us whatſoever they can. It is God's work ſurely, bleſſed be God for his unſpeakable goodneſs. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the love of God, and the communication of the Holy Ghoſt be with you all, Amen, Amen.

As far as London is from Oxford, yet thence we have received of late, both meat, money and ſhirts, not only from ſuch as are of our acquaintance, but of ſome (whom this bearer can tell) with whom I had never to my knowledge any acquaintance. I know for whoſe ſake they do it; to him therefore be all honour, glory, and due thanks.

And yet I pray you do ſo much as to ſhew them, that we have received their benevolence, and (God be bleſſed) have plenty of all ſuch things. This I deſire you to do; for I know they be of Mr. Hooper's and your familiar acquaintance. Mr. Latimer was out of order: but now (thanks be to God) he amendeth again.

Nicholas Ridley.

Another Letter from Biſhop Ridley to Mr. Bradford.

O Dear brother, ſeeing the time is now come, wherein it pleaſeth the heavenly Father for Chriſt our Saviour's ſake to call upon you, and to bid you to come, happy are you that ever you were born, thus to be found awake at the Lord's calling. "Well done, good and faithful ſervant, becauſe thou haſt been faithful in ſmall matters, he ſhall ſet thee over great things, and thou ſhalt enter into the joy of thy Lord."

O dear brother, what meaneth that you are ſent into your own native country? The wiſdom and policy of the world may mean what they will, but I truſt God will ſo order the matter finally by his fatherly providence, that ſome great occaſion of God's gracious goodneſs ſhall be plentifully poured abroad amongſt our dear brethren in that country by this your martyrdom, where the martyrs for Chriſt's ſake ſhed their blood, and loſt their lives. O what wondrous things hath Chriſt afterwards wrought to his glory, and confirmation of their doctrine? If it be not the place that ſanctifieth the man, but the holy man doth by Chriſt ſanctify the place, brother Bradford, then happy and holy ſhall be that place wherein thou ſhalt ſuffer, and ſhall be with thy aſhes in Chriſt's cauſe ſprinkled over withal. All the country may rejoice of thee, that it ever brought forth ſuch a one, which would render his life again in his cauſe, of whom he had received it. Brother Bradford, ſo long as I ſhall underſtand thou art in thy journey, by God's grace I ſhall call upon our heavenly Father for Chriſt's ſake to ſet thee ſafely home; and then, good brother, ſpeak you, and pray for the remnant which are to ſuffer for Chriſt's ſake, according to that thou then ſhalt know more clearly.

We do look now every day when we ſhall be called on, bleſſed be God. I think I am the weakeſt many ways of our company; and yet I thank our Lord God and heavenly Father by Chriſt, that ſince I heard of our dear brother Rogers departing, and ſtout confeſſion of Chriſt and his truth even unto the death, my heart (bleſſed be God) rejoiced for it, that ſince that time (I ſay) I never felt any lumpiſh heavineſs in my heart, as I grant I have felt ſometimes before. O good brother, bleſſed be God in thee, and bleſſed be the time that ever I knew thee. Farewel, farewel.

Your brother in Chriſt,
Nicholas Ridley.

To the Brethren remaining in Captivity, and diſperſed abroad in ſundry Priſons, but knit together in Unity of Spirit and Holy Religion in the Bowels of the Lord Jeſus.

GRACE, peace and mercy be multiplied among you.

What worthy thanks can we render unto the Lord for you, my brethren, namely, for the great conſolation which through you we have received in the Lord, who notwithſtanding the rage of Satan, that goeth about by all manner of ſubtle means to beguile the world, and alſo buſily laboureth to reſtore and ſet up his kingdom again, that of late began to decay and fall to ruin; ye remain yet ſtill unmoveable, as men ſurely grounded upon a ſtrong rock. And now albeit that Satan, by his ſoldiers and wicked miniſters, daily (as we hear) draweth numbers unto him, ſo that it is ſaid of him, that he plucketh even the very ſtars out of heaven, while he driveth into ſome men the fear of death, and loſs of all their goods, and ſheweth and offereth to others the pleaſant baits of the world; namely, riches, wealth, and all kinds of delights and pleaſures, fair houſes, great revenues, fat benefices, and what not; and all to the intent they ſhould fall down and worſhip, not the Lord, but the dragon, the old ſerpent, which is the devil, that great beaſt and his image, and ſhould be enticed to commit fornication with the ſtrumpet of Babylon, together with the kings of the earth, with the leſſer beaſt and with the falſe prophets, and ſo to rejoice and be pleaſant with her, and to be drunken with the wine of her fornication: yet bleſſed be God the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which hath given unto you a manly courage, and hath ſo ſtrengthened you in the inward man, by the power of his Spirit, that you can contemn as well all the terrors, as alſo the vain flattering allurements of the world, eſteeming them as vanities, mere trifles, and things of nought: who hath alſo wrought, planted, and ſurely eſtabliſhed in your hearts, ſo ſtedfaſt a faith and love of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, joined with ſuch conſtancy, that by no engines of Antichriſt, be they never ſo terrible or plauſible, ye will ſuffer any other Jeſus, or any other Chriſt to be forced upon you, beſides him whom the prophets have ſpoken of before, the apoſtles have preached, the holy martyrs of God have confeſſed and teſtified with the effuſion of their blood.

In this faith ſtand ye faſt, my brethren, and ſuffer not yourſelves to be brought under the yoke of bondage and ſuperſtition any more. For ye know, brethren, how that our Saviour warned his beforehand, that ſuch ſhould come as would point unto the world another Chriſt, and would ſet him out with ſo many falſe miracles, and with ſuch deceivable and ſubtle practices, that even the very elect (if it were poſſible) ſhould thereby be deceived: ſuch ſtrong deluſion to come did our Saviour give warning of before. But continue ye faithful and conſtant, and be of good comfort, and remember that our grand Captain hath overcome the world; for he that is in us is ſtronger than he that is in the world, and the Lord promiſeth unto us that for the elect ſake, the days of wickedneſs ſhall be ſhortened. In the mean ſeaſon abide ye and endure with patience as ye have begun: endure, I ſay, and reſerve yourſelves unto better times, as one of the heathen poets ſaid, Ceaſe not to ſhew yourſelves valiant ſoldiers of the Lord, and help to maintain the travailing faith of the goſpel.

Ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye may receive the promiſes. "For yet a very little, and he that ſhall come, will come, and will not tarry; and the juſt ſhall live by faith: but if any withdraw himſelf, my ſoul ſhall have no pleaſure in him (ſaith the Lord). But we are not they which do withdraw ourſelves unto damnation, but believe unto the ſalvation of the ſoul." Let us not ſuffer theſe words of Chriſt to fall out of our hearts by any manner of terror, or threatenings of the world. Fear not them which kill the body; the reſt ye know. For I write not unto you, as to men which are ignorant of the truth, but who know the truth, and to this end only, that we agreeing together in one faith, may comfort one another, and be more confirmed and ſtrengthened thereby. We never had a better or more juſt cauſe either to contemn our life, or ſhed our blood; we cannot take in hand the defence of a more certain, clear, and manifeſt truth. For it is not any ceremony for which we contend; but it toucheth the very ſubſtance of our whole religion, yea, even Chriſt himſelf. Shall we, or can we receive and acknowledge any other Chriſt inſtead of him, who is alone the everlaſting Son of the everlaſting Father, and is the brightneſs of the glory, and a lively image of the ſubſtance of the Father, in whom only dwelleth corporally the fulneſs of the Godhead, who is the only way, the truth, and the life? Let ſuch wickedneſs (my brethren) let ſuch horrible wickedneſs be far from us. For although there be that be called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, as there be many gods and many lords, yet unto us there is but one God, who is the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him: but every man hath not knowledge. "This is life eternal (ſaith St. John), that they know thee to be the only true God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom thou haſt ſent." If any therefore would force upon us any other God, beſides him whom Paul and the apoſtles have taught, let us not hear him, but let us fly from him, and hold him accurſed.

Brethren, ye are not ignorant of the deep and profound ſubtilties of Satan; for he will not ceaſe to range about you, ſeeking by all means poſſible whom he may devour: but play ye the men, and be of good comfort in the Lord. And although your enemies and the adverſaries of the truth, armed with all worldly force and power that may be, do ſet upon you; yet be ye not faint-hearted, and ſhrink not therefore, but truſt unto your captain Chriſt, truſt unto the Spirit of truth, and truſt to the truth of your cauſe; which as it may by the malice of Satan be darkened, ſo can it never be clean put out. For we have (high praiſe be given to God therefore) moſt plainly, evidently, and clearly on our ſide, all the prophets, all the apoſtles, and undoubtedly all the ancient eccleſiaſtical writers which have written, until of late years paſt.

Let us be hearty and of good courage therefore, and thoroughly comfort ourſelves in the Lord. Be in no wiſe afraid of your adverſaries; for that which is to them an occaſion of perdition, is to you a ſure token of ſalvation, and that of God. For unto you it is given, that not only ye ſhould believe on him, but alſo ſuffer for his ſake. And when ye are railed upon for the name of Chriſt, remember that by the voice of Peter, yea, and of Chriſt our Saviour alſo, ye are counted with the prophets, with the apoſtles, and with the holy martyrs of Chriſt, happy and bleſſed therefore: for the glory and Spirit of God reſteth upon you.

On their part our Saviour Chriſt is evil ſpoken of, but on your part he is glorified. For what can they elſe do unto you by perſecuting you, and working all cruelty and villainy againſt you, but make your crowns more glorious, yea, beautify and multiply the ſame, and heap upon themſelves the horrible plagues and heavy wrath of God: and therefore, good brethren, though they rage never ſo fiercely againſt us, yet let us not wiſh evil to them again, knowing that while for Chriſt's cauſe they vex and perſecute us, they are like mad men, moſt outrageous and cruel againſt themſelves, heaping hot burning coals upon their own heads: but rather let us wiſh well unto them, knowing that we are thereunto called in Chriſt Jeſus, that we ſhould be heirs of the bleſſing. Let us pray therefore unto God, that he would drive out of their hearts this darkneſs of errors, and make the light of his truth to ſhine unto them, that they acknowledging their blindneſs, may with all humble repentance be converted unto the Lord, and together with us confeſs him to be the only true God, which is the Father of light, and his only Son Jeſus Chriſt, worſhipping him in ſpirit and truth, Amen. The Spirit of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt comfort your hearts in the love of God, and patience of Chriſt, Amen.

Your brother in the Lord, whoſe name this bearer ſhall ſignify unto you, ready always by the grace of God to live and die with you.

To the Brethren which conſtantly cleave unto Chriſt, in ſuffering Affliction with him and for his Sake.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be multiplied unto you, Amen.

Although, brethren, we have of late heard nothing from you, neither have at this preſent any news to ſend to you; yet we thought good to write ſomething unto you, whereby ye might underſtand that we have good remembrance of you continually, as we doubt not but ye have of us alſo. When this meſſenger, coming unto us from you of late, had brought unto us good tidings of your great conſtancy, fortitude, and patience in the Lord, we were filled with much joy and gladneſs, giving thanks to God the Father through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which hath cauſed his face ſo to ſhine upon you, and with the light of ſpiritual underſtanding hath ſo enlightened your hearts, that now being in captivity and bonds for Chriſt's cauſe, ye have not ceaſed as much as in you lieth, by words, but much more by deeds and by your example, to eſtabliſh and confirm that thing, which when ye were at liberty in the world, ye laboured to publiſh and ſet abroad by the word and doctrine: that is to ſay, holding faſt the word of life, ye ſhine as lights in the world, in the midſt of a wicked and crooked nation, and that with ſo much the greater glory of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and profit of your brethren, by how much Satan more cruelly now rageth, and buſily laboureth to darken the light of the goſpel.

And as for the darkneſs that Satan now bringeth upon the church of England, who needeth to doubt thereof? Of late time our Saviour Chriſt, his apoſtles, prophets, and teachers, ſpake in the temple to the people of England in the Engliſh tongue, ſo that they might be plainly underſtood by the godly, and ſuch as ſought for heavenly knowledge in matters, which of neceſſity pertained to the obtaining of eternal life; but now thoſe things which once were written by them for the edifying of the congregation, are read in a ſtrange tongue without interpretation, manifeſtly againſt St. Paul's commandment, ſo that there is no man able to underſtand them, who hath not learned that ſtrange and unknown tongue.

Of late days thoſe heavenly myſteries, whereby Chriſt hath ingrafted us into his body, and hath united us one to another, whereby alſo being regenerate, and born anew to God, he hath nouriſhed, increaſed and ſtrengthened us, whereby moreover either he hath taught and ſet forth an order amongſt them which are whole, or elſe to the ſick in ſoul or body, hath given, as it were, wholeſome medicines and remedies; thoſe (I ſay) were all plainly ſet forth to the people in their own language; ſo that what great and exceeding good things every man had received of God, what duty every one owed to another by God's ordinance, what every one had promiſed in his vocation, and was bound to obſerve, where remedy was to be had for the wicked and feeble, he to whom God hath given a deſire and willing heart to underſtand theſe things, might ſoon perceive and underſtand. But now all theſe things are taught and ſet forth in ſuch ſort, that the people redeemed with Chriſt's blood, and for whoſe ſakes they were by Chriſt himſelf ordained, can have no manner of underſtanding thereof at all.

Of late (foraſmuch as we know not how to pray as we ought) our Lord Jeſus Chriſt in his prayer, whereof he would have no man ignorant, and alſo the Holy Ghoſt in the pſalms, hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs which are ſet forth in the Bible, did teach and inſtruct all the people of England in the Engliſh tongue, that they might aſk ſuch things as are according to the will of the Father, and might join their hearts and lips in prayer together; but now all theſe things are commanded to be hid and ſhut up from them in a ſtrange tongue, whereby it muſt needs follow, that the people can neither tell how to pray, nor what to pray for; and how can they join their hearts and voice together, when they underſtand no more what the voice ſignifieth than a brute beaſt?

Finally, I hear ſay, that the catechiſm which was lately ſet forth in the Engliſh tongue, is now in every pulpit condemned. O deviliſh malice, and moſt ſpitefully injurious to the ſalvation of mankind purchaſed by Jeſus Chriſt! Indeed Satan could not long ſuffer that ſo great light ſhould be ſpread abroad in the world; he ſaw well enough that nothing was able to overthrow his kingdom ſo much, as if children being godly inſtructed in religion, ſhould learn to know Chriſt whilſt they are yet young; whereby not only children, but the elder ſort alſo, and aged people that were not taught before how to know Chriſt in their childhood, ſhould now even with children and babes, be forced to learn to know him. Now therefore he roareth, now he rageth. But what elſe do they (brethren) who ſerve Satan, and become his miniſters and ſlaves in maintaining of his impiety, but even the ſame which they did, to whom Chriſt our Saviour threateneth his curſe in the goſpel; "Woe unto you who ſhut up the kingdom of heaven before men, and take away the key of knowledge from them: you yourſelves have not entered in, neither have ye ſuffered them that would enter, to come in."

And from whence ſhall we ſay (brethren) that this horrible and miſchievous darkneſs proceedeth, which is now brought upon the world? From whence, I pray you, but even from the ſmoke of the great furnace of the bottomleſs pit, ſo that the ſun and the air are now darkened by the ſmoke of the pit? Now, even now, (out of doubt, brethren) the pit is opened againſt us, and the locuſts begin to ſwarm, and Abaddon now reigneth.

Ye therefore (my brethren) which pertain unto Chriſt, and have the ſeal of God marked in your foreheads; that is, are ſealed with the earneſt of the Spirit to be a peculiar people of God, quit yourſelves like men, and be ſtrong; for he that is in us, is ſtronger than he that is in the world; and ye know that all who are born of God overcometh the world, and this is our victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Let the world fret, let it rage never ſo much, be it never ſo cruel and bloody, yet be ye ſure that no man can take us out of the Father's hands: for he is greater than all, who hath not ſpared his own Son, but hath given him to death for us all; and therefore how ſhall he not with him give us all things alſo? "Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who then ſhall condemn? It is Chriſt that is dead, yea rather which is riſen again, who alſo is at the right hand of God, and maketh requeſt alſo for us. Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? Shall tribulation, or anguiſh, or perſecution, or famine, or nakedneſs, or peril, or the ſword?" the reſt, ye know, brethren. We are certainly perſuaded with St. Paul, by the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that no kind of thing ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. Which thing, that it may come to paſs by the grace and mercy of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, to the comfort both of you and of us all, as we for our parts will continually (God willing) pray for you; ſo (dear brethren in the Lord) with all earneſt and hearty requeſt we beſeech you, even in the bowels of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that ye will not ceaſe to pray for us. Fare ye wel, dear brethren. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all evermore, Amen.

A Letter from Biſhop Ridley, anſwering to a certain Letter of one Mr. Weſt, ſometime his Chaplain.

I Wiſh you grace in God, and love of the truth, without which truly eſtabliſhed in men's hearts by the mighty hand of Almighty God, it is no more poſſible to ſtand by the truth in Chriſt in time of trouble, that it is for the wax to abide the heat of the fire. Sir, you know this, that I am, bleſſed be God, perſuaded that this world is but tranſitory, and (as St. John ſaith) "The world paſſeth away and the luſt thereof." I am perſuaded that Chriſt's words be true; "Whoſoever ſhall confeſs me before men, him will I confeſs alſo before my Father which is in heaven." And I believe that no earthly creature ſhall be ſaved, whom the Redeemer and Saviour of the world ſhall before his Father deny. This the Lord grant, that it may be ſo grafted, fixed, and eſtabliſhed in my heart, that neither things preſent nor to come, high or low, life nor death be able to remove me thence. It is a goodly wiſh, that you wiſh me deeply to conſider the things pertaining unto God's glory; but if you had wiſhed alſo, that neither fear of death, nor hope of worldly proſperity ſhould hinder me to maintain God's word and his truth, which is his glory and true honour, it would have pleaſed me well. You deſire me for God's ſake to remember myſelf. Indeed, Sir, now it is time ſo to do; for, ſo far as I can perceive, it ſtandeth me upon no leſs danger, than of the loſs both of body and ſoul; and I think it is time for a man to awake, if any thing will awake him. He that will not fear him that threateneth to caſt both body and ſoul into everlaſting fire, whom will he fear? With this fear, O Lord, faſten thou together our frail fleſh, that we never ſwerve from thy laws. You ſay you have made much ſuit for me. Sir, God grant that you have not in ſuing for my worldly deliverance, impaired and hindered the furtherance of God's word and his truth.

You have known me long indeed; in which time I happened, as you ſay, to miſlike ſome things. I grant it is true; for ſudden changes without ſubſtantial and neceſſary cauſe, and the haſty ſetting forth of extremities, I did never love. Confeſſion unto the miniſter who is able inſtruct, correct, comfort, and inform the weak, wounded, and ignorant conſcience, indeed I ever thought might do much good in Chriſt's congregation, and ſo I aſſure you, I think even at this day. My doctrine and my preaching, you ſay, you have heard often, and after your judgment have thought it godly, ſaving only for the ſacrament, which thing although it was by me reverently handled, and a great deal better than of the reſt (as you ſay) yet in the margin you write Warily, and this in this world Wisely; and yet methought all sounding not well. Sir, but that I see so many changes in this world, and so much alteration, else at this your saying I would not a little marvel. I have taken you for my friend, and a man whom I fansied for plainness and faithfulness, as much, I assure you, as for your learning; and have you kept this so close in your heart for me unto this day? Sir, I consider more things than one, and will not say all that I think. But what need you to care what I think, for any thing I shall be able to do to you, either good or harm? you give me good lessons to stand in nothing against my learning, and to beware of vain-glory. Truly, I herein like your counsel very well, and by God's grace I intend to follow it to my life's end.

To write unto those whom you name, I cannot see what it will avail me. For this I would have you know, that I esteem nothing available for me, which will not also further the glory of God. And now, because I perceive you have an entire zeal and desire of my deliverance out of this captivity and worldly misery, if I should not bear you a good heart in God again, methinks I were to blame. Sir, how nigh the day of my dissolution and departure out of this world is at hand, I cannot tell: the Lord's will be fulfilled, how soon soever it shall come. I know the Lord's words must be verified on me, that I shall appear before the uncorrupt judge, and be accountable to him for all my former life. And though the hope of his mercies is my shoot-anchor of eternal salvation, yet am I persuaded, that whosoever wittingly neglecteth and regardeth not to clear his conscience, he cannot have peace with God, nor a lively faith in his mercy. Conscience therefore moveth me, considering you were one of my family, and one of my household, of whom when I think I had a special cure, and of all them which were within my house, which indeed ought to have been an example of godliness to all the rest of my cure, not only of good life, but also in promoting of God's word to the uttermost of their power (but, alas, now when the trial doth separate the chaff from the corn, how small a quantity it is, God knoweth, which the wind doth not blow away), this conscience, I say, doth move me to fear, lest the lightness of my family shall be laid to my charge for lack of more earnest and diligent instruction, which should have been done. But blessed be God who hath given me grace to see this my fault, and to lament it from the bottom of my heart, before my departing hence.

This conscience doth also move me now to require both you and my friend Dr. Harvey, to remember your promises made to me in times past, of the pure setting forth and preaching of God's word and his truth. These promises although you need not fear being charged with them by me hereafter before the world, yet look for none other (I exhort you as my friends), but to be charged with them at God's hand. This conscience and the love that I bear unto you, biddeth me now say unto you both in God's name; Fear God, and love not the world: for God is able to cast both body and soul into hell-fire. When his wrath shall be suddenly kindled, blessed are all they that put their trust in him. And the saying of St. John is true, "All that is in the world, as the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but of the world; and the world passeth away, and the lusts thereof, but he that doth the will of God abideth for ever." If this gift of grace (which undoubtedly is necessarily required unto eternal salvation), were truly and unfeignedly grafted and firmly established in men's hearts, they would not be so light, so suddenly to shrink from the maintenance and confession of the truth, as is now, alas, manifestly seen of so many in these days. But here, peradventure, you would know of me, what is the truth. Sir, God's word is the truth, as St. John saith, and that even the same that was heretofore. For although men do vary and change as the moon, yet God's word is stable, and abideth one for evermore: and of Christ it is truly said, "Christ yesterday and to-day, the same is also for ever."

When I was in office, all that were esteemed learned in God's word, agreed this to be a truth in God's word written, that the Common Prayer of the church should be had in the common tongue. You know I have conferred with many, and I assure you, I never found man (so far as I do remember), neither old nor young, gospeller nor papist, of what judgment soever he was, in this thing to be of a contrary opinion. If then it were a truth of God's word, think you that the alteration of the world can make it an untruth? If it cannot, why then do so many men shrink from the confession and maintenance of this truth received once of us all? For what is it, I pray you, else to confess or deny Christ in this world, but to maintain the truth taught in God's word, or for any worldly respect to shrink from the same? This one thing have I brought for an ensample; other things be in like case, which now particularly I need not rehearse. For he that will forsake wittingly, either for fear or gain of the world, any open truth of God's word, if he be constrained, he will assuredly forsake God and all his truth, rather than he will endanger himself to lose or to leave what he loveth better indeed, than he doth God and the truth of his word.

I like very well your plain speaking, wherein you say, I must either agree or die; and I think that you mean of the bodily death, which is common both to good and bad. Sir, I know I must die, whether I agree or no. But what folly were it then to make such an agreement, by which I could never escape this death which is common to all, and also incur the guilt of death and eternal damnation? Lord grant that I may utterly abhor and detest this damnable agreement so long as I live. And because I dare say, you wrote this short earnest advertisement to me out of love, and I think verily, wishing me to live and not to die, therefore bearing you in my heart no less love in God, than you do me in the world, I say unto you in the word of the Lord (and that I say to you, I say to all my friends and lovers of us in God), that if you do not confess and maintain to your power and knowledge that which is grounded upon God's word, but will either for fear or gain of the world shrink and play the Apostata, indeed you shall die the death; you know what I mean. And I beseech you all true friends and lovers in God, remember what I say, for this may best be the last time peradventure that ever I shall write unto you.

From Bocardo in Oxford,
April 8, 1555.

Mr. Grindal (afterwards archbishop of Canterbury) being in the time of exile in the city of Frankfort, wrote to Dr. Ridley then prisoner, a certain epistle, wherein first he lamenteth his captivity, exhorting him withal to be constant. Secondly, he certifieth him of the state of the English exiles being dispersed in Germany, and of the singular providence of God in stirring up the magistrates and rulers there towards them. Thirdly, he writeth to know his mind and will concerning the printing of his book against transubstantiation, and of certain other treatises and his disputations. Whereunto bishop Ridley answereth again in order as followeth.

Dr. Ridley's Answer to Mr. Grindal's Letter.

BLessed be God our heavenly Father, which inclined your heart to have such a desire to write unto me, and blessed be he again which hath heard your request, and brought your letters safe unto my hands; and over all this I bless him through our Lord Jesus Christ, for the great comfort I have received by the same, of the knowledge of your state, and of other our dearly beloved loved brethren and countrymen in thoſe parts beyond the ſea.

Dearly beloved brother Grindal, I ſay to you and all the reſt of our brethren in Chriſt with you, rejoice in the Lord, and as you love me, and the other my reverend fathers and fellow-priſoners (which undoubtedly are Gloria Chriſti), lament not our ſtate, but I beſeech you and them all to give to our heavenly Father for his boundleſs mercies and unſpeakable benefits, even in the midſt of all our troubles given unto us, moſt hearty thanks. For know ye, that as the weight of his croſs hath increaſed upon us, ſo he hath not, nor doth not ceaſe to multiply his mercies to ſtrengthen us; and I truſt, yet by his grace I doubt nothing, but he will do ſo for Chriſt our maſter's ſake even to the end. To hear that you and our other brethren do find favour and grace in your exile, with the magiſtrates, miniſters, and citizens at Tigury, Frankfort, and other places, it doth greatly comfort (I dare ſay) all here that do love Chriſt and his true word. I do aſſure you it warmed my heart, to hear you by chance name ſome, as Scory, Cox, &c. O that it had come in your mind to have ſaid ſomewhat alſo of Cheek, Turner, Leaver, Sampſon, and Chambers, but I truſt in God they be all well. And, Sir, ſeeing you ſay, that there be in thoſe parts with you of ſtudents and miniſters ſo good a number, now therefore care you not for us, otherwiſe than to wiſh that God's glory may be ſet forth by us. For whenſoever God ſhall call us home (as we look daily for none other, but when it ſhall pleaſe God to ſay, Come), you, bleſſed be God, are enow through his aid, to light, and ſet up again the lanthorn of his word in England. As concerning the copies ye ſay ye have with you, I wonder how ever they did or could find the way to come to you. My diſputation, except ye have that which I gathered myſelf after the diſputation was done, I cannot think ye have it truly. If ye have that, then ye have therewithal the whole manner after which I was uſed in the diſputation.

As for the treatiſe in Engliſh againſt tranſubſtantiation, I cannot think it worth tranſlating into Latin, nor would I have you tranſlate any other of my writings, till you are certain how the Lord will diſpoſe of me. And thus much concerning your letters. Now, although I ſuppoſe you know a good part of our condition here (for we are forthcoming, even as when ye departed, &c.) you ſhall underſtand that I was in the Tower about the ſpace of two months cloſe priſoner, and after that had granted to me, without my labour, the liberty of the Tower, and ſo continued about half a year, and then, becauſe I refuſed to allow the maſs with my preſence, I was ſhut up in priſon again.

The laſt Lent ſave one, it chanced by reaſon of the tumult ſtirred up in Kent, there were ſo many priſoners in the Tower, that my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, and Mr. Bradford and I were put all together in one priſon, where we remained till almoſt the next Eaſter, and then we three, Canterbury, Latimer and I, were ſuddenly ſent a little before Eaſter to Oxford, and were ſuffered to have nothing with us, but what we carried upon us. About the Whitſuntide following was our diſputations at Oxford, after which all was taken from us, as pen, ink, &c. Our own ſervants were taken from us before, and every one had a ſtrange man put to him, and each of us were appointed to be kept in ſeparate places, as we are unto this day.

Bleſſed be God, we three at writing hereof were in good health, and (in God) of good chear. We expected long ago to have been diſpatched, for we were all three on one day condemned as heretics by Dr. Weſton (he being the head commiſſioner), within a day or two of our diſputations, and ever ſince we remain as we were by him left. The Lord's will be fulfilled in us, as I doubt not but by his grace it ſhall be to his glory, and our eternal ſalvation, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

No. 27.

Likewiſe the Lord hath hitherto preſerved above all our expectation, our dear brother, and in Chriſt's cauſe, a ſtrong champion, John Bradford. He is alſo condemned, and is already delivered to the ſecular power, and writs (as we have heard ſay), given out for his execution, and called in again.

Thus the Lord, ſo long as his bleſſed pleaſure is, preſerveth whom he liſteth, notwithſtanding the wonderful raging of the world. Many (as we hear ſay) have valiantly ſuffered confeſſing Chriſt's truth, and nothing yielding to the adverſary, yea not for the fear or pains of death.

The names of them which I knew, and have now ſuffered, are theſe; Farrar biſhop of St. David's, Hooper biſhop of Worceſter, Rogers your fellow-prebend, Dr. Taylor of Hadley, Mr. Saunders, and one Tomkins a weaver, and now this laſt day Mr. Cardmaker, with another, was burnt in Smithfield at London, and many others in Eſſex and Kent, whoſe names are written in the book of life, whom yet I do not know.

Weſt, your old companion, and ſometime my officer (alas) hath relented (as I have heard), but the Lord hath ſhortened his days, for ſoon after he died, and is gone. Grimbold was caught by the heel, and caſt into the Marſhalſea, but now is at liberty again, but I fear he eſcaped not without bowing of his knee to Baal.

My dear friend Thomas Ridley, of the Bull-head, in Cheap, which was to me the moſt faithful friend that I had in my trouble, is departed alſo unto God. My brother Shipſide, that hath married my ſiſter, hath been almoſt half a year in priſon, for delivering (as he was accuſed) of certain things from me; but now, thanks be to God, he is at liberty again, but ſo that the biſhop taketh from him his park.

Of all us three priſoners in Oxford, I am kept moſt ſtrict, and with leaſt liberty; either becauſe the man in whoſe houſe I am a priſoner is governed by his wife, who is a moroſe, ſuperſtitious old woman, and thinks ſhe ſhall merit by having me very cloſely confined; for the man himſelf, whoſe name is Iriſh, is civil enough to all, but too much ruled by his wife. Though I never had a wife, yet from this daily uſage I begin to underſtand how great and intolerable a burthen it is to have a bad one. The wiſe man ſays rightly, A good wife is the gift of God: and again, Bleſſed is the man who has a good wife. Or elſe I ſay the reaſon is (for I know not from which), that he is ſo commanded from the higher powers, which is what he pleads, when I complain of my hard uſage.

At Cambridge (as I hear ſay), all the reformations of ſtudents and ſtatutes which were lately made, are now undone: and all things are reduced to their ancient confuſion and old popiſh ſuperſtition. All the heads of colleges who preached the ſincere word of God, or favoured it, are turned out, and others of popiſh faction put in their places: inſomuch that I hear no one can be admitted fellow of a college, that will not bow the knee to Baal. Nor do I wonder, ſince it is ſo throughout the whole realm of England among archbiſhops, biſhops, prieſts and deacons, and the whole body of the clergy. And to tell you much naughty matter in few words, Popery every where reigns among us in its full and ancient force.

The Lord be merciful, and for Chriſt's ſake pardon us our old unkindneſs and unthankfulneſs; for when he poured upon us the gifts of his manifold graces and favours (alas), we did not ſerve him, nor render thanks unto him according to the ſame. We paſtors many of us were too cold, and bare too much with the wicked world: our magiſtrates did abuſe, to their own worldly gain, both God's goſpel and the miniſters of the ſame. The people in many places were unruly and unkind. Thus of every ſide and of every ſort we have provoked God's anger and wrath to fall upon us: but bleſſed might he be that hath not ſuffered his to continue in thoſe ways which ſo wholly have diſpleaſed his ſacred majeſty, but hath awaked them by the fatherly correction of his own Son's croſs, unto his glory and our endleſs ſalvation, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

My daily prayer is (as God doth know), and by God's grace ſhall be ſo long as I live in this world, for you my dear brethren that are fled out of your own country, becauſe you will rather forſake all worldly things than the truth of God's word. It is even the ſame that I uſe to make to God, for all thoſe churches abroad through the world, which have forſaken the kingdom of Antichriſt, and profeſſed openly the purity of the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt: that is, that God our eternal Father, for our Saviour Chriſt's ſake, will daily increaſe in you the gracious gift of his heavenly Spirit, to the true ſetting forth of his glory and of his goſpel, and make you to agree brotherly in the truth of the ſame, that there ariſe no root of bitterneſs among you, that may infect that good ſeed which God hath ſown in your hearts already, and finally that your life may be ſo pure and ſo honeſt, according to the rule of God's word, and according to that vocation whereunto we are called by the goſpel of Chriſt our Saviour, that the honeſty and purity of the ſame may provoke all that ſhall ſee or know it, to the love of your doctrine, and to love you for your honeſty and virtue ſake, and ſo both in brotherly unity of your true doctrine, and alſo in the godly virtue of your honeſt life, to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Several of our magiſtrates, viz. the chancellor of Wincheſter, earl of Arundel, and lord Paget, are embaſſadors with cardinal Pool beyond the ſeas, to make peace (as it is ſaid) between the emperor, our realm, and the king of France. After whoſe return, and the delivery of the queen, which we daily expect, and have long expected, and which God for the glory of his name grant to be a ſafe and happy one, then ſhall we expect from the old enemy of our profeſſion, ſoon to receive triumphant crowns in the Lord.

I humbly with my whole heart commend myſelf to all your prayers, and firſt to yours, O moſt dear brother in Chriſt, and my moſt beloved Grindal, to yours moſt dear and together with me beloved in the Lord, Cheek, Cox, Turner, Leaver, Sampſon, Chambers, and all our brethren and fellow-countrymen who live amongſt you, and love our Lord Jeſus Chriſt in truth. I commend alſo to you the reverend fathers in God, and my fellow-captives in the Lord, Thomas Cranmer, now moſt worthy of the name of a true great paſtor and archbiſhop; and that old ſoldier of Chriſt and true apoſtle of our Engliſh nation, Hugh Latimer. I here give myſelf the greater length in this letter, moſt dear brother, becauſe after this I am perſuaded they will be too ſhort to trouble you.

Oxford, N. R.

To Auguſtine Bernher.

BRother Auguſtine, I bleſs God with all my heart in his manifold merciful gifts, given unto our dear brethren in Chriſt, eſpecially to our brother Rogers, whom it pleaſed him to ſet forth firſt, no doubt out of his gracious goodneſs and fatherly favour towards him. And likewiſe bleſſed be God in the reſt, as Hooper, Saunders and Taylor, whom it hath pleaſed the Lord likewiſe to ſet in the forefront of the battle againſt his adverſaries, and hath endured them all (ſo far as I can hear) to ſtand in the confeſſion of his truth, and to be content in his cauſe, and for his goſpel ſake to loſe their life. And evermore and without end bleſſed be even the ſame our heavenly Father for our dear and entirely beloved brother Bradford, whom now the Lord (I perceive) calleth for: for I believe he will no longer vouchſafe him to abide among the adulterous and wicked generation of this world. I do not doubt but that he (for thoſe gifts of grace which the Lord hath beſtowed on him plenteouſly) hath helped thoſe which are gone before in their journey, that is, hath animated and encouraged them to keep the high-way, and ſo to run, that at length they may receive the reward. The Lord be his comfort, whereof I do not doubt, and I thank God heartily that ever I was acquainted with him, and that ever I had ſuch a one in my houſe. And yet again I bleſs God in our dear brother, and of this time protomartyr Rogers, that he was alſo one of my calling to be a prebendary preacher of London. And now becauſe Grindal is gone (the Lord I doubt not hath and knoweth wherein he will beſtow him), I truſt to God it ſhall pleaſe him of his goodneſs to ſtrengthen me to make up the Trinity out of Paul's church, to ſuffer for Chriſt whom God the Father hath anointed, the Holy Spirit doth bear witneſs unto, Paul and all the apoſtles preached. Thus fare you well; I had no paper, I was conſtrained thus to write.

The Life of Biſhop Latimer, a famous Preacher, and worthy Martyr of Chriſt.

NOW conſequently after the life of Biſhop Ridley, followeth the life of that valiant champion and old diſciplin'd ſoldier of Chriſt, biſhop Hugh Latimer, who was the ſon of one Hugh Latimer of Thirkeſſon in the county of Leiceſter, a huſbandman in good repute; with whom he was brought up till he was about four years old: at which time his parents (having him as then left for their only ſon, with ſix daughters) ſeeing him to be of a ready, prompt, and ſharp wit, purpoſed to train him up in erudition, and knowledge of good literature; wherein he ſo profited in the common ſchools of his own country, that at fourteen years of age he was ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge: where, after ſome continuance in the exerciſe of other things, he gave himſelf up to the ſtudy of ſchool divinity, as the ignorance of that age would ſuffer.

Zealous he was then in the popiſh religion, and therewith ſo ſcrupulous, as himſelf confeſſed, that being a prieſt, and uſing to ſay maſs, he was ſo ſervile an obſerver of the Romiſh decrees, that he thought he had never ſufficiently mingled his maſſing wine with water; and moreover, that he ſhould never be damned, if he were once a profeſſed friar, with divers of ſuch ſuperſtitious fantaſies. And in this blind zeal he was a very enemy to the profeſſors of Chriſt's goſpel; as both his oration made when he proceeded bachelor of divinity, againſt Melanchton, and alſo his other works did plainly appear. But eſpecially in thoſe days his popiſh zeal could in no caſe abide good Mr. Stafford, reader of the divinity lectures in Cambridge, moſt ſpitefully railing againſt him, and perſuading the youth of Cambridge in no wiſe to believe him.

Notwithſtanding, ſuch was the goodneſs and merciful purpoſe of God, that when he ſaw his good time, by which way he thought utterly to have defaced the profeſſors of the goſpel, and true church of Chriſt, he was at length himſelf by a member of the ſame prettily caught in the bleſſed net of God's word. For Mr. Thomas Bilney being at that time a trier out of Satan's ſubtilties, and a ſecret overthrower of Antichriſt's kingdom, ſeeing Mr. Latimer to have a zeal in his way (although not according to knowledge), was ſtricken with a brotherly pity towards him, and began to conſider by what means he might beſt win this zealous ignorant brother to the true knowledge of Chriſt. Wherefore, after a ſhort time, he came to Mr. Latimer's ſtudy, and deſired him to hear him make his confeſſion, which he willingly did; and by hearing thereof he was, by the good Spirit of God, ſo touched, that thereupon he forſook the ſtudy of the ſchool doctors, and other ſuch fopperies, and became an earneſt ſtudent in true divinity, as he himſelf, as well in his conference with biſhop Ridley, as alſo in his firſt ſermon made upon the Pater Noſter, doth confeſs. So that whereas before he was an enemy, and almoſt a perſecutor of Chriſt, he was now a zealous ſeeker after him, changing his old manner of caviling, and railing, into a diligent kind of conferring, both with Mr. Bilney and others, and came alſo to Mr. Stafford before he died, and deſired him to forgive him.

After his own converſion, he was not ſatisfied without endeavouring that of others, and like a true diſciple of the bleſſed Samaritan, pitied the miſery of others, and therefore became both a public preacher, and alſo a private inſtructor to the reſt of his brethren within the univerſity, by the ſpace of three years, ſpending his time partly in the Latin tongue among the learned, and partly amongſt the ſimple people in his natural and vulgar language. Howbeit, as Satan never ſleepeth when he ſeeth his kingdom to decay, ſo likewiſe now, ſeeing that this worthy member of Chriſt would be a terrible ſhaker thereof, he raiſed up his impious imps to moleſt and trouble him.

Amongſt theſe there was an Auguſtine friar, who took occaſion upon certain ſermons that Mr. Latimer made about Chriſtmas, 1529. as well in the church of St. Edward, as alſo in St. Auguſtine's, within the univerſity of Cambridge, to inveigh againſt him, for that Mr. Latimer in the ſaid ſermons (alluding to the common uſage of the ſeaſon), gave the people certain cards out of the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew, whereupon they might, not only then, but always elſe occupy their time. For the chief Triumph in the cards he limited the heart, as the principal thing that they ſhould ſerve God withal, whereby he quite overthrew all hypocritical and external ceremonies, not tending to the neceſſary furtherance of God's holy word and ſacraments. For the better attaining hereof, he wiſhed the ſcriptures to be in Engliſh, whereby the common people might the better learn their duty, as well to God as to their neighbour.

The handling of this matter was ſo apt for the time, and ſo pleaſantly applyed by him, that it not only declared the wit and dexterity of the preacher, but alſo wrought in the hearers much fruit, to the overthrow of popiſh ſuperſtition, and ſetting up of perfect religion.

This was upon the Sunday before Chriſtmas day; on which day coming to the church, and cauſing the bell to be tolled to a ſermon, he entered into the pulpit, taking for his text the words of the goſpel aforeſaid, read in the church that day; "Who art thou? &c." In delivering which cards (as is aboveſaid) he made the Heart to be Triumph, exhorting and inviting all men thereby to ſerve the Lord with inward heart and true affection, and not with outward ceremonies: adding moreover to the praiſe of that Triumph, that though it were never ſo ſmall, yet it would take up the beſt court card beſide in the bunch, yea, though it were the king of clubs, &c. meaning thereby how the Lord would be worſhipped and ſerved in ſimplicity of heart and verity, wherein conſiſteth true chriſtian religion, and not in the outward deeds of the letter only, or in the glittering ſhew of man's traditions, or pardons, pilgrimages, ceremonies, vows, devotions, voluntary works, and works of ſupererogation, foundations, oblations, the pope's ſupremacy, &c. ſo that all theſe either were needleſs, where the other is preſent; or elſe were of ſmall eſtimation, in compariſon of the other. The tenor and effect of theſe his ſermons, ſo far as they could come to our hands, here followeth.

The Tenor and Effect of certain Sermons made by Mr. Latimer in Cambridge, about the Year of our Lord 1529.

TU QUIS ES? Which words are as much as to ſay in Engliſh, "Who art thou?" Theſe be the words of the Phariſees, which were ſent by the Jews unto St. John Baptiſt in the wilderneſs, to have knowledge of him who he was; which words they ſpake unto him of an evil intent, thinking that he would have taken on him to be Chriſt, and ſo they would have had him done by their good wills, becauſe they knew that he was more carnal, and given to their laws, than Chriſt indeed ſhould be, as they perceived by their old prophecies; and alſo, becauſe they marvelled much of his great doctrine, preaching and baptizing, they were in doubt whether he was Chriſt or not: wherefore they ſaid unto him, "Who art thou?" Then anſwered St. John, and confeſſed that he was not Chriſt. Now here is to be noted the great and prudent anſwer of St. John Baptiſt unto the Phariſees, that when they required of him who he was, he would not directly anſwer of himſelf, what he was himſelf; but he ſaid he was not Chriſt. By which ſaying he thought to put the Jews and Phariſees out of their falſe opinion, and belief towards him, in that they would have had him to exerciſe the office of Chriſt, and ſo declared further unto them of Chriſt, ſaying, "He is in the midſt of you, and amongſt you, whom ye know not, the latchet of whoſe ſhoe I am not worthy to unlooſe." By this you may perceive that St. John ſpake much in the praiſe of his Maſter Chriſt, profeſſing himſelf to be in no wiſe like unto him. So likewiſe it ſhall be neceſſary unto all men and women of this world, not to aſcribe unto themſelves any goodneſs of themſelves, but all unto our Lord God, as ſhall appear hereafter, when this queſtion aforeſaid [Who art thou?] ſhall be moved unto them: not as the Phariſees did unto St. John, of an evil purpoſe, but of a good and ſimple mind, as may appear hereafter.

Now then, according to the preacher's mind, let every man and woman, of a good and ſimple mind, contrary to the Phariſees intent, aſk this queſtion [Who art thou?] This queſtion muſt be moved to themſelves, what they be of themſelves, on this faſhion, What art thou of thy only and natural generation between father and mother, when thou cameſt into the world? What ſubſtance, what virtue, what goodneſs art thou of by thyſelf? which queſtion if thou rehearſe oftentimes to thyſelf, thou ſhalt well perceive and underſtand, how thou ſhalt make anſwer to it: which muſt be made on this wiſe; I am of myſelf, and by myſelf, coming from my natural father and mother, the child of the anger and indignation of God, the true inheritor of hell, a lump of ſin, and working nothing of myſelf, but all towards hell, except I have better help of another, than I have of myſelf. Now we may ſee in what ſtate we enter into this world, that we be of ourſelves the true and juſt inheritors of hell, the children of the ire and indignation of Chriſt, working all towards hell, whereby we deſerve of ourſelves perpetual damnation, by the right judgment of God, and the true claim of ourſelves: which unthrifty ſtate that we be born unto is come unto us for our own deſerts, as proveth well this example following.

Let it be admitted for the probation of this, that it might pleaſe the king's grace now being, to accept into his favour a mean man, of ſimple degree and birth, not born to any poſſeſſion; whom the king's grace favoureth, not becauſe this perſon hath of himſelf deſerved any ſuch favour, but that the king caſteth his favour unto him of his own mere motion and fancy: and becauſe the king's grace will more declare his favour unto him, he giveth unto this ſaid man a thouſand pounds in lands, to him and his heirs, on this condition, that he ſhall take upon him to be the chief captain and defender of his town of Calais, and to be true and faithful to him in the cuſtody of the ſame, againſt the Frenchmen eſpecially above all other enemies.

This man taketh on him this charge, promiſing his fidelity thereunto; it chanceth in proceſs of time, that by the ſingular acquaintance and frequent familiarity of this captain with the Frenchmen, theſe Frenchmen give unto the ſaid captain of Calais a great ſum of money, ſo that he will be but content and agreeable, that they may enter enter into the ſaid town of Calais, by force of arms, and ſo thereby poſſeſs the ſame unto the crown of France. Upon this agreement the Frenchmen do invade the ſaid town of Calais, only by the negligence of this captain.

Now the king's grace hearing of this invaſion, cometh with a great puiſſance to defend this his ſaid town, and ſo by good policy of war overcometh the ſaid Frenchmen, and entereth again into his town of Calais. Then he being deſirous to know how theſe enemies of his came thither, he maketh ſtrict ſearch and inquiry by whom this treaſon was conſpired; by this ſearch it was known and found his own captain to be the very author and the beginner of the betraying of it. The king, ſeeing the great infidelity of this perſon, diſchargeth this man of his office, and taketh from him and his heirs this thouſand pounds poſſeſſions. Think you not that the king doth uſe juſtice unto him, and all his poſterity and heirs? Yes, truly: the ſaid captain cannot deny himſelf but that he had true juſtice, conſidering how unfaithfully he behaved himſelf to his prince, contrary to his own fidelity and promiſe: So likewiſe it was of our firſt father Adam. He had given unto him the ſpirit and ſcience of knowledge, to work all goodneſs therewith; this ſaid ſpirit was not given only to him, but unto all his heirs and poſterity. He had alſo delivered him the town of Calais, that is to ſay, paradiſe in earth, the moſt ſtrong and faireſt town in the world, to be in his cuſtody; he nevertheleſs by the inſtigation of theſe Frenchmen, that is, the temptation of the fiend, did obey unto their deſire, and ſo he brake his promiſe and fidelity, the commandment of the everlaſting King his maſter, in eating of the apple by him inhibited.

Now then, the king, ſeeing this great treaſon in his captain, depoſed him of the thouſand pounds of poſſeſſions, that is to ſay, from everlaſting life in glory, and all his heirs and poſterity: for likewiſe as he had the ſpirit of ſcience and knowledge, for him and his heirs; ſo in like manner when he loſt the ſame, his heirs alſo loſt it by him. and in him. So now this example proveth, that by our father Adam we had once in him the very inheritance of everlaſting joy; and by him, and in him again we loſt the ſame.

The heirs of the captain of Calais could not by any manner of claim aſk of the king the right and title of their father in the thouſand pounds poſſeſſions, by reaſon the king might anſwer and ſay unto them, that although their father deſerved not of himſelf to enjoy ſo great poſſeſſions, yet he deſerved by himſelf to loſe them, and greater, committing ſo high treaſon as he did, againſt his prince's commandments; whereby he had no wrong to loſe his title, but was unworthy to have the ſame, and had therein true juſtice; let not you think which be his heirs, that if he had juſtice to loſe his poſſeſſions, you have wrong to loſe the ſame: In the ſame manner it may be anſwered unto all men and women now being, that if our father Adam had true juſtice to be excluded from his poſſeſſion of everlaſting glory in paradiſe, let us not think the contrary that be his heirs, but that we have no wrong in loſing alſo the ſame; yea, we have true juſtice and right. Then in what miſerable eſtate we be, that of the right and juſt title of our own deſerts have loſt the everlaſting joy and claim of ourſelves, to be true inheritors of hell? For he that committeth deadly ſin willingly, bindeth himſelf to be an inheritor of everlaſting pain: and ſo did our fore-father Adam willingly eat of the apple forbidden. Wherefore he was caſt out of the everlaſting joy in paradiſe, into this corrupt world amongſt all vileneſs, whereby of himſelf he was not worthy to do any thing laudable or pleaſant to God, evermore bound to corrupt affections and beaſtly appetites, transformed into the uncleanneſt and moſt variable nature that was made under heaven, of whoſe ſeed and diſpoſition all the world is lineally deſcended; inſomuch that this evil nature is ſo diffuſed and ſhed from one into another, that at this day there is no man nor woman living, that can of themſelves waſh away this abominable vileneſs; and ſo we muſt needs grant of ourſelves to be in like diſpleaſure unto God, as our father Adam was; by reaſon hereof, as I ſaid, we be of ourſelves the very children of the indignation and vengeance of God, the true inheritors of hell, and working all towards hell, which is the anſwer to this queſtion, made to every man and woman by themſelves, Who art thou?

And now the world ſtanding in this damnable ſtate, cometh in the occaſion of the incarnation of Chriſt; the Father in heaven perceiving the frail nature of man, that he by himſelf and of himſelf could do nothing for himſelf, by his prudent wiſdom ſent down the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, his Son Jeſus Chriſt, to declare unto man his pleaſure and commandment: and ſo at the Father's will Chriſt took on him human nature, being willing to deliver man out of this miſerable way, and was content to ſuffer cruel paſſion in ſhedding his blood for all mankind, and ſo left behind for our ſafeguard, laws and ordinances, to keep us always in the right path unto everlaſting life, as the goſpels, the ſacraments, the commandments, &c. which if we do keep and obſerve according to our profeſſion, we ſhall anſwer better unto this queſtion [Who art thou?] than we did before: for before thou didſt enter into the ſacrament of baptiſm, thou wert but a natural man or a natural woman; as I might ſay, a man, a woman; but after thou takeſt on thee Chriſt's religion, thou haſt a longer name; for then thou art a chriſtian man, a chriſtian woman. Now then, ſeeing thou art a chriſtian man, what ſhall be the anſwer of this queſtion, [Who art thou?]

The anſwer of this queſtion is, when I aſk it unto myſelf, I muſt ſay that I am a chriſtian man, a chriſtian woman, the child of everlaſting joy, through the merits of the bitter paſſion of Chriſt. This is a joyful anſwer. Here we may ſee how much we be bound, and in danger unto God, that hath revived us from death to life, and ſaved us that were damned: which great benefit we cannot well conſider, unleſs we do remember what we were of ourſelves before we meddled with him or his laws: and the more we know our feeble nature, and ſet leſs by it, the more we ſhall conceive and know in our hearts what God hath done for us: and the more we know what God hath done for us, the leſs we ſhall ſet by ourſelves, and the more we ſhall love and pleaſe God; ſo that in no condition we ſhall either know ourſelves or God, except we do utterly confeſs ourſelves to be mere vileneſs and corruption. Well, now it is come unto this point, that we be chriſtian men, chriſtian women, I pray you what doth Chriſt require of a chriſtian man, or of a chriſtian woman? Chriſt requireth nothing elſe of a chriſtian man or woman, but that they will obſerve his rule. For likewiſe as he is a good Auguſtine friar that keepeth well St. Auguſtine's rule, ſo is he a good chriſtian man that keepeth well Chriſt's rule.

Now then what is Chriſt's rule? Chriſt's rule conſiſteth in many things, as in the commandments, and the works of mercy, and ſo forth. And becauſe I cannot declare Chriſt's rule unto you at one time, as it ought to be done, I will apply myſelf according to your cuſtom at this time of Chriſtmas, I will, as I ſaid, declare unto you Chriſt's rule, but that ſhall be in Chriſt's cards. And where you are wont to celebrate Chriſtmas in playing at cards, I intend by God's grace to deal unto you Chriſt's cards, wherein you ſhall perceive Chriſt's rule. The game that we will play at, ſhall be called the Triumph, which if it be well played at, he that dealeth ſhall win; the players ſhall likewiſe win, and the ſtanders and lookers-upon ſhall do the ſame; inſomuch that there is no man that is willing to play at this Triumph with theſe cards, but they ſhall be all winners, and no loſers.

Let therefore every chriſtian man and woman play at theſe cards, that they may have and obtain the triumph; you muſt mark alſo that the triumph muſt apply to fetch home home unto him all the other cards, whatſoever ſuit they be of. Now then take ye this firſt card, which muſt appear and be ſhewed unto you as followeth. You have heard what was ſpoken to men of the old law, Thou ſhalt not kill; whoſoever ſhall kill ſhall be in danger of judgment. But I ſay unto you of the new law, ſaith Chriſt, that whoſoever is angry with his neighbour, ſhall be in danger of judgment, and whoſoever ſhall ſay unto his neighbour Racha, that is to ſay, Brainleſs, or any other like word of rebuking, ſhall be in danger of a council; and whoſoever ſhall ſay unto his neighbour, Fool, ſhall be in danger of hell-fire. This card was made and ſpoken by Chriſt, as appeareth in the fifth chapter of St. Matthew.

Now it muſt be noted, that whoſoever ſhall play with this card, muſt firſt before they play with it, know the ſtrength and virtue of the ſame; wherefore you muſt well note and mark terms how they be ſpoken, and to what purpoſe: let us therefore read it once or twice, that we may be the better acquainted with it.

Now behold and ſee, this card is divided into four parts: the firſt part is one of the commandments that was given unto Moſes in the old law, before the coming of Chriſt, which commandment we of the new law are bound to obſerve and keep, and it is one of our commandments. The other three parts ſpoken by Chriſt, be nothing elſe but expoſitions to the firſt part of this commandment: for in very effect of all theſe four parts be but one commandment, that is to ſay, "Thou ſhalt not kill." Yet nevertheleſs, the three laſt parts do ſhew unto thee how many ways thou mayeſt kill thy neighbour contrary to this commandment: yet for all Chriſt's expoſition, in the three laſt parts of this card, the terms be not open enough to thee that doſt read and hear them ſpoken. No doubt the Jews underſtood Chriſt well enough when he ſpake to them theſe three laſt ſentences, for he ſpake unto them in their own natural terms and tongue: wherefore ſeeing that theſe terms were natural terms of the Jews, it ſhall be neceſſary to expound them, and compare them unto ſome like terms of our natural ſpeech, that we in like manner may underſtand Chriſt as well as the Jews did. We will begin firſt with the firſt part of this card, and then after with the other three parts: you muſt therefore underſtand that the Jews and the Phariſees of the old law, to whom this firſt part, this commandment, "Thou ſhalt not kill," was ſpoken, thought it ſufficient and enough for their diſcharge not to kill with any manner of material weapon, as ſword, dagger, or with any ſuch weapon, and they thought it no great fault whatſoever they ſaid or did by their neighbour, ſo that they did not harm or meddle with their corporal bodies, which was a falſe opinion in them, as prove well the three laſt other ſentences following the firſt part of this card.

Now as concerning the three other ſentences, you muſt note and take heed what difference is between theſe three manner of offences, To be angry with your neighbour, To call your neighbour brainleſs, or any ſuch word of diſdain, or to call your neighbour Fool: whether theſe three manner of offences be of themſelves more grievous one than the other, it is to be opened unto you. Truly, as they be of themſelves divers offences, ſo they kill diverſly one more than the other, as you ſhall perceive by the firſt of theſe three, and ſo forth: A man which conceiveth againſt his neighbour or brother, anger or wrath in his mind, by ſome manner of occaſion given unto him, although he be angry in his mind againſt his ſaid neighbour, he will peradventure expreſs his anger by no manner of ſign, either in word or deed; yet nevertheleſs he offendeth againſt God, and breaketh this commandment in killing his own ſoul; and is therefore in danger of judgment.

Now to the ſecond part of theſe three; That man that is moved with anger againſt his neighbour, and in his anger calleth his neigbour brainleſs, or ſome other like word of diſpleaſure; as a man might ſay in a fury, I ſhall handle thee well enough, which words and countenances do more repreſent and declare anger to be in this man, that in him that was but angry, and ſpake no manner of word, nor ſhewed any countenance to declare his anger: wherefore as he that ſo declareth his anger either by word or countenance, offendeth more againſt God, ſo he both killeth his own ſoul, and doth what in him is to kill his neighbour's ſoul in moving him to anger, wherein he is faulty himſelf, and ſo this man is in danger of a council.

Now to the third offence, and laſt of theſe three; That man that calleth his neighbour Fool, doth more declare his angry mind toward him, than he that called his neighbour brainleſs, or any ſuch words moving anger: but to call a man Fool, that word repreſenteth more envy in a man, than brainleſs doth. Wherefore he doth moſt offend, becauſe he doth moſt earneſtly with ſuch words expreſs his anger, and ſo he is in danger of hell-fire: wherefore you may underſtand now theſe three parts of this card to be three offences, and that one is more grievous to God than the other, and that one killeth more the ſoul of man than the other.

Now peradventure there be ſome that will marvel that Chriſt did not declare this commandment by ſome greater faults of anger, than by theſe which ſeem but ſmall faults, as to be angry and ſpeak nothing of it, to declare it and to call a man brainleſs, and to call his neighbour fool; truly theſe be the ſmalleſt, and the leaſt faults that belong to anger, or to killing in anger. Therefore beware how you offend in any kind of anger: ſeeing that the ſmalleſt be damnable to offend in, ſee that you offend not in the greateſt. For Chriſt thought, if he might bring you from the ſmalleſt manner of faults, and give you warning to avoid the leaſt, he reckoned you would not offend in the greateſt and worſt, as to call your neighbour thief, whoreſon, whore, drab, &c. into more blaſphemous names, which offences muſt needs have puniſhment in hell, conſidering how that Chriſt hath appointed theſe three ſmall faults, to have three degrees of puniſhment in hell, as appeareth by theſe three terms, judgment, council, and hell-fire; theſe three terms do ſignify nothing elſe but three divers puniſhments in hell, according to the offences; Judgment is leſs in degree than council, therefore it ſignifieth a leſſer pain in hell, and it is ordained for him that is angry in his mind with his neighbour, and doth expreſs his malice neither by word nor countenance: council is a leſs degree in hell than hell-fire, and is a greater degree in hell than judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour brainleſs, or any ſuch word that declareth his anger and malice: wherefore it is more pain than judgment. Hell-fire is more pain in hell, than council or judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour fool, by reaſon that in calling his neighbour fool, he declareth more his malice, in that it is an earneſt word of anger. Wherefore hell-fire is appointed for it, that is, the moſt pain of the three puniſhments.

Now you have heard that to theſe divers offences of ire and killing, be appointed puniſhments according to their degrees: for look as the offence is, ſo ſhall the pain be: if the offence be great, the pain ſhall be according: if it be leſs, there ſhall be leſs pain for it. I would not now that you ſhould think becauſe that here are but three degrees of puniſhment ſpoke of, that there be no more in hell: no doubt Chriſt ſpake of no more here but of theſe three degrees of puniſhment, thinking they were ſufficient enow for example, whereby we might underſtand, that there be as many pains as there be offences: and ſo by theſe three offences, and theſe three puniſhments, all other offences and puniſhments may be compared with each other; yet I would ſatisfy your minds farther in theſe three terms, of judgment, council, and hell fire. Where you might ſay, what was the cauſe that Chriſt declared more the pains of hell by theſe terms than by any other terms? I told you before that he knew well to whom he ſpake them: theſe terms were natural and well known among the Jews and the Phariſees. Wherefore Chriſt taught them with their own terms, to the intent they might underſtand the better his doctrine: and theſe terms may be likened unto three terms which we have common and uſual amongſt us, that is to ſay, the ſeſſions of enquirance, the ſeſſions of deliverance, and the execution day: ſeſſions of enquirance is like unto judgment; for when ſeſſions of enquiry is, then the judges cauſe twelve men to give verdict of the felon's crime, whereby he ſhall be judged to be indicted: ſeſſions of deliverance is much like council; for at ſeſſions of deliverance the judges go among themſelves to council, to determine ſentence againſt the felon. Execution-day is to be compared to hell-fire: for the Jews had a place of execution among themſelves named Hell-fire: and ſurely when a man goeth to his death, it is the greateſt pain in this world: wherefore you may ſee that there are degrees in theſe our terms, as there be in thoſe terms. Theſe evil diſpoſed affections and ſenſualities in us are always contrary to the rule of our ſalvation. What ſhall we do now or imagine to thruſt down theſe Turks, and to ſubdue them? It is a great ignominy and ſhame for a chriſtian man to be bound and ſubject unto a Turk: nay, it ſhall not be ſo, we will firſt caſt a Trump in their way, and play with them at cards who ſhall have the better, let us play therefore on this faſhion with this card. Whenſoever it ſhall happen theſe foul paſſions and Turks to riſe in our ſtomachs againſt our brother or neighbour, either for unkind words, injuries, or wrongs, which they have done unto us, contrary to our mind, ſtraitways let us call unto our remembrance, and ſpeak this queſtion unto ourſelves, [Who art thou?] the anſwer is, I am a chriſtian man. Then further we muſt ſay to ourſelves, What requireth Chriſt of a chriſtian man? Now turn up your trump, your heart (hearts is trump, as I ſaid before) and caſt your trump, your heart on this card, and upon this card you ſhall learn what Chriſt requireth of a chriſtian man, not to be angry, nor moved to ire againſt his neighbour, in mind, countenance, nor other ways by word or deed. Then take up this card with your heart, and lay them together; that done, you have won the game of the Turk, whereby you have defaced and overcome by true and lawful play: but alas, for pity, the Rhodes are won and overcome by theſe falſe Turks, the ſtrong caſtle faith is decayed, ſo that I fear it is almoſt impoſſible to win it again.

The great occaſion of the loſs of this Rhodes is by reaſon that chriſtian men do ſo daily kill their own nation, that the very true number of chriſtianity is decayed: which murder and killing one of another, is increaſed eſpecially two ways, to the utter undoing of Chriſtendom, that is to ſay, by example and ſilence. By example thus: When the father, the mother, the lord, the lady, the maſter, the dame, be themſelves overcome with theſe Turks, they be continual ſwearers, adulterers, diſpoſers to malice, never in patience, and ſo forth in all other vices: think you not when the father, the mother, the maſter, the dame, be diſpoſed unto vice or impatience, but that their children and ſervants ſhall incline and be diſpoſed to the ſame? No doubt as the child ſhall take diſpoſition natural of his father and mother, ſo ſhall the ſervants apply unto the vices of their maſters and dames: if the heads be falſe in their faculties and crafts, it is no marvel if the children, ſervants, and apprentices do join therein. This is a great and ſhameful manner of killing chriſtian men, that the fathers, the mothers, the maſters, and the dames, ſhall not only kill themſelves, but all theirs, and all that belongeth unto them, and ſo this way is a great number of chriſtian linage murdered and ſpoiled. The ſecond manner of killing is ſilence. By ſilence alſo is a great number of chriſtian men ſlain: which is on this faſhion: although that the father and mother, maſter and dame of themſelves be well diſpoſed to live after the law of God, yet they may kill their children and ſervants in ſuffering them to do evil before their own faces, and do not uſe due correction according to their offences: the maſter ſeeth his ſervant or apprentice take more of his neighbour than the king's laws, or the order of his faculty doth admit him, or he ſuffered him to take more of his neighbour than he himſelf would be content to pay if he were in like condition: thus doing, I ſay, ſuch men kill willingly their children and ſervants, and ſhall go to hell for ſo doing; but alſo their fathers and mothers, maſters, and dames ſhall bear them company for ſo ſuffering. Wherefore I exhort all true chriſtian men and women to give good example unto your children and ſervants, and ſuffer not them by ſilence to offend: every man muſt be in his own houſe, according to St. Auguſtine's mind, a biſhop, not only giving good example, but teaching according to it, rebuke and puniſh vice, not ſuffering your children and ſervants to forget the laws of God: you ought to ſee them have their belief, to know the commandments of God, to keep their holy days, not to loſe their time in idleneſs; if they do ſo, you ſhall all ſuffer pain for it, if God be true of his ſaying, as there is no doubt thereof. And ſo you may perceive that there be many one that break this card, "Thou ſhalt not kill." and playeth therewith oftentimes, at the blind Trump, whereby they be no winners, but great loſers, but who be thoſe now-a-days that can clear themſelves of theſe manifeſt murders uſed to their children and ſervants? I think not the contrary, but that many have theſe two ways ſlain their own children unto their damnation; were not the great mercy of God ready to help them when they repent therefore.

Wherefore conſidering that we be ſo prone and ready to continue in ſin, let us caſt ourſelves down with Mary Magdalen, and the more we bow down with her toward Chriſt's feet, the more we ſhall be afraid to riſe again in ſin, and the more we know and ſubmit ourſelves, the more we ſhall be forgiven, and the leſs we know and ſubmit ourſelves, the leſs we ſhall be forgiven, as appeareth by the following example.

Chriſt when he was in the world amongſt the Jews and the Phariſees, there was a great Phariſee whoſe name was Simon; this Phariſee deſired Chriſt on a time to dine with him, thinking with himſelf that he was able and worthy to give Chriſt a dinner: Chriſt refuſed not his dinner, but came unto him. In time of their dinner there happened to come into the houſe a great ſinner named Mary Magdalen. As ſoon as ſhe perceived Chriſt ſhe caſt herſelf down, and called unto her remembrance what ſhe was of herſelf, and how greatly ſhe had offended God, whereby ſhe conceived in Chriſt great love, and ſo came near unto him, and waſhed his feet with bitter tears, and ſhed upon his head precious ointment, thinking that by him ſhe could be delivered from her ſins; this great proud Phariſee ſeeing that Chriſt did accept her oblation in the beſt part, had great indignation againſt this woman, and ſaid to himſelf, If this man Chriſt were a holy prophet, as he is taken for, he would not ſuffer this ſinner to come ſo nigh him. Chriſt underſtanding the naughty mind of this Phariſee, ſaid to him; Simon, I have ſomewhat to ſay unto thee: Say what you pleaſe (quoth the Phariſee). Then, ſaid Chriſt, I pray thee tell me this: if there be a man to whom there is owing twenty pounds by one, and forty by another, this man to whom this money is owing, perceiving theſe two men be not able to pay him, he forgiveth them both. Which of theſe two debtors ought to love this man moſt? The Phariſee ſaid, That man ought to love him beſt that had moſt forgiven him: Likewiſe, ſaid Chriſt, it is by this woman. She hath loved me moſt, therefore moſt is forgiven her, ſhe hath known her ſins moſt, whereby ſhe hath moſt loved me; and thou haſt leaſt loved me, becauſe thou haſt leaſt known thy ſins, therefore becauſe thou haſt leaſt known thine offences, thou art leaſt forgiven. So this proud Phariſee had an anſwer to allay his pride: and think you not but that there be amongſt us us a great number of theſe proud Phariſees, which think themſelves worthy to bid Chriſt to dinner, who will perk and preſume to ſit by Chriſt in the church, and have diſdain of this poor woman Magdalen, this poor neighbour, with an high diſdainful and ſolemn countenance, and being always deſirous to climb higheſt in the church, reckoning themſelves more worthy to ſit there than another, I fear me poor Magdalen under the boord and in the belfry, hath more forgiven of Chriſt than they have: for it is like that theſe Phariſees do leſs know themſelves and their offences, whereby they leſs love God and ſo they be leſs forgiven.

I would to God we would follow this example, and be like unto Magdalen. I doubt not but we be all Magdalens in falling into ſin, and in offending: but we be not again Magdalens in knowing ourſelves, and in riſing from ſin. If we be the true Magdalens, we ſhould be as willing to forſake our ſin, and riſe from ſin, as we were willing to commit ſin, and to continue in it; and we then ſhould know ourſelves beſt, and make more perfect anſwer than ever we did, unto this queſtion [Who art thou?] To which we might anſwer, that we be true chriſtian men and women: and then, I ſay, you ſhould underſtand and know how you ought to play at this card, "Thou ſhalt not kill," without any interruption of your deadly enemies the Turks, and ſo Triumph at the laſt by winning everlaſting life in glory, Amen.

It would require a long diſcourſe to declare what a ſtir there was in Cambridge upon this preaching of Mr. Latimer. Belike Satan began to feel himſelf and his kingdom to be touched too near, and therefore thought it time to look about him, and to make out his men of arms.

Firſt came out the prior of the Black Friars called Buckneham, who thinking to make a great hand againſt Mr. Latimer, about the ſame time of Chriſtmas, when Mr. Latimer brought forth his cards to deface belike the doings of the other, brought out his Chriſtmas dice, caſting there to his audience Cinque and Quater, meaning by the Cinque five places in the New Teſtament, and the four doctors by the Quater; by which his Cinque Quater, he would prove that it was not expedient the ſcripture to be in Engliſh, leſt the ignorant and vulgar ſort through the occaſion thereof, might aptly be brought in danger to leave their vocation, or elſe to run into ſome inconvenience: as for example.

The ploughman when he heareth this in the goſpel, "No man that layeth his hand on the plough and looketh back, is meet for the kingdom of God;" might peradventure hearing this, ceaſe from his plough. Likewiſe the baker, when he hears that little leaven corrupteth a whole lump of dough, may perchance leave our bread unleavened, and ſo our bodies ſhall be unſeaſoned. Alſo the ſimple man when he heareth in the goſpel, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and caſt it from thee," may make himſelf blind, and ſo fill the world with beggars. Theſe with ſome others this clerkly friar brought out, to the number of five, to prove his purpoſe.

Mr. Latimer hearing this ſermon of Dr. Buckneham, cometh again in the afternoon, or ſhortly after, to the church, to anſwer the friar, where reſorted to him a great multitude, as well of the univerſity as of the town, both doctors and other graduates, with great expectation to hear what he could ſay: among whom alſo, directly in the face of Latimer, underneath the pulpit, ſate Buckneham the aforeſaid friar, prior of the Black Friars, with his black friar's cowl about his ſhoulders.

Then Mr. Latimer firſt repeating the friarly reaſons of Dr. Buckneham, whereby he would prove it a dangerous thing for the vulgar people to have the ſcripture in the vulgar tongue, ſo refuted the friar, ſo anſwered to his objections, ſo dallied with his bald reaſon of the ploughman looking back, and of the baker leaving his bread unleavened, that the vanity of the friar might to all men appear, well proving and declaring to the people, that there was no ſuch fear nor danger for the ſcriptures to be in Engliſh, as the friar pretended; at leaſt requiring this, that the ſcripture might be ſo long in the Engliſh tongue, till Engliſhmen were ſo mad, that either the ploughman durſt not look back, or the baker ſhould leave his bread unleavened. And proceeding moreover, in his ſermon, he began to diſcourſe of the myſtical ſpeeches and figurative phraſes of the ſcripture: which phraſes he ſaid were not ſo diffuſe and difficult, as they were common in the ſcripture, and in the Hebrew tongue are commonly uſed and unknown: and not only in the Hebrew tongue, but alſo every ſpeech (ſaith he) hath his like metaphors and figurative ſignifications, ſo common and vulgar to all men, that the very painters do paint them on walls and on houſes.

As for example (ſaith he, looking towards the friar that ſate over againſt him), when they paint a fox preaching out of a friar's cowl, none is ſo mad to take this to be a fox that preacheth, but know well enough the meaning of the matter; which is to paint out unto us, what hypocriſy, crafts, and ſubtle diſſimulation lieth hid many times in theſe friars cowls, willing us thereby to beware of them. In fine, friar Buckneham was ſo daſhed with this ſermon, that he durſt never after peep out of the pulpit againſt Mr. Latimer.

Beſides this Buckneham, there was alſo another railing friar, not of the ſame coat, but of the ſame note and faction, a gray friar and a doctor, an outlandiſh man, named Dr. Venetus, who likewiſe in his brawling ſermons railed and raged againſt Mr. Latimer, calling him a mad and brainleſs man, and willing the people not to believe him, &c. To whom Mr. Latimer anſwering again, taketh for his ground the words of our Saviour Chriſt, Matt. 5. Thou ſhalt not kill, &c. But I ſay unto you, Whoſoever is angry with his neighbour ſhall be in danger of judgment; and whoſoever ſhall ſay unto his neighbour, Racha, (or any other like words of rebuking, as brainleſs), ſhall be in danger of council: and whoſoever ſhall ſay to his neighbour, fool, ſhall be in danger of hell-fire.

In diſcuſſing of which place, firſt he divideth the offence of killing into three branches. One to be with hand, the other with heart, the third with word. With hand, when we uſe any weapon drawn, to ſpill the life of our neighbour. With heart, when we be angry with him. With word, when in word or countenance we diſdainfully rebuke our neighbour, or deſpitefully revile him. Words of rebuking are, when we ſpeak any opprobrious or unſeemly thing, whereby the patience of our neighbour is moved, as when we call him mad (ſaid he), or brainleſs, or ſuch like, which are guilty of council: Words of ſpite, or reviling, are, when we call him fool; which Chriſt ſaith is guilty of hell-fire.

Thus Mr. Latimer, in handling and trimming this matter, after that with the weight of Chriſt's words, and the explaining of the ſame, he had ſufficiently borne the friar clean down, then he turned to the fifth chapter of the book of Wiſdom. Out of which chapter he declared to the audience, how the true ſervants and preachers of God in this world, commonly are ſcorned and reviled by the proud enemies of God's word, which account them here as mad men, fools, brainleſs and drunken: ſo did they (ſaid he) in the ſcripture call them which moſt purely preached, and ſet forth the glory of God's word. But (ſaid he), what will be the end of theſe jolly fellows, or what will they ſay in the end? We mad men, we mad fools, we, we ourſelves, &c. And that will be their end except they repent. And thus ending his ſermon, he ſo confounded the poor friar, that he drave him not only out of countenance, but alſo clean out of the univerſity.

But what ſhould I here ſtand deciphering the names of his adverſaries, when whole ſwarms of friars and doctors flocked againſt him on every ſide, almoſt thorough the whole univerſity, preaching and likewiſe barking againſt him? Amongſt whom was Dr. Watſon, maſter of Chriſt's college, whoſe ſcholar Latimer had been before; Dr. Notaries, maſter of Clare-hall; Dr. Philo, maſter of Michael-houſe; Dr. Metecalfe, maſter of St. John's; Dr. Blithe, of the King's-hall; Dr. Bullock, maſter of the Queen's-college; Dr. Cliffe, of Clement-houſe; Dr. Donnes, of Jeſus-college, Dr. Pſalms, maſter of St. Nicholas Hoſtel, Baſh, Rud, and Greenwood, bachelors of divinity, all three of St. John's college; alſo Brickenden, bachelor of divinity, of the ſame houſe, and ſcholar ſometime to the ſaid Latimer. In ſhort, almoſt as many as were heads there of houſes, ſo many impugners did this worthy ſtandard-bearer of Chriſt's goſpel ſuſtain.

Then came at laſt Dr. Weſt, biſhop of Ely, who preaching againſt Mr. Latimer at Barwel Abby, forbad him within the churches of that univerſity to preach any more. Notwithſtanding, ſo the Lord provided, that Dr. Barnes, prior of the Auguſtine friars, did licence Mr. Latimer to preach in his church of the Auguſtines, and he himſelf preached at the church by, called St. Edward's church, which was the firſt ſermon of the goſpel that Dr. Barnes preached, being Sunday and Chriſtmas Eve. Whereupon certain articles were gathered out of his ſermon, and were commenced againſt him by Mr. Tirell, fellow of the King's-hall, and ſo by the vice-chancellor preſented to the cardinal.

This Mr. Latimer (as you have heard), being baited by the friars, doctors, and maſters of that univerſity, about the year aforeſaid, 1529, notwithſtanding the malice of theſe malignant adverſaries, continued yet in Cambridge preaching for the ſpace of three years together with favour and applauſe of the godly, alſo with ſuch admiration of his enemies that heard him, that the biſhop himſelf coming in, and hearing his gift, wiſhed himſelf to have the like, and was compelled to commend him upon the ſame.

So Mr. Latimer and Mr. Bilney after this continued in Cambridge for ſome time, where they ſo frequently conferred together, that the fields wherein they uſually walked, was for a long time after called, The heretics hill.

The ſociety of theſe two, as it was much noted by many in that univerſity, ſo it was full of many good examples, to all ſuch as would follow them, both in viſiting the priſoners, relieving the needy, and in feeding the hungry. Mr. Latimer maketh mention of a certain hiſtory which happened about this time in Cambridge, between them both and a certain woman then priſoner in the caſtle or tower of Cambridge, which I thought here worthy to be mentioned. The ſtory is this: It ſo happened, that after Mr. Latimer had been ſo acquainted with the aforeſaid Mr. Bilney, he went with him to viſit the priſoners in the Tower of Cambridge, and being there, among other priſoners, there was a woman who was accuſed that ſhe had killed her own child, which act ſhe plainly and ſtedfaſtly denied. Whereby it gave them occaſion to ſearch for the matter, and at length they found that her huſband loved her not, and therefore ſought all means he could to make her away. The matter was thus:

A child of hers had been ſick a whole year, and at length died in harveſt time, as it were in a conſumption: which when it was gone, ſhe went to have her neighbours to help her at the burial, but all were abroad in the harveſt, whereby ſhe was enforced with heavineſs of heart, alone to prepare the child for the burial. Her huſband coming home, and not loving her, accuſed her of murdering the child. This was the cauſe of her trouble, and Mr. Latimer, by earneſt inquiſition, of conſcience thought the woman not guilty. Then immediately after he was called to preach before king Henry the eighth at Windſor, where after his ſermon the king's majeſty ſent for him, and talked familiarly with him. At which time Mr. Latimer, finding an opportunity, kneeled down, opened this whole matter to the king, and deſired her pardon, which the king moſt graciouſly granted, and gave it to him at his return homeward. In the mean time the woman was delivered of a child in the priſon, whoſe godfather was Mr. Latimer, and Mrs. Cheek godmother. But all the while he would not tell her of the pardon, but laboured to have her confeſs the truth of the matter. At length the time came when ſhe expected to ſuffer, and Mr. Latimer came, as he was wont to inſtruct her; unto whom ſhe made great lamentation and moan, to be purified before her ſuffering, for ſhe thought ſhe muſt be damned if ſhe died without purification.

Then Mr. Bilney being with Mr. Latimer, both told her that the law was made for the Jews, and not for us, and that women be as well in the favour of God before they be purified as after; and rather it was appointed for a civil and politic law, for natural honeſty ſake, than that they ſhould any thing the more be purified from ſin thereby, &c. So thus they argued with this woman till they had better inſtructed her, and at length ſhewed her the king's pardon, and let her go.

This good act, among many others about that time, happened in Cambridge by Mr. Latimer and Mr. Bilney. But this was not all, for many more like matters were wrought by them. But as it is commonly ſeen in the natural courſe of things, that as the fire beginneth more to kindle, ſo the more ſmoke ariſeth withal, in much like ſort it happened with Mr. Latimer; whoſe towardneſs the more it began to ſpring, his virtues to be ſeen, and his doings to be known, the more his adverſaries began to kick and ſpurn againſt him. Concerning theſe adverſaries, and ſuch as did moleſt him, partly their names be above expreſſed. Among the reſt of this number was Dr. Redman, a man ſavouring more of ſuperſtition than of true religion, after the zeal of the Phariſees, yet not ſo malignant or hurtful, but of a civil and quiet diſpoſition, and alſo liberal in well-doing, that few poor ſcholars were in that univerſity, who fared not better by his purſe. This Dr. Redman was a man of great authority in the univerſity of Cambridge, and perceiving the bold enterprize of Mr. Latimer, in ſetting abroad the word and doctrine of the goſpel, at this time, or much about the ſame, writeth to him, ſeeking by perſuaſion to revoke the ſaid Latimer from that kind and manner of teaching; to whom Mr. Latimer maketh anſwer again in a few words: the ſum and effect of both their letters, tranſlated out of Latin, here followeth.

The Subſtance of the Epiſtle written by Dr. Redman to Mr. Latimer.

GRACE be with you, and true peace in Chriſt Jeſus. I beſeech you heartily, and require moſt earneſtly, even for charity's ſake, that you will not ſtand in your own conceit with a mind ſo indurate, nor prefer your own ſingular judgment in matters of religion and controverſy before ſo many learned men, and which is more, before the whole catholic church, eſpecially conſidering that you neither have any thing in the word of God to make for you, nor yet the teſtimony of any authentic writer. Nay, nay, I beſeech you rather conſider that you are a man, and that lying and vanity may quickly blear your eyes, which doth ſometimes transform itſelf into an angel of light.

Judge not ſo raſhly of us, as that wicked ſpirit hath tickled you in the ear. Wit you well that we are careful for you, and that we wiſh you to be ſaved, and that we are careful alſo for your own ſalvation. Lay down your ſtomach I pray you, and humble your ſpirit, and ſuffer not the church to take offence with the hardneſs of your heart, nor that her unity and Chriſt's coat without ſeam (as much as lieth in you) ſhould be torn aſunder. Conſider what the ſaying of the wiſe man is, and be obedient thereunto. Truſt not your own wiſdom. The Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.

The Sum of Mr. Latimer's Anſwer to Dr. Redman.

REverend Mr. Redman, it is even enough for me, that Chriſt's ſheep hear no man's voice but Chriſt's: and as for you, you have no voice of Chriſt againſt me, whereas for my part I have a heart that is ready to hearken to any voice of Chriſt that you can bring me. Thus fare you well, and trouble me no more from the talking with the Lord my God.

After Mr. Latimer had thus travelled in preaching and teaching in the univerſity of Cambridge about the ſpace of three years, at length he was called up to the cardinal for hereſy, by the procurement of ſome of the ſaid univerſity, where he was content to ſubſcribe and grant to ſuch articles as then they propounded to him, &c.

After that he returned to the univerſity again, where ſhortly after by the means of Dr. Buts, the king's phyſician, a ſingular good man, and a ſpecial favourer of good proceedings, he was in the number of them which laboured in the cauſe of the king's ſupremacy. Then went he to the court, where he remained a certain time in the ſaid Dr. But's chamber, preaching then in London very often. At laſt being weary of the court, having a benefice offered by the king, at the ſute of the lord Cromwel, and Dr. Buts, was glad thereof, ſeeking by that means to be rid out of the court, wherewith in no caſe he could agree; and ſo having a grant of the benefice, contrary to the mind of Dr. Buts, he would needs depart and be reſident at the ſame.

This benefice was in Wiltſhire, under the dioceſe of Sarum, the name of which town was called Weſt Kingſton, where this good preacher did exerciſe himſelf with much diligence of teaching to inſtruct his flock, and not only to them his diligence extended, but alſo to all the country about. In fine, his diligence was ſo great, his preaching ſo powerful, the manner of his teaching ſo zealous, that there in like ſort he could not eſcape without enemies. So true it is that St. Paul foretelleth us, Whoſoever will live godly in Chriſt, ſhall ſuffer perſecution. It ſo happened, that whereas he, preaching upon the bleſſed virgin Chriſt's mother (whom we call our lady), had thereupon declared his mind, referring and reducing all honour only to Chriſt our only Saviour, certain popiſh prieſts being therewith offended, ſought and wrought much trouble againſt him, drawing out articles and impoſitions which they untruly, unjuſtly, falſely, and uncharitably imputed unto him: Firſt, that he ſhould preach againſt our lady, for that he reproved in a ſermon the ſuperſtitious rudeneſs of certain blind prieſts, which ſo held together upon the bleſſed virgin, as though ſhe never had any ſin, nor were ſaved by Chriſt the only Saviour of the whole world.

Item, That he ſhould ſay, that ſaints were not to be worſhipped.

Item, That Ave Maria was a ſalutation only, and no prayer.

Item, That there was no material fire in hell.

Item, That there was no purgatory, in ſaying, that he had rather be in purgatory than in Lollard's Tower.

Touching the whole diſcourſe of which articles, with his reply and anſwer to the ſame, hereafter ſhall follow (by the Lord's aſſiſtance), when we come to his letters.

The chief impugners and moleſters of him, beſides theſe country prieſts, were Dr. Powel of Saliſbury, Dr. Wilſon ſometime of Cambridge, Mr. Hubberdin, and Dr. Sherwood. Of whom ſome preached and ſome wrote againſt him; inſomuch that by their procurement he was cited up, and called to appear before W. Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and John Stokeſly, biſhop of London, Jan. 29, 1531. The copy of which citation (as now tranſlated from the Latin) here followeth.

No. 27.

The Copy of a Citation ſent to the ſaid Mr. Latimer, by the Chancellor of Sarum, at the Interceſſion of the Biſhop of London.

RIchard Hilley, doctor of the decrees of the moſt reverend father in God, Laurence, by divine providence biſhop of Sarum, and vicar-general in ſpiritual affairs throughout England. To all and ſingular rectors, vicars, chaplains, curates, and the reſt of the clergy and learned perſons throughout the whole dioceſe of Sarum, health in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Together and apart we commit and firmly command, that ye immediately cite or cauſe to be cited, Mr. Hugh Latimer, vicar of Weſt Kingſton in the county of Wilts and dioceſe of Sarum, that he may appear before the reverend father in God, John, by divine providence biſhop of London, or his vicar-general in ſpirituals, or before the chapter held in the church of St. Paul, London, on Monday the 29th of this inſtant January, between the hours of nine and eleven in the forenoon of the ſame day, there perſonally to anſwer to certain articles or queſtions concerning grievous crimes and miſdemeanors by him committed, and under the cognizance of the biſhop of London, and furthermore to receive condign puniſhment for the ſame: and that ye certify us at Sarum of what is done on the premiſſes before the 22d of this ſame month of January, that we may be able to certify the ſame to the aboveſaid reverend father, the lord biſhop of London, on or before the ſaid 22d of January, according as the ſame reverend father having prayed and required it of us, in aid of the law, and out of mutual kindneſs.

Given at Sarum, under the ſeal of the aforeſaid father in God, the 10th day of January, 1531.

Againſt this citation, although Mr. Latimer did appeal to his own ordinary, requiring by him to be ordered, yet all that notwithſtanding, he was had up to London before Warham the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhop of London, where he was greatly moleſted, and detained a long time from his cure at home. There he being called thrice every week before the ſaid biſhops, to make anſwer for his preaching, had certain articles or propoſitions drawn out and laid to him, whereunto they required him to ſubſcribe. At length he not only perceiving their practical proceedings, but alſo much grieved with their troubleſome unquietneſs, who neither would preach themſelves, nor yet ſuffer him to preach and do his duty, writeth to the aforeſaid archbiſhop, partly excuſing his infirmity, whereby he could not appear at their commandment, partly expoſtulating with them for ſo troubling and detaining him from doing his duty, and that for no juſt cauſe, but only for preaching the truth againſt certain vain abuſes crept into religion, much needful to be ſpoken againſt. Which all may appear by his epiſtle ſent to a certain biſhop or archbiſhop, whoſe name is not expreſſed; the copy of which epiſtle is now tranſlated from Latin, and is as followeth.

A copy of the Epiſtle written by Mr. Latimer to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

MOST REVEREND GOVERNOR,

HAD not ſickneſs prevented me, I had myſelf waited on you at your palace; but theſe freſh troubles have brought on me a ſharp return of an old diſtemper, ſo that I cannot be able to wait on you to-day, I cannot (I ſay) without great pain, but that your lordſhip might no longer in vain expect my coming, I have ſent theſe lines ſcribled with mine own hand to your grace, as to a moſt upright judge, of my excuſe, in which I wiſh I had more time or more judgment to frame a juſt expoſtulation with your grace for detaining me ſo long againſt my will from my cure, and that ſo unſeaſonably, at a time when it moſt behoves every paſtor to be with his flock. But what ſhall I ſay, if it is lawful for ſo mean a priſoner to plead with ſo great a father? If we eſteem a prieſt good for doing his duty, who while he remains in this earthly tabernacle, never ceaſeth to teach and admoniſh his congregation, and ſo much the more as he draws nearer his laſt home, what muſt we think of thoſe who neither preach themſelves now (at which I ſhould not wonder had they not been uſed to it before), nor permit thoſe who are deſirous to do it, unleſs they are bound to do and ſay nothing but what they pleaſe. At firſt I thought it ſafe to ſubmit myſelf entirely to your clemency, but now it ſeems as ſafe to juſtify myſelf a little, ſince one thing was pretended in the beginning, but now another, and what will be the end I have great room to doubt; but I hope truth only will be uſed. St. Jerome, on theſe words (which I hope I ſhall never forget), "The Lord who preſerveth truth, for ever ſhall deliver thee," writes thus, Whatſoever I ſuffer for truth's ſake, ſhall never trouble me, for the Lord liveth and careth for me. Firſt I was ſent to London, where I was before the court of Canterbury, then all was ſtopped that had been done, and the matter had bounds and limits ſet to it by him who ſent me, but ſo the buſineſs was handled and brought into doubt, that at length there ſeemed no end to it, but that it muſt be infinitely prolonged. For while, without either method or deſign, I was queſtioned of one thing after another, whether pertitent or impertinent, now by one and then by another, if I gave them no anſwer, or if I anſwered them to the purpoſe (which I thought was not imprudent ſometimes to put an end to the diſpute), I was equally uncivil; while one anſwers to many and of many things, he may inadvertently ſay ſomething that may prejudice the moſt righteous cauſe. None ought to judge me wicked for what at moſt they can call but an error of conſcience, and to remember all things it behoves a man to remember the foundation of the other world. When a man acts againſt conſcience he doth it to gain, to maintain, or defend his own, but what they charge me with is far different, and I believe without example, wickedly requeſting, to know the cauſe of my confinement. If any perſon is diſpoſed to attack my ſermons, that they are obſcure, or not cautiouſly enough worded, I am prepared either to explain or vindicate them, for (to the beſt of my knowledge) I never preached any thing againſt the truth, againſt the councils of the fathers, or againſt the catholic faith. All that my adverſaries or detractors truly charge me with, is what I have long deſired, and do deſire, namely, the improving the common people's judgment. I heartily deſire that all men might know and comprehend the diſagreement of things, the worth, the place, time, degrees and order proper for each, and how much they are concerned in thoſe things which God has prepared for them to walk in: every man ought to be very diligent in doing the works of his calling, after which, things indifferent may be done with equal diligence, amongſt which are all things which no law has forbid, unleſs we forbid them to ourſelves: it is lawful to uſe images, to go on pilgrimages, to invoke ſaints, to remember the ſouls in purgatory, but theſe which are voluntary acts are to be ſo reſtrained that they diminiſh not the juſt eſteem the precepts of God (which beſtow eternal life on thoſe who do them), ſhould neceſſarily have; they who uſe them otherwiſe, are ſo far from gaining the love of God, that they rather incur his hatred. The true love of God is to keep his commandments, as our Saviour ſays, He who heareth my words and doth them, he it is who loveth me. Let no man then have ſo mean an opinion of the laws of God, as to make them equal with the fancies of men, ſince by thoſe at the laſt day before the tribunal of Chriſt we ſhall all be judged, and not by theſe; as Chriſt ſays, The word that I ſpeak that ſhall judge you at the laſt day; and what man is able to make amends for the breach of one of thoſe commandments, by any or all of theſe ſpecious additions? O that we would be but as ready, as diligent, as devoted to do his will as we are to follow our own empty notions. Many things done with an upright heart God accepts of, making an allowance for our infirmities, though he has not commanded or required them; but theſe things ought to be taken away when they begin to have the force of commands, leſt while we do theſe, we omit thoſe that are abſolutely neceſſary; and what can be more abſurd than to revere as ordinances of God, the idle fancies of men, whilſt his true ordinances are neglected? whence I, in behalf of the commandments of God, ſtand hitherto immoveable, not ſeeking my own but Chriſt's gain, not my own but God's glory, and whilſt I live, I will ſtand ſtedfaſt; ſo all the German divines have hitherto complained of the intolerable abuſe of theſe things, that no man deſirous of the glory of Chriſt can accept of the miniſtry without doing thoſe things againſt his conſcience; and if ſome have (for I won't ſay none) ſubmitted to this hardſhip purely to do good, yet what doth the chriſtian religion ſuffer by it? unleſs we are ſo miſerably blinded as to think that theſe things are to be diſpenſed with for our own filthy gain, though they are not for the honour of God. Now who can juſtify the conſtant practice of ſuch things which in themſelves are highly criminal? Some things are conſtantly performed which ought never, while others are omitted which ought always, to be done: now who cannot ſee this manifeſt abuſe? and who ſees, and don't grieve? and who grieves, that would not labour to remove it? and when ſhall it be removed, while it is conſtantly preached and commended? why it is hardly poſſible for it not to be univerſal. It is one thing barely to permit, and another to inforce as law. Go (ſays Chriſt) and teach all things; but what are thoſe all things? Why all that ye have heard of me, not all that ſeems fit to yourſelves. Let us therefore, by the help of God, go and do likewiſe: let us employ our whole ſtrength to preach the ſincere word of God, not to flatter or cook up our ſermons to men's depraved taſte, then ſhall we be true preachers of God's word, As careleſs as men are in what relates to God, they are diligent enough in what relates to themſelves, to this they want no ſpurs; but they are miſerably deceived by an unjuſt eſteem of things, and an early ſuperſtition received in their tender years from their fore-fathers, which we are hardly able to remedy by any preaching, how frequent, how earneſt, how ſincere and pure ſoever, which God doth not now permit; for in theſe evil days they who ought to preach themſelves (for to us, ſays St. Peter, has he given to preach the goſpel), forbid them to preach who are willing and able, and on the contrary, compel time-ſervers, who damnably detain the miſerable people in ſuperſtition and falſe confidence; but Lord have mercy upon us, and grant we may know thy way upon earth, not to be found amongſt thoſe to whom the Lord ſays, My ways are not your ways, neither are my thoughts your thoughts. Hence I dare not ſubſcribe to theſe propoſitions, moſt honoured father, becauſe I would no ways be acceſſary to the longer continuance of theſe popular ſuperſtitions, leſt I ſhould be the author of my own damnation. Was I worthy, I would give even you ſome advice; but that little impertinent thing the heart, can do little elſe than gueſs, none knowing the things of a man but the ſpirit of a man which is in him. It is not any pride that hinders me from ſubſcribing to theſe propoſitions; on the contrary, I am very ſorry I cannot wholly perform your requeſt. I know how great a crime it is to diſobey the fathers and governors of the church, but then regard is to be had to what they command, in which caſe we ought always to obey God rather than man.

My head aches ſo much, and my body is ſo weak, that I can neither come, nor write over again and correct theſe lines; lines; but your lordſhip, I hope, will approve, if not the judgment, yet the endeavours of

Your lordſhip's devoted ſervant.

In this aforeſaid epiſtle (as ye hear) he maketh mention of certain articles or propoſitions, whereunto he was required by the biſhops to ſubſcribe. The copy and effect of thoſe articles or rude propoſitions (as he calleth them) are theſe:

Articles deviſed by the Biſhops for Mr. Latimer to ſubſcribe unto.

I Believe that there is a purgatory to purge the ſouls of the dead after this life.

That the ſouls in purgatory are holpen with the maſſes, prayers, and alms of the living.

That the ſaints do pray as mediators now for us in heaven.

That they are to be honoured of us in heaven.

That it is profitable for chriſtians to call upon the ſaints, that they may pray as mediators for us unto God.

That pilgrimages and oblations done to the ſepulchres and relics of ſaints are meritorious.

That they which have vowed perpetual chaſtity may not marry, nor break their vow, without the diſpenſation of the pope.

That the keys of binding and looſing delivered to Peter, do ſtill remain with the biſhops of Rome his ſucceſſors, although they live wickedly, and are by no means nor at any time committed to laymen.

That men may merit and deſerve at God's hand by faſting, prayer, and other good works of piety.

That they which are forbidden by the biſhop to preach, as ſuſpect perſons, ought to ceaſe until they have purged themſelves before the ſaid biſhop, or their ſuperiors, and be reſtored again.

That the faſt which is uſed in Lent, and other faſts preſcribed by the cannons, and by cuſtom received of the chriſtians (except neceſſity otherwiſe require) are to be obſerved and kept.

That God in every one of the ſeven ſacraments giveth grace to a man, rightly receiving the ſame.

That conſecrations, ſanctifyings and bleſſings, by uſe and cuſtom received in the church, are laudable and profitable.

That it is laudable and profitable, that the venerable images of the crucifix and other ſaints, ſhould be had in the churches as a remembrance, and to the honour and worſhip of Jeſus Chriſt and his ſaints.

That it is laudable and profitable to deck and to cloath thoſe images, and ſet up burning lights before them to the honour of the ſaid ſaints.

To theſe articles, whether he did ſubſcribe or no, it is uncertain. It appeareth by this epiſtle above written to the biſhop, that he durſt not conſent unto them where he writeth in theſe words, I dare not ſubſcribe to theſe propoſitions, becauſe I would no ways be acceſſary to the longer continuance of theſe popular ſuperſtitions, leſt I be the author, &c. But yet whether he was compelled afterwards to agree through the cruel handling of the biſhops, it is in doubt. By the words and the title in Tonſtal's regiſter prefixed before the articles, it may ſeem that he did ſubſcribe. The words of the regiſter are theſe: Hugh Latimer, bachelor of divinity, of the univerſity of Cambridge, in a convication held at Weſtminſter before the lord archbiſhop of Canterbury, John lord biſhop of London, and the reſt of the clergy, has acknowledged and made the following confeſſion of his faith, as in theſe articles, March 21, 1531. If theſe words be true, it may be thought he ſubſcribed. And whether he ſo did, no great matter or marvel, the iniquity of the time being ſuch, that either he muſt needs ſo do, or elſe abide the biſhop's bleſſing, that is, cruel ſentence of death, which he at that time (as he himſelf confeſſed preaching at Stamford) was loth to ſuſtain for ſuch matters as theſe were, unleſs it were for articles neceſſary of his belief; by which his words of conjecture rather that he did ſubſcribe at length; albeit it was long before he could be brought ſo to do. Yet this by the way is to be noted, concerning the crafty and deceitful handling of theſe biſhops in his examinations, what ſubtle devices they uſed the ſame time to entrap him in their ſnares. The truth of the ſtory he ſhewed forth himſelf in a certain ſermon preached at Stamford, Oct. 9. 1550. his words be theſe:

I was once (ſaith he) in examination before five or ſix biſhops, where I had much turmoiling; thrice every week I came to examinations, and many ſnares and traps were laid to get ſomething. Now God knoweth I was ignorant of the law, but that God gave me anſwer and wiſdom what I ſhould ſpeak; it was God indeed, for elſe I had never eſcaped them. At laſt I was brought forth to be examined into a chamber hanged with arras where I was wont to be examined: but now at this time the chamber was ſomewhat altered. For whereas before there was wont always to be a fire in the chimney, now the fire was taken away, and an arras hanged over the chimney, and the table near the chimney's end.

There was amongſt the biſhops that examined me, one with whom I have been very familiar, and took him for my great friend, an aged man, and he ſate next the table's end.

Then amongſt all other queſtions he put forth one, a very ſubtle and crafty one, and ſuch an one indeed as I could not think ſo great danger in. And when I ſhould make anſwer, I pray you, Mr. Latimer, ſaid one, ſpeak out, I amvery thick of hearing, and here be many that ſit far off. I marvelled at this that I was bid to ſpeak out, and begun to ſuſpect, and give an ear to the chimney; and, Sir, there I heard a pen walking in the chimney behind the cloth. They had appointed one there to write all mine anſwers: for they made ſure that I ſhould not ſtart from them: there was no ſtarting from them. God was my good Lord, and gave me anſwer, I could never elſe have eſcaped it. The queſtion there and then objected to him was this; Whether he thought in his conſcience, that he hath been ſuſpected of hereſy. This was a captious queſtion. There was no holding of peace would ſerve; for that was to grant himſelf faulty. To anſwer, it was every way full of danger: but God which alway giveth in need what to anſwer, helped him, or elſe (as he confeſſed himſelf) he never had eſcaped their bloody hands. Albeit what was his anſwer, he doth not there expreſs. And thus hitherto you have heard declared the manifold troubles of this godly preacher, in the time not only of his being in the univerſity, but eſpecially at his benefice, as partly in his own words abovementioned, and partly by his own letters hereafter following, may better appear.

In theſe ſo hard and dangerous ſtraits, and ſuch ſnares of the biſhops, hard it had been for him, and impoſſible to have eſcaped and continued ſo long, had not the Almighty helping hand of the Higheſt, as he ſtirred him up, ſo preſerved him through the favour and power of his prince; who with much favour embraced him, and with his mere power ſometime reſcued and delivered him out of the crooked claws of his enemies. Moreover, at length alſo through the procurement partly of Dr. Buts, partly of the good lord Cromwel, he advanced him to the dignity and degree of a biſhop, making him the biſhop of Worceſter, which ſo continued a few years, inſtructing his dioceſe, according to the duty of a diligent and vigilant paſtor, with wholeſome doctrine and example of perfect converſation duly agreeing to the ſame. It were a long matter to ſtand particularly upon ſuch things as might here be brought to the commendation of his his pains; as ſtudy, readineſs, and continual carefulneſs in teaching, preaching, exhorting, viſiting, correcting and reforming, either as his ability could ſerve, or elſe the time would bear. But the days then were ſo dangerous and variable, that he could not in all things do that he would. Yet what he might do, that he performed to the uttermoſt of his ſtrength, ſo that although he could not utterly extinguiſh all the ſparkling relics of old ſuperſtition, yet he ſo wrought, that though they could not be taken away, yet they ſhould be uſed with as little hurt, and with as much profit as might be. As for example, in this thing, and in divers others it did appear, that when it could not be avoided, but holy water and holy bread muſt needs be received, yet ſo he prepared and inſtructed them of his dioceſe, with ſuch informations and leſſons, that in receiving thereof, ſuperſtition ſhould be excluded, and ſome remembrance taken thereby, touching and charging the miniſters of his dioceſe, in delivering the holy water and the holy bread, to ſay theſe words following:

Words ſpoken to the People in giving them holy Water.

" Remember your promiſe in baptiſm,
Chriſt his mercy and blood-ſhedding,
By whoſe moſt holy ſprinkling,
Of all your ſins you have free pardoning."

What to ſay in giving holy Bread.

" Of Chriſt's body this is a token,
Which on the croſs for our ſins was broken:
Wherefore of your ſins you muſt be forſakers,
If of Chriſt's death ye will be partakers."

By this it may be conſidered what the diligent care of this biſhop was in doing the duty of a faithfnl paſtor among his flock. And moreover it is to be thought, that he would have brought more things elſe to paſs, if the time then had anſwered to his deſire; for he was not ignorant how the inſtitution of holy water and holy bread, not only had no ground in ſcripture, but alſo how full of profane exorciſms and conjurations they were, contrary to the rule and learning of the goſpel. Thus this good man behaved himſelf in his dioceſe. But (as before) both in the univerſity and at his benefice he was toſt and troubled by wicked and evil diſpoſed perſons; ſo in his biſhopric alſo he was not free from ſome that ſought his trouble. As among many other evil willers, one eſpecially there was, and that no ſmall perſon, who accuſed him then to the king for his ſermons. The ſtory, becauſe he himſelf ſheweth in a ſermon of his before king Edward, I thought therefore to uſe his own words, which be theſe:

In the king's day's that is dead, a great mary of us were called together before him, to ſpeak our minds in certain matters. In the end one kneeleth down and accuſeth me of ſedition; and that I had preached ſeditious doctrine. A heavy ſalutation, and a hard point of ſuch a man's doing, as if I ſhould name ye would not think.

The king turned to me, and ſaid; What ſay you to that, Sir? Then I kneeled down, and turned firſt to my accuſer, and required him; Sir, what form of preaching would you appoint me in preaching before a king? Would you have me preach nothing as concerning a king in the king's ſermon? Have you any commiſſion to appoint me what I ſhall preach? Beſides this, I aſked him divers other queſtions, and he would make no anſwer to any of them all; he had nothing to ſay.

Then I turned to the king, and ſubmitted myſelf to his grace, and ſaid, I never thought myſelf worthy, nor did I ever ſue to be a preacher before your grace, but I was called to it, and would be willing (if you miſlike me) to give place to my betters; for I grant there be a great many more worthy of the room than I am. And if it be your grace's pleaſure ſo to allow them for preachers, I could be content to carry their books after them. But if your grace allow me for a preacher, I would deſire your grace to give me leave to diſcharge my conſcience, give me leave to frame my doctrine according to my audience. I had been a very blockhead to have preached ſo at the borders of your realm, as I preach before your grace.

And I thank Almighty God (who hath always been my remedy) that my ſayings were well accepted of the king; for like a gracious lord he turned into another communication. It is even as the ſcripture ſaith, The Lord directeth the king's heart. Some of my friends came to me with tears in their eyes, and told me, they expected I ſhould have been in the Tower the ſame night.

Beſides this, divers other conflicts and combats this godly biſhop ſuſtained in his own country and dioceſe, in taking the cauſe of right and equity againſt oppreſſion and wrong. As for another example: There was at this time not far from the dioceſe of Worceſter a certain juſtice of peace, whom here I will not name, being a good man afterwards, and now deceaſed. This juſtice in purchaſing of certain land for his brother or for himſelf, went about to wrong or damnify a poor man, who made his complaint to Mr. Latimer. He firſt hearing, then tendering his rightful cauſe, wrote his letter to the gentleman, exhorting him to remember himſelf, to conſider the cauſe, and to abſtain from injury. The juſtice of peace not content withal (as the faſhion of men is when they are told of their faults) ſendeth word again in diſpleaſure, that he would not ſo take it at his hands, with ſuch threatening words. Mr. Latimer hearing his, anſwered again by writing to a certain gentleman: the copy whereof among his letters hereafter followeth in the ſequel of this ſtory to be ſeen.

It were a large and long proceſs to declare all the doings, travels, and writings of this chriſtian biſhop, neither yet have we expreſſed all that came to our hands; but this I thought ſufficient for this preſent. Thus he continued in his laborious function of a biſhop ſome years, till the coming in of the ſix articles. Then being diſtreſſed through the ſtraightneſs of time, ſo that either he muſt loſe the quietneſs of a good conſcience, or elſe forſake his biſhopric, the latter of which he freely did, and Dr. Shaxton the biſhop of Saliſbury reſigned likewiſe with him. At which time he threw off his rochet in his chamber among his friends, and ſuddenly gave a ſkip on the floor for joy, feeling his ſhoulder ſo light, and being diſcharged (as he ſaid) of ſuch an heavy burden. However he was not ſo lightened, but that troubles and labour followed him whereſoever he went. For a little after he had renounced his biſhopric, he was much bruiſed by the fall of a tree: then coming up to London for remedy, he was moleſted and troubled by the biſhops, whereby he was again in no little danger, and at length was ſent to the Tower, where he continually remained priſoner, till the time that bleſſed king Edward entered his crown, by which means the golden mouth of this preacher, long ſhut up before, was now opened again. And ſo he beginning afreſh to ſet forth his plough again, continued all the time of the ſaid king labouring in the Lord's harveſt moſt fruitfully, diſcharging his talent at Stamford, and before the ducheſs of Suffolk, and many other places in this realm (whoſe ſermons are now extant), as alſo at London in the convocation-houſe, and eſpecially before the king at the court: in the ſame place of the inward garden, which was before applied to laſcivious and courtly paſtimes, there he diſpenſed the fruitful word of the glorious goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, preaching there before the king and his whole court, to the edification of many.

And

And thus he ſpent his time in king Edward's days, preaching, for the moſt part, twice every Sunday, to the ſhame of all other loitering and unpreaching prelates, who occupy great rooms, and do little good; and ſo much the more to their ſhame, becauſe he, being a man ſo bruiſed by the fall of a tree, and above ſixty ſeven years of age, took ſo little eaſe and care of ſparing himſelf, to do the people good. Now to ſpeak here of his indefatigable diligence in his private ſtudies: Notwithſtanding his years, and the fatigue of ſo often preaching, it was his common cuſtom every morning, winter and ſummer, to be diligently at his book, by two of the clock. How careful his heart was of the preſervation of the church, and the good ſucceſs of the goſpel, his letters can teſtify, wherein he admoniſheth thoſe of their duty that were then in authority, and aſſiſted them with his godly counſel.

As the diligence of this man of God never ceaſed all the time of king Edward, to profit the church both publicly and privately, ſo it is likewiſe to be obſerved, that the ſame good Spirit of God that aſſiſted and comforted him in preaching the goſpel, did alſo enable him evidently to foretel all thoſe kinds of plagues, which afterwards enſued; if England ever had a prophet, he ſeemed to have been one. And as touching himſelf, he ever affirmed, that the preaching of the goſpel would coſt him his life, to which he no leſs chearfully prepared himſelf, than certainly was perſuaded, that Wincheſter was kept in the Tower for the ſame purpoſe, as the event did too truly prove the ſame. For after the death of the ſaid pious king Edward, not long after queen Mary was proclaimed, a purſuivant was ſent down (by the means, no doubt, of Wincheſter), into the country, to call him up, of whoſe coming, although Mr. Latimer lacked no forewarning, being premoniſhed about ſix hours before by one John Careles (whoſe ſtory hereafter followeth), yet he was ſo far from endeavouring to eſcape, that he prepared himſelf for his journey before the ſaid officer came to his houſe.

At which when the purſuivant marvelled, ſeeing him ſo prepared for his journey, Mr. Latimer ſaid unto him, My friend, you be a welcome meſſenger to me. And be it known unto you and to all the world, that I go as willingly to London at this preſent, being called by my prince to render a reckoning of my doctrine, as ever I went to any place in the world. I doubt not but that God, as he hath made me worthy to preach his word before two excellent princes, ſo will he enable me to witneſs the ſame unto the third, either to her comfort or diſcomfort eternally, &c. When the purſuivant had delivered his letters, he departed, affirming that he had commandment not to tarry for him. By whoſe ſudden departure it was manifeſt that they would not have him appear, but rather to have fled out of the realm. They knew that his conſtancy ſhould deface them in their popery, and confirm the godly in the truth.

Thus Mr. Latimer being ſent for, and coming up to London, (entering Smithfield, he merrily ſaid, That Smithfield had long groaned for him), was brought before the council, where he patiently bearing all the mocks and taunts given him by the ſcornful papiſts, was again ſent to the Tower, where he being aſſiſted with the heavenly grace of Chriſt, patiently ſuſtained impriſonment a long time; notwithſtanding the cruel and unmerciful uſage of the lordly papiſts, who then thought their kingdom would never fall, yet he ſhewed himſelf not only patient, but alſo merry and chearful in and above all that which they could work againſt him; yea, ſuch a valiant ſpirit the Lord gave him, that he was able not only to deſpiſe the terribleneſs of priſons and torments, but alſo to deride and laugh to ſcorn even the cruel proceedings of his enemies. It is well known to many what anſwer he made to the lieutenant when he was in the Tower. For when the lieutenant's man, upon a time came to him, the aged father kept without fire in the froſty winter, and well nigh ſtarved for cold, he bade the man tell his maſter, That if he did not look better after him, perchance he might deceive him.

The lieutenant hearing this, and not knowing what to make of ſo odd a ſpeech, and fearing that he would in earneſt make his eſcape, began to look more ſtrictly to his priſoner, and coming to him, beginneth to charge him with his words, reciting the ſame unto him which his man had told him before; That if he were not better looked unto, purchance he might deceive him. Yea, Mr. Lieutenant, ſo I ſaid (quoth he) for I ſuppoſe you expect that I ſhould burn; but except you let me have ſome fire, I am like to deceive your expectation, for I am like here to ſtarve for cold.

Many ſuch-like anſwers and reaſons, merry, but ſavoury, coming not from a vain mind, but from a conſtant and quiet reaſon, proceeded from that man, declaring a firm and ſtable heart, little minding all the bluſtering of their terrible threats, but rather deriding the ſame.

Thus Mr. Latimer, paſſing a long time in the Tower, with as much patience as a man in his caſe could do, from thence was tranſported to Oxford, with Dr. Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Dr. Ridley, biſhop of London, there to diſpute upon articles ſent down from Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, as is before mentioned, the manner and order of which diſputations between them and the univerſity doctors, is alſo before ſufficiently expreſſed. Where alſo is declared, how and by whom the ſaid Latimer with his other fellow-priſoners were condemned after the diſputations, and ſo committed again to the priſon, and there they continued from the month of April, till the month of October; where they were moſt godly occupied, either with brotherly conference, or with fervent prayer, or with fruitful writing.

Albeit Mr. Latimer, by reaſon of the feebleneſs of his age, wrote leaſt of all in this latter time of his impriſonment; yet in prayer he was frequently occupied, wherein oftentimes ſo long he continued kneeling, that he was not able to riſe without help: and amongſt other things, theſe were the principal matters he prayed for.

Firſt, That as God had appointed him to be a preacher of his word, ſo alſo he would give him grace to ſtand to his doctrine until his death, that he might give his heart blood for the ſame.

Secondly, That God of his mercy would reſtore his goſpel to England once again; and theſe words ONCE AGAIN, ONCE AGAIN, he did ſo inculcate and beat into the ears of the Lord God, as though he had ſeen God before him, and ſpoken to him face to face.

The third matter was, to pray for the preſervation of the lady Elizabeth, whom in his prayer he uſed to name, and even with tears deſired God to make her a comfort to this comfortleſs realm of England.

Theſe were the matters he prayed for ſo earneſtly. Neither were theſe things of him deſired in vain, as the good ſucceſs thereof, after following, did declare; for the Lord moſt graciouſly did grant all thoſe his requeſts.

Firſt, Concerning his conſtancy, even in the moſt extremity, the Lord graciouſly aſſiſted him. For when he ſtood at the ſtake without Bocardo-gate at Oxford, and the tormenters about to ſet the fire to him, and to the learned and pious biſhop Dr. Ridley, he lifted up his eyes towards heaven with an amiable and comfortable countenance, ſaying theſe words, "God is faithful, which doth not ſuffer us to be tempted above our ſtrength;" and ſo afterward ſhed his blood in the cauſe of Chriſt, which blood ran out of his heart in ſuch abundance, that all thoſe that were preſent, being godly, did marvel to ſee the moſt part of his blood in his body to be gathered to his heart, and with ſuch violence to guſh out, his body being opened by the force of the fire; by which things God moſt graciouſly granted his requeſt, which was, That he might ſhed his heart blood in the defence of the goſpel.

How mercifully the Lord heard his ſecond requeſt, in reſtoring his goſpel once again unto this realm, theſe preſent days can bear record. And what then ſhall England ſay now for her defence, which being ſo mercifully viſited and refreſhed with the word of God, ſo ſlenderly and unthankfully conſidereth either her own miſery paſt, or the great benefit of God now preſent? The Lord be merciful unto us, Amen.

Again, concerning his third requeſt, it ſeemeth likewiſe moſt effectually granted, to the great praiſe of God, the furtherance of his goſpel, and to the unſpeakable comfort of this realm. For whether at the requeſt of his prayer, or of other God's holy ſaints, or whether God was moved with the cry of his whole church, the truth is, that when all was deplorable and in a deſperate caſe, and ſo deſperate, that the enemies mightily flouriſhed and triumphed, God's word was baniſhed, Spaniards received, no place left for Chriſt's ſervants to cover their heads; ſuddenly the Lord called to remembrance his mercy, and forgetting our former iniquity, made an end of all theſe miſeries, and wrought a marvellous change of things; at the change whereof the ſaid queen Elizabeth was appointed and anointed, for whom this gray-headed father ſo earneſtly prayed in his impriſonment: through whoſe true, natural, and imperial crown, the brightneſs of God's word was ſet up again to confound the dark and falſe vizored kingdom of Antichriſt, the true temple of Chriſt re-edified, the captivity of ſorrowful chriſtians releaſed, which ſo long was wiſhed for in the prayers of ſo many good men, eſpecially of this faithful and true ſervant of the Lord, Mr. Latimer.

The ſame God, who, at the requeſts of his holy and faithful ſaints, hath poured upon us ſuch benefits of his mercy, peace and tranquillity, aſſiſt our moſt virtuous and chriſtian princeſs, and her ſubjects, that we may every one, in his ſtate and calling, ſerve to his glory, and walk in our vocation, that we loſe not that which they have obtained, but may proceed in all faithfulneſs, to build and keep up the houſe and temple of the Lord, to the advancing of his glory, and our everlaſting comfort in him. And thus much concerning the laborious travels of Mr. Latimer. Now after theſe things thus finiſhed and diſcourſed, pertaining to the ſtory of his life, let us come to his letters, which he wrote at divers and ſundry times, from the firſt beginning of his preaching, all which hereto comprehend which he wrote both in Engliſh and Latin, lack of room at preſent will not permit: nevertheleſs ſome we ſhall inſert, and firſt concerning the articles above-mentioned, for which he was troubled by the prieſts of the country about his benefice at Weſt Kingſton; which he writeth thereof to Mr. Morice, the copies whereof follow.

Articles untruly, unjuſtly, falſly, uncharitably imputed to me by Dr. Powel, of Saliſbury.

Firſt, That our Lady was a Sinner.

OCcaſioned of ſome, not only lay-men, but alſo prieſts and beneficed men, who gave ſo much to our lady of devotion without judgment, as though ſhe had not needed Chriſt to ſave her: to prove Chriſt her Saviour, to make Chriſt a whole Saviour of all that be, or ſhall be ſaved, I reaſoned after this manner: That either ſhe was a ſinner, or no ſinner; there is no mean. If ſhe were a ſinner, then ſhe was redeemed or delivered from ſin by Chriſt, as other ſinners be: if ſhe were no ſinner, then ſhe was preſerved from ſin by Chriſt; ſo that Chriſt ſaved her, and was her neceſſary Saviour, whether ſhe ſinned or no. Now certain authors, ſaid I, as Chryſoſtom, Theophilact, and others, write, as though ſhe had been ſomething faulty in her time. Alſo, I ſaid, that certain ſcriptures ſtandeth to the ſame, unleſs they be the more warily underſtood and taken, (as in Rom. 3. 10, 20.) All have declined, that every mouth be ſtopped, and all the world be bounden or in danger to God. And after in the ſame chapter; All have ſinned, and need the glory of God. And in the fifth, And ſo death paſſed through into all men and women, foraſmuch as all have ſinned. But to theſe ſcriptures I ſaid, it might be anſwered, that the privilege of one, or of a few, doth not derogate or diminiſh the verity of an univerſal expoſition in ſcriptures.

And as to the doctors, I ſaid, that others ſay otherwiſe; and foraſmuch as now it is univerſally and conſtantly received and applied, that ſhe was no ſinner, it becometh every man to ſtand and agree to the ſame; and ſo will I, quoth I, nor any man that is wiſe, will the contrary: but to my purpoſe it is neither to nor from, to prove neither this nor that; for I will have her ſaved, and Chriſt her Saviour, whether ever ſhe was, &c.

And to that, what need you to ſpeak of this? I anſwered great need, when men cannot be content that ſhe was a creature ſaved, but as it were a Savioureſs, not needing ſalvation, it is neceſſary to ſet her in degree to the glory of Chriſt, Creator and Saviour of all that be or ſhall be ſaved. Good authors have written that ſhe was not a ſinner: but good authors never wrote that ſhe was not ſaved: for though ſhe never ſinned, yet ſhe was not ſo impeccable, but ſhe might have ſinned, if ſhe had not been preſerved: it was of the goodneſs of God that ſhe never ſinned: it had come of her own illneſs if ſhe had ſinned: there was difference betwixt her and Chriſt. And I will give as little to her as I can (doing her no wrong), rather than Chriſt her ſon and Saviour ſhall lack any parcel of his glory; and I am ſure that our lady will not be diſpleaſed with me for ſo doing, for our lady ſought his glory here upon earth, ſhe would not defraud him now in heaven: but ſome are ſo ſuperſtitiouſly religious, or ſo irreligiouſly ſuperſtitious, ſo prepoſterouſly devout toward our lady, as though there could not too much be given to her: ſuch are zeals without knowledge and judgment to our lady's diſpleaſure.

No doubt our lady was, through the goodneſs of God, a good and a gracious creature, a devout handmaid of the Lord, indued with ſingular gifts and graces from above, which through the help of God, ſhe uſed to God's pleaſure, according to her duty, ſo giving us enſample to do likewiſe; ſo that all the goodneſs that ſhe had, ſhe had it not of herſelf, but of God the author of all goodneſs: the Lord was with her favourably, and poured graces unto her plenteouſly, as it is in the Ave Maria. The Son of God, when he would become man, to ſave both man and woman, did chooſe her to his mother, which love he ſhewed to her alone, and to none other, of his benign goodneſs, by which ſhe was the natural mother of Chriſt: and through faith in Chriſt ſhe was the ſpiritual ſiſter of Chriſt, ſaved by Chriſt, bleſſed by hearing Chriſt's word, and keeping the ſame. It would not availed her to ſalvation, to have been his natural mother, if ſhe had not done the will of his heavenly Father: by him ſhe was his mother, by him ſhe did the will of his Father: ſhe the handmaiden, he the Lord. The handmaiden did magnify the Lord, the handmaiden would that all ſhould magnify the Lord, to whom be honour and glory for ever, Amen.

To honour him worthily, is not to diſhonour our lady; he is as able to preſerve from ſin, as to deliver from ſin; he was then ſubject to Joſeph his father-in-law, his mother's huſband, Joſeph is now ſubject to him. He never diſhonoured Joachim and Anna, his grandfather and grandmother, and yet I have not read that he preſerved them from all ſin.

To ſay that Peter and Paul, David, and Mary Magdalen, were ſinners, is not to diſhonour them: for then, ſcripture doth diſhonour them. It had not been for our profit to have preſerved all that he could have preſerved. For

For remembrance of that fall and up-riſing keepeth us in our fall from deſpairing: both is of God, to have not ſinned, and to have forſaken and left ſin. And as ſure is this of heaven as that, and this more common than that, and to us that have been ſinners, more comfortable.

It hath been ſaid, in times paſt, without ſin, that our lady was a ſinner: but it was never ſaid without ſin, that our lady was not ſaved, but a ſaviour: I do not go about to make our lady a ſinner, but to have Chriſt her Saviour. When mine adverſaries cannot reprove the thing that I ſay, then they will bely me, to ſay the thing that they can reprove. They will ſin to make our lady no ſinner, to prove that, that no man dieth. So that provers, and ſo cold probations ſaw you never. It were better unproved, than ſo weakly proved. But they be devout towards honouring of our lady, but to ſin to have our lady no ſinner, or to ſay ſhe was no ſinner.

I would be as loth to diſhonour our lady as they, I pray God we may honour her as ſhe would be honoured; for verily ſhe is worthy to be honoured.

To make a pernicious and a damnable lie, to have our lady no ſinner, is neither honour, nor yet pleaſure to our lady, but great ſin, to the diſhonour and diſpleaſure both of God and her.

They ſhould both pleaſe and honour our lady much better, to believe their ſinful living, and keep themſelves from ſinfulneſs, as our lady did, than ſo ſinfully to lie to make our lady no ſinner; which if they do not, they ſhall certainly go to the devil, though they believe never ſo ſurely, that our lady was no ſinner.

And for the Ave Maria, they lie falſly, I never denied it: I know it was a heavenly ſaluting or greeting of our lady, ſpoken by the angel Gabriel, and written in the holy ſcripture of St. Luke. But yet it is not properly a prayer, as the Pater Noſter is. Saluting or greeting, lauding or praiſing, is not properly praying. The angel was ſent to greet our lady, and to annunciate and ſhew the good will of God towards her, and therefore it is called, the Annunciation of our lady, and not to pray her, or to pray to her, properly: Shall the Father of heaven pray to our lady? When the angel ſpake it, it was not properly a prayer. And is it not the ſame thing now as it was then? nor yet he that denieth the Ave Maria to be properly a prayer, denieth the Ave Maria; ſo that we may ſalute our lady with Hail Mary! as the angel did, though we be not ſent of God ſo to do, as the angel was. Yet though we may ſo do, we have no plain command for ſo doing, as the angel had; ſo that the angel had been more to blame peradventure to have left it unſaid, than we be, foraſmuch as he was appointed of God to ſay it, and not we: but as I deny not, but as we may ſay the Pater Noſter, and the Ave Maria together, that to God, this to our lady, ſo we may ſay them ſeparately, the Pater Noſter by itſelf, and the Ave by itſelf; and the Pater Noſter is a whole and a perfect prayer, without the Ave Maria; ſo that it is but a ſuperſtition to think that a Pater Noſter cannot be well ſaid without an Ave Maria at his heel. For Chriſt was no fool, and when he taught the people to ſay a Pater Noſter to God, he taught them not to ſay, neither Pater Noſter, neither Ave Maria to our lady, nor yet Pater Noſter to St. Peter, as Mr. Hubberdin doth: therefore to teach to ſay twenty Ave Maria's for one Pater Noſter, is not to ſpeak the word of God as the word of God. And one Ave Maria well ſaid, and devoutly, with affection, ſenſe and underſtanding, is better than twenty-five ſaid ſuperſtitiouſly. And it is not like, but our lady ſaid many times the Pater Noſter, foraſmuch as her ſon Chriſt, whom ſhe loved and honoured over all, did make it, and taught it to be ſaid; whether ſhe made an Ave Maria with all, or ten or twenty Ave Maria's for one Pater Noſter, I will leave that to learned men, as Hubberdin and Powel, to diſcuſs and determine; ſhe was not ſaved by often ſaying of the Ave Maria, but by conſenting to the will of him, that ſent the angel to ſalute her with, Hail Mary! wherefore if the praying of them which decline their ear from hearing the law of God is execrable in the ſight of God, yea, though they ſay the Pater Noſter, I doubt not but the ſalvation of them hath been unpleaſant to our lady in her ſight, for whatſoever pleaſeth not her Son, pleaſeth not her; for ſhe hath delight and pleaſure in nothing, but in him, and in that which delighteth and pleaſeth him. Now we will be traitors to her Son by cuſtomable ſinful living, and yet we ſhall think great perfection and holineſs in numbering every day many Ave Maria's to our lady, and ſo we think to make her our friend and patroneſs, and then we care not for God: for having our lady on our ſide, we may be bold to take our pleaſure: for we fantaſy as though the very work and labour of flummering the Ave Maria is very acceptable to our lady, and the more, the more acceptable, not minding how they be ſaid, ſo that they be ſaid; if the Pater Noſter which Chriſt both made, and commanded us to uſe, may be uſed to Chriſt's diſpleaſure, much more the Ave Maria, which neither Chriſt nor our lady bid us ſay, may be ſaid to her diſpleaſure: and better never once ſaid, than often ſo ſaid. I would have a difference betwixt well ſaying and often ſaying, and betwixt that which Chriſt bid us ſay, and that which he bid us not ſay: and whether Ave Maria be ſaid in heaven or no, who can tell but Dr. Powel? and if it be ſaid alway there without a Pater Noſter, why may not Pater Noſter be ſaid here without Ave Maria; and whether doth our lady ſay it in heaven or no? which thing I ſpeak not to withdraw you from ſaying of it, but to withdraw you from ſuperſtitious and unfruitful ſaying of it. So that by occaſion of falſe faith and truſt, that ye have in the daily ſaying of it, you ſet not aſide imitation and following of holy living, which will ſerve, at length, when ſuperſtitious greeting will neither ſerve nor ſtand in ſtrength: it is meet that every thing be taken, eſteemed, and valued as it is.

We ſalute alſo and greet well the holy croſs, or the image of the holy croſs, ſaying, All hail holy croſs, which hath deſerved to bear the precious Talent of the world: and yet, who will ſay that we pray properly to the holy croſs? whereby it may appear that greeting is one thing, praying another thing. The croſs can neither hear nor ſpeak again, no more than this pulpit: wherefore we do ſalute it, not properly pray to it.

The angel ſpake alſo to Zachary, before he ſpake to our lady. Be not afraid, Zachary, for thy prayer is heard, and thy wife Elizabeth ſhall bring thee forth a child which ſhall be called John, and great joy and gladneſs ſhall be at his birth, and he ſhall be great and full of the Holy Ghoſt from the womb of his mother, &c,

What if a man ſhould ſay theſe words every day, betwixt the Pater Noſter and the Ave Maria, in the worſhip of St. Zachary, who I think is a ſaint in heaven, and was ere ever our lady came therefore to be honoured, I think he might pleaſe and honour St. Zachary, as well ſome other way, and better too; though they be words ſent from God, ſpoken by an angel, and written by St. Luke in holy ſcripture.

And yet if it were once begun and accuſtomed, I warrant ſome men would make it more than ſacrilege to leave it off, though the devil ſhould ſow never ſo much ſuperſtition by proceſs of time unto it.

Chriſt made the Pater Noſter for a prayer, and bid his people ſay it to his heavenly Father, One God in Trinity of Perſons, one Father and Comforter, one Worker and Doer of all things here in this world, ſaying unto us, After this manner ſhall ye pray, Our Father, &c. God ſent his Son, amongſt other things, to teach his people to pray; God ſent his angel to greet our lady, not to teach his people to pray. For neither Chriſt nor the angel ſaid to the people, This ſhall ye pray, Ave Maria. When the apoſtles ſaid to Chriſt, Teach us to pray; Chriſt ſaid, ſaid, When you pray ſay, Our Father: he ſaid not when you pray, ſay, Ave Mary. I ſuppoſe Chriſt could teach to pray, as well as Dr. Powel and Mr. Hubberdin. I ſay that the Ave Maria was before the Pater Noſter; Dr. Powel ſaith, it ſhall endure after the Pater Noſter: I can prove my ſaying by ſcripture, ſo cannot he his: yet as it is no good argument, The Ave Mary was before the Pater Noſter, Ergo, it is properly a prayer: ſo it is no good argument, The Ave Mary ſhall laſt after the Pater Noſter, Ergo, it is properly a prayer, without the antecedent be impoſſible, which is not credible to come out of ſuch a fantaſtical brain.

Who was ever ſo mad as to think, that words of holy ſcripture could not be well ſaid: and yet we may not be ſo peeviſh as to allow the ſuperſtitious ſaying of holy ſcripture. The devil is crafty, and we frail and prone to ſuperſtition and idolatry, God give me grace to worſhip him and his, not after our own curioſity, but according to his ordinance with all humility.

St. Zachary is to be honoured, and in no wiſe to be diſhonoured: ſo that we may leave unſaid that which the angel ſaid without diſhonouring him.

It is not neceſſary to our ſalvation to make an ordinance of honouring him, with ſaying as the angel did.

It is better for a mortal man to do the office of a man, which God biddeth him to do, than to leave that undone, and do the office of an angel which God biddeth us not to do: if the other be preſumption, I had rather preſume to pray to God, which is God's bidding and man's office, than to preſume into the office of an angel without God's bidding.

It is a godly preſumption, to preſume to do the bidding of God.

Here I neither ſay, that our lady was a ſinner, nor yet I deny the Ave Mary.

Saints are not to be honoured.

I Said, this word Saints, is diverſly taken by the vulgar people; images of ſaints are called ſaints, and inhabiters of heaven are called ſaints. Now by honouring of ſaints, is meant praying to ſaints. Take honouring ſo, and images for ſaints; ſo ſaints are not to be honoured: that is to ſay, dead images are not to be prayed unto; for they have neither ears to hear withal, nor tongue to ſpeak withal, nor heart to think withal, &c.

They can neither help me, nor mine ox, neither my head nor my tooth, nor work any miracle for me, one no more than another: and yet I ſhewed the good uſe of them to be lay-men's books, as they be called, reverently to look upon them, to remember the things that are ſignified by them, &c.

And yet I would not have them ſo coſtly and curiouſly gilt and decked, that the quick image of God, (for whom Chriſt ſhed his blood, and to whom whatſoever is done, Chriſt reputeth it done to himſelf), lack neceſſaries and be unprovided for by that occaſion, for then the layman doth abuſe his book.

A man may read upon his book, though it be not very curiouſly gilded; and in the day-time a man may behold it without many candles, if he be not blind.

Now, I ſay, there be two manner of mediators, one by way of redemption, another by way of interceſſion; and I ſaid, that theſe ſaints, that is to ſay, images called ſaints, be mediators neither way.

As touching pilgrimages, I ſaid, that all idolatry, ſuperſtition, error, falſe faith, and hope in the images, muſt be pared away, before they can be well done, houſhold looked upon, poor chriſtian people provided for, reſtitutions made, all ordinances of God diſcharged, or ever they can be well done. And when they be at beſt, before they be vowed, they need not to be done: they ſhall never be required of us, though they be never done, and yet we ſhall be blamed when they be all done; wives muſt adviſe with their huſbands, and huſbands with their wives, both with curates, ere ever they may be vowed to be done.

And yet idolatry, may be committed in doing of them, as it appeareth by St. Paul, in the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, chap. 10. where he biddeth the Corinthians this; to beware of idolatry, and that after they had received the true faith in Chriſt; which had been vain, if they could not have done idolatry: and expoſitors add, to beware, not only of the act of idolatry, but alſo of all occaſion of that act: which is plain againſt Mr. Hubberdin, and parſon of Chriſt's church, who went about to prove, that now there could be no idolatry.

As touching the ſaints in heaven, I ſaid, they be not our mediators by way of redemption: for ſo Chriſt alone is our mediator and theirs both: ſo that the blood of martyrs hath nothing to do by way of redemption: the blood of Chriſt is enough for a thouſand worlds, &c.

But by way of interceſſion, ſo ſaints in heaven may be mediators, and pray for us, as I think they do when we call not upon them: for they be charitable, and need no ſpurs, and we are not openly required of God in ſcripture to call upon them, as we are to call upon God, nor yet may we call upon them without any diffidence or miſtruſt in God; for God is more charitable, more merciful, more able, more ready to help than them all, ſo that though we may deſire the ſaints in heaven to pray to God for us, yet it is not ſo neceſſary to be done, but that we may pray to God ourſelves, without making ſute firſt to them, and obtain of him whatſoever we need, if we continue in prayer, ſo that whatſoever we aſk the Father, in the name of Chriſt his Son, the Father will give it us: for ſaints can give nothing without him, but he can without them, as he did give to them: ſcripture doth ſet ſaints, that be departed before our eyes, for our enſamples, ſo that the chiefeſt and moſt principal worſhip and honouring of them is to know their holy living, and to follow them, as they followed Chriſt, &c.

God biddeth us come to him with prayer, and to follow his advice is no preſumption, it is rather preſuming to leave it undone, to do that which he biddeth us not do, &c. We muſt have ſaints in reverent memory, and learn at God's goodneſs towards them to truſt in God, and mark well their faith toward God and his word, their charity toward their neighbour, their patience in all adverſity, and pray to God who gave them grace ſo to do, that we may do likewiſe, for which like doings we ſhall have like ſpeedings, they be well honoured when God is well pleaſed; the ſaints were not ſaints by praying to ſaints, but by believing in him that made them ſaints: and as they were ſaints, ſo may we be ſaints: yea, there be many ſaints that never prayed to ſaints: and yet I deny not, but we may pray to ſaints, but rather to him who can make us ſaints, who calleth us to him, biddeth us call upon him, promiſeth help, cannot deceive us and break his promiſe; when we pray faithfully to him we honour him, not after our own fantaſtical imagination, but even after his own moſt wiſe ordination, whom to honour is not to diſhonour ſaints; therefore they lie, that ſay, that I would not have ſaints to be honoured, &c.

There is no Fire in Hell.

I Never knew man that ever ſaid ſo. I ſpeak of divers opinions that have been written of the nature of that fire; ſome that it is a ſpiritual fire, or at leaſt way, a ſpiritual pain in the corporal fire; for as it is called a fire, ſo it is called a worm: now becauſe they think not that it is a corporal worm, but a ſpiritul and metaphorical worm, ſo they think of the fire. Some, that it is a corporal and natural fire; ſome have thought diverſly before the reſurrection without the body, and after with the body; ſome, that the ſoul without body ſuffereth in the fire, but not of the fire; ſome, both in and of the fire. The ſcholaſtic authors think, that the ſouls before the reſurrection, becauſe they be ſpiritual ſubſtance, doth not receive the heat of the fire into them, which is a ſenſible and corporal quality, ſo that Athanaſius, a Greek author calleth their pain Triſtitiam, a heavineſs or an anguiſh: and this opinion is probable enough: ſome think that though they be alway in pain, yet they be not always in fire, but go from waters of ſnow to exceeding heat: but it is when their bodies be there; but whether in cold or in heat, in water or in fire, in air or in earth, they lack no pain, their torment goeth with them, for they think that the devils that tempt us, though they have pain with them, yet they have not fire with them, for then they ſhould be known by heat of the fire.

I am certain, ſaith St. Auguſtine, that there is a fire in hell, but what manner of fire, or in what part of the world, no man can tell but he that is of God's privy council: I would adviſe every man to be more careful to keep out of hell, than truſt he ſhall find no fire in hell. Chryſoſtom ſaith, That to be deprived of the fruition of the Godhead, is greater pain than the being in hell: there is fire burning, there is the worm gnawing, there is heat, there is cold, there is pain without pleaſure, torment without eaſe, anguiſh, heavineſs, ſorrow, and penſiveneſs, which tarrieth and abideth for all lyars and hinderers of the truth.

There is no Purgatory after this Life.

NOT for ſuch lyars as will hear me in hand to ſay that I ſaid not: I ſhewed the ſtate and condition of them that be in purgatory: then I denied it, not that they have charity in ſuch ſurety that they cannot loſe it, ſo that they cannot murmur againſt God, cannot diſhonour God, can neither diſpleaſe God, nor be diſpleaſed with God, cannot be diſſevered from God, cannot die, nor be in peril of death, cannot be damned, nor be in danger of damnation; cannot be but in ſurety of ſalvation; they be members of the myſtical body of Chriſt as we be, and in more ſurety than we be; they love us charitably; charity is not idle, if it be, it worketh and ſheweth itſelf, and therefore I ſay, they wiſh us well, and pray for us; they need not cry loud to God, they be in Chriſt, and Chriſt in them, they be with Chriſt, and Chriſt with them, they joy in the Lord Chriſt alway, taking thankfully whatſoever God doth with them, ever giving thanks to their Lord God, ever lauding and praiſing him in all things that he doth, diſcontent with nothing that he doth, &c.

And foraſmuch as they be always in charity, and when they pray for us, they pray always in charity, and be always God's friends, God's children, brethren and ſiſters to our Saviour Chriſt, even in God's favour, even have Chriſt with them, to offer their prayer to the Father of heaven, to whom they pray in the name of the Son. And we many times for lack of charity, having malice and envy, rancour, hatred one toward another, be the children of the devil, inheritors of hell, adverſaries to Chriſt, hated of God, his angels, and all his ſaints; they in their ſtate may do us more good with their prayers, than we in this ſtate: and they do us alway good, unleſs the lack and impediment be in us; for prayer ſaid in charity is more fruitful to him that it is ſaid for, and more acceptable to God, than ſaid out of charity; for God looketh not to the work of praying, but to the heart of the prayer. We may well pray for them, and they much better for us, which they will do of their charity, though we deſire them not.

I had rather be in purgatory than in the biſhop of London's priſon; for in this I might die bodily, for lack of meat; in that I could not. In this I might die ghoſtly for fear of pain, or lack of good counſel; in that I could not. In this I might be in extream neceſſity; in that I could not, if extreme neceſſity be peril of periſhing. And then you know what followeth, if we be not bounden by precept to help, but them that be in extreme neceſſity, we ſee not who needeth in purgatory, but we ſee who needeth in this world. And John ſaith, If thou ſee thy brother, and help him not, how is the charity of God in thee? Here, either we be, or we may be in extreme neceſſity, both in body and ſoul; in purgatory neither one nor other. Here we be bound to help one another, as we would be helped ourſelves under pain of damnation. Here for lack of help we may murmur and grudge againſt God, diſhonour God, undo ourſelves, which inconveniencies ſhall not follow, if we do our duty one to another. I am ſure the ſouls in purgatory be ſo charitable, and of charity ſo loth to have God diſhonoured, that they would have nothing withdrawn from the poor here in this world, to be beſtowed upon them which might occaſion the diſhonour of God, &c.

Therefore howſoever we do for purgatory, let us provide to keep out of hell. And had I a thouſand pounds to beſtow, as long as I ſaw neceſſary occaſion offered to me of God to diſpenſe it upon my needy brother here in this world, according to God's commandment, I would not withdraw my duty from him for any proviſion of purgatory, as long as I ſaw dangerous ways unrepaired, poor men's daughters unmarried, men beg for lack of work, ſick and ſore for lack of ſuccour. I would have difference between that which may be done, and that which ought to be done, and this to go before that, and that to come after this: if God command one way, mine own devotion moveth me another way, which way ſhould I go? I may by no trentals, no maſſes, no ladders of heaven make no foundations for myſelf with other men's goods; goods wrongfully gotten muſt needs home again, muſt needs be reſtored to the owners, if they can be known, if not, they be poor men's goods: debts muſt needs be paid, creditors ſatisfied and content, God's ordinance toward my neighbour here in this world diſcharged, all affections and luſts moving to the contrary purged. Or elſe though our ſoul-prieſts ſing till they be blear-eyed, or ſay maſs till they have worn their tongues to the ſtumps, neither their ſinging nor their ſayings ſhall bring us out of hell, whither we ſhall go for contemning God's prohibitions.

He that purgeth all error of falſe opinions, all unwillingneſs to do God's ordinance, provideth not for hell and purgatory. Purgatory's iniquity hath ſet aſide reſtitutions, and brought poor chriſtians to extreme beggary, repleniſhed hell, and left heaven almoſt empty.

In Purgatory there is no pain

- That can break their charity.
- That can break their patience.
- That can diſſever them from Chriſt.
- That can diſſever Chriſt from them.

- That can cauſe them to diſhonour God.
- That can cauſe them to diſpleaſe God.
- That can cauſe them to be diſpleaſed with God.
- That can cauſe them to be diſcontent with God.

- That can bring them to peril of death.
- That can bring them to peril of damnation.
- That can bring them to extreme neceſſity.
- That can bring them from ſurety of ſalvation.

And yet it followeth not that there is no pain.

Howbeit if the biſhop's two fingers can ſhake away a good part, if a friar's cowl, or the pope's pardon, or Scala Cœli of a groat can diſpatch for all together, it is not ſo greatly to be cared for. I have not leiſure to write at large, and I wrote before ſuch things which in this haſte cometh now to mind.

They that can reclaim at this, that the ſouls in purgatory do pray for us, if they could get as much money for the prayer, that the ſouls in purgatory ſaith for us, as they have done for that that they have ſaid for them, they ſaid, When you pray ſay, Our Father: he ſaid not when you pray, ſay, Ave Mary. I ſuppoſe Chriſt could teach to pray, as well as Dr. Powel and Mr. Hubberdin. I ſay that the Ave Maria was before the Pater Noſter; Dr. Powel ſaith, it ſhall endure after the Pater Noſter: I can prove my ſaying by ſcripture, ſo cannot he his: yet as it is no good argument, The Ave Mary was before the Pater Noſter, Ergo, it is properly a prayer: ſo it is no good argument, The Ave Mary ſhall laſt after the Pater Noſter, Ergo, it is properly a prayer, without the antecedent be impoſſible, which is not credible to come out of ſuch a fantaſtical brain.

Who was ever ſo mad as to think, that words of holy ſcripture could not be well ſaid: and yet we may not be ſo peeviſh as to allow the ſuperſtitious ſaying of holy ſcripture. The devil is crafty, and we frail and prone to ſuperſtition and idolatry, God give me grace to worſhip him and his, not after our own curioſity, but according to his ordinance with all humility.

St. Zachary is to be honoured, and in no wiſe to be diſhonoured: ſo that we may leave unſaid that which the angel ſaid without diſhonouring him.

It is not neceſſary to our ſalvation to make an ordinance of honouring him, with ſaying as the angel did.

It is better for a mortal man to do the office of a man, which God biddeth him to do, than to leave that undone, and do the office of an angel which God biddeth us not to do: if the other be preſumption, I had rather preſume to pray to God, which is God's bidding and man's office, than to preſume into the office of an angel without God's bidding.

It is a godly preſumption, to preſume to do the bidding of God.

Here I neither ſay, that our lady was a ſinner, nor yet I deny the Ave Mary.

Saints are not to be honoured.

I Said, this word Saints, is diverſly taken by the vulgar people; images of ſaints are called ſaints, and inhabiters of heaven are called ſaints. Now by honouring of ſaints, is meant praying to ſaints. Take honouring ſo, and images for ſaints; ſo ſaints are not to be honoured: that is to ſay, dead images are not to be prayed unto; for they have neither ears to hear withal, nor tongue to ſpeak withal, nor heart to think withal, &c.

They can neither help me, nor mine ox, neither my head nor my tooth, nor work any miracle for me, one no more than another: and yet I ſhewed the good uſe of them to be lay-men's books, as they be called, reverently to look upon them, to remember the things that are ſignified by them, &c.

And yet I would not have them ſo coſtly and curiouſly gilt and decked, that the quick image of God, (for whom Chriſt ſhed his blood, and to whom whatſoever is done, Chriſt reputeth it done to himſelf), lack neceſſaries and be unprovided for by that occaſion, for then the layman doth abuſe his book.

A man may read upon his book, though it be not very curiouſly gilded; and in the day-time a man may behold it without many candles, if he be not blind.

Now, I ſay, there be two manner of mediators, one by way of redemption, another by way of interceſſion; and I ſaid, that theſe ſaints, that is to ſay, images called ſaints, be mediators neither way.

As touching pilgrimages, I ſaid, that all idolatry, ſuperſtition, error, falſe faith, and hope in the images, muſt be pared away, before they can be well done, houſhold looked upon, poor chriſtian people provided for, reſtitutions made, all ordinances of God diſcharged, or ever they can be well done. And when they be at beſt, before they be vowed, they need not to be done: they ſhall never be required of us, though they be never done, and yet we ſhall be blamed when they be all done; wives muſt adviſe with their huſbands, and huſbands with their wives, both with curates, ere ever they may be vowed to be done.

And yet idolatry, may be committed in doing of them, as it appeareth by St. Paul, in the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, chap. 10. where he biddeth the Corinthians this; to beware of idolatry, and that after they had received the true faith in Chriſt; which had been vain, if they could not have done idolatry: and expoſitors add, to beware, not only of the act of idolatry, but alſo of all occaſion of that act: which is plain againſt Mr. Hubberdin, and parſon of Chriſt's church, who went about to prove, that now there could be no idolatry.

As touching the ſaints in heaven, I ſaid, they be not our mediators by way of redemption: for ſo Chriſt alone is our mediator and theirs both: ſo that the blood of martyrs hath nothing to do by way of redemption: the blood of Chriſt is enough for a thouſand worlds, &c.

But by way of interceſſion, ſo ſaints in heaven may be mediators, and pray for us, as I think they do when we call not upon them: for they be charitable, and need no ſpurs, and we are not openly required of God in ſcripture to call upon them, as we are to call upon God, nor yet may we call upon them without any diffidence or miſtruſt in God; for God is more charitable, more merciful, more able, more ready to help than them all, ſo that though we may deſire the ſaints in heaven to pray to God for us, yet it is not ſo neceſſary to be done, but that we may pray to God ourſelves, without making ſute firſt to them, and obtain of him whatſoever we need, if we continue in prayer, ſo that whatſoever we aſk the Father, in the name of Chriſt his Son, the Father will give it us: for ſaints can give nothing without him, but he can without them, as he did give to them: ſcripture doth ſet ſaints, that be departed before our eyes, for our enſamples, ſo that the chiefeſt and moſt principal worſhip and honouring of them is to know their holy living, and to follow them, as they followed Chriſt, &c.

God biddeth us come to him with prayer, and to follow his advice is no preſumption, it is rather preſuming to leave it undone, to do that which he biddeth us not do, &c. We muſt have ſaints in reverent memory, and learn at God's goodneſs towards them to truſt in God, and mark well their faith toward God and his word, their charity toward their neighbour, their patience in all adverſity, and pray to God who gave them grace ſo to do, that we may do likewiſe, for which like doings we ſhall have like ſpeedings, they be well honoured when God is well pleaſed; the ſaints were not ſaints by praying to ſaints, but by believing in him that made them ſaints: and as they were ſaints, ſo may we be ſaints: yea, there be many ſaints that never prayed to ſaints: and yet I deny not, but we may pray to ſaints, but rather to him who can make us ſaints, who calleth us to him, biddeth us call upon him, promiſeth help, cannot deceive us and break his promiſe; when we pray faithfully to him we honour him, not after our own fantaſtical imagination, but even after his own moſt wiſe ordination, whom to honour is not to diſhonour ſaints; therefore they lie, that ſay, that I would not have ſaints to be honoured, &c.

There is no Fire in Hell.

I Never knew man that ever ſaid ſo. I ſpeak of divers opinions that have been written of the nature of that fire; ſome that it is a ſpiritual fire, or at leaſt way, a ſpiritual pain in the corporal fire; for as it is called a fire, ſo it is called a worm: now becauſe they think not that it is a corporal worm, but a ſpiritul and metaphorical worm, ſo they think of the fire. Some, that it is a corporal and natural fire; ſome have thought diverſly before the reſurrection without the body, and after with the body; ſome, that the ſoul without body ſuffereth in the fire, but not of the fire; ſome, both in and of the fire. The ſcholaſtic authors think, that the ſouls before the reſurrection, becauſe they be ſpiritual ſubſtance, doth not receive the heat of the fire into them, which is a ſenſible and corporal quality, ſo that Athanaſius, a Greek author calleth their pain Triſtitiam, a heavineſs or an anguiſh: and this opinion is probable enough: ſome think that though they be alway in pain, yet they be not always in fire, but go from waters of ſnow to exceeding heat: but it is when their bodies be there; but whether in cold or in heat, in water or in fire, in air or in earth, they lack no pain, their torment goeth with them, for they think that the devils that tempt us, though they have pain with them, yet they have not fire with them, for then they ſhould be known by heat of the fire.

I am certain, ſaith St. Auguſtine, that there is a fire in hell, but what manner of fire, or in what part of the world, no man can tell but he that is of God's privy council: I would adviſe every man to be more careful to keep out of hell, than truſt he ſhall find no fire in hell. Chryſoſtom ſaith, That to be deprived of the fruition of the Godhead, is greater pain than the being in hell: there is fire burning, there is the worm gnawing, there is heat, there is cold, there is pain without pleaſure, torment without eaſe, anguiſh, heavineſs, ſorrow, and penſiveneſs, which tarrieth and abideth for all lyars and hinderers of the truth.

There is no Purgatory after this Life.

NOT for ſuch lyars as will hear me in hand to ſay that I ſaid not: I ſhewed the ſtate and condition of them that be in purgatory: then I denied it, not that they have charity in ſuch ſurety that they cannot loſe it, ſo that they cannot murmur againſt God, cannot diſhonour God, can neither diſpleaſe God, nor be diſpleaſed with God, cannot be diſſevered from God, cannot die, nor be in peril of death, cannot be damned, nor be in danger of damnation; cannot be but in ſurety of ſalvation; they be members of the myſtical body of Chriſt as we be, and in more ſurety than we be; they love us charitably; charity is not idle, if it be, it worketh and ſheweth itſelf, and therefore I ſay, they wiſh us well, and pray for us; they need not cry loud to God, they be in Chriſt, and Chriſt in them, they be with Chriſt, and Chriſt with them, they joy in the Lord Chriſt alway, taking thankfully whatſoever God doth with them, ever giving thanks to their Lord God, ever lauding and praiſing him in all things that he doth, diſcontent with nothing that he doth, &c.

And foraſmuch as they be always in charity, and when they pray for us, they pray always in charity, and be always God's friends, God's children, brethren and ſiſters to our Saviour Chriſt, even in God's favour, even have Chriſt with them, to offer their prayer to the Father of heaven, to whom they pray in the name of the Son. And we many times for lack of charity, having malice and envy, rancour, hatred one toward another, be the children of the devil, inheritors of hell, adverſaries to Chriſt, hated of God, his angels, and all his ſaints; they in their ſtate may do us more good with their prayers, than we in this ſtate: and they do us alway good, unleſs the lack and impediment be in us; for prayer ſaid in charity is more fruitful to him that it is ſaid for, and more acceptable to God, than ſaid out of charity; for God looketh not to the work of praying, but to the heart of the prayer. We may well pray for them, and they much better for us, which they will do of their charity, though we deſire them not.

I had rather be in purgatory than in the biſhop of London's priſon; for in this I might die bodily, for lack of meat; in that I could not. In this I might die ghoſtly for fear of pain, or lack of good counſel; in that I could not. In this I might be in extream neceſſity; in that I could not, if extreme neceſſity be peril of periſhing. And then you know what followeth, if we be not bounden by precept to help, but them that be in extreme neceſſity, we ſee not who needeth in purgatory, but we ſee who needeth in this world. And John ſaith, If thou ſee thy brother, and help him not, how is the charity of God in thee? Here, either we be, or we may be in extreme neceſſity, both in body and ſoul; in purgatory neither one nor other. Here we be bound to help one another, as we would be helped ourſelves under pain of damnation. Here for lack of help we may murmur and grudge againſt God, diſhonour God, undo ourſelves, which inconveniencies ſhall not follow, if we do our duty one to another. I am ſure the ſouls in purgatory be ſo charitable, and of charity ſo loth to have God diſhonoured, that they would have nothing withdrawn from the poor here in this world, to be beſtowed upon them which might occaſion the diſhonour of God, &c.

Therefore howſoever we do for purgatory, let us provide to keep out of hell. And had I a thouſand pounds to beſtow, as long as I ſaw neceſſary occaſion offered to me of God to diſpenſe it upon my needy brother here in this world, according to God's commandment, I would not withdraw my duty from him for any proviſion of purgatory, as long as I ſaw dangerous ways unrepaired, poor men's daughters unmarried, men beg for lack of work, ſick and ſore for lack of ſuccour. I would have difference between that which may be done, and that which ought to be done, and this to go before that, and that to come after this: if God command one way, mine own devotion moveth me another way, which way ſhould I go? I may by no trentals, no maſſes, no ladders of heaven make no foundations for myſelf with other men's goods; goods wrongfully gotten muſt needs home again, muſt needs be reſtored to the owners, if they can be known, if not, they be poor men's goods: debts muſt needs be paid, creditors ſatisfied and content, God's ordinance toward my neighbour here in this world diſcharged, all affections and luſts moving to the contrary purged. Or elſe though our ſoul-prieſts ſing till they be blear-eyed, or ſay maſs till they have worn their tongues to the ſtumps, neither their ſinging nor their ſayings ſhall bring us out of hell, whither we ſhall go for contemning God's prohibitions.

They that can reclaim at this, that the ſouls in purgatory do pray for us, if they could get as much money for the prayer, that the ſouls in purgatory ſaith for us, as they have done for that that they have ſaid for them, they would would not reclaim: you know the waſp that doth ſting them, and maketh them ſo ſwell, they that reclaim at that, doth not reclaim at this.

Nor at this.
- Chriſt's blood is not ſufficient without blood of martyrs.
- Magdalen did not know Chriſt to be God before his reſurrection.
- There can be no idolatry.
- Rome cannot be deſtroyed.
- The pope is lord of all the world.
- Whatſoever he doth is well done.
- Pater Noſter is to be ſaid to St. Peter.
- Pater Noſter is but a beggarly prayer.
- Ave Mary is infinitely better.
- Twenty Ave Maries for one Pater Noſter.
- It was not neceſſary ſcripture to be written.
- He that leaveth father and mother maketh for our pilgrimage.
- With many more.

Mr. Latimer's Letter to Mr. Morice, concerning the Articles written, which were falſly laid againſt him.

RIght worſhipful, and mine own good maſter Morice, Salutem in Chriſto Jeſu. And I thank you for all hearty kindneſs, not only heretofore ſhewed unto me, but alſo, that now of late you would vouchſafe to write unto me ſo poor a wretch, to my great comfort among all theſe my troubles. I truſt and doubt nothing in it, but God will reward you for me, and abundantly ſupply mine inability, &c. Mr. Morice, you would wonder to know how I have been treated at Briſtow, I mean, by ſome of the prieſts, who firſt deſired me, welcomed me, made me chear, heard what I ſaid, and allowed my ſaying in all things, while I was with them; when I was gone home to my benefice, perceiving that the people favoured me ſo greatly, and that the mayor had appointed me to preach at Eaſter, privily they procured an inhibition for all them that had not the biſhop's licenſe, which they knew well enough I had not, and ſo craftily defeated maſter mayor's appointment, pretending that they were ſorry for it, procuring alſo certain preachers to blatter againſt me, as Hubberdin, and Powel, with others, whom when I had brought before the mayor and the wiſe council of the town, to know what they could lay to my charge, wherefore they ſo declaimed againſt me; they ſaid, they ſpake as they were informed; however, no man could be brought forth, that could ſtand to any thing: ſo that they had place and time to bely me ſhamefully, but they had no place or time to lay to my charge, when I was preſent, and ready to make them anſwer. God amend them, and aſſuage their malice, that they have againſt the truth and me, &c.

Our Lady was a Sinner.

SO they did bely me to have ſaid, when I had ſaid nothing ſo, but to reprove certain, both prieſts and beneficed men, which do give ſo much to our lady, as though ſhe had not been ſaved by Chriſt, a whole Saviour both of her, and of all that be, or ſhall be ſaved; I did reaſon after this manner, that either ſhe was a ſinner, or no ſinner: if a ſinner, then ſhe was delivered from ſin by Chriſt; ſo that he ſaved her, either by delivering, or preſerving her from ſin, ſo that without him, neither ſhe, nor none other, either be, or could be ſaved. And to avoid all offence I ſhewed how it might be anſwered, both to certain ſcriptures which maketh all generally ſinners, and how it might be anſwered unto Chryſoſtom and Theophilact which make her namely and ſpecially a ſinner. But all would not ſerve, their malice was ſo great; notwithſtanding that five hundred honeſt men can and will bear record. When they cannot reprove that thing that I do ſay, they bely me, to ſay that thing which they can reprove; for they will needs appear to be againſt me.

Saints are not to be worſhipped.

SO they lied when I had ſhewed divers ſignifications of this word [Saints] among the vulgar people: Firſt, images of ſaints are called ſaints, and ſo they are not to be worſhipped: take worſhipping of them for praying to them; for they are neither mediators by way of redemption, nor yet by way of inrerceſſion. And yet they may be well uſed when they be applied to the uſe for which they were ordained, to be laymen's books for remembrance of heavenly things, &c.

Take ſaints for inhabitants of heaven, and worſhipping of them for praying to them, I never denied, but that they might be worſhipped, and be our mediators, though not by way of redemption (for ſo Chriſt alone is a whole mediator, both for them and for us) yet by the way of of interceſſion.

Pilgrimage.

AND I never denied pilgrimage. And yet I have ſaid that much ſcurf muſt be pared away, ere ever it can be well done; ſuperſtition, idolatry, falſe faith and truſt in the image, unjuſt eſtimation of the thing, ſetting aſide God's ordinance for doing of the thing; debts muſt be paid, reſtitution made, wife and children muſt be provided for, duty to our neighbours diſcharged. And when it is at the beſt, before it be vowed, it need not be done, for it is neither under the command of God nor man to be done. And wives muſt adviſe with huſbands, and huſbands and wives with curates, before it be vowed to be done, &c.

Ave Maria.

AS for the Ave Mary, who can think that I would deny it? I ſaid it was an heavenly greeting or ſaluting of our bleſſed lady, wherein the angel Gabriel, ſent from the Father of heaven, did annunciate and ſhew unto her the good will of God towards her, what he would with her, and to what he had choſen her. But I ſaid it was not properly a prayer, as the Pater Noſter, which our Saviour Chriſt himſelf made for a proper prayer, and bid us ſay it for a prayer, not adding that we ſhould ſay ten or twenty Ave Maries withal: and I denied not but that we may well ſay Ave Mary alſo, but not ſo that we ſhall think that the Pater Noſter is not good, a whole and perfect prayer, nor cannot be well ſaid without Ave Mary; ſo that I did not ſpeak againſt well ſaying of it, but againſt ſuperſtitious ſaying of it, and of the Pater Noſter too; and yet I put a difference betwixt that, and that which Chriſt made to be ſaid for a prayer.

No Fire in Hell.

WHO ever could ſay or think ſo? However good authors do make a difference betwixt a ſuffering in the fire with bodies, and without bodies. The ſoul without the body is a ſpiritual ſubſtance, which they ſay cannot receive a corporal quality, and ſome make it a ſpiritual fire, and ſome a corporal fire. And as it is called a fire, ſo it is called a worm, and it is thought of ſome not to be a material worm, that is, a living beaſt, but it is a metaphor, but that is neither here nor there: for a fire it is, a worm it is, pain it is, a torment it is, anguiſh it is, a grief, a miſery, a ſorrow, a heavineſs inexplicable, intolerable, intolerable, whoſe nature and condition in every point who can tell, but he that is of God's privy counſel, ſaith St. Auſtin? God give us grace rather to be diligent to keep us out of it, than to be curious to diſcuſs the property of it; for certain we be, that there is little eaſe, yea, none at all, but weeping, wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth, which be two effects of extreme pain, rather certain tokens what pain there is, than what manner of pain there is.

No Purgatory.

HE that ſheweth the ſtate and condition of it, doth not deny it. But I had rather be in it than in Lollard's Tower, the biſhop's priſon, for divers reaſons.

Firſt, In this I might die bodily for lack of meat and drink; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might die ſpiritually for fear of pain, or lack of good counſel; there I could not.

Item, In this I might be in extreme neceſſity; in that I could not, if it be peril of periſhing.

Item, In this I might lack charity; there I could not.

Item, In this I might loſe my patience; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be in danger of death; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be without ſurety of ſalvation; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might diſhonour God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might murmur and grudge againſt God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might diſpleaſe God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be diſpleaſed with God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be judged to perpetual priſon, as they call it; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be craftily handled; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be brought to bear a faggot; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be diſcontented with God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be ſeparated and diſſevered from Chriſt: in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be a member of the devil; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be an inheritor in hell; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might pray out of charity, and in vain; in that I could not.

Item, In this my lord and his chaplains might manacle me by night; in that they could not.

Item, In this they might ſtrangle me, and ſay that I hanged myſelf; in that they could not.

Item, In this they might have me to the conſiſtory and judge me after their faſhion; from thence they could not.

Ergo, I had rather be there than here. For though the fire be called never ſo hot, yet if the biſhop's two fingers can ſhake away a piece, a friar's cowl another part, and Scala Cœli all together, I will never found abbey, college, nor chauntry, for that purpoſe.

For ſeeing there is no pain that can break my charity, break my patience, cauſe me to diſhonour God, to diſpleaſe God, to be diſpleaſed with God, cauſe me not to joy in God, nor that can bring me to danger of death, or to danger of deſperation, or from ſurety of ſalvation, that can ſeparate me from Chriſt, or Chriſt from me, I care the leſs for it. John Chryſoſtom ſaith, that the greateſt pain that damned ſouls have, is to be ſeparate and cut off from Chriſt for ever: which pains the ſouls in purgatory neither have nor can have.

Conſider, Mr. Morice, whether proviſion for purgatory hath not brought thouſands to hell. Debts have not been paid; reſtitution of evil gotten lands and goods hath not been made; chriſtian people (whoſe neceſſities we ſee, to whom whatſoever we do Chriſt reputeth done to himſelf, to whom we are bound under pain of damnation to do for, as we would be done for ourſelves), are neglected and ſuffered to periſh; laſt wills unfulfilled and broken; God's ordinance ſet aſide: And alſo for purgatory, foundations have been taken for ſufficient ſatisfaction; ſo we have trifled away the ordinance of God and reſtitutions. Thus we have gone to hell with maſſes, dirges, and ringing of many a bell. And who can pull pilgrimages from idolatry, and purge purgatory from robbery, but he ſhall be in peril to come in ſuſpicion of hereſy with them? ſo that they may fleece one with pilgrimage, and ſpoil with purgatory. And verily the abuſe of them cannot be taken away, but great lucre and advantage ſhall fall away from them, who had rather have profit with abuſe, than lack the ſame with uſe; and that is the waſp that doth ſting them, and maketh them to ſwell. And if purgatory were purged of all that it hath gotten, by ſetting aſide reſtitution, and robbing of Chriſt, it would be but a poor purgatory; ſo poor, that it ſhould not be able to feed ſo fat, and trick up ſo many idle and ſlothful lubbers.

I take God to witneſs, I would hurt no man, but it grieveth me to ſee ſuch abuſe continue without remedy. I cannot underſtand what they mean by the pope's pardoning of purgatory, but by way of ſuffrage; and as for ſuffrage, unleſs he do his duty, and ſeek not his own, but Chriſt's glory, I had rather have the ſuffrage of Jack of the ſkullery, who in his calling doth exerciſe both faith and charity; but as for his maſs, that is as good of another ſimple prieſt as of him. As for authority of keys, it is to looſe from guiltineſs of ſin and eternal pain, due to the ſame, according to Chriſt's word and not to his own private will: and as for pilgrimage, you would wonder what juggling there is to get money withal. I dwell within half a mile of the Foſs-way, and you would wonder to ſee how they come by flocks out of the weſt-country to many images, but chiefly to the blood of Hailes. And they believe verily that it is the very blood that was in Chriſt's body, ſhed upon the mount of Calvary for our ſalvation, and that the ſight of it with their bodily eye, doth certify them, and putteth them out of doubt, but they be in clean life, and in a ſtate of ſalvation without ſpot of ſin, which doth embolden them to do many things. For you would wonder, if you ſhould commune with them both coming and going, what faiths they have. For as forgiving their enemies and reconciling their chriſtian brethren, they cannot away withal; for the ſight of that blood doth quit them for the time.

I read in ſcripture of two certifications; one to the Romans; "We being juſtified by faith have peace with God."

If I ſee the blood of Chriſt with the eye of my ſoul, that is, true faith, that his blood was ſhed for me, &c.

Another in the epiſtle of St. John: "We know that we are tranſlated from death to life, becauſe we love the brethren." But I read not that I have peace with God, or that I am tranſlated from death to life, becauſe I ſee with my bodily eye the blood of Hailes. It is very probable, that all the blood that was in the body of Chriſt, was united and knit to his divinity, and then no part thereof ſhall return to his corruption. And I marvel that Chriſt ſhall have two reſurrections. And if it were that they that did violently and injuriouſly pluck it out of his body when they ſcourged him and nailed him to the croſs, did ſee it with their bodily eye, yet they were not in clean life. And we ſee the ſelf-ſame blood in form of wine, when we have conſecrated, and may both ſee it, feel feel it, and receive it to our damnation, as touching bodily receiving. And many do ſee it at Hailes without confeſſion, as they ſay. God knoweth all, and the devil in our time is not dead.

Chriſt hath left a doctrine behind him, wherein we be taught how to believe, and what to believe: he doth ſuffer the devil to uſe his craftineſs for our trial and probation. It were little thank-worthy to believe well and rightly, if nothing ſhould move us to falſe faith, and to believe ſuperſtitiouſly. It was not in vain that Chriſt, when he had taught truly, by and by, bade, Beware of falſe prophets, who would bring in error ſlyly. But we be ſecure and careleſs, as though falſe prophets could not meddle with us, and as though the warning of Chriſt were no more earneſt and effectual, than is the warning of mothers when they trifle with their children, and bid them beware the bugg, &c.

Lo, Sir, how I run at riot beyond meaſure. When I began, I was minded to have written but half a dozen lines; but thus I forget myſelf, ever when I write to a truſty friend, who will take in worth my folly, and keep it from mine enemy, &c.

As for Dr. Wilſon, I know not what I ſhould ſay; but I pray God endue him with charity. Neither he nor any of his country-men, did ever love me, ſince I did inveigh againſt their factions, and partiality in Cambridge. Before that, who was more favoured of him than I? That is the byle that may not be touched, &c.

A certain friend ſhewed me, that Dr. Wilſon is gone now into his country about Beverly in Holderneſs, and from thence he will go a progreſs through Yorkſhire, Lancaſhire, Cheſhire, and ſo from thence to Briſtol. What he intended by this progreſs, God knoweth, and not I. If he come to Briſtol, I ſhall hear, till, &c.

As for Hubberdin (no doubt), he is a man of no great learning, nor yet of ſtable wit. He is here Servus Hominum; for he will preach whatſoever the biſhops will bid him preach. Verily in my mind they are more to be blamed than he. He doth magnify the pope more than enough.

As for our Saviour Chriſt and chriſtian kings, they are little beholding to him. No boubt he did miſs the cuſhion in many things. Howbeit they that did ſend him, men think, will defend him; I pray God amend him and them both. They would fain make matter againſt me, intending ſo either to deliver him by me, or elſe to rid us both together, and ſo they would think him well beſtowed, &c.

As touching Dr. Powel, how highly he took upon him in Briſtol, and how little he regarded the ſword, which repreſenteth the king's perſon, many cannot tell you. I think there is never an earl in this realm that knoweth his obedience by Chriſt's commandment to his prince, and knoweth what the ſword doth ſignify, that would have taken upon him ſo ſtoutly. However Mr. mayor, as he is a profound wiſe man; did twit him prettily; it were too long to write all. Our pilgrimages are not a little beholding to him. For to occaſion the people to them, he alledged this text.

Whoſoever leaveth father, houſe, wife, &c. By that you may perceive his hot zeal and crooked judgment, &c. Becauſe I am ſo belied, I could wiſh that it would pleaſe the king's grace to command me to preach before his highneſs a whole year together every Sunday, that he himſelf might perceive how they bely me, ſaying, that I have neither learning, nor utterance worthy thereunto, &c. I pray you pardon me, I cannot make an end.

A brief Digreſſion concerning the railing of Mr. Hubberdin againſt Mr. Latimer.

FOraſmuch as mention hath been made in this letter of Mr. Hubberdin, an old divine of Oxford, a right painted phariſee, and a great ſtrayer abroad in all quarters of the realm, to deface and impeach the ſpringing of God's holy goſpel, ſomething will be added more concerning that man, whoſe doings and pageants, if they might be deſcribed at large, it were as good as any enterlude for the reader to behold. Who in all his life, and in all his actions (in one word to deſcribe him) ſeemeth nothing elſe but a right image or a counterfeit, ſetting out unto us, in lively colours, the pattern of perfect hypocriſy. But becauſe the man is now gone, to ſpare therefore the dead, (although he little deſerved to be ſpared, who never ſpared to work what villainy he could againſt the true ſervants of the Lord), this ſhall be enough for example ſake, for all chriſtian men neceſſarily to obſerve, how the ſaid Hubberdin, after his long railing in all places againſt Luther, Melanchon, Zuinglius, John Frith, Tindal, Latimer, and all other like profeſſors, after his hypocritical open alms-given out of other men's purſes, his long prayers, devout faſtings, his mean habit, and other his prodigious demeanour, riding in his long gown down to the horſe heels like a phariſee, or rather like a ſloven dirted up to the horſe belly, after his forged tales and fables, dialogues, dreams, dancings, hoppings and leapings, with other player-like toys and geſtures uſed in the pulpit, and all againſt heretics; at laſt riding by a church ſide, where the youth of the pariſh were dancing in the church-yard, he ſuddenly alighting from his horſe; by the occaſion of their dancing came into the church, and there cauſing the bell to toll-in the people, thought, inſtead of a fit of mirth, to give them a ſermon of dancing. In which ſermon, after he had patched up certain common texts out of the ſcriptures, and then coming to the doctors, firſt to Auguſtine, then to Ambroſe, ſo to Jerome and Gregory, Chryſoſtom and other doctors, had made them every one (after his dialogue manner) by name to anſwer to his call, and to ſing after his tune for the probation of the ſacrament of the altar againſt John Frith, Zuinglius, Oecolampadious, Luther, Tindall, Latimer, and other heretics (as he called them) at laſt to ſhew a perfect harmony of all theſe doctors together, as he had made them before ſing after his tune, ſo now to make them dance alſo after his pipe; firſt he calleth out Chriſt and his apoſtles, then the doctors and ancient ſeniors of the church, as in a round ring, all to dance together, with pipe up Hubberdin. Now dance Chriſt, now dance Peter, Paul, now dance Auguſtine, Ambroſe, Jerome; and thus old Hubberdin, as he was dancing with his doctors luſtily in the pulpit againſt the heretics, how he ſtamped and took on I cannot tell, but craſh quoth the pulpit, down cometh the dancer, and there lay Hubberdin not dancing but ſprawling in the midſt of his audience; where although he brake not his neck, yet he ſo brake his leg the ſame time, and bruiſed his old bones, that he never came in the pulpit more, and died not long after the ſame. Whereupon when the church wardens were called, and charged for the pulpit being no ſtronger, they made anſwer again, excuſing themſelves that they had made their pulpit for preaching and not for dancing, &c. But to ſpend no more paper about this idle matter, now to our purpoſe again.

Amongſt many other impugners and adverſaries, whereof there was no ſmall ſort which did infeſt this good man in ſermons, ſome alſo there were which attempted the pen againſt him. In the number of whom was one Dr. Sherwood, who, upon the ſame occaſion of preaching of the virgin Mary (or as they thought againſt the virgin), did invade him with his pen, writing againſt him in Latin, whoſe long epiſtle, with Mr. Latimer's anſwer alſo in Latin to the ſame, hereunder followeth, now tranſlated into Engliſh.

The

The Letter of Dr. William Sherwood againſt Mr. Latimer.

William Sherwood, Prieſt, to Mr. Latimer, Rector of Weſt-Kingſton, Grace and Peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Worthy Sir,

PReſuming you won't take it amiſs to be chriſtianly admoniſhed by a chriſtian, I have ſent theſe lines to reaſon with you about ſome things deliver'd by you in a ſermon, or rather a ſatyre, lately preached at Great-field, not much like a chriſtian; and firſt, concerning the parable of the thief and the ſhepherd, where you truly ſaid that our Saviour reproved the ſcribes and phariſees for the hardneſs of their hearts, but not openly, but ſecretly, and in general he did not ſay to every one of the ſcribes and phariſees, Ye are thieves and robbers; but what did he ſay? why, Verily I ſay unto you, he who enters not by the door into the ſheepfold, but climbeth in ſome other way, the ſame is a thief and a robber: on the contrary, you openly declare all popes, biſhops and prieſts to be thieves and robbers (yourſelf, and a few of the refuſe of the people excepted;) thus you have preached or deceived the people: but perhaps you meant it for an hyperbole, if ſo it was a very cruel and unjuſt one. My brother, we are not ſo raſhly to judge before the time (if we may believe St. Paul) when the Lord ſhall come; who will bring to light the hidden things of darkneſs, and manifeſt the councils of the heart: alſo Chriſt himſelf, whom the Father has appointed Judge both of the living and the dead, in St. Matthew ſeems to forbid the raſh judging of our neighbour, where he ſays, Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what judgment ye judge ye ſhall be judged, and with what meaſure ye mete, it ſhall be meaſured to you again, and ſuch like.

I would have vice expoſed, but I would not have light put for darkneſs, nor darkneſs for light; nor that good ſhould be called evil, and evil good, ſweet bitter, and bitter ſweet. If this ſhould be, then each in his turn would devour one another. But I need urge this no farther, the thing itſelf appears ſo plain; we know your deſigns, and what notice has been taken of them. Alas! alas! Latimer, what madneſs urged you to preach, or lye, ſaying, there are more thieves than ſhepherds, more goats than ſheep? St. Cyprian ſaid otherwiſe, Let God be true, and every man a lyar, the greater number of chriſtians is ſtill beſt, more are thoſe who keep the faith intire than thoſe the devil has ſeduced; you alſo cry out againſt things which the church hath in the higheſt reverence, and which have been brought in by thoſe who have ſuffered for the name of Chriſt. For you ſay any man, who, as Peter, did confeſs Chriſt to be the Son of the living God, has as much power as Peter, and that the church there mentioned ſignifies any congregation: ſo that Peter was no more Chriſt's ſupreme vicar upon earth than any other chriſtian. St. Origen ſays, we are like Peter, if we make the ſame confeſſion as he did, namely, Thou art the Son of the living God, not by fleſh and blood revealed unto us, but by the Father who is in heaven illuminating our minds; ſhall we ſay that theſe words are of as great force as thoſe ſpoke to Peter himſelf? No, no. For after the name of Chriſt all his faithful ſervants are called, as ſays the prophet, that he might ſave his Chriſt's; and again, Touch not my Chriſt's. The words here uſed differ from thoſe which only ſignify anointed. Eraſmus (whom you follow and imitate in many things) in his Annotations on the ſixteenth chapter of St. Matthew, upon theſe words, Thou art Peter, &c. ſays very juſtly, that he was the firſt Roman pontiff and head of the chriſtian faith. But if, like you, we ſhould ſay this of all chriſtians equally with Peter, we ſhould fall into that error of Luther, that all chriſtians are prieſts, and that after ordination they have no more power than before, that only licenſing them to exerciſe it. But this has been condemned by the church a great while ago.

On thoſe words of Chriſt where he ſays, The leaſt of theſe precepts; you ſay he alludes to the wickedneſs of the ſcribes and phariſees, who to raiſe their own traditions, called the divine commandments, The leaſt commandments: but here you differ widely from Origen, a diligent interpreter of ſcripture, who in his homily on the fifth of St. Matthew, ſays, Some precepts may be called leaſt, ſince from the obſervation of them it is ſaid ſome ſhall be leaſt and ſome ſhall be great in the kingdom of heaven.

You find fault becauſe we ſay that Chriſt went up in the mount only with a few diſciples, the multitude, the ſcribes and phariſees not being worthy to hear that divine ſermon, you have ſubjoined (not much like a chriſtian, I think) that a chriſtian man who has any carnal deſire is no more a Chriſtian than a Jew or a Turk, this ſeems to me not like a chriſtian, but Œcolampadian.——

Some things are here wanting, which perhaps may be ſupplied from Mr. Latimer's anſwer.

This was needful to bring back the Germans to the beneficial confeſſion of Peter; what it is you here drive at I do not know; if it is his ſupremacy, truly every catholic is obliged to defend it with all his ſtrength; had not Peter the ſupremacy the words of Chriſt are of no effect (I give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, &c.) if there is no need to defend the ſupremacy of Peter, there is no need to defend the truth, for which every one ought to contend even to death. I cannot think the Germans can be brought to a beneficial confeſſion of Peter without acknowledging his ſupremacy; is Chriſt Son of the living God? the Son of God is truth, but Chriſt is not truth if Peter has no ſupremacy. What a foul fall is here, for no advantage can come from the confeſſion of Chriſt to that man who will not preſerve and defend the apoſtolic chair with all his might. You ſay this is one of the moſt bare-faced lyes, that Chriſt was in the mountain only with a few diſciples; Origen, the moſt accurate interpreter of ſcripture, in his ſermon on the fifth of St. Matthew, ſays plainly as I ſay, Jeſus went down from the mountain, and there followed many multitudes; the diſciples were with him in the mount, for to them it was given to know the ſecrets of his heavenly doctrine, the knowledge of ſalvation, which makes the heart of the moſt bruti ſh to rejoice: they were to ſpread abroad the light of truth, to enlighten the eyes of thoſe blinded with the thick darkneſs of worldly delight, whence it was our Lord ſaid to them, Ye are the ſalt of the earth, ye are the light of the world; but now deſcending from the mount the multitudes followed him, into the mountain none were able to aſcend to hear thoſe ſublime myſteries, but thoſe who had caſt away the burden of all worldly delights. Thus you hear how Origen approves of mine and not of your interpretation.

You have found out certain falſe preachers, who I know not, howſoever they are well known to you, who perſuade the people it is enough for a chriſtian to believe as the church believes, though at the ſame time they know neither what nor how the church believes, ſo the miſerable vulgar are detered from ſeeking after a larger knowledge of God; and there are ſuch preachers we are beholden to, the Lutheran and heretic churches; they cannot poſſibly be in ours, ſince the bridegroom hath promiſed never to deſert his ſpouſe the church. What you have ſaid elſe I paſs over as mere jeſts. It is plain that laſtly you ſay I argue philoſophically of the juſtification of faith, and yet you cannot overthrow my argument, but whether it is arguing philoſophically, to ſay we are not juſtified by faith only, but rather by works done in faith and charity? If this is to argue like a philoſopher, than I am one, and not I only but St. James alſo. Faith is, I confeſs, as St. Auguſtine rightly ſaith, the root and foundation of a holy life which is the performance of all good by which we are juſtified; let no man think that faith alone is able to juſtify excluſive of all good and pious works, the reſt ſeeing I have forgot, I paſs over; I ſhall only add, if thou doſt well, ſhalt thou not be rewarded? but if thou doſt ill, ſin lieth at thy door. When I have more leiſure I ſhall write more fully of theſe things, till when farewel.

Derham.

Mr. Latimer's Anſwer.

HEalth to you in abundance. I don't know, worthy Sir, that I am ſo fierce as not to bear patiently any chriſtian admonition, or ſo inſenſible, that when ſlandered, admoniſhed, confuted, condemned by calumny and lyes, I ſhould not juſtify myſelf: what if I ſhould anſwer your letter with the ſame liberty you take? But I forbear, leſt inſtead of convincing I provoke your paſſion; rather God give us both wiſely to know him, and to me patience worthy of a chriſtian amidſt ſo many afflictions, and to you a right judgment, that you be not tranſported ſo far by an over-hot zeal. I thought this prayer better than any apology for anſwering you, being withal ſo buſy in writing a ſermon which I muſt preach the day after to-morrow, that I have no more leiſure than there is obligation, to anſwer all your heap of lyes; but that I may ſatisfy you a little, I will ſay a few things to a great many. And firſt the thing is what I have ſaid, and what you ſay I ſaid. And here you are ſo hard put to it, that as the ſaying is you are forced to ſkin a flint, but ſo it is, that through all you ſay there runs a continued ſtrain of rage and malice. Suppoſe, I ſaid, that all popes, biſhops and prieſts entering not by the door into the ſheep-fold, but climbing up ſome other way, were thieves and robbers; the ſtreſs lays on their entering and climbing up, not on their perſons or titles; and I ſay no more than what Chriſt himſelf ſays: hence, you of your own head charge me with ſaying, that all popes, biſhops and prieſts were thieves and robbers. Now (my brother) is this fairly to be collected from what I ſaid? May I not juſtly apply to you that of St. Paul to the Romans, So they ſay we ſaid, but they ſpeak evil of us, and their damnation is juſt: and yet St. Paul's adverſaries could more juſtly draw their concluſions from what he ſaid, than you can from what I ſaid. If the word of God is the ſame as it was at firſt, and the miniſters of that word are as acceptable to him now as they were then, doth the ſame damnation remain for their calumniators? But there is a great difference, you ſay, between; all that enter not by the door are thieves and robbers, and ſaying ſimply, that all were thieves and robbers. But whence comes it, I beſeech you that whilſt I ſay, all that enter not by the door, ſhould ſeem to you ſimply to ſay all in general; unleſs more ſeem to you to aſcend ſome other way, than to enter by the door, though you are too wiſe to own it? And if it is ſo, there is no wonder there ſhould be more thieves than ſhepherds. For whether you will own it or not, it is true that whoever enters not by the door are thieves and robbers, whether they be popes, biſhops or prieſts. You ſay our Saviour reproved the ſcribes and phariſees privately; but the ſcripture ſays, that to their face, and before a great multitude he ſaid unto them, Woe unto you ſcribes and phariſees, hppocrites, &c.

You adviſe me not to judge leſt I be judged, and this ought to teach you how neceſſary it is for lyars to have good memories, leſt your throat be cut with your own ſword, and you fall into the pit you had dug for others, for I think you paſs your judgment upon me when you ſay, I account all thieves and robbers but myſelf and a few of the refuſe of the people; you cry out that I have invaded the power of St. Peter, and of the keys, when I ſaid not one word of the power of the keys, or made mention of St. Peter's ſupremacy: I told them not to build on a ſandy foundation, but on the rock of Chriſt, not to be content with a dead faith leſt they endangered their own ſalvation, but to ſhew their faith by their works, that at the laſt they might attain everlaſting life, You know very well what Luther's ſentiments were of the church, and I can readily ſubſcribe to what Lyra, after many others, ſays on the 16th of St. Matthew, That the church doth not conſiſt of men great either by eccleſiaſtical or civil power, for we have found that many princes and popes have apoſtatized from the faith, but of ſuch who have a true knowledge both of the faith and truth of the chriſtian religion. With him agree St. Jerome and St. Chryſoſtom, who ſay, there are ſome more ready to defend the ſupremacy of St. Peter, a thing of no neceſſity, than to make that bleſſed confeſſion which would be of real uſe, You dare to ſay, that Chriſt when he called ſome of the commandments leaſt, did not allude to the impiety of the phariſees, and that becauſe you had read Origen had otherwiſe interpreted it; but may not one and the ſame place of ſcripture be differently expounded by different perſons? Becauſe Origen took no notice of this alluſion, doth it therefore follow that no body elſe ſhould; when Chriſt himſelf tells them that they made the commandments of God of no effect by their traditions? Again, except your righteouſneſs exceed the righteouſneſs of the ſcribes and phariſees, ye ſhall in no caſe enter the kingdom of heaven; you ſay Chriſt preached his ſermon on the mount only to a few of his diſciples; this is plainly to contradict the ſcripture. In the 7th of St. Matthew it is ſaid, that having ended theſe ſayings, they were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine, for he taught them as one that had authority. Who was it that were aſtoniſhed? why St. Luke will tell you it was the multitude that heard him, chapter the 7th, when he had ended all his ſaying in the audience of the people. As to that of blaming any perſon for believing as the church believes, 'tis either your ill-will which made you deaf, or elſe you were willing to hear what was never ſpoke. What I ſaid was, that many falſe preachers tell the people to believe as the church believes, when they are ignorant in what manner the church believes. As to what laſtly, you call ſo inhuman, ſee St. Jerome on the 26th of St. Matthew, I ſay a chriſtian, that is once admitted into the church by baptiſm, if he anſwers not his profeſſion, but gives himſelf up to fleſhly deſires, is in reſpect of eternal life which is promiſed to chriſtians, no more a chriſtian than a Jew or a Turk; yea, I ſay his condition ſhall be worſe at the laſt day, if he ſays true, who ſays, 'Twas better never to have known the way of truth, than after they have known, to fall away; 'tis the duty of a preacher to exhort all ſo to live with Chriſt here, that they may reign with him hereafter, otherwiſe (whatever they may think) they are no chriſtians; ſo the interpreters of the ſcripture ſpeak, but this ſeems to you heretical; for a covetous man, a fornicator, or a murderer, with you is a good catholic, and a ſervant of Chriſt, but theſe are alſo ſervants of ſin and of the devil, therefore they can ſerve two maſters, which was what Chriſt did not know. If ſo, a dead faith may be catholic, and devils may be members of the catholic church, as being thoſe, who according to St. James, believe and tremble. You ſay a fornicator believes in Chriſt, he who believes in Chriſt ſhall not periſh, but have everlaſting life; alſo St. Paul writing to the Galations, which had erred from the faith, calls them a church, and to the Corinthians, in one chapter, calls them both carnal perſons and the temple of God, becauſe ſome were good, and ſome were bad, for carnal perſons were not the temple of God, and the church was the multitude of profeſſors, good and bad, the evangelical net gathering of all ſorts. Now, pray, is it a crime to exhort all to do good and not evil? If your diſcourſe is no gentler than your letter, I deſire I may hear none of it; but all bitterneſs, anger, and evil-ſpeaking, with all malice, being taken from you, neither your diſcourſe nor writing would be burdenſome to me: I believe you deſire no ſuch auditors as yourſelf, and unleſs God gives you you a better diſpoſition, I ſhall never deſire you to be one of mine.

Farewel.

Another Letter of Mr. Latimer to Dr. Sherwood.

MAY the Spirit of truth be with you. I have read your letter through carefully, but it is more worthy of the flames, than of my peruſal, it abounds ſo much with ſlanders. What you have truly ſaid you ſhall ſoon ſee. 'Tis now a great while ago ſince ſeveral perſons who heard the ſermon preached at Marchfield, told me, you being preſent, ſuffered the perſon openly, and with authority, to ſay, that thoſe were unworthy and miſerable wretches who ſaluted the virgin mother of God with the angelic ſalutation, unleſs they could raiſe her up again that ſhe might bear Chriſt. I ſaid, this was neither chriſtianly nor religiouſly done, had you not been there; for we ought not to offend pious chriſtians, who may not believe juſt as we do. Now whether this was ſlandering, or not rather giving pious and religious advice, &c.

The remaining part of the letter is vindicating himſelf from the ſame things as the former, and almoſt in the ſame words, which for brevity's ſake we omit.

A Letter from Mr. Latimer to Sir Edward Baynton, Knight.

RIght worſhipful Sir, I recommend myſelf unto you with hearty thanks for your friendly, charitable, and mindful remembrance of me, ſo poor a wretch. Whereas of late I received your letters by Mr. Bonnam, and perceiving therein who are grieved with me, and what behoveth me to do in caſe I muſt needs come up; for which your goodneſs towards me, whereas I myſelf am not able to recompenſe, I ſhall not ceaſe to pray my Lord God, who is both able, and alſo doth indeed reward all them that favour the favourers of his truth for his ſake: for the truth is a common thing, pertaining to every man, for which every man ſhall anſwer another day. And I deſire favour neither of your maſterſhip, nor of any man elſe, but in the truth and for the truth, I take God to witneſs, which knoweth all.

In very deed Mr. Chancellor did ſhew me, that my lord biſhop of London had ſent letters to him for me: and I made anſwer that he was mine ordinary, and that he might and ſhould reform me as far as I needed reformation as well and as ſoon as my lord of London. And I would be very loth (now this deep winter) being ſo weak and ſo feeble (not only exerciſed with my old diſeaſe in my head and ſide, but alſo with new, both the cholic and ſtone) to take ſuch a journey; and though he might ſo do, yet he needed not, for he was not bound ſo to do. Notwithſtanding I ſaid, if he, to do my lord of London pleaſure, to my great diſpleaſure, would needs command me to go, I would obey his command, yea though it ſhould be never ſo great a grievance and painful to me. With which anſwer he was content, ſaying, he would certify my lord of London thereof, truſting his lordſhip would be content with the ſame.

Mr. Chancellor alſo ſaid, that my lord of London ſeemed greatly diſpleaſed with me, becauſe I contemned his authority at my laſt being in London. Forſooth I preached in Abby-church, not certain then as I remember) whether in his dioceſe or no, intending nothing leſs than to contemn his authority; and this I did at the requeſt of honeſt merchant-men, as they ſeemed to me, whoſe names I do not know, for they were not of my acquaintance before; and I am glad thereof for their ſakes, leſt if I knew them I ſhould be compelled to utter them ſo, and their good deſire to hear godly preaching ſhould turn to their trouble; for they required me very earneſtly, and to ſay the truth, very importunately. Whether they were of that pariſh or no, I was not certain: but they ſhewed not only themſelves, but alſo many others to be very deſirous to hear me, pretending great hunger and thirſt of the word of God and ghoſtly doctrine. And upon conſideration, and to avoid all inconveniences, I put them off, and refuſed them twice or thrice, till at laſt they brought me word, that the parſon and curate were not only content, but alſo deſired me; notwithſtanding that they certified him both of my name plainly, and alſo that I had not the biſhop's ſeal to ſhew for me, but only a licenſe of the univerſity: which curate did receive me, welcomed me, and when I ſhould go into the pulpit, gave me the common benediction; ſo that I had not only been uncharitable, but alſo churliſhly uncharitable, if I ſhould have ſaid nay. Now all this ſuppoſed to be truth (as it is) I marvel greatly how my lord of London can alledge any contempt of him in me.

Firſt, He never did inhibit me in my life; and if he did inhibit his curate to receive me, what pertaineth that to me, who did neither know thereof, nor yet made any ſuit to the curate deceitfully; nor did it appear to me very likely that the curate would ſo little have regarded my lord's inhibition, which he maintaineth ſo vigilantly not knowing my lord's mind before. Therefore I conjectured with myſelf, that either the curate was of ſuch acquaintance with my lord, that he might admit whom he would; or elſe (and rather) that it was a train and a trap laid before me, to the intent that my lord himſelf, or ſome pertaining to him, was appointed to have been there, and to have taken me, if they could, in my ſermon: which conjecture hath occaſioned me ſomewhat to ſuſpect thoſe men which deſired me, though they ſpake never ſo fair and friendly, and alſo rather to go. For I preach nothing, but if it might be ſo, I would my lord himſelf might hear me every ſermon I preach. So certain I am that it is truth which I take in hand to preach. If I had, with power of my friends (the curate gainſaying and withſtanding me) preſumed to have gone into the pulpit, there had been ſomething wherefore to pretend a contempt. I preached in Kent alſo at the earneſt requeſt of a curate; yet I do not hear that his ordinary layeth any contempt to my charge, or yet doth trouble the curate,

I marvel not a little how my lord biſhop of London, having ſo large and populous a dioceſe committed to his charge, can have leiſure for preaching and teaching the word of God, opportunely and preſſingly, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, publicly and privately, to his own flock, in perſuading, confuting, exhorting, and admoniſhing with all mildneſs and doctrine, have leiſure (I ſay) either to trouble me, or to trouble himſelf with me, ſo poor a wretch, a ſtranger to him, and nothing pertaining to his cure, but as every man pertaineth to every man's cure, ſo intermixing and intermeddling himſelf with another man's cure, as though he had nothing to do in his own. If I would do as ſome men ſay my lord doth, gather up riches, warily and covetouſly, and yet neither preach for it in mine own cure nor elſewhere, peradventure he would deny me nothing. In very deed I did admoniſh both judges and ordinaries to uſe charitable equity in their judgments towards ſuch as be accuſed, namely, of ſuch accuſers, who be as like to hear and bewray, as others be to ſay amiſs, and to take men's words in the meaning thereof, and not to wreſt them in another ſenſe than they were ſpoken in: for all ſuch accuſers and witneſſes do falſe before God, as St. Jerome ſaith upon the 26th chapter of St. Matthew. Nor yet do I account thoſe judges well adviſed, who wittingly will give ſentence after ſuch witneſſes, much leſs thoſe who procure ſuch witneſſes againſt any man: nor do I think judges now-a-days ſo deeply confirmed in grace, or ſo impeccable, but that it may become preachers to admoniſh them them to do well, as well as other kinds of men both great and ſmall. And this I did, occaſioned of the epiſtle which I declared, Rom. 6. wherein is this ſentence, Ye are not under the law, but under grace. Ye chriſtian men that believe in Chriſt, are not under the law. What a ſaying is this (quoth I) if it be not rightly underſtood, that is, as St. Paul did underſtand it? for the words ſound as though he would go about to occaſion chriſtian men to break law, ſeeing they be not under the law: and what if the pſeudo-apoſtles, adverſaries to St. Paul, would have ſo taken them, and accuſed St. Paul of the ſame to my lord of London? if my ſaid lord would have heard St. Paul declare his own mind of his own words, then he ſhould have eſcaped, and the falſe apoſtles put to rebuke; if he would have rigorouſly followed whatſoever was alledged and proved, and have given ſentence after a relation of the accuſers, then good St. Paul muſt have borne a faggot at Paul's Croſs, my lord of London being his judge. O, it had been a godly ſight to have ſeen St. Paul with a faggot on his back, even at Paul's Croſs, my lord of London biſhop of the ſame, ſitting under the croſs. Nay, verily I dare ſay, my lord ſhould ſooner have burned him, for St. Paul did not mean that chriſtian men might break law, and do whatſoever they would, becauſe they were not under the law: but he did mean, that chriſtian men might keep the law, and fulfil the law, if they would, becauſe they were not under the law, but under Chriſt, by whom they were divided from the tyranny of the law, and above the law, that is to ſay, able to fulfil the law, to the pleaſure of him that made the law, which they could never do of their own ſtrength, and without Chriſt: ſo that to be under the law, after St. Paul's meaning, is to be weak to ſatisfy the law; and what could St. Paul do with all, though his adverſaries would not ſo take it? But peradventure my lord would ſay, that men will not take the preacher's words otherwiſe than they mean therein. Bona verba; as though St. Paul's words were not otherwiſe taken, as it appeareth in the third chapter to the Romans, where he ſaith, Our unrighteouſneſs commendeth and maketh more excellent the righteouſneſs of God, which ſoundeth to many as though they ſhould be evil, that good ſhould come of it, and by unrighteouſneſs to make the righteouſneſs of God more excellent. So St. Paul was reported to mean; yet he did mean nothing ſo; but ſhewed the ineſtimable wiſdom of God, who can uſe our naughtineſs to the manifeſtation of his unſpeakable goodneſs; not that we ſhould do naughtily to that end and purpoſe. Now my lord will not think (I dare ſay) that St. Paul was to blame that he ſpake no more circumſpectly, more warily, or more plainly, to avoid evil offence of the people; but rather he will blame the people, for not taking better heed, and not giving more attendance to St. Paul's ſpeaking, for the better underſtanding thereof: yea, he will rather pity the people, who have been ſo long nuzled in the doctrine of the phariſees, and wallowed ſo long in the darkneſs of man's traditions, ſuperſtitiions, and trade of living, that they were unapt to receive the bright lightneſs of the truth, and wholeſome doctrine of God, uttered by St. Paul. Nor do I think my lord will require more circumſpection, or more convenience to avoid offence of errors in me, than was in St. Paul, when he did not eſcape malevolous corrections, and ſlanderous reports of them that were of perverſe judgments, who reported him to ſay whatſoever he appeared to them to ſay, or whatſoever ſeemed to them to follow of his ſaying: but what followeth? So thay report us to ſay, ſaith St. Paul, ſo they ſpeak evll of us; but ſuch whoſe damnation is juſt, ſaith he; and I think the damnation of all ſuch that report evil of preachers now-a-days, likewiſe juſt, for it is untruth now and then. Yea Chriſt himſelf was miſ-reported, and falſly accuſed, both as touching his words, and alſo as concerning the meaning of his words. Firſt, he ſaid, Deſtruite, that is to ſay, Deſtroy you; they made it Poſſum Deſtruere, that is to ſay, I can deſtroy: He ſaid, Templum hoc, This Temple; they added, Manu factum, that is to ſay, Made with hand, to bring it to a contrary ſenſe. So they both inverted his words, and alſo added unto his words to alter his ſentence: for he did mean of the temple of his body, and they wreſted it to Solomon's temple. Now I report me, whether it be a juſt fame raiſed up and diſperſed after this manner. Nay verily, for there be three manner of perſons which can make no credible information: firſt, adverſaries, enemies; ſecondly, ignorant and without judgment; thirdly, Suſurrones, that is to ſay, whiſperers, and blowers in men's ears, who will ſpue out in hudder-mudder, more than they dare avow openly. The firſt will not, the ſecond cannot, the third dare not: therefore the relation of ſuch is not credible, and therefore they can make no fame lawful, nor occaſion any impartial judge to make proceſs againſt any man; and it maketh no little matter what they be themſelves that report of any man, whether well or evil: for it is a great commendation to be evil ſpoken of, by them that be naught themſelves, and to be commended by them, is many times no ſmall reproach. God ſend us once all grace to wiſh well one to another, and to ſpeak well one of another.

Methinks it were more comely for my lord (if it were comely for me to ſay ſo), to be a preacher himſelf, having ſo great a cure as he hath, than to be a diſquieter and a troubler of preachers, and to preach nothing at all himſelf. If it would pleaſe his lordſhip to take ſo great a labour and pain at any time, as to come to preach in my little biſhopric at Weſt Kingſton, whether I were preſent or abſent myſelf, I would thank his lordſhip heartily, and think myſelf greatly bounden to him, that he of his charitable goodneſs, would go ſo far to help to diſcharge me in my cure, or elſe I were more unnatural than a beaſt unreaſonable; not yet would I diſpute, contend or demand, by what authority, or where he had authority ſo to do, as long as his preaching were fruitful, and to the edification of my pariſhioners. As for my lord, he may do as it pleaſeth his lordſhip. I pray God he do always as well as I could wiſh him ever to do. But I am ſure St. Paul ſaith in the firſt chapter to the Philippians, that in his time ſome preached Chriſt for envy of him, thinking thereby ſo to grieve him withal, and as it were to obſcure him, and to bring his authority into contempt; ſome of good will and love, thinking thereby to comfort him: notwithſtanding (ſaith he) by all manner of ways, and after all faſhions, whether it be of occaſion or of truth, as ye would ſay for truth ſake, ſo that Chriſt be preached and ſhewed, I joy and will joy. So much he regarded more the glory of Chriſt, and promotion of Chriſt's doctrine, to the edification of chriſtian ſouls, than the maintenance of his own authority, reputation, and dignity, conſidering right well (as he ſaid), that what authority ſoever he had, it was to edification, and not to deſtruction. Now I think it were no reproach to my lord, but very commendable, rather to joy with St. Paul, and be glad that Chriſt be preached, in whatever manner, yea, though it were for envy, that is to ſay, in diſdain, deſpite and contempt of his lordſhip (which thing no man well adviſed will attempt), than when the preaching cannot be proved juſtly, to demand of the preacher auſterely, as the phariſees did of Chriſt, By what authority do you theſe things, and who gave you this authority? As my authority is good enough, and as good as any my lord can give me, yet I would be glad to have his alſo, if it would pleaſe his lordſhip to be ſo good unto me. For the univerſity of Cambridge hath authority apoſtolic to admit twelve yearly, of which I am one: and the king's highneſs, God ſave his grace, hath decreed, that all admitted of univerſities ſhould preach throughout all his realm, as long as they preached well, without interruption; my lord of Canterbury, my lord of Durham, with many ſuch others, ſtood by, and heard the decree, and alſo gave their conſent to the ſame. Now to contemn my lord of London's authority, were no little fault in me; ſo no leſs fault might appear in my lord of London, to contemn the king's authority and decree, yea ſo godly, ſo fruitful, ſo commendable a decree, pertaining both to the edification of chriſtian ſouls, and alſo to the regard and defence of the popiſh grace and authority apoſtolic. To have a book of the king not inhibited, is to obey the king, and to inhibit a preacher of the king's admitted, is it not to diſobey the king? Is it not one king that doth inhibit and admit, and hath he not as great authority to admit as to inhibit? He that reſiſteth the power, whether admitting or inhibiting, doth he not reſiſt the ordinance of God? We low ſubjects are bound to obey powers, and their ordinances: and are not the higheſt ſubjects alſo, who ought to give us enſample of ſuch obedience? As for my preaching itſelf, I truſt in God, my lord of London cannot juſtly blame it, nor reprove it, if it be taken with the circumſtance thereof, and as I ſpake it, or elſe it is not my preaching, but his that falſly reporteth it, as the poet Martial ſaid to one that depraved his book:

To me ('tis true) you ſay thoſe lines belong,
But they're your own, whilſt you repeat them wrong.

But now I hear ſay that my lord of London is informed, and upon the ſaid information hath informed the king, that I go about to defend Bilney, and his cauſe, againſt his ordinaries, and his judges, which I aſſure you is not ſo: for I had nothing to do with Bilney, nor yet with his judges, except his judges did him wrong; for I did nothing elſe but admoniſh all judges indifferently to do right; nor am I altogether ſo fooliſh as to defend the thing which I knew not. It might have become a preacher to ſay as I ſaid, though Bilney had never been born. I have known Bilney a great while, I think much better than ever did my lord of London: for I have been his ghoſtly father many times; and to tell you the truth, what I have thought always in him, I have known hitherto few ſuch, ſo prompt and ready to do every man good according to his power, both friend and foe, and wittingly offended no man; in ſhort, he was a very good and pious ſoul, in nothing fit for this wretched world, for the blindneſs of which he would lament and bewail as much, as any man that ever I knew: as for his ſingular learning, as well in holy ſcripture, as in all other good letters, I will not ſpeak of it. Notwithſtanding, if either now of late, or at any time, he attempted any thing contrary to the obedience which a chriſtian man doth owe either to his prince, or to his biſhop, I neither do nor will allow and approve that, neither in him, or any other man: we be all men, and liable to fall; wherefore he that ſtandeth, let him bewary he fall not. How he ordered or miſordered himſelf in judgment, I cannot tell, nor will I meddle withal; God knoweth, whoſe judgments I will not judge. But I cannot but wonder, if a man living ſo mercifully, ſo charitably, ſo patiently, ſo continently, ſo ſtudiouſly and virtuouſly, and killing his old Adam, that is to ſay, mortifying his evil affections, and blind motions of his heart ſo diligently, ſhould die an evil death, there is no more, but let him that ſtandeth beware that he fall not: for if ſuch as he ſhall die evil, what ſhall become of me, ſuch a wretch as I am? But let this go, as little to the purpoſe, and come to the point we muſt reſt upon. Either my lord of London will judge my outward man only, as it is ſaid, Man ſeeth thoſe things that are without; or elſe he will be my God, and judge mine inward man, as it is ſaid, But God ſeeth the heart. If he will have to do only with mine outward man, and meddle with mine outward converſation, how that I have ordered myſelf toward my chriſtian brethren, the king's liege people, I truſt I ſhall pleaſe and content both my Lord God, and alſo my lord of London: for I have preached and teached but according to holy ſcripture, holy fathers, and ancient interpreters of the ſame, with which I think my lord of London will be pacified: for I have done nothing elſe in my preaching, but with all diligence moved my auditors to faith and charity, to do their duty, and that which is neceſſary to be done. As for things of private devotion, mean things, and voluntary things, I have reproved the abuſe, the ſuperſtition of them, without condemnation of the things themſelves, as it becometh preachers to do: which thing, if my lord of London will do himſelf (as I wiſh to God he would), he ſhould be reported (no doubt) to condemn the uſe of ſuch things, of covetous men which have damage, and find leſs in their boxes by condemnation of the abuſe, which abuſe they ſaid rather ſhould continue ſtill, than their profit ſhould not continue (ſo thorny be their hearts). If my lord will needs coaſt and invade my inward man, will I, nill I, and break violently into my heart, I fear I ſhall diſpleaſe my lord of London (which I would not willingly do), or elſe my Lord God, which I ſhall be more loth to do: not for any infidelity, but for ignorance, for I believe as a chriſtian man ought to believe: but peradventure my lord knoweth, and will know many things certainly, which (perchance) I am ignorant in, with which ignorance, though my lord of London may if he will be diſcontent, yet I truſt my Lord God will pardon it, as long as I hurt no man withal, and ſay to him with diligent ſtudy, and daily prayer, My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready; ſo ſtudying, and preaching, and tarrying the pleaſure and leiſure of God: and in the mean ſeaſon, Acts 8. as Apollos did, when he knew nothing of Chriſt, but the baptiſm of John, teach and preach mine, even chriſtian that, and no farther than I know to be true. There be three creeds, one in my maſs, another in my mattins, the third common to them that neither ſay maſs, nor mattins, nor yet know what they ſay when they ſay the creed: and I believe all three with all that God hath left in holy writ, for me and all others to believe; yet I am ignorant in things which I truſt hereafter to know, as I do not know things in which I have been ignorant heretofore: ever learn, and ever to be learned, to profit with learning, with ignorance not to offend. I have thought in times paſt, that the pope, Chriſt's vicar, hath been lord of all the world as Chriſt is, ſo that if he ſhould have deprived the king of his crown, or you of the lordſhip of Bromeham, it had been enough; for he could do no wrong. Now I might be hired to think otherwiſe; notwithſtanding I have both ſeen and heard ſcripture drawn to that purpoſe. I have thought in times paſt, that the pope's diſpenſations of the pluralities of benefices, and abſence from the ſame, had diſcharged conſciences before God: foraſmuch as I have heard, Lo! I am with you, and he who heareth you, bended to corroborate the ſame. Now I might be intreated to think otherwiſe, &c.

I have thought in times paſt, that the pope could have ſpoiled purgatory at his pleaſure with a word of his mouth; now learning might perſuade me otherwiſe, or elſe I would marvel why he would ſuffer ſo much money to be beſtowed that way, which is ſo needful to be beſtowed otherwiſe, and to deprive us of ſo many patrons in heaven as he might deliver out of purgatory, &c. I have thought in times paſt, that if I had been a friar, and in a cowl, I could not have been damned, nor afraid of death, and by occaſion of the ſame I have been minded many times to have been a friar, namely, when I was ſore, ſick, and diſeaſed: now I abhor my ſuperſtitious fooliſhneſs, &c. I have thought in times paſt, that divers images of ſaints could have helped me, and done me much good, and delivered me of my diſeaſes: now I know that one can help as much as another. And it pitieth my heart that my lord, and ſuch as my lord is, can ſuffer the people to be ſo craftily deceived. It were too long to tell you what blindneſs I have been in, and how how long it was ere I could forſake ſuch folly, it was ſo incorporated in me: but by continual prayer, continual ſtudy of ſcripture, and oft communing with men of more right judgment, God hath delivered me, &c. Yea, men think my lord himſelf hath thought in times paſt, that by God's law a man might marry his brother's wife, which now both dare, think, and ſay contrary: and yet this his boldneſs might have chanced, in pope Julius's days, to ſtand him either in a fire, or elſe in a faggot. Which thing deeply conſidered and pondered by my lord, might ſomething ſtir him to charitable equity, and to be ſomething remiſs toward men, which labour to do good as their power ſerveth with knowledge, and do hurt to no man with their ignorance: for there is no greater diſtance than between God's law, and not God's law.

And finally as ye ſay, the matter is weighty, and ought ſubſtantially to be looked upon, even as weighty as my life is worth; but how to look ſubſtantially upon it otherwiſe I know not, than to pray my Lord God day and night, that as he hath emboldened me to preach his truth, ſo he will ſtrengthen me to ſuffer for it, to the edification of them which have taken by the working of him fruit thereby; and even ſo I deſire you, and all others, that favour me for his ſake, likewiſe to pray: for it is not I (without his mighty helping hand), that can abide that brunt; but I have truſt that God will help me in time of need, which if I had not, the ocean ſea, I think, ſhould have divided my lord of London and me by this day. For it is a rare thing for a preacher, to have favour at his hand who is no preacher himſelf, and yet ought to be. I pray God, that he, and I, may both diſcharge ourſelves, he in his great cure, and I in my little one, to God's pleaſure, and ſafety of our ſouls, Amen. I pray you pardon me, that I write no more diſtinctly, nor more truly, for my head is out of frame, that it would be too painful for me to write it again; and if I be not prevented, I intend to make merry with my pariſhioners this Chriſtmas, for all the ſorrow, leſt perchance I never return to them again: and I have heard ſay, that a doe is as good in winter, as a buck in ſummer.

A Letter of Sir Edward Baynton, Knight, anſwering to Mr. Latimer.

MAſter Latimer, after hearty recommendations; I have communicated the effect of your letters to divers of my friends, ſuch as for chriſtian charity (as they ſay), rather deſire in you a reformation, either in your opinion (if it ſwerve from the truth), or at leaſt in your manner and behaviour, inaſmuch as it giveth occaſion of ſlander and trouble, to the hindrance of your good purpoſes, than any other inconvenience to your perſon or good name. And foraſmuch as your ſaid letter miſliketh them in ſome part, and that I have ſuch confidence in your chriſtian breaſt, as in my judgment ye will conformably and gladly both hear, that may be reformed in you, and alſo (as it is worthy), ſo acknowledge and confeſs the ſame: I have therefore deſired them, to take the pains to note their minds in this letter which I ſend to you, as the ſum of their ſayings, and ſent from me, your aſſured friend and favourer, in that that is the very truth of God's word: wherein nevertheleſs, as I truſt, yourſelf will temper your own judgment, and in a ſoberneſs affirm no truth of yourſelf, which ſhould divide the unity of the congregation in Chriſt; and the received truth agreed upon by holy fathers of the church, conſonant to the ſcripture of God, even ſo, whatſoever ye will do therein (as I think, ye will not do otherwiſe than ye ſhould do), I being unlearned, and not of the knowledge to give ſentence in this altercation and contention, muſt rather of good congruence ſhew myſelf in that you diſagree with them, readier to follow their doctrine in truth, than yours, unleſs it may pleaſe Almighty God, to inſpire and confirm the hearts of ſuch people to teſtify the ſame in ſome honeſt number, as ought to induce me to give credence unto them.

Only God knoweth the certain truth, which is communicated to us, as our capacity may comprehend it by faith, but that is through a glaſs darkly. And there have been thoſe who have had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. Among whom I repute not you, but to this purpoſe I write it, that to call this or that truth, it requireth a deep and profound knowledge, conſidering that to me unlearned, that I take for truth may be otherwiſe, not having a ſenſe exerciſed enough, as St. Paul ſaith, to diſcern good and evil: and it is ſhewed me, that an opinion or manner of teaching, which cauſeth diſſention in a chriſtian congregation, is not of God, by the doctrine of St. John in his epiſtle, where he ſaith, All who confeſs that Chriſt is come in the fleſh, &c. are of God. And like as the word of God hath always cauſed diſſention among men unchriſtened, whereupon hath enſued and followed martyrdom to the preacher, ſo in Chriſt's congregation, among them that profeſs Chriſt's name, in one Lord, one baptiſm, and one faith, they that preach and ſtir rather contention than charity, though they can defend their ſaying, yet their teaching is not to be taken as of God, in that it breaketh the chain of chriſtian charity, and maketh diviſion in the people, congregate and called by God into an unity of faith and baptiſm. But for this point I would pray to God, that not only in the truth may be agreement, but alſo ſuch ſoberneſs and uniform behaviour uſed in teaching and preaching, as men may wholly expreſs (as they may) the charity of God, tending only to the union and love of us all, to the profit and ſalvation of our ſouls.

Mr. Latimer's Anſwer to Sir Edward Baynton's Letter.

RIGHT worſhipful Sir, and my ſingular good maſter, &c. Whereas you have communicated my laſt letters to ſome of your friends, which rather deſire this or that in me, &c. what I think therein I will not now ſay, not for that there could be any peril or danger in the ſaid letters (well taken) as far as I can judge, but for that they were raſhly and unadviſedly ſcribbled, as ye might well know both by my excuſe, and both by themſelves alſo, though no excuſe had been made. And beſides that, ye know right well, that where the bee gathereth honey, even there the ſpinner gathered venom, not for any diverſity of the flower, but for different natures in them that ſuck the flower: as in times paſt, and in the beginning, the very truth, and one thing in itſelf, was to ſome an offence, to ſome fooliſhneſs, to others otherwiſe diſpoſed, the wiſdom of God. Such difference there was in the hearers thereof.

But this notwithſtanding, there is no more but either my writing is good or bad. If it be good, the communicating thereof to your friends cannot be hurtful to me; if it be otherwiſe, why ſhould you not communicate it to them, who both could and would inſtruct you in the truth, and reform my error? Let this paſs, I will not contend: had I knew, ever cometh out of ſeaſon. Truly I were not well adviſed if I would not either be glad of your inſtruction, or yet refuſe mine own reformation; but yet it is good for a man to look ere he leap, and God forbid that ye ſhould be addict and ſworn to me, ſo wretched a fool, that you ſhould not rather follow the doctrine of your friends in truth, ſo great learned men as they appear to be, than the opinions of me, having never ſo chriſtian a breaſt.

Wherefore do as you will: for as I would not if I could, ſo I cannot if I would, be noiſome unto you; but yet I ſay, I would my letters had been written, if for no other cauſe, at leaſtway inaſmuch as they cauſe me to more writing, an occupation nothing meet for my mad head.

head. And as concerning points which in my foreſaid letters your friends miſlike, I have little leiſure now to make an anſwer thereto, for the great buſineſs I have in my little cure: I know not what other men have in their great cures, ſeeing that I am alone without any prieſt to ſerve my cure, without any ſcholar to read unto me, without any book neceſſary to be looked upon, without learned men to come and counſel withal. All which things others have at hand abundantly, but ſomething muſt be done, howſoever it be. I pray you to take it in good worth as long as I temper my own judgment, affirming nothing with prejudice of better. Firſt, ye miſlike that I ſay I am ſure that I preach the truth, ſaying, in reproof of the ſame, that God knoweth certain truth. Indeed God alone knoweth all certain truth, and God alone knoweth it as of himſelf, and none knoweth certain truth but God, and thoſe who be taught of God, as ſaith St. Paul, for God hath made it plain to them: and Chriſt himſelf, They ſhall all be taught of God: and your friends deny not but that certain truth is communicated to us, as our capacity may comprehend it by faith, which if it be truth, as it is, then there ought no more to be required of any man, but according to his capacity; now certain it is, that every man hath not like capacity, &c.

But as to my preſumption and arrogancy; either I am certain or uncertain that it is truth that I preach. If it be truth, why may not I ſay ſo, to encourage my hearers to receive the ſame more ardently, and enſue it more ſtudiouſly? If it be uncertain, why dare I be ſo bold to preach it? And if your friends, in whom you truſt ſo greatly, be preachers themſelves, after their ſermon, I pray you aſk them, whether they be certain and ſure that they have taught you the truth or no, and ſend me word what they ſay, that I may learn to ſpeak after them? If they ſay they be ſure, ye know what followeth? if they ſay they be unſure, when ſhall you be ſure, that have ſo doubtful and unſure teachers? And you yourſelf, whether are you certain or uncertain that Chriſt is your Saviour, and ſo forth, of other articles that ye be bound to believe? or whether be ye ſure or unſure, that civil ordinances be the good works of God, and that you do God ſervice in doing of them, if ye do them for a good intent? If ye be uncertain, take heed he be your ſure friend that heareth you ſay ſo, and then with what conſcience do ye doubt, ſeeing whatſoever is not of faith is ſin? But contrary ſay you, God alone knoweth certain truth, and ye have it but through a glaſs darkly; and there have been who have a zeal of God; but not according to knowledge: and to call this or that truth, it requireth a deep knowledge, conſidering, that to you unlearned, that you take for truth may be otherwiſe, not having a ſenſe exerciſed to diſcern good and evil, as ye reaſon againſt me, and ſo you do beſt to know ſurely nothing for truth at all, but to wander meekly here and there, with every wind of doctrine, &c. Our knowledge here, you ſay, is but through a glaſs darkly: what then? Ergo, it is not certain and ſure.

I deny your argument by your leave; yea, if it be by faith, as ye ſay, it is much ſure, becauſe the certainty of faith is the ſureſt certainty, as Duns and other ſchool-doctors ſay: That there is a great diſagreement between certain knowledge and clear knowledge; for that may be of things abſent that appear not, this requireth the preſence of the object, I mean of the thing known; ſo that I certainly and ſurely know the thing which I perfectly believe, though I do not clearly and evidently know it. I know your ſchool-ſubtilties as well as you, which diſpute as though enigmatical knowledge, that is to ſay, dark and obſcure knowledge, might not be certain and ſure knowledge, becauſe it is not clear, manifeſt, and evident knowledge; and yet there have been (ſay they) which they had a zeal, but not after knowledge. True it is, there have been ſuch, and yet be too many to the great hindrance of Chriſt's glory, which nothing doth more obſcure, than an hot zeal accompanied with great authority without right judgment. There have been alſo, which have had knowledge without any zeal of God, who holding the verity of God in unrighteouſneſs, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes, while they, knowing the will of God, do nothing thereafter. I mean not among Turks and Saracens that be unchriſtened, but of them that be chriſtened. And there have been alſo, that have loſt the ſpiritual knowledge of God's word which they had before, becauſe they have not followed after it, nor promoted the ſame, but rather with their mother wits have impugned the wiſdom of the the Father, and hindered the knowledge thereof, which therefore hath been taken away from them; that Chriſt may be juſtified in his ſayings, and overcome when he is judged, threatening, Matt. 13. To him that hath not, that alſo which he hath, that is, that which he ſeemeth to have, ſhall be taken from him: when as to abuſe that which a man hath, or not to uſe it well, is as not to have it. And alſo ſeeing it is true, that God's wiſdom will not dwell in a body ſubject to ſin, albeit he abound in carnal wiſdom too much: yet the ſame carnal and philoſophical underſtanding of God's ſcriptures, is not the wiſdom of God which is hid from the wiſe, and is revealed to little ones. And if to call this or that truth, requireth a deep and profound knowledge, then either every man hath a deep and profound knowledge, or elſe no man can call this or that truth: and it behoveth every preacher to have ſo deep and profound knowledge, that he may call this or that truth, which this or that he taketh in hand to preach for the truth; and yet he may be ignorant and uncertain in many things, both this and that, As Apollos was: but which things, whether this or that, he will not attempt to preach for the truth. And as for myſelf, I truſt in God I may have my ſenſes exerciſed to diſcern good and evil in thoſe things, which, without deep and profound knowledge in many things, I preach not; yea, there be many things in ſcripture in which I cannot certainly diſcern good and evil, I mean true and falſe, not with all the excerciſe that I have in ſcripture, nor yet with the help of all the interpreters that I have, to content myſelf and others in all ſcruples that may ariſe: but in ſuch I am wont to wade no further into the ſtream, than that I may either go over, or elſe return back again, ever having reſpect, not to the oſtentation of my little wit, but to the edification of them that hear me, as far forth as I can, neither paſſing mine own not yet their capacity.

And ſuch manner of arguments might well ſerve the devil againſt cowards, to occaſion them to wander and waver in the faith, and to be uncertain in things in which they ought to be certain: or elſe it may appear to make and ſerve againſt ſuch preachers which will define great ſubtilties and high matters in the pulpit, which no man can be certain and ſure of by God's word to be truth, unleſs a man had a ſuperlative ſenſe to diſcern good and evil; as whether, if Adam had not ſinned, we ſhould have had ſtock-fiſh out of Iſland? how many larks for a penny if every ſtar in the element were a flickering hobby? how many years a man ſhall lie in purgatory for one ſin, if he buy not plenty of the oil that runneth over our lamps to ſlake the ſin withal, and ſo forget hell which cannot be ſlaked, to provide for purgatory?

Such argumentation I ſay) might appear to make well againſt ſuch preachers, not againſt me, which ſimply and plainly utter true faith and the fruits of the ſame, which be the good works of God, which he hath prepared for us to walk in, every man to do the thing that pertaineth to his office and duty, in his degree and calling, as the word appointeth; which thing a man may do with ſoberneſs, having a ſenſe but indifferently exerciſed to diſcern good and evil. For it is but fooliſh humility, willingly to continue always an infant in Chriſt and in infirmity. In reproof of which it was ſaid, Ye have need of milk and not of ſtrong meat. For St. Paul ſaith not, Be ye humble, that ye be not deceived. For though he would not that we ſhould think arrogantly of ourſelves, and above that that it becometh us to think of ourſelves, but ſo to think of ourſelves that we may be ſober and modeſt; yet he biddeth us ſo to think of ourſelves, As God hath diſtributed to every one the meaſure of faith. For he that may not with meekneſs think in himſelf what God hath done for him, and of himſelf as God hath done for him, how ſhall he, or when he ſhall give due thanks to God for his gifts? And if our friends will not allow the ſame, I pray you enquire of them whether they may with ſobriety and modeſty, be ſure they preach to you the truth, and whether we may, with ſobriety and modeſty, follow St. Paul's advice, where he ſaith unto us all, Be not children in underſtanding, but in maliciouſneſs be ye infants. God give us all grace to keep the mean, and to think of ourſelves neither too high nor too low, but ſo that we may reſtore unto him, who hath ſent abroad his gifts again, with good uſe of the ſame, ſo that we do our part with the ſame, to the glory of God, Amen.

For my life, I truſt in God that I neither (by God's grace) ſhall, neither in ſoberneſs, nor yet in drunkenneſs, affirm any truth of myſelf, therewith intending to divide that unity of the congregation of Chriſt, and the received truth agreed upon by the holy fathers of the church, conſonant to the ſcripture of God, though it be ſhewed you never ſo often, that an opinion or manner of teaching, which cauſeth diſſention in a chriſtian congregation is, not of God, by the doctrine of St. John in his epiſtle, where he ſaith, Every one that confeſſeth Chriſt in the fleſh, is of God. Firſt, Not of every thing whereupon followeth diſſention, cauſeth diſſention, as I would that they ſhewed you, that would alſo ſhew you, whether this opinion, that a man may not marry his brother's wife, be of God or of men? if it be of men, then as Gamaliel ſaid, diſſolve it; if it be of God, as I think it is, and perchance your friends alſo, who can diſſolve it, but ſhall ſeem to repugn againſt God? And yet there be many, not heathens, but in Chriſtendom, that diſſent from the ſame, which could bear full evil to hear ſaid unto them, You are of the devil's ſide. So that ſuch an opinion might ſeem to ſome to make a diſſention in a chriſtian congregation, ſaving that they may ſay, perchance with more liberty than others, that an occaſion is ſometimes taken and not given, which with their favour I might abuſe for my defence, ſaving that it is not granted unto all in theſe worſt of times.

The Galatians having for preachers and teachers the falſe apoſtles, by whoſe teaching they were degenerate from the ſweet liberty of the goſpel into the ſour bonds of ceremonies, thought themſelves, peradventure a chriſtian congregation, when St. Paul did write his epiſtle unto them, and were in a quiet trade under the dominion of maſterly curates, ſo that the falſe apoſtles might have objected to St. Paul, that his apoſtleſhip was not of God, foraſmuch as there was diſſention in a chriſtian congregation by occaſion thereof, while ſome would renew their opinions by occaſion of the epiſtle, ſome would judge, as they were wont to do, and follow their great lords and maſters, the falſe apoſtles, which were not heathen and unchriſtened, but chriſtened, and high prelates of the profeſſors of Chriſt. For your friends I know right well what Eraſmus hath ſaid in an epiſtle ſet before the paraphraſe to the Corinthians, which Eraſmus hath cauſed no ſmall diſſention with his pen in a chriſtian congregation, inaſmuch as many have diſſented from him, hot only in cloiſters (men more than chriſtened men) of high perfection, but alſo at Paul's Croſs, and St. Mary Spittle, beſides many that with no ſmall zeal have written againſt him, but not without anſwer.

And I would fain learn of your friends, whether that St. Jerome's writing were of God, which cauſed diſſention in a chriſtian congregation, as it appeareth by his own words in the prologue before the canonical epiſtles, which be theſe: And whilſt that you, Euſtochium, virgin of Chriſt, enquire ſo earneſtly of me the truth of the ſcripture, you ſeem in ſome meaſure to put off my old age corroded with the teeth and bites of the envious, who ſtyle me a falſifier and corrupter of the ſcriptures; but I am not affrightened at their envy in ſuch a work, nor will deny the truth of the ſcriptures to thoſe that require it. I pray you what were they that called St. Jerome a falſifier and corrupter of ſcripture, and for envy would have bitten him with their teeth; unchriſtian or chriſtian? What had the unchriſtian to do with chriſtian doctrine? They were worſhipful fathers of a chriſtian congregation, men of much hotter ſtomachs than right judgments, of a greater authority than good charity. But St. Jerome would not ceaſe to do good for the evil ſpeaking of them that were naught, giving in that an enſample to us of the ſame; and if this diſſention were in St. Jerome's time, what may be in our time? From ill to worſe.

And I pray you what mean your friends by a chriſtian congregation? All thoſe (think ye) that have been baptized? But many of thoſe be in a worſe condition, and ſhall have greater damnation than many unbaptized. For it is not enough to a chriſtian congregation that is of God, to have been baptized: but it is to be conſidered what we promiſe when we be baptized, to renounce Satan, his works, his pomps. Which thing if we buſy not ourſelves to do, let us not crack that we profeſs Chriſt's name in a chriſtian congregation in one baptiſm.

And where they add, in one Lord: I read in Matt. 7. Not every one that ſaith Lord, Lord, &c. And in Luke, the Lord himſelf complaineth and rebuketh ſuch profeſſors and confeſſors, ſaying to them, Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not that I bid you? But I would your friends would take the pains to read over St. Chryſoſtom upon Matt. Hom. 49. cap. 24. to learn to know a chriſtian congregation, if it will pleaſe them to learn of him. And where they add, in one faith, St. James ſaith boldly, Shew me thy faith by thy works. And St. Jerome, If we believe, we ſhew the truth in working. And the ſcripture ſaith, He that believeth God attendeth to his commandments: And the devils do believe to their little comfort. I pray God to ſave you and your friends from that believing and congregation, and from that faithful company.

Therefore all this toucheth not them that be unbaptized, but them that be baptized, and anſwer not to their baptiſm. For St. Jerome ſheweth how true preachers ſhould order themſelves, when evil prieſts and falſe preachers, and the people that be by them deceived, ſhould be angry with them for preaching the truth, exhorting them to ſuffer death for the ſame, of the evil prieſts and falſe preachers, and the people deceived of them, which evil prieſts and falſe preachers, with the people deceived, be baptized as well as others. And I fear that St. Jerome might appear to ſome chriſtian congregation, as they will be called, to write ſeditiouſly, to divide the unity of a great honeſt number confeſſing Chriſt, in one baptiſm, one Lord, one faith, ſaying, The people which before were brought aſleep by their maſters, muſt go up to the mountains, not ſuch mountains which ſmoke when they are touched, but to the mountains of the Old and New Teſtament, the prophets, apoſtles, and evangeliſts. And when thou art occupied with reading in theſe mountains, if then thou found no inſtructions (for the harveſt is great, and the workman few) yet ſhall the diligent ſtudy of the people be fleeing to the mountains, and the ſlothfulneſs of the maſters ſhall be rebuked.

I do marvel why our chriſtian congregations be ſo greatly grieved that lay-people would read ſcripture, ſeeing that St. Jerome alloweth and approveth of the ſame, which compareth not here the unchriſtianed to the chriſtianed. but the lay-people chriſtianed to their curates chriſtianed, ſunder which they have been rocked and locked aſleep in a ſubtle trade a great while full ſoundly, though now of late they have been awaked, but to their pain, at leaſt wiſe to the pain of thoſe that awakened them with the word of God; and it is properly ſaid of St. Jerome to call them maſters and not ſervants, meaning that ſervants teach not their own doctrine, but the doctrine of their maſter Chriſt, to his glory. Maſters teach not Chriſt's doctrine, but their own, to their own glory; which maſterly curates cannot be quiet 'till they have brought the people aſleep again: but Chriſt the very true maſter ſaith, Watch and pray, leſt ye enter into temptation. My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither my ways your ways, ſaith the Lord: and there have been thoſe who have gone about counſels, which they could not eſtabliſh. I pray God give our people grace ſo to awake, that their works may be approved, and our maſters ſo to ſleep, that their idleneſs do not rebuke them. For who is ſo blind as not to ſee how far our chriſtian congregation doth gainſay St. Jerome, and ſpeaketh after another manner? God amend what is amiſs? for, I underſtand we be ſomething wide.

But now your friends have learned of St. John, That every one that confeſſeth Jeſus Chriſt in the fleſh, is of God: and I have learned of St. Paul, that there have been, not among the heathen, but among the chriſtians, which confeſs Chriſt with their mouth, and deny him with their acts: ſo that St. Paul ſhould appear to expound St. John, ſaying, that I will not affirm any thing as of myſelf, but leave it to your friends to ſhew you, whether they who in deeds deny Chriſt, are by the bare confeſſion of the mouth of God: for your friends know well enough by the ſame St. John, He who is of God ſinneth not: and there both have been, and be now too many, who with mouth only confeſs Chriſt to be come in the fleſh; but will not effectually hear the word of God by conſenting to the ſame, notwithſtanding that St. John ſaith, He who is of God heareth God's word: ye hear not becauſe ye are not of God: and many ſhall hear, I never knew you, which ſhall not only be chriſtened, but alſo ſhall prophecy, and do puiſſant things in the name of Chriſt: and St. Paul ſaid, there would come ravening wolves who will not ſpare the flock, meaning it of them who ſhould with their lips confeſs Chriſt in the fleſh, and uſurp by ſucceſſion the office, which Chriſt calleth falſe prophets, and biddeth us beware of them, ſaying, They ſhall come in ſheep's cloathing, and yet they may wear both ſattin, ſilk, and velvet, called afterwards naughty ſervants, not feeding, but ſmiting their fellow-ſervants, eating and drinking with the drunken, who ſhall have their portion with hypocrites. They are called ſervants, I ſuppoſe, becauſe they confeſs Chriſt in the fleſh: and naughty they are called becauſe they deny him in their deeds, not giving meat in due ſeaſon, and exerciſing maſterſhip over the flock. And yet your friends reaſon as though there could none bark and bite at true preachers, but they that be unchriſtened, notwithſtanding that St. Auguſtine, upon the ſame epiſtle of St. John, calleth ſuch confeſſors of Chriſt, Antichriſts, who confeſs him in words and in deeds deny him; a ſtrange name for a chriſtian congregation: And though St. Auguſtine could defend his ſaying, yet his ſaying might appear not to be of God, to ſome men's judgment, in that it breaketh the chain of Chriſt's charity, ſo to cauſe men to hate Antichriſts, according to the doctrine of St. Paul, Hate that is evil; and ſo make diviſion, not between chriſtened and unchriſtened, but between chriſtians and antichriſtians, when neither tongue nor pen can divide the antichriſtian from their blind folly. And I wiſh you would cauſe your friends to read over St. Auguſtine upon the epiſtle of St. John, and tell you the meaning thereof, if they think it expedient for you to know it, as I remember it is Tractatu 3. but I am not ſure nor certain of that, becauſe I did not ſee it ſince I was at Cambridge; and here I have not St. Auguſtine's works to look for it, but well I know that there he teacheth us to know the chriſtians from the antichriſtians, which both he chriſtened, and both confeſs Jeſus to be Chriſt, if they be aſked the queſtion: and yet the one part denieth it in very deed. But to know the difference, we muſt not ſtand upon our talk, but attend to our doings and converſation of life, whether we not only do not put our endeavour thereto, but alſo perſuade ourſelves as though it were not neceſſary for us to accompliſh ſuch things, &c. but that it is enough to bear rule and authority over them, and to beſtow ourſelves wholly upon ſecular matters, pleaſures, and pomp of this world. And yet he will appear, at the leaſt to be of God alone, but they far otherwiſe confeſs Chriſt, who are approved of God by their confeſſion.

And yet as long as they miniſter the word of God, or his ſacraments, or any thing that God hath ordained to the ſalvation of mankind, wherewith God hath promiſed to be preſent, to work with the miniſtration of the ſame to the end of the world, they be to be heard, to be obeyed, to be honoured for God's ordinance ſake, which is effectual and fruitful, whatſoever the miniſter be, though he be a devil, and neither church nor member of the ſame, as Origen ſaith, and Chryſoſtom; ſo that it is not all one to honour them and truſt in them, St. Jerome ſaith: but there is required a judgment to diſcern when they miniſter God's word and ordinance of the ſame, and their own, leſt peradventure we take chalk for cheeſe, which will edge our teeth, and hinder digeſtion. For as it is commonly ſaid, The blind eateth many a fly, as they did which were perſuaded by the high-prieſts to aſk Barabbas and to crucify Jeſus: and ye know that to follow the blind guides, is to come into the pit with the ſame. And will you know, ſaith Auguſtine, how pertly they reſiſt Chriſt, which men begin to blame them for their miſ-living, and intolerable ſecularity and negligence? They dare not for ſhame blaſpheme Chriſt himſelf, but they will blaſpheme the miniſters and preachers by whom they be blamed.

Therefore whereas ye will pray for agreement both in the truth, and in uttering of the truth, when ſhall that be as long as we will not hear the truth, but diſquiet with crafty conveyance the preachers of the truth, becauſe they reprove our wickedneſs with the truth? And, to ſay the truth, better it were to have a deformity in preaching, ſo that ſome would preach the truth of God, and that which is to be preached without cauponation and adulteration of the word, (as Lyranus ſaith in his time few did, what they do now-a-days I refer to them that can judge) than to have ſuch an uniformity, that the ſilly people ſhould be thereby occaſioned to continue ſtill in their lamentable ignorance, corrupt judgment, ſuperſtition and idolatry, and eſteem things as they do all, prepoſterouſly, doing that they need not to do, and leaving undone that they ought to do, for lack of knowing what is to be done, and ſo ſhew their love to God, not as God commandeth (who ſaith, If ye love me, keep my commandments. And again, He that knoweth my precepts, and doth them, he loveth me) but as they command, Which ſeek their own things, not Chriſt's: as though no tythe mint were more than judgment, faith and mercy.

And what is to live in ſtate of curates, but that he taught which ſaid, Peter, loveſt thou me? feed, feed, feed; which is now ſet aſide, as though to love, were to do nothing elſe but to wear rings, mitres and rochets, &c. And when they err in right living, how can the people but err in loving, and all of the new faſhion, to his diſhonour that ſuffered his paſſion, and taught the true kind of loving, which is now turned to piping, playing, and curious ſinging, which will not be reformed (I believe) unleſs by the ſtrong hand of God. And I have both St. Auguſtine and St. Thomas, with divers others, that [law] is taken not only for ceremonies, but alſo for morals, where it is ſaid, Ye are not under the law, though your friends reprove the ſame. But they can make no diviſion in a chriſtian congregation. And whereas both they and you would have a ſoberneſs in our preaching, I pray God ſend it unto us, whatſoever ye mean by it; for I ſee well whoſoever will be happy, and buſy with, Woe to you, he ſhall ſhortly after come before you.

And where your friends think that I made a lye, when I ſaid, that I have thought in times paſt that the pope had been lord of the world, though your friends be much better learned than I, yet I am ſure that they know not what either I think or have thought better than I, according to that, No man knoweth the things of a man, &c. as though better men than I have not thought ſo, as Bonifacius Octavus (as I remember) the great learned man John of the Burnt Tower, Preſbyter Cardinalis in his book where he proveth the pope to be above the council general and ſpecial; and where he ſaith that the pope is king of kings, and lord of lords, and that he is the true lord of the whole world by good right, albeit in fact he be not ſo; and that Conſtantine did but reſtore his own unto him when he gave unto him Rome; ſo that as St. John ſaith Chriſt did, He came unto his own, and his own received him not; and yet I hear not that any of our chriſtian congregations have reclaimed againſt him, until now of late diſſention began. Who be your friends I cannot tell; but I wiſh you would deſire them to be my good maſters, and if they will do me no good, at leaſt do me no harm; and though they can do you more good than I, yet I am ſure I would be as loth to hurt you as they, either with mine opinions, manner of preaching, or writing.

And as for the pope's high dominion over all, there is one Raphael Maruphus in London, an Italian, and in times paſt a merchant of diſpenſations, which I ſuppoſe, would die in the quarrel, God's true knight and true martyr. As touching purgatory, and worſhipping of ſaints, I ſhewed to you my mind before my ordinary: and yet I marvelled ſomething, that after private communication had with him, ye would (as it were) adjure me to open my mind before him, not giving me warning before, ſaving I cannot interpret your evil doings towards me; and yet neither mine ordinary nor you diſallowed the thing that I ſaid, and I looked not to eſcape better than Dr. Crome: but when I have opened my mind never ſo much, yet I ſhall be reported to deny my preaching, by them that I have belyed my preaching, as he was: I ſhall have need of great patience to bear the falſe report of the malignant church.

Sir, I have had more buſineſs in my little cure, ſince I ſpake with you, what with ſick folks, and what with matrimonies, than I have had ſince I came to it, or than I would have thought a man ſhould have in a great cure. I wonder how men can go quietly to bed, who have great and many cures, and yet peradventure are in none of them all. But I pray you to tell none of your friends that I ſpake ſo fooliſhly, leſt I make a diſſention in a chriſtian congregation, and divide a ſweet and peaceable union, or as many as may reſt with this in ſuch an age. Sir, I had juſt made an end of this ſcribling, and was beginning to tranſcribe it more correctly, but there came a man of my lord of Farley's, with a citation to appear before my lord of London in haſte, to be puniſhed for ſuch exceſſes as I committed at my laſt being there, ſo that I could not perform my purpoſe; I doubt whether ye can read it as it is. If ye can, well be it; if not, I pray you ſend it me again, and that you ſo do, whether you can read it or not. Jeſus' mercy, what a world is this, that I ſhould be put to ſo great labour and pains, beſides great charges, above my power, for preaching of a poor ſimple ſermon! But I think our Saviour Chriſt ſaid true, I muſt needs ſuffer and ſo enter; ſo dangerous a thing it is to live virtuouſly with Chriſt, yea, in a chriſtian congregation. God make us all chriſtians, after the right faſhion, Amen.

A public and authentic Inſtrument of the Biſhops, for aboliſhing, and inhibiting of the Scripture, and divers other Books to be read in Engliſh, in the Time of King Henry the Eighth, 1531.

IN the name of God, Amen. Be it known to all and ſingular true and faithful people, to whom theſe preſent letters teſtimonial, or this preſent public and authentic inſtrument ſhall come, or ſhall ſee, read, hear, or underſtand the ſame, and whom this underwritten ſhall or may teach, or appertain in any manner of wiſe in time to come, William, by the ſufferance of Almighty God, archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all the realm of England, ſendeth greeting in our Lord God everlaſting. We ſignify unto you all, and you well know by theſe preſents, that where the king our ſovereign lord, hearing of many books in the Engliſh tongue, containing many deteſtable errors, and damnable opinions, printed in parts beyond the ſeas, to be brought into divers towns, and ſundry parts of this his realm of England, and ſown abroad in the ſame, to the great decay of our faith catholic, and perilous corruption of his people, unleſs ſpeedy remedy were briefly provided, his highneſs willing evermore to employ all his ſtudy and mind in the high degree which Almighty God hath called him unto, to the wealth of his ſubjects, that they might not only live in tranquillity and peace, but alſo to be kept pure and clean from all contagion and wrong opinions in Chriſt's religion; conſidering alſo that he being defender of the faith, would be very loth to ſuffer ſuch evil ſeed ſown amongſt his people, and ſo take root that it might overgrow the corn of the catholic doctrine, before ſprung in the ſouls of his ſubjects: for the repelling of ſuch books, calling unto him of his great goodneſs, and gracious diſpoſition, not only certain of the chief prelates and clerks of his realm, but alſo of each univerſity a certain number of the learned men of them, propoſed ſuch of the books, as his chief grace had ready, therefore unto them to be read; requiring them to hear in that behalf their advice and judgment of them: who both by great diligence and mature deliberation, peruſing over the ſaid books, found in them many errors and hereſies, both deteſtable and damnable, being of ſuch a ſort, that they were ſoon like to corrupt a great part of his people (if they might be ſuffered to remain in their hands any time) gathering alſo out of them many great errors, and peſtilent hereſies, and noting them in writing, to the intent to ſhew for what cauſe they reputed the ſaid books damnable, of which hereafter out of each book gathered, many do enſue. Albeit many more there be in the ſaid books, which books totally do ſwarm full of hereſies, and deteſtable opinions.

SAINTS in heaven cannot help us thither.

To build a church in honour of our lady, or any other ſaint, is in vain, they cannot help thee, they be not thy friends.

To bid the poor man pray for me, is only to remember him to do his duty, not that I have any truſt in his prayer.

Churches are for preaching only, and not as they be uſed now.

To worſhip God otherwiſe, than to believe that he is juſt and true in his promiſes, is to make God an idol.

Saints be ſaved, not by their merits, but only by the merits of Chriſt.

Errors, Blaſphemies and Hereſies, noted in the Book of the Revelation of Antichriſt, and the Epiſtle going before.

TO bind a man perpetually to any vow of religion, is without doubt an error.

To feign the conſtitutions of religion are good becauſe holy men did ordain them, as Auguſtine, Benedict, Francis, Dominick, and ſuch others, that is to leave the faith: and to follow ſuch examples of fathers in ſome things, that is, in theſe things, is erring.

If they would make all the obſervations of the ceremonies, as Lent, faſting, holy-days, confeſſion, matrimony, maſs, matins, reliques, &c. free and indifferent, he ſhould not be Antichriſt, but now becauſe he commandeth it in the name of Chriſt, he doth utterly corrupt the church, ſuppreſs the faith, and advance ſin.

The Errors and Hereſies contained in the Book called, The Sum of the Scripture.

WE deſerve nothing of God.

We deſerve not everlaſting life by our good works: for God hath promiſed it unto us before that we began to do good.

We muſt love death, and more deſire to die than to fear death.

Thou ſhalt not count at night how much money thou haſt gained.

Thou ſhalt not vex or grieve, by juſtice or otherwiſe, the poor that oweth unto thee; for thou mayſt not do it without ſin.

He that is rich and liveth of his rents, may not uſe to over-ſpend his goods as he will, but thy goods belong as well unto the poor as to thee.

God hath not given riches to rich men for to boaſt and brag therewith; nor to make great chear, neither to make themſelves lords, but to the intent that they ſhould be ſervants unto all the world.

Out of the Book of Beggars.

THERE be many men of great literature and judgment, that for the love they have unto the church, and unto the commonwealth, have not feared to put themſelves into the greateſt infamy that may be in the objection of all the world, yea in the peril of death, to declare their opinion in this matter, which is that there is no purgatory; but it is a thing invented by the covetouſneſs of the ſpirituality, only to tranſlate all kingdoms from other princes unto them; and that there is not one word ſpoken of it in all holy ſcripture. God took Enoch away, that is to ſay, he departed out of this world like other men, the firſt is wrong tranſlated, for the ſcripture ſays, he was tranſlated, not taken away; and the laſt is falſe, for in Heb. 11. it is ſaid, By faith Enoch was tranſlated that he ſhould not ſee death, and was not found, becauſe God had tranſlated him; and in Eccleſ. Enoch pleaſed God and was tranſlated into paradiſe, that he might declare the wiſdom of his people.

The ungodly and erroneous Sayings contained in an Engliſh Work, inſcribed, An Expoſition upon the ſeventh Chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians.

WHoſoever in himſelf doth not feel this godly thing, this gift of chaſtity, but doth feel incontinency, to him, I ſay, a commandment is given that he may be married.

Hereof doth follow, that no perſon can make a vow, or promiſe to live chaſte or ſingle, and that none is bound to keep any ſuch vows, but rather to break them: and he that ſhall obſerve them, it is damnable, and by the law of God already condemned.

The touching of women, ſome perſons have compaſſed much ſtraightly, ſo that they dare not touch a woman's hand or ſkin, moreover they imagined many, both ſtatutes and ceremonies, to keep them from company of women, as they thought that built abbeys, but how fortunately that hath come to paſs, what place thereby hath been given to Satan, it were horrible to be ſpoken of.

He that is compelled outwardly to abſtain from women, and is inwardly full of luſt, is a diſſembler, and it is double letchery.

Mark what ſoul-ſlayers they be that provoke fooliſh youth to a vow of chaſtity, compelling them to nouriſh inwardly hidden malice.

All other evils may be ſuffered with a mean conſcience.

This cannot ſo be endured, this can be helped by no medicine but by marriage.

It is good for a man not to touch a woman; this word Good is not underſtood of merit and deſerving before God, as though an unmarried man were better before him, than the married, like as St. Jerome hath expounded this text; for it concerneth only faith, and no deed or work, but it is ſpoken of temporal quietneſs of this life, ſo that the virgin hath much more joy and tranquillity.

Chaſtity is a good thing, if luſt and incontinency make it not ſo common a thing as we have hitherto uſed to do, and yet do, but all amiſs; but the apoſtle will, that all men univerſally be conjugal: but all the biſhops ſince his time have deſtroyed the godly ordinance, when they babble and rail in pulpits, changing this word Every into Certain.

Men ought to ſtint of their ſtatutes-making, for a better ſtatute can none be than this, that men without any reſpect of time uſe their wife, not to exempt certain days as they have which we call Vigils, and women conceived.

Faſting is a meaſurable uſage of meats and drinks; prayer is a crying, ſigh, deſire and mourning.

No man ought to enforce and compel men to faſting and prayer, as they hitherto by laws have done.

Before God, all things are alike and equal.

Abominably they do ſin who make nuns ſwell in pride, when they babble, that their religion is more precious than matrimony, and then feign that they ſhall have a crown or garland of gold, ſo maketh them arrogant, wicked, unfaithful; chaſtity is the gift of God, and therefore can no man either promiſe, nor vow, nor keep it.

The

The ſects of all them that are called religious, and of all manner of ſhavelings, are falſly called the ſpiritual orders: for matrimony like as in very deed, ſo it ought to be called the ſpiritual ſtate before other orders worldly and ſecular; matrimony is of all other the higheſt religion, and moſt ſpiritual eſtate.

By teſtimony of ſcriptures, all the apoſtles and all the biſhop's ſucceſſors were married.

Saint Paul ſaith, That he ought to be choſen to be a biſhop that is the huſband of one wife.

Seeing ye chuſe not married men to be biſhops, either Chriſt muſt be a fool and unrighteous who did ſo chuſe, or you Antichriſts and deceivers.

You put away univerſally marriage from prieſts, contrary unto God, to nature, to reaſon, to right, only of preſumption, without any manner of cauſe.

There is no ſin nor miſchief in all the world ſo great, that can hinder a man from prieſthood, but godly matrimony.

What other thing is it to ſay, that a prieſt ſhould not marry, than to ſay, that a man ſhould not be a man?

This I dare be bold to ſay, that where is one chaſte, there ought more than an hundred thouſand to live married.

To keep a young man in a cloiſter to live chaſte, is as much as to offer a child to Moloch there to be burnt.

All which great errors and peſtilent hereſies being contagious and damnable, with all the books containing the ſame, with the tranſlation alſo of ſcripture corrupted by William Tindal, as well in the Old Teſtament as in the New, and all other books in Engliſh containing ſuch errors the king's highneſs preſent in perſon, by one whole advice and aſſent of the prelates and clerks, as well of the univerſities, as of all other aſſembled togethtr, determined utterly to be repelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to be ſuffered to go abroad among his ſubjects: And his highneſs willeth further that his pleaſure and determination ſhould be notified by preachers abroad unto the people, as well for putting away of all ſuch books, as reading, retaining, or having hereafter of any other like, delivering unto certain preachers, the form of a writing to be publiſhed in effect unto the people in their ſermons, whereof the form here followeth, willing them in all his realm to publiſh the ſame.

Here followeth the Bill in Engliſh, to be publiſhed by the Preacher.

IT is the office and duty of every preacher and teacher of the word of God, not only to ſhew and declare unto his audience that which might be profitable and wholſome for the wealth of their ſouls, to be followed and taken, but alſo to note and ſignify unto them ſuch things as be dangerous and contagious, to the intent they might be avoided and eſchewed, and alſo as near as they can judge who be teachers and authors of the ſame; this example we have of our Saviour Chriſt, where he ſaith, Beware of falſe prophets, &c. St. Paul likewiſe many times giveth warning to ſuch as he wrote unto, that they ſhould beware of the falſe prophets, that in his abſence went about to corrupt the doctrine that he had taught them being preſent. Wherefore conſidering that it hath pleaſed the king's highneſs, like a noble and a virtuous prince, tendering not only the preſent bodily wealth and tranquillity of all his ſubjects, for his, and their worldly benefit and advantage, but moſt chiefly regarding the wealth of their ſouls and their due order towards God, thereby to deſerve and attain immortal glory, to aſſemble and call together the chief perſonages of his prelates, and a great number of learned men of both univerſities, charging and commanding them for the diſcharge and exoneration of his conſcience, to find, read, examine and diſcuſs the contents of ſuch books as be now ſpread abroad within this his grace's realm in the Engliſh tongue concerning the points and articles of our faith, and after their learning and conſcience to make relation unto his highneſs, whether the ſame books be expedient and profitable for his people, to the direction and ordering of their conſcience and ſoul, or elſe contagious and peſtiferous for the ſame: and whether the opinions contained in them, were agreeable to God's word and doctrine or no, foraſmuch as the ſaid congregation and aſſembly had free liberty and licenſe granted unto every man to ſay as his conſcience and learning ſerved him without any reproof or blame to be imputed or arrected for any thing to be ſpoken there, whoſe perſon ſoever it touched, or any neceſſity to agree to the greater part, but only to ſay that his own learning and conſcience could maintain and juſtify; after mature deliberation and conſultation had, it was thereby a whole conſent, no man repugning or gain-ſaying, determined and agreed that the books now being abroad in the Engliſh tongue contain falſe traditions and corrupt doctrine, far different from the true ſenſe of the goſpel and catholic underſtanding of ſcripture, only perſuading pernicious hereſies to the deſtruction of the ſouls of good chriſtian men, and that the certainty hereof, I can report unto you of mine own knowledge, being one of the aſſembly, and hearing and ſeeing the ſaid opinions read, declared and examined, and by the true ſenſe and meaning of God's learning reproved and rejected: I think therefore my duty is, taking upon me the office of a preacher, following the example of our maſter Chriſt and St. Paul, as is aforeſaid, to warn and admoniſh you by the words of Chriſt, as I ſpake before, Beware of falſe prophets, &c. and take heed of yourſelf that ye be not infected by the contagion and infection of ſuch pſeudo-apoſtles as have in our Engliſh tongue, ſet forth books to ſeduce you from the true knowledge of God's laws, and bring you by their falſe interpretations of ſcripture into deteſtable and abominable hereſies to the deſtruction of our ſouls: wherefore you that have the books called, The Obedience of a Chriſtian Man; The Sum of Scripture; The Revelation of Antichriſt; The Supplication of Beggars; The Mammon of Unrighteouſneſs; The Matrimony of Tindal; The New Teſtament in Engliſh, or the tranſlation which is now printed, and ſuch other books in Engliſh, the authors whereof either dare not, or do not put to their names, be pernicious books; deteſt them, abhor them, keep them not in your hands, deliver them to the ſuperiors ſuch as call for them: and if by reading them heretofore, any thing remaineth in your breaſts of that teaching, either forget it, or by information of the truth expel it and purge it, to the intent that ye being ſo purified and cleanſed of that contagious doctrine and peſtiferous traditions, may be fit and apt to receive and retain the true doctrine and underſtanding of Chriſt's laws, to the comfort and edification of your ſouls; thus I move and exhort you in God to do, this is your duty to do.

The prelates of the church having the cure and charge of your ſouls ought to compel you, and your prince to puniſh and correct your not doing of the ſame, unto whom as St. Paul ſaith, the ſword is given by God's ordinance for that purpoſe; ye ſhall alſo farther underſtand, that the king's highneſs, foraſmuch as it was reported unto him that there is engendered an opinion in divers of his ſubject, that it is his grace's duty to cauſe the ſcripture of God to be tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue to be communicated unto the people, and that the prelates, and alſo his highneſs do wrong in hindering of the ſame, his highneſs willed therefore every man there preſent in the ſaid aſſembly, freely and frankly to ſhew and open unto him what might be proved, and conferred by ſcripture, and holy doctors in that behalf, to the intent that his highneſs (as he there openly proteſted) might conform himſelf thereunto, minding to do his duty towards his people, as he would they ſhould do their duties towards him: in which matter, after the ſcriptures declared, holy doctors and authors alledged and read, and all things ſaid, which might be on both ſides, and for both parts ſpoken, deduced, and brought forth, finally it appeared, that the having of the whole ſcripture in Engliſh, is not neceſſary to chriſtian men, but that without having any ſuch ſcripture, endeavouring themſelves to do well, and to apply their minds to take and follow ſuch leſſons as the preacher teacheth them, and ſo learned by his mouth, may as well edify ſpiritually in their ſouls, as if they had the ſame ſcriptures in Engliſh. And like as the having the ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue, and in the common people's hands, hath been by both holy fathers of the church heretofore in ſome times thought meet and convenient, ſo at another time it has been thought to holy fathers not expedient to be communicated amongſt them, wherein foraſmuch as the king's highneſs, by the advice and deliberation of his council, and the agreement of the great learned men, thinketh in his conſcience, that the divulging of the ſcripture at this time in the Engliſh tongue, to be committed to the people, conſidering ſuch peſtilent books, and ſo evil opinions, as be now ſpread amongſt them, ſhould rather be to their further confuſion and deſtruction, than the edification of their ſouls, and that as holy doctors teſtify, upon ſuch-like conſiderations, the ſemblable hath been done in times paſt, it was thought there in that aſſembly to all and ſingular in that congregation, that the king's highneſs, and the prelates in ſo doing and not ſuffering the ſcripture to be divulged and communicated in the Engliſh tongue unto the people, at this time doth well. And alſo I think and judge the ſame, exhorting and moving you, that in conſideration his highneſs did there openly ſay and proteſt that he would cauſe the New Teſtament to be, by learned men, faithfully and purely tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue, to the intent he might have it in his hands to be given to his people, as he might ſee their manners and behaviour meet, apt, and convenient to receive the ſame, that ye will ſo deteſt theſe pernicious books, ſo abhor theſe hereſies and new opinions, ſo decline from arrogancy of knowledge and underſtanding of ſcripture after your fantaſies, and ſhew yourſelf in cunning and reaſoning ſo ſober, quiet, meek, and temperate, as all fear of miſuſing the gift of ſcripture taken away, ye may appear ſuch in your prince's eyes, and eyes of your prelates, as they ſhall have no juſt cauſe to fear any ſuch danger; perſuading unto yourſelf in the mean time without grudging or murmuring the very truth, which is this, that we cannot require or demand ſcripture to be divulged in the Engliſh tongue, otherwiſe than upon the diſcretion of our ſuperiors, ſo as whenſoever they think in their conſcience it may do you good, they may and do well to give it unto you: and whenſoever it ſhall be ſeen otherwiſe unto them, they do amiſs in ſuffering you to have it. Of and upon which decree, order and determination above recited, his gracious highneſs being in perſon in the chapel, called the old chapel, which ſometime was called St. Edward's chamber, ſat on the eaſt ſide of the parliament chamber, within his grace's palace at Weſtminſter, upon the 24th day of May, in the year of our Lord God 1530, and in the two and twentieth year of his reign, called before his grace the three notaries hereunder written, and then and there, in the preſence of all the perſonages there aſſembled and gathered together, willed and required the ſaid three notaries to make public and authentic inſtruments, and us to ſet thereunto our ſeal accordingly in and for witneſs, and perpetual memory and monument of this his grace's deſire, order and determination, and of all and ſingular the premiſes, and all the perſonages then and there being preſent, to teſtify the ſame, and bear record and teſtimony thereupon. In witneſs of all and ſingular the premiſes, We, William, archbiſhop, primate and legate aforeſaid, have commanded and obtained theſe preſent letters teſtimonial, or preſent public or authentic inſtrument, containing therein the order, decree, and determination aboveſaid, to be made and to be ſubſcribed, and conſigned by the hands of the notaries hereafter named, and to be ſealed with our own ſeal. All which premiſes have been done in manner and form above ſpecified, then and there being preſent the noble perſonage of Thomas Moor, knight, great chancellor of England; our reverend brother in Chriſt, Cutbert, by the permiſſion of God, biſhop of Durham; and worſhipful perſonages, Mr. Stephen Gardiner, ſecretary; Mr. Richard Samſon, dean of the chapel, doctor of law; Mr. Richard Wolman, maſter of the requeſt; Mr. John Bell, counſellor; doctors of holy decrees; Mr. Nicholas Wilſon, the king's confeſſor; Mr. Richard Duck, archdeacon of Wiltſhire, doctors of divinity; Mr. John Oliver, Mr. Edmund Steward, doctors of the law, chaplains to our ſovereign lord the king's grace; Mr. Richard Mawdly, Mr. William Mortimer, Mr. Edward Crome, Mr. Edward Wiggen, doctors alſo of divinity; Mr. Robert Carter, Mr. Edward Leighton; Mr. Hugh Latimer, Mr. William Latimer, and Roger Tilſon, maſters of art in both the univerſities aboveſaid, with many more learned men of the ſaid univerſities, in a great number aſſembled then and there together witneſs to the premiſes required and exhibited. Theſe being premiſed, now let us ſee the anſwer of Mr. Latimer again to this aforeſaid propoſal or inſtrument of the biſhops, in a letter which the ſaid Latimer wrote to king Henry the ſame time in that behalf.

Here followeth a letter of Mr. Latimer written to king Henry the eighth upon this occaſion. Ye heard before of two proclamations ſet out by the biſhops in the name of king Henry, one in the year 1531, and the other in the year 1546; in which proclamations, being authorized by the king's name, were inhibited all Engliſh books, either containing or tending to any matter of the ſcripture. Where alſo we have expreſſed a catalogue of ſome of the errors of the ſaid biſhops falſly picked out, and maliciouſly imputed to godly writers. Now Mr. Latimer growing in ſome favour with the king, and ſeeing the great decay of Chriſt's religion by reaſon of theſe proclamations, and touched therefore with the zeal of conſcience, directeth unto king Henry this letter here enſuing, thereby intending by all means poſſible to perſuade the king's mind to ſet open again the freedom of God's holy word amongſt his ſubjects. The copy of which letter here followeth.

Mr. Latimer's Letter to King Henry the Eighth, for the reſtoring again of the free Liberty of reading the holy Scriptures.

To the moſt Mighty Prince, King of England, Henry the Eighth, Grace, Mercy and Peace from God the Father, by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

THE holy doctor St. Auguſtine, in an epiſtle which he wrote to Caſalanus, ſaith, That he which for fear of any power hideth the truth, provoketh the wrath of God to come upon him, for he feareth men more than God. And according to the ſame, the holy man St. John Chryſoſtom ſaith, that he is not only a traitor to the truth, which openly for truth teacheth a lye; but he alſo which doth not freely pronounce and ſhew the truth that he knoweth. Theſe ſentences (moſt redoubted king) when I read now of late, and marked them earneſtly in the inward parts of mine heart, they made me ſore afraid, troubled and vexed me grievouſly in my conſcience, and at laſt drave me to this ſtrait, that either I muſt ſhew forth ſuch things as I have read and learned in ſcripture, or elſe be of that ſort that provoke the wrath of God upon them, and be traitors unto the truth: which thing, rather than it ſhould happen, I had rather ſuffer extreme puniſhment.

For what other thing is it to be a traitor unto the truth, than to be a traitor and a Judas unto Chriſt, which is the very truth, and the cauſe of all truth? Who ſaith, that whoſoever denieth him here before men, he will deny him before his Father in heaven. Which denying ought more to be feared and dreaded, than the loſs of all temporal goods, honour, promotion, fame, priſon, ſlander, hurts, baniſhments, and all manner of torments and cruelties, yea, and death itſelf, be it never ſo ſhameful and painful. But alas, how little do men regard thoſe ſharp ſayings of theſe two holy men? And how little do they fear the terrible judgment of Almighty God? And eſpecially they which boaſt themſelves to be guides and captains unto others, and challenging unto themſelves the knowledge of holy ſcripture, yet will neither ſhew the truth themſelves (as they be bound) neither ſuffer them that would. So that unto them it may be ſaid, that which our Saviour Chriſt ſaid to the phariſees, Matt. 23. Woe be unto you, ſcribes and phariſees, who ſhut up the kingdom of heaven before men, and neither will you enter in yourſelves, neither ſuffer them that would enter in. And they will, as much as in them lieth, debar, not only the word of God, which David calleth, a light to direct and ſhew every man how to order his affections and luſts, according to the commandments of God, but alſo by their ſubtle wilineſs they inſtruct, move, and provoke in a manner, all kings in Chriſtendom, to aid, ſuccour, and help them in this their miſchief; and eſpecially in this your realm they have ſo blinded your liege people and ſubjects with their laws, cuſtoms, ceremonies and Banbury gloſſes, and puniſhed them with curſings, excommunications, and other corruptions (corrections I would ſay) and now at the laſt when they ſee they cannot prevail againſt the open truth (which the more it is perſecuted, the more it increaſeth by their tyranny) they have made it treaſon to your noble grace to have the ſcripture in Engliſh.

Here I beſeech your grace to pardon me a while, and patiently to hear me a word or two; yea, though it be ſo that, as concerning your high majeſty and regal power, whereunto Almighty God hath called your grace, there is a great difference between you and me, as between God and man: for you be here to me and all your ſubjects, in God's ſtead, to defend, aid and ſuccour us in our right, and ſo I ſhall tremble and quake to ſpeak to your grace. But again, as concerning that you be a mortal man, in danger of ſin, having in you the corrupt nature of Adam, in which we be all both conceived and born: ſo have you no leſs need of the merits of Chriſt's paſſion for your ſalvation, than I and other of your ſubjects have, which be all members of the myſtical body of Chriſt. And though you be an higher member, yet you muſt not diſdain the leſſer. For as St. Paul ſaith, Thoſe members that be taken to be moſt vile, and had in leaſt reputation, be as neceſſary as the other, for the preſervation and keeping of the body. This, moſt gracious king, when I conſidered, and alſo your favourable and gentle nature, I was bold to write this rude, homely, and ſimple letter to your grace, truſting that you will accept my true and faithful mind, even at it is.

Firſt, I will exhort your grace to mark the life and proceſs of our Saviour Chriſt, and his apoſtles, in preaching and ſetting forth of the goſpel, and to note alſo the words of our maſter Chriſt, which he had to his diſciples when he ſent them forth to preach his goſpel, and to theſe have ever in your mind the golden rule of our Saviour Chriſt; The tree is known by the fruit. For by the diligent marking of theſe, your grace ſhall clearly know and perceive who be the true followers of Chriſt, and teachers of his goſpel, and who be not. And concerning the firſt, all ſcripture ſheweth plainly that our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt's life was very poor.

Begin at his birth, and I beſeech you, who ever heard of a poorer, and ſo poor as he was? It were too long to write how poor Joſeph and the bleſſed virgin Mary took their journey from Nazareth toward Bethlehem, in the cold and froſty winter, having no body to wait upon them, but he both maſter and man, and ſhe both miſtreſs and maid. How vilely, thinks your grace, where they intreated in the inns and lodgings by the way? and in how vile and abject place was this poor maid, the mother of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, brought to-bed, without company, light, or any other thing neceſſary for a woman in that condition? Was not here a poor beginning, as concerning this world? Yes truly. And according to this beginning, was the proceſs and end of his life in this world, and yet he might by his godly power have had all the goods and treaſures of this world at his pleaſure, when and where he would.

But this he did to ſhew us, that his followers and vicars ſhould not regard and ſet by the riches and treaſures of this world, but after the ſaying of David we ought to take them, which ſaith thus; If riches, promotions, and dignity happen to a man, let him not ſet his affiance, pleaſure, truſt, and heart upon them. So that it is not againſt the poverty of ſpirit, which Chriſt preacheth in the goſpel of St. Matthew, chap. 5. to be rich, to be in dignity and in honour, ſo that their hearts be not fixed and ſet upon them ſo much that they neither care for God nor good men. But they be enemies to this poverty in ſpirit, have they never ſo little, that have greedy and deſirous minds to the goods of this world, only becauſe they would live after their own pleaſures and luſts. And they alſo be privy enemies (and ſo much the worſe) which have profeſſed, as they ſay, wilful poverty, and will not be called worldly men, and they have lord's lands, and king's riches, yea, rather than they would loſe one jot of that which they have, they will ſet debate between king and king, realm and realm, yea, between the king and his ſubjects, and cauſe rebellion againſt the temporal power, to which our Saviour Chriſt himſelf was obedient, and paid tribute, as the goſpel declareth; unto whom the holy apoſtle St. Paul teacheth every chriſtian man to obey. Yea, and beſide all this, they will curſe and ban, as much as in them lieth, even into the deep pit of hell, all that gainſay their appetite, whereby they think their goods, promotions, or dignities ſhould decay.

Your grace may ſee what means and craft the ſpirituality (as they will be called) imagine, to break and withſtand the acts which were made in your grace's laſt parliament againſt their ſuperfluities. Wherefore they that thus do, your grace may know them not to be true followers of Chriſt. And although I named the ſpirituality to be corrupt with this unthrifty ambition; yet I mean not all to be faulty therein, for there be ſome good of them. Neither will I that your grace ſhould take away the goods due to the church, but take away all evil perſons from the goods, and ſet better in their ſtead.

I name nor appoint no perſon nor perſons, but remit your grace to the rule of our Saviour Chriſt, as in Matthew the ſeventh chapter, By their fruits ſhall you know them. As touching the words that our Saviour Chriſt ſpake to his diſciples when he ſent them to preach his goſpel, they be read in Matthew the fifteenth chapter, where he ſheweth, That here they ſhall be hated and deſpiſed of all men worldly, and brought before kings and rulers, and that all evil ſhould be ſaid by them for their preaching ſake; but he exhorteth them to take patiently ſuch perſecution by his own example, ſaying, It becometh not the ſervant to be above the maſter. And ſeeing they call me Beelzebub, what marvel is it if they call you deviliſh perſons and heretics? Read the fourteenth chapter of St. Matthew's goſpel, and there your grace ſhall ſee that he promiſed to the true preachers no worldly promotions or dignity, but perſecution and all kinds of puniſhment, and that they ſhould be betrayed even by their own brethren and children. In John alſo he ſaith, In the world ye ſhall have oppreſſion, and the world ſhall hate you: but in me ye ſhall have peace. And in the tenth chapter of St. Matthew's goſpel ſaith our Saviour alſo, Lo I ſend you forth as ſheep among wolves. So that the true preachers go like ſheep harmleſs, and be perſecuted, and yet they revenge not their wrong, but remit all to God; ſo far is it off that they will perſecute any other but with the word of God only, which is their weapon. And ſo this is the moſt evident token that our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt would that his goſpel and the preachers of it ſhould be known by, that it ſhould be deſpiſed among thoſe worldly wiſe men, and that they ſhould repute it but fooliſhneſs and deceivable doctrine, and the true preachers ſhould be perſecuted and hated, and driven from town to town, yea, and at the laſt loſe both goods and life.

And yet they that did this perſecution, ſhould think that they did well, and a great pleaſure to God. And the apoſtles remembering this leſſon of our Saviour Chriſt, were content to ſuffer ſuch perſecutions, as you may read in the Acts of the apoſtles, and the epiſtles. But we never read that they ever perſecuted any man. The holy apoſtle St. Paul ſaith, That every man that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, ſhould ſuffer perſecution. And alſo he ſaith further in the epiſtle to the Philippians, in the firſt chapter, That it is not only given to you to believe in the Lord, but alſo to ſuffer perſecution for his ſake.

Wherefore take this for a ſure concluſion, that there where the word of God is truly preached, there is perſecution, as well of the hearers, as of the teachers: and where is quietneſs and reſt in worldly pleaſure, there is not the truth. For the world loveth all that are of the world, and hateth all things that are contrary to it. And to be ſhort, St. Paul calleth the goſpel, the word of the croſs, the word of puniſhment. And the holy ſcripture doth promiſe nothing to the favourers and followers of it in this world, but trouble, vexation, and perſecution, which theſe worldly men cannot ſuffer, nor away withal.

Therefore pleaſeth it your good grace, to return to this golden rule of our maſter and only Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, which is this, By their fruits you ſhall know them. For where you ſee perſecution, there is the goſpel, and there is the truth: and they that do perſecute, be void and without all truth; not caring for the clear light, which (as our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt ſaith in the third chapter of St. John's goſpel) is come into the world, and which ſhall utter and ſhew forth every man's works. And they whoſe works be naught, dare not come to this light, but go about to ſtop it and hinder it, endeavouring to prevent as much as poſſible the reading of the holy ſcripture in our mother tongue, ſaying, that it would cauſe hereſy and inſurrection, and ſo they perſuade, at leaſt they would fain perſuade your grace to keep it back. But here mark their ſhameleſs boldneſs, who be not aſhamed contrary to Chriſt's doctrine, to gather figs of thorns, and grapes of thiſtles, and to call light darkneſs, and darkneſs light, ſweet bitter, and bitter ſweet, good evil, and evil good; and to ſay that that which teacheth all obedience ſhould cauſe diſſention and ſtrife: but ſuch is their belly wiſdom, wherewith they judge and meaſure every thing, to hold and keep ſtill this wicked mammon, the goods of this world, which is their god, and hath ſo blinded the eyes of their hearts, that they cannot ſee the clear light of the ſacred ſcripture, though they babble never ſo much of it.

But as concerning this matter, other men have ſhewed your grace their minds, how neceſſary it is to have the ſcripture in Engliſh. Which thing alſo your grace hath promiſed by your laſt proclamation: which promiſe I pray God that your gracious highneſs may ſhortly perform, even to-day before to-morrow. Now let the wickedneſs of theſe worldly men detain you from your godly purpoſe and promiſe. Remember the ſubtle worldly wiſe counſellors of Hanun the ſon of Naas, king of the Ammonites, whom when David had ſent his ſervants to comfort the young king for the death of his father, by crafty imaginations counſelled Hanun, not only not to receive them gently, but to treat them moſt ſhamefully and cruelly, ſaying, "That they came not to comfort him, but to eſpy and ſearch his land, ſo that afterward they bringing David word how every thing ſtood, David might come and conquer it." And he cauſed the young king to ſhear their heads, and to cut their coats by the points, and ſent them away like fools: whom he ought rather to have made much of, and to have treated them gently, and have given them great thanks and rewards: O wretched counſellors. But ſee what followed of this carnal and worldly wiſdom: truly nothing but deſtruction of all whole realm, and alſo of all them that took their parts.

Therefore good king, ſeeing that the right David, that is to ſay, our Saviour Chriſt hath ſent his ſervants, that is to ſay, his true preachers, and his own word alſo to comfort our weak and ſick ſouls, let not theſe worldly men make your grace believe that they will cauſe inſurrections and hereſies, and ſuch miſchiefs as they imagine of their own mad brains, leſt that he be avenged upon you and your realm, as was David upon the Ammonites, and as he hath ever been avenged upon them which have obſtinately withſtood and gainſayed his word. But peradventure they will lay this againſt me, and ſay that experience doth ſhew, how that ſuch men as call themſelves followers of the goſpel, regard not your grace's commandment, neither ſet by your proclamation, and that was well proved by thoſe perſons which of late were puniſhed in London, for keeping ſuch books as your grace had prohibited by proclamation; and ſo like as they regarded not this, ſo they will not regard or eſteem other your grace's laws, ſtatutes, or ordinances. But this is but a crafty perſuaſion. For your grace knoweth, that there is no man living, eſpecially that loveth worldly promotion, that is ſo fooliſh, to ſet forth, promote or advance his enemies, whereby he ſhould be hindered of his worldly pleaſures and fleſhly deſires: but rather he will ſeek all the ways poſſible that he can, utterly to confound deſtroy, and put him out of the way. And ſo as concerning your laſt proclamation, prohibiting ſuch books, the very true cauſe of it and chief counſellors (as men ſay, and of likelihood it ſhould be) were they, whoſe evil living and cloaked hypocriſy theſe books uttered and diſcloſed. And howbeit that there were three or four, that would have had the ſcripture to go forth in Engliſh, yet it happened there, as it is always ſeen, that the moſt part overcometh the better, and ſo it might be that theſe men did not take this proclamation as yours, but as theirs ſet forth in your name, as they have done many times more, which hath put this your realm in great hindrance and trouble, and brought it in great penury, and more would have done, if God had not mercifully provided to bring your grace to knowledge of the falſhood and privy treaſon, which their head and captain was about; and be you ſure not without adherents, if the matter be duly ſearched. For what marvel is it, that they being ſo nigh of your council, and ſo familiar with your lords, ſhould provoke both your grace and them to prohibit theſe books, which before by their own authority have forbidden the New Teſtament under pain of everlaſting damnation: for ſuch is their manner, to ſend a thouſand men to hell, ere they ſend one to God, and yet the New Teſtament (and ſo I think by the other) was meekly offered to every man that would and could, to amend it, if there were any fault.

Moreover, I will aſk them the cauſes of all inſurrections, which have heretofore been in this realm. And whence is it that there be ſo many extortioners, bribers, murderers, and thieves, which daily do not break only your grace's laws, ordinances, and ſtatutes, but alſo the laws and commandments of Almighty God? I think they will not ſay theſe books, but rather their pardons which cauſeth many a man to ſin in truſt of them. For as for thoſe malefactors which I now rehearſed, you ſhall not find one amongſt a hundred, but that he will cry out both of theſe books, and alſo of them that have them, yea and will be glad to ſpend the good which he hath wrongfully gotten, upon faggots to burn both the books, and them that have them.

And as touching theſe men that were lately puniſhed for theſe books, there is no man, I hear ſay, that can lay any word or deed againſt them that ſhould ſound to the breaking of any of your grace's laws, this only except, if it be yours, and not rather theirs. And be it ſo that there be ſome that have theſe books, that be evil, unruly and ſelf-willed perſons, not regarding God's laws, nor man's, yet theſe books be not the cauſe thereof, no more than was the bodily preſence of Chriſt and his words the cauſe that Judas fell, but their own froward mind and carnal wit, which ſhould be amended by the virtuous example of living of their curates, and by the true expoſition of the ſcripture. If the lay-people had ſuch curates that would thus do their office, neither theſe books, nor the devil himſelf could hurt them to go out of frame, ſo that the lack of good curates is the deſtruction and cauſe of all miſchief. Neither do I write theſe things becauſe that I will either excuſe theſe men lately puniſhed, or to affirm all to be true written in theſe books, which I have not all read, but to ſhew that there cannot ſuch inconvenience follow of them, and eſpecially of the ſcripture, as they would make men believe ſhould follow.

And though it be ſo that your grace may by other books, and namely by the ſcripture itſelf, know and perceive the hypocrite wolves clad in ſheep's cloathing, yet I think myſelf bound in conſcience to utter unto your grace ſuch things as God puts in my wind to write. And this I do (God ſo judge me) not for hate of any perſon or perſons living, nor for that I think the word of God ſhould go forth without perſecution, if your grace had commanded that every man within your realm ſhould have it in his mother's tongue. For the goſpel muſt needs have perſecution unto the time that it be preached throughout all the world, which is the laſt ſign that Chriſt ſhewed to his diſciples ſhould come before the day of judgment: ſo that if your grace had once commanded that the ſcripture ſhould be put forth, the devil would ſet forth ſome wile or other to perſecute the truth. But my purpoſe is, for the love that I have to God principally, and the glory of his name, which is only known by his word, and for the true allegiance that I owe unto your grace, and not to hide in the ground of my heart the talent given me by God, but to chaffer it forth to others, that it may increaſe to the pleaſure of God, to exhort your grace to avoid and beware of theſe miſchievous flatterers, and their abominable ways and counſels.

And take heed whoſe counſels your grace doth take in this matter: for there be ſome that for fear of loſing of their worldly worſhip and honour, will not leave off their opinion, which raſhly, and that to pleaſe men withal by whom they had great promotion, they took upon them to defend by writing, ſo that now they think that all their felicity which they put in this life ſhould be marred, and their wiſdom not ſo greatly regarded, if that which they have ſo ſlanderouſly oppreſſed ſhould be now put forth and allowed. But alas, let theſe men remember St. Paul, how fervent he was againſt the truth (and that of a good zeal) before he was called; he thought no ſhame to ſuffer puniſhment and great perſecutions for that which before he deſpiſed and called hereſy. And I am ſure that their living is not more perfect that St. Paul's was, as concerning the outward works of the law, before he was converted.

Alſo the king and prophet David was not aſhamed to forſake his good intent in building of the temple, after that the prophet Nathan had ſhewed him that it was the the pleaſure of God that he ſhould build any houſe for him: and notwithſtanding that Nathan had before allowed and praiſed the purpoſe of David, yet he was not aſhamed to revoke and eat his words again when he knew that they were not according to God's will and pleaſure.

Wherefore they be more drowned in worldly wiſdom, that think it againſt their worſhip to acknowledge their ignorance; whom I pray to God that your grace may eſpy, and take heed of their worldly wiſdom, which is fooliſhneſs before God, that you may do what God commandeth, and not what ſeemeth good in your own ſight without the word of God, that your grace may be found acceptable in his ſight, and one of the members of his church, and according to the office that he hath called your grace unto, you may be found a faithful miniſter of his gifts, and not a defender of his faith, for he will not have it defended by man, or man's power, but by his word only, by which he hath evermore defended it, and that by a way far above man's power or reaſon, as all the ſtories of the Bible make mention.

Wherefore, gracious king, remember yourſelf, have pity upon your ſoul, and think that the day is even at hand when you ſhall give account of your office, and of the blood that hath been ſhed with your ſword. In which day that your grace may ſtand ſtedfaſtly, and not be aſhamed, but be clear and ready in your reckoning, and to have, as they ſay, your diſcharge ſealed with the blood of our Saviour Chriſt, which only ſerveth at that day, is my daily prayer to his Father for grace for us continually. To whom be all honour and praiſe for ever, Amen. The Spirit of God preſerve your grace.

December 1, 1530.

In this letter of Mr. Latimer to the king above prefixed, many things we have to conſider: Firſt, his good conſcience to God, his good will to the king, the duty of a right paſtor unto truth, his tender care to the commonwealth, and eſpecially to the church of Chriſt. Further, we have to conſider the abuſe of princes courts, how kings many times be abuſed with flatterers and wicked counſellers about them, and eſpecially we may note the ſubtle practices of prelates, in abuſing the name and authority of kings, to ſet forth their own malignant proceedings. We may ſee moreover, and rather marvel at in the ſaid letter, the great boldneſs and divine ſtoutneſs in this man, who as yet being no biſhop, ſo freely and plainly without any fear of death, adventuring his own life to diſcharge his conſcience, durſt ſo boldly, to ſo mighty a prince, in ſuch a dangerous caſe, againſt the king's law and proclamation ſet out in ſuch a terrible time, take upon him to write, and admoniſh that, which no counſellor durſt ſo much as once mention unto him in defence of Chriſt's goſpel. Whoſe example, if the biſhops and prelates of this realm, for their parts likewiſe, in like caſes would follow (as indeed they ought to do) it is very probable that many things would not be ſo out of the frame as they be.

Finally, this moreover in the ſaid letter is to be noted, how bleſſedly Almighty God wrought with his faithful ſervant's bold adventure, and wholeſome counſel, though it did not prevail through the iniquity of the time, yet God ſo wrought with his ſervant in doing his duty, that no danger, nor yet diſpleaſure roſe to him thereby, but rather thanks and good will of the prince; for not long after the ſame he was advanced by the king to the biſhopric of Worceſter, as is above declared.

Seeing Mr. Latimer was ſo bold and plain with the king (as is before ſpecified) no great marvel if he did uſe the like freedom and plainneſs towards other meaner perſons in admoniſhing them of their miſorder, eſpecially if any ſuch occaſion were given, where truth and equity required his defence againſt injury and oppreſſion. For example whereof we have another letter of his, written to a certain juſtice of the peace in Warwickſhire, who as he is long ſince departed, ſo he ſhall be here unnamed. The letter, although it may ſeem ſomewhat long and tedious, yet I thought here not to overpaſs the ſame for ſeveral reaſons: Firſt, That the virtue and faithful conſcience of this good paſtor may appear more at large; alſo for that all other biſhops and paſtors by this example may learn with like zeal and reſolution to diſcharge their duty and conſcience in reforming things amiſs, and in powdering, with the ſalt of God's word, the ſores of the people. Which thing if every biſhop for his part within his dioceſe had done in king Edward's days, in redreſſing ſuch corruption of that time with like diligence as this man did, verily I ſuppoſe that the perſecution of queen Mary had not ſo plagued the realm as it did: Item, Another reſpect is, becauſe of the juſtices and all others placed in office, which may take heed hereby, not to abuſe their authority to tread down truth, and bear down poor men with open wrong through extortion or partiality. And finally, that all injurious oppreſſors whatſoever, by the ſaid letter may take ſome fruit of wholeſome admonition.

Mr. Latimer's Letter to a Juſtice of the Peace.

RIGHT worſhipful, health in the Lord. And now Sir, I underſtand, that you be in great admiration at me, and take very grievouſly my manner of writing to you, adding thereunto that you will not bear it at my hand, no, not if I were the beſt biſhop in England, &c.

Ah, Sir, I ſee well I may ſay as the common ſaying is, Well I have fiſhed and caught a frog; brought little to paſs with much ado. You will not bear it with me, you ſay. Why, Sir, what will ye do with me? You will not fight with me, I ſuppoſe. It may ſeem unſeemly for a juſtice of peace to be a breaker of peace: I am glad the doting time of my fooliſh youth is gone and paſt. What will you then do with me, in that you ſay you will not bear it at my hand? What hath my hand offended you? Perchance you will ſummon me before ſome judge, and call me into ſome court. God turn it to good. I refuſe no judgment. Let us accuſe one another, that one of us may amend another, in the name of the Lord. Let juſtice proceed in judgment. And then and there, do beſt, have beſt, for club half-penny. Or peradventure ye will ſet pen to paper, and all to rattle me in a letter, wherein confuting me you will defend yourſelf and your brother againſt me. Now that would I ſee, quoth long Robin, as is commonly ſaid. I cannot chooſe but muſt allow ſuch diligence. For ſo ſhould both your integrities and innocencies beſt appear, if you be able to defend both your own proceedings, and your brother's doings in this matter to be upright. And then will I gladly give place, confeſſing my fault humbly, as one conquered with juſt reaſons. But I think it will not be. But now firſt of all let me know, what it is that ye will not bear at my hand? What have I done with my hand? What hath my hand treſpaſſed you? Forſooth, that can I tell, no man better: for I have charitably admoniſhed you in a ſecret letter, of your ſupper dealing, and ſuch like miſbehaviour. What a ſore matter is this? And will ye not bear ſo much with me? Will ye not take ſuch a ſhew of my good-will towards you, and toward the ſaving of your ſoul at my hand? O Lord God, who would have thought that Mr. N. had been ſo imprudent, that he would not bear a godly admonition for the wealth of his ſoul? I have in uſe to commit ſuch trefpaſs many times in a year with your betters, by two or three degrees, both lords and ladies, and the beſt of the realm, and yet hitherto I have not heard that any of them have ſaid in their diſpleaſure, that they will not bear it at my hand. Are you yet to be taught what is the office, liberty and privilege of a preacher? What is it elſe, but even to rebuke the world of ſin without reſpect of perſons: which thing undoubtedly is the peculiar office of the Holy Ghoſt in the church of God, ſo that it be practiſed by lawful preachers. You could but ill bear (belike) to hear your fault openly reproved in the pulpit, which cannot bear the ſame in a ſecret ſealed up letter, written both friendly, charitably and truly; unleſs perhaps to rebuke ſin ſharply, be now to lack all charity, friendſhip and truth. But Mr. N. if you will give me leave to be plain with you, I fear you are ſo plunged in worldly purchaſings, and ſo drowned in the manifold dregs of this deceivable world, that I believe you have forgotten your catechiſm. Read therefore again the opening of the firſt commandment, and then tell me, whether you have juſt cauſe to complain of me, or I of you, &c.

Alſo, Sir, you ſaid further, that I am wonderfully abuſed by my neighbour, &c. How ſo, good Mr. N? Wherein? Or how will you prove it to be true, and when? So you ſaid, that he had abuſed you, and given you wrong information; but the contrary is found true by good teſtimony of Mr. Chamber, who heard as well as you what my neighbour ſaid, and hath teſtified the ſame, both to you, and againſt you, full like himſelf. Mr. N, to forge and feign (which argueth an ill cauſe) that is one thing; but to prove what a man doth ſay, that is another thing. As though you were privileged to out-face poor men, and bear them in hand what you liſt, as may ſeem to make ſome maintenance for your naughty cauſe. Truſt me, Ma. N. I was but a very little acquainted with my neighbour when this matter began; but now I have found him ſo conformable to honeſty, upright in his dealings, and ſo true in his talk, that I eſteem him better than I do ſome other whom I have perceived and found otherwiſe, For I will flatter no man, nor yet claw his back in his folly, but eſteem all men as I find them, allowing what is good, and diſallowing what is bad; among all men, either friends or enemies, according to St. Paul's precept, not eſteemed of the children of this world; Hate you, ſaith he, that which is evil, and cleave to that which is good. And let us not any time for the favour of men, call good evil, and evil good, as the children of this world are commonly wont to do, as it is every where to be ſeen. And now what manner of man do you make me, maſter N. when you note me to be ſo much abuſed by ſo ignorant a man, ſo ſimple, ſo plain, and ſo far without all wrinkles? Have I lived ſo long in this tottering world, and have I been ſo many ways turmoiled and toſſed up and down, and ſo much as it were ſeaſoned with the powder of ſo many experiences to and fro, to be now ſo far bewitched and alienated from my wits, as though I could not diſcern cheeſe from chalk, truth from falſhood; but that every ſilly ſoul, and baſe-witted man might eaſily abuſe me to what enterprize he liſted at his pleaſure? Well, I ſay not nay, but I may be abuſed. But why do you not tell me how your brother abuſed me, promiſing before me and many more, that he would ſtand to your awardſhip, and now doth deny it? Why do you not tell me, how thoſe two falſe faithleſs wretches abuſe me, promiſing alſo to abide your award, and do it not? Yea, why do you not tell me how you yourſelf have abuſed me, promiſing me to redreſs the injury and wrong that your brother hath done to my neighbour, and have not fulfilled your promiſe? Theſe notable abuſes be nothing with you, but only you muſt needs burden me with my neighbour's abuſing me, which is none at all, as far as ever I could perceive, ſo God help me at my need. For if he had abuſed me as you and others have done, I ſhould be ſoon at a point with him, for any thing further doing for him, &c.

Likewiſe, Sir, you ſaid further, that I ſhall never be able to prove that either your brother, or the two tenants agree to ſtand to your award, &c. No, Sir, Mr. N. you ſay belike as you would have it to be, or as your brother with his adherents have perſuaded you to think it to be, ſo inducing you to do their requeſt to your own ſhame and rebuke, if you perſevere in the ſame, beſides the danger of your ſoul, for conſenting, at leaſt wiſe, to the maintenance by falſhood of your brother's iniquity. For in that you would your awardſhip ſhould take none effect, you ſhew yourſelf nothing inclinable to the redreſs of your brother's unright dealing with an honeſt poor man, which hath been ready at your requeſt to do you pleaſure with his things, or he had never come into this wrangle, for his own goods with your brother.

Ah maſter N. what manner of man do you ſhew yourſelf to be? Or what manner of conſcience do you ſhew yourſelf to have? For, firſt, as touching your brother, you know right well that Sir Thomas Coking with a letter of his own hand writing, hath witneſſed unto your brother's agreement; which letter he ſent to me unſealed, and I ſhewed the ſame to my neighbour, and others, before I ſealed it, and perchance have a copy of the ſame yet to ſhew. With what conſcience then can you ſay that I ſhall never be able to prove it? Shall not three men upon their oaths make a ſufficient proof, think you? The Lord himſelf ſaying, In the mouth of two or three, &c. Yea, you think it true I dare ſay, in your conſcience, if you have any conſcience, though I were in my grave, and ſo unable to prove any thing. And as for the two tenants, they be as they be, and I truſt to ſee them handled according as they be; for there be three men yet alive, that dare ſwear upon a book, that they both did agree. But what ſhould we look for at ſuch men's hands, when you yourſelf play the part you do? But God is yet alive, who ſeeth all, and judgeth juſtly.

Alſo, Sir, you ſaid yet further, that the juſtices of the peace in the country think you very unnatural, in taking part with me before your brother, &c. Ah, maſter N. what a ſentence is this to come out of your mouth? For partaking is one thing, and miniſtering of juſtice is another thing; and a worthy miniſter of juſtice will be no partaker, but one indifferent between party and party. And did I require you to take my part, I pray you? No, I required you to adminiſter juſtice between your brother and my neighbour, without any partaking with either other. But what manner of juſtices be they, I pray you? who would ſo fain have you to take part naturally with your brother, when you ought and ſhould reform and amend your brother? as you yourſelf know, no man better. What, juſtices! No, jugglers you might more worthily call ſuch as they be, than juſtices? Be they thoſe juſtices which call you unnatural, for that you will not take your brother's part againſt all right and conſcience, whom you had picked out and appointed to have the final hearing and determining of my neighbour's cauſe, after your ſubſtantial and final award-making? Verily, I think no leſs. Forſooth he is much beholding to you, and I alſo for his ſake. Is that the wholeſome counſel that you have to give your poor neighbours in their need? Indeed you ſhew yourſelf a worthy juggler: Oh, I would have, ſaid a juſticer, among other of your juggling and partaking juſtices. O good God! what is in the world? Marry, Sir, my neighbour had ſpun a fair thread, if your partaking juſtices, through your good counſel, had had this matter in ordering and finiſhing. I pray God ſave me and all my friends, with all God's flock, from your natural and ſo partaking juſtices, Amen.

Lord God! who would have thought that there had been ſo many partaking juſtices, that is to ſay, unjuſt juſtices in Warwickſhire, if maſter N. himſelf, one of the ſame order (but altogether out of order) and therefore knoweth it beſt, had not told us the tale? But theſe call you, you ſay, very unnatural, &c. And why not rather, I pray you, too much natural? For we read of a double nature, ſound and corrupt. That was full of juſtice: this, unleſs it be reſtored, abideth always unjuſt, bringing forth the fruits of wickedneſs one after another; ſo that he that will not help his brother, having a juſt cauſe in his need, may be juſtly called unnatural, as not doing according to the inſtinct of nature, either it was at the beginning, or as it was reſtored. But he that will take his brother's part againſt right, as to ratify his brother's wrong deceiving, he is too much natural, as one following the diſpoſition and inclination of corrupt nature againſt the will of God; and ſo to be natural may ſeem to be cater-couſin, or couſin-german with, to be diabolical.

I fear we have too many juſtices that be too much natural, to their own puniſhment both body and ſoul. For worthy juſtices having ever the fear and dread of God before their eyes (of which ſort we have fewer amongſt us than I wiſh we had) will have no reſpect at all in their judgments and proceedings, to vicinity of blood, but altogether to the worth and juſtice of the cauſe, judging that to be juſt which is ſo in the ſight of God, though not of men; of which number I pray God make you one, Amen. He is juſt that doth juſtice. But he that ſinneth (as they all do which do unjuſtly for favour and pleaſure of men) is one of the devil, ſaith he, of which ſort all our partaking and natural juſtices be with all their partiality and naturality. Wherefore it would be right and juſt that as many as be ſuch juſtices, be juſtly deprived of their offices, and further alſo to be puniſhed, according to the quantity or quality of their crime, ſo that by that means they may be cut off, as men born and bred to the hurt and detriment of the commonwealth, which trouble us when they ought to help us, Amen.

Sir, Finally and laſt of all you added theſe words following: Well, quoth you, let Mr. Latimer take heed how he meddleth with my brother, for he is like to find as crabbed and as froward a piece of him, as ever he found in his life, &c. Ah, Sir, and is your brother ſuch an one as you ſpeak of indeed? Merciful God, what a commendation is this for one brother to give another? Is this your glorying, my friend? And were it not poſſible, think you, to make him better? It is written, Vexation giveth him underſtanding. And again, It is good O Lord, that thou haſt humbled me. At leaſt, I may pray to God for him as David did for ſuch like, after this ſort; Bind faſt aſſes with bridle and ſnaffle, that they approach not near unto thee. In the mean ſeaſon, I would I had never known either of you both: for ſo ſhould I have been without this inward ſorrow of my heart, to ſee ſuch untowardlineſs of you both to godlineſs: for I cannot but be heavy-hearted, to ſee ſuch men ſo wickedly minded. Well, let us ponder a little better your words, where you ſay, I ſhall find him as crabbed and as froward a piece as ever I found in my life, &c. Mark well your own words. For by the tenor of the ſame it plainly appeareth, that you confeſs your brother's cauſe wherein he ſo ſtifly ſtandeth to be unjuſt and very naught. For he that ſtandeth ſo ſtiffly in a good quarrel and a juſt cauſe, as many good men have done, is called a faſt man, a conſtant, a truſty man. But he that is ſo obſtinate and untractable in wickedneſs and wrong doing, is commonly called a crabbed and froward piece, as you name your brother to be.

Wherefore knowing ſo well your brother's cauſe to be ſo naughty, why have you not endeavoured yourſelf, as a worthy juſtice, to reform him accordingly, as I required you, and you promiſed me to do, now almoſt twelve months ago. In ſhort Mr. N. if you will not come off ſhortly, and apply yourſelf thereunto more effectually hereafter than you have heretofore, be you well aſſured thereof, I ſhall detect you to all the friends that I have in England both high and low, as well his crabbedneſs and forwardneſs, as your colourable ſupport of the ſame: that I may truſt I ſhall be able thereby either to bring you both to ſome goodneſs, or at leaſt I ſhall ſo warn my friends and all honeſt hearts to beware of your wickedneſs, that they ſhall either take no hurt at all, or at leaſt leſs harm by you thro' my advertiſement; in that knowing you perfectly, they may the better avoid and ſhun your company. You ſhall not hinder me, Mr. N. no though you would give me all the lands and goods you have, as rich as you are noted to be. I will not forſake ſuch a juſt cauſe, neither will I communicate with other men's ſins. For whether it be by deteſtable pride; whether whether by abominable avarice: or by both linked together, it is no ſmall iniquity to keep any poor man ſo long from his right and duty ſo ſtiff-neckedly and obſtinately, or, whether ye will, crabbedly and frowardly. And what is it then any, manner of ways, to conſent to the ſame? You know, I ſuppoſe, Mr. N. what theft is, that is, to take or detain by any manner of way another man's goods againſt his will that is the owner, as ſome define it. If he be a thief that ſo doth openly, what ſhall he be that approveth him which is the doer, defendeth, maintaineth, and ſupporteth him by any manner of colour? Conſider with yourſelf, good Mr. N. what it is to oppreſs, and to defraud your brother in his buſineſs, and what followeth thereof. It is truly ſaid, the ſin is not forgiven, except the thing be reſtored again that is taken away. No reſtitution, no ſalvation; which is as well to be underſtood of things gotten by fraud, guile and deceit, as of things gotten by open theft and robbery. Wherefore let not your brother, Mr. N. by cavillation continue in the devil's poſſeſſion. I will do the beſt I can, and wreſtle with the devil with all my ſtrength, to deliver you both from him. I will leave no one ſtone unmoved to have both you and your brother ſaved. There is neither archbiſhop nor biſhop, nor yet any learned man neither in univerſities or elſewhere that I am acquainted withal, that ſhall not write unto you, and in their writing, by their learning, confute you. There is no godly man of law in this realm that I am acquainted withal, but they ſhall write unto you, and conſute you by the law. There is neither lord nor lady, nor yet any noble perſonage in this realm, that I am acquainted withal, but they ſhall write unto you, and goldly threaten you with their authority.

I will do all this; yea, and kneel upon both my knees before the king's majeſty, and all his honourable council, with moſt humble petition for your reformation, rather than the devil ſhall poſſeſs you ſtill, to your final damnation. So that I do not deſpair, but verily truſt one way or other, to pluck both you and alſo your crabbed brother, as crabbed as you ſay he is, out of the devil's claws, in ſpite of the devil's heart.

Theſe premiſes well conſidered, look upon it good maſter N. that we have no further ado: God's plague is preſently upon us; therefore let us now diligently look about us, and no wiſe defend, but willingly acknowledge and amend whatſoever hath been amiſs. Theſe were the capital points of your talk, as I was informed, after you had peruſed that my nipping and unpleaſant letter? And I thought good to make you ſome anſwer to them, if perchance I might ſo move you, rather to call yourſelf to ſome better remembrance, and ſo more earneſtly apply yourſelf to accompliſh and perform what you have begun and promiſed to do, namely, the thing itſelf, being of ſuch ſort, as apparently tendeth both to your worſhip, and alſo to God's high pleaſure.

Thus, lo, with a mad head, but yet a good will, after long ſcribbling I know not well what (but I know you can read it, and comprehend it well enough) I bid you moſt heartily well to fare in the Lord, with good health, and long life to God's pleaſure.

From Baxterly, June 15.

During the time that the ſaid Mr. Latimer was priſoner at Oxford, we read not of much that he did write, beſides his conference with Dr. Ridley, and his proteſtation at the time of his diſputation. Otherwiſe, of letters we find very few or none that he wrote to his friends abroad, ſave only theſe few lines, which he ſent to one Mrs. Wilkinſon, of London, a pious woman, and afterwards an exile for the goſpel's ſake. Who ſo long as ſhe remained in England, was a ſingular patroneſs to the good ſaints of God, and learned biſhops, as to biſhop Hooper, to the biſhop of Hereford, to Mr. Coverdale, Mr. Latimer, Dr. Cranmer, with many others. The copy and effect of which his letter to Mrs. Wilkinſon here followeth.

A Letter from Mr. Hugh Latimer to Mrs. Wilkinſon, Widow, in London.

IF the gift of a pot of water ſhall not be in oblivion with God, how can God forget your manifold and bountiful gifts, when he ſhall ſay to you: I was in priſon, and you viſited me? God grant us all to do and ſuffer while we be here as may be to his will and pleaſure, Amen,

Yours, in Bocardo.
Hugh Latimer.

Touching the memorable actions of this worthy man, among many others this is not to be neglected, what a bold enterprize he attempted, in ſending to king Henry a preſent, the manner whereof is this. There was then, and remaineth ſtill an old cuſtom received from the old Romans, that upon New-years day, being the firſt day of January, every biſhop with ſome handſome new-years gift ſhould gratify the king; and ſo they did; ſome with gold, ſome with ſilver, ſome with a purſe full of money, and ſome one thing and ſome another: but Mr. Latimer, being then biſhop of Worceſter, among the reſt, preſented a New Teſtament for his new-years gift, with a napkin having this poſey about it, Fornicators and adulterers God will judge.

And thus haſt thou, gentle reader, the whole life, both of Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer, two worthy fathers in the church of Chriſt, with their writings, diſputations, ſufferings, their painful travels, and faithful preachings, ſtudious ſervice in Chriſt's church, their patient impriſonment, and conſtant fortitude in that which they had taught, with all their proceedings from time to time, ſince their firſt ſpringing years to this preſent month of queen Mary, being the month of October, Anno. 1555. In which month they were brought forth together, to their final examination and execution. Wherefore as we have heretofore declared both their lives ſeverally and diſtinctly one from another; ſo now jointly to couple them both together, as they were both together joined in one ſociety of cauſe of martyrdom, we will, by the grace of Chriſt, proſecute the reſt that remaineth concerning their laſt examination, degrading, and conſtant ſuffering, with the order and manner alſo of the commiſſioners; and what were their words, their objections, their orations there uſed; what again were the anſwers of theſe men to the ſame, as in the proceſs here followeth to be ſeen.

The Order and Manner of the Examination of Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer in September 1555.

FIRST, after the appearing of Thomas Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury before the pope's delegate, and the queen's commiſſioners in St. Mary's church at Oxford, about the 12th of September, whereof more ſhall be ſaid (by God's grace) when we come to the death of the ſaid archbiſhop; ſhortly after, on the 28th of the ſaid month, another commiſſion was ſent down to Oxford from cardinal Poole, to John White biſhop of Lincoln, Dr. Brooks biſhop of Glouceſter, and Dr. Holyman biſhop of Briſtol. The contents and virtue of which commiſſion was, that the ſaid biſhops of Lincoln, Glouceſter, and Briſtol, or two of them, ſhould have full power and authority to cite, examine and judge Mr. Hugh Latimer and Dr. Ridley, for divers and ſundry erroneous opinions, which the ſaid Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley did hold and maintain in open diſputations had in Oxford, in the months of May, June and July, in the year 1554, as long before in the time of perdition, and ſince. Which opinions, if the named perſons would now recant, giving and yielding themſelves to the determination of the univerſal and catholic church planted by Peter in the bleſſed ſee of Rome, that then deputed judges, by the ſaid authority of their commiſſion, ſhould have power to receive the ſaid penitent perſons, and forthwith adminiſter unto them the reconciliation of the holy father the pope; but if the ſaid Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley would ſtoutly and ſtubbornly defend and maintain theſe their erroneous opinions and aſſertions, that then the ſaid lords by their commiſſion ſhould proceed in form of judgment, according to the law of heretics; that is, degrading them from their promotion and dignity of biſhops, prieſts, and all other eccleſiaſtical orders, ſhould pronounce them as heretics, and therefore clean cut them off from the church, and ſo yield them to receive puniſhments due to all ſuch hereſy and ſchiſm.

Wherefore the laſt of September the ſaid two perſons, Nicholas Ridley and Hugh Latimer, were cited to appear before the ſaid lords in the divinity-ſchool at Oxford, at eight of the clock. At which time the lords repaired thither, placing themſelves in the high ſeat made for public lectures and diſputations, according to the uſage of that ſchool, being then fair ſet and trimmed with cloth of tiſſue, and cuſhions of velvet: And after the ſaid lords were placed and ſet, the ſaid Latimer and Ridley were ſent for. And firſt Dr. Ridley appeared, and by and by Mr. Latimer. But becauſe it ſeemed good ſeverally to examine them, Mr. Latimer was kept back until Dr. Ridley was throughly examined. Therefore ſoon after the coming of Dr. Ridley into the ſchool, the commiſſion was publiſhed by an appointed notary, and openly read. But Dr. Ridley ſtanding bareheaded, humbly expecting the cauſe of that his appearance, as ſoon as he had heard the cardinal named, and the pope's holineſs, put on his cap. Wherefore after the commiſſion was publiſhed, the biſhop of Lincoln ſpake as followeth.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, although neither I, neither my lords here, in reſpect of our own perſons, do look for cap or knee, yet becauſe we bear and repreſent ſuch perſons as we do, that is, my lord cardinal's grace, legate a latere to the pope's holineſs, as well in that he is of a noble parentage [and there Dr. Ridley moved his cap with lowly obeiſance] deſcending from the royal blood, as in that he is a man worthy to be reverenced with all humility, for his great knowledge and learning, noble virtues and godly life, and eſpecially in that he is here in England deputy to the pope's holineſs, it ſhould have becomed you at this name to have uncovered your head. Wherefore except you will of your ownſelf take the pains to put your hand to your head, and at the nomination, as well of the ſaid cardinal, as of the pope's holineſs, uncover the ſame, leſt that this your contumacy, exhibited now before us, ſhould be prejudicial to the ſaid moſt reverend perſons, (which thing we may in no caſe ſuffer) you ſhall cauſe us to take the pains to oblige ſome man to pluck off your cap from you. To whom Dr. Ridley [deſiring licence] anſwered:

Ridley. As touching what you ſaid, my lord, that you of your own perſons deſire no cap or knee, but only require the ſame in conſideration that you repreſent the cardinal's grace's perſon, I do you to wit, and thereupon make my proteſtation, that I did put on my cap at the naming of the cardinal's grace, neither for any contumacy that I bear towards your own perſons, neither for any derogation of honour toward the lord cardinal's grace. For I know him to be a man worthy of all humility, reverence, and honour, in that he came of the moſt regal blood, and in that he is a man indued with manifold graces of learning and virtue, and as touching theſe virtues and points, I with all humility [therewith he put off his cap, and bowed his knee] and obeiſance that I may, will reverence and honour his grace; but in that he is legate to the biſhop of Rome [and therewith put on his cap] whoſe uſurped ſupremacy and abuſed authority I utterly refuſe and renounce, I may in no wiſe give any obeiſance or honour unto him, leſt that my ſo doing might be prejudicial to mine oath, and derogation to the verity of God's word: and therefore that I might not only by confeſſion profeſs the verity in not reverencing the renounced authority, contrary to God's word, but alſo in geſture, in beheavour, and all my doings expreſs the ſame, I have put on my cap, and for this conſideration only; and not for any contumacy to your lordſhips, neither contempt of this worſhipful audience, neither derogation of any honour due to the cardinal's grace, both for his noble parentage, and alſo his excellent qualities, I have kept on my cap.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, you excuſe yourſelf of that which we preſſed you not, in that you proteſt you keep on your cap, neither for the contumacy towards us (who look for no ſuch homage from you) neither for any contempt to this audience; which although juſtly they may, yet (as I ſuppoſe) in this caſe do not require any ſuch obeiſance of you; neither in derogation of any honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, for his regal deſcent [at which word Dr. Ridley moved his cap] and excellent qualities; for although in all the premiſes honour be due, yet in theſe reſpects we require none of you, but only in that my lord cardinal's grace is here in England, deputy of the pope's holineſs [at which word the lords and others put off their caps, and Dr. Ridley put on his] and therefore we ſay unto you the ſecond time, that except you take the pains yourſelf, to put your hand to your head, and put off your cap, you ſhall put us to the pains to cauſe ſome man to take it from you, except you alledge ſome infirmity and ſickneſs, or other more reaſonable cauſe, upon the conſideration whereof we may do as we think good.

Ridley. The premiſes I ſaid only for this end, that it might as well appear to your lordſhips, as to this worſhipful audience, why and for what conſideration I uſed ſuch kind of behaviour, in not humbling myſelf to your lordſhips with cap and knee: and as for my ſickneſs, I thank my Lord God, that I am as well at eaſe as I have been this long time; and therefore I do not pretend that which is not, but only this, that it might appear by this my behaviour that I acknowledge in no point that uſurped ſupremacy of Rome, and therefore contemn and utterly deſpiſe all authority coming from him. In taking off my cap, do as it ſhall pleaſe your lordſhip, and I ſhall be content.

Then the biſhop of Lincoln, after the third admonition, commanded one of the beadles (that is an officer of the univerſity) to pluck his cap from his head; Dr. Ridley, bowing his head to the officer, gently permitted him to take it away.

After this the biſhop of Lincoln in a long oration exhorted Dr. Ridley to recant, and ſubmit himſelf to the univerſal faith of Chriſt, in this manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, I am ſure you have ſufficiently pondered with yourſelf the effect of this our commiſſion with good advice, conſidering both points thereof, how that authority is given to us, if you ſhall receive the true doctrine of the church, which firſt was founded by Peter at Rome immediately after the death of Chriſt, and from him by lineal ſucceſſion hath been brought to this our time, if you will be content to renounce your former errors, recant your heretical and ſeditious opinions, content to yield yourſelf to the undoubted faith and truth of the goſpel, received and always taught by the catholic and apoſtolic church, which the king and queen, all the nobles of this realm, and commons of the ſame, all chriſtian people have and do confeſs, you only ſtanding alone by yourſelf: You underſtand and perceive, I am ſure, that authority is given us to receive you, to reconcile you, and upon due penance to join and aſſociate you again into the number of the catholics and Chriſt's church, from which you have ſo long ſtrayed, without which no man can be ſaved, which thing I and my lords here, here, yea and all, as well nobles and commons of this realm, moſt heartily deſire, and I for my part [here he put off his cap] moſt earneſtly exhort you to do.

Remember, Mr. Ridley, it is no ſtrange country whither I exhort you to return. You were once one of us, you have taken degrees in the ſchool. You were made a prieſt, and became a preacher, ſetting forth the ſame doctrine which we do now. You were made biſhop according to our laws: and to be ſhort, it is not ſo long ago ſince you ſeparated yourſelf from us, and in the time of hereſy became a ſetter-forth of that deviliſh and ſeditious doctrine which in theſe latter days was preached amongſt us. For at what time the new doctrine of only faith began to ſpring, the council willing to win my lord chancellor, ſent you to him (I then being in my lord's houſe unknown as I ſuppoſe to you) and after you had talked with my lord ſecretly, and were departed, immediately my lord declared certain points of your talk, and means of your perſuaſion, and amongſt others this was one, that you ſhould ſay, Tuſh, my lord, this matter of juſtification is but a trifle, let us not ſtick to condeſcend herein to them; but for God's love, my lord, ſtand ſtoutly in the verity of the ſacrament: for I ſee they will aſſault that alſo. If this be true (as my lord is a man credible enough in ſuch a matter) hereby it is declared of what mind you were then, as touching the truth of the moſt bleſſed ſacrament.

Alſo in a ſermon of yours at Paul's Croſs, you as effectually and as catholicly ſpake of that bleſſed ſacrament, as any man might have done, whereby it appeareth that it is no ſtrange thing, nor unknown place whereunto I exhort you. I wiſh you to return thither from whence you came: that is, with us to acknowledge the church of God, wherein no man may err, to acknowledge the ſupremacy of our moſt reverend father in God, the pope's holineſs, which (as I ſaid) lineally taketh his deſcent from Peter, upon whom Chriſt promiſeth before his death, to build his church; which ſupremacy or prerogative, the moſt ancient fathers in all ages, in all times did acknowledge: [and here he brought a place or two out of the doctors, but eſpecially ſtaid upon a place of St. Auguſtine, who writeth in this manner: All the chriſtian countries beyond the ſea are ſubject to the church of Rome. Here you ſee, Mr. Ridley, that all Chriſtendom is ſubject to the church of Rome.] What ſhould hinder you therefore to confeſs the ſame, as St. Auguſtine and other fathers?

Then Dr. Ridley deſired his patience to ſuffer him to ſpeak ſomewhat of the premiſes, leſt the multitude of things might confound his memory: and having leave granted him, he ſaid in this manner:

Ridley. My lord, I moſt heartily thank your lordſhip, as well for your gentleneſs, as alſo for your ſobriety in talk, and for your good and favourable zeal in this learned exhortation, in which I have marked eſpecially three points, which you uſed to perſuade me to leave my doctrine and religion, which I perfectly know and am thoroughly perſuaded to be grounded not upon man's imagination and decrees, but upon the infallible truth of Chriſt's goſpel, and not to look back and to return to the Romiſh ſee, contrary to mine oath, contrary to the prerogative and crown of this realm, and eſpecially (which moveth me moſt) contrary to the expreſſed word of God.

The firſt point is this, That the ſee of Rome taking his beginning from Peter, upon whom you ſay Chriſt hath built his church, hath in all ages lineally, from biſhop to biſhop, been brought to this time.

Secondly, That even the holy fathers from time to time have confeſſed the ſame.

Thirdly, That in that I was once of the ſame opinion, and together with you I did acknowledge the ſame.

Firſt, As touching the ſaying of Chriſt, from whence your lordſhip gathereth the foundation of the church upon Peter, truly the place is not to be underſtood as you take it, as the circumſtance of the place will declare. For after that Chriſt had aſked his diſciples whom men judged him to be, and they had anſwered, that ſome had ſaid he was a prophet, ſome Elias, ſome one thing, ſome another, then he ſaid, Whom ſay ye that I am? Then Peter ſaid, I ſay that thou art Chriſt the Son of God. To whom Chriſt anſwered, I ſay, Thou art Peter, and upon this ſtone I will build my church; that is to ſay, Upon this ſtone, not meaning Peter himſelf, as though he would have conſtituted a mortal man, ſo frail and brittle a foundation of his ſtable and infallible church; but upon this rock-ſtone, that is, this confeſſion of thine, that I am the Son of God, I will build my church. For this is the foundation and beginning of all chriſtianity, with word, heart and mind, to confeſs that Chriſt is the Son of God. Whoſoever believeth not this, Chriſt is not in him; and he cannot have the mark of Chriſt printed in his forehead, which confeſſeth not that Chriſt is the Son of God.

Therefore Chriſt ſaid unto Peter, that upon this rock, that is, upon this his confeſſion, that he was Chriſt the Son of God, he would build his church; to declare, that without this faith no man can come to Chriſt; ſo that this belief, that Chriſt is the Son of God, is the foundation of our chriſtianity, and ſupport of our church. Here you ſee upon what foundation Chriſt's church is built, not upon the frailty of man, but upon the ſtable and infallible word of God.

Now as touching the lineal deſcent of the biſhops in the ſee of Rome, true it is, that the patriarchs of Rome in the apoſtles time, and long after, were great maintainers and ſetters forth of Chriſt's glory, in which above all other countries and regions, there eſpecially was preached the true goſpel, the ſacraments were moſt duly adminiſtered; and as before Chriſt's coming it was a city ſo valiant in power, and martial affairs, that all the world was in a manner ſubject to it, and after Chriſt's paſſion divers of the apoſtles there ſuffered perſecution for the goſpel's ſake: ſo after that the emperors, their hearts being illuminated, received the goſpel, and became chriſtians, the goſpel there, as well for the great power and dominion, as for the fame of the place, flouriſhed moſt, whereby the biſhops of that place were had in more reverence and honour, moſt eſteemed in all councils and aſſemblies, not becauſe they acknowledged them to be their head, but becauſe the place was moſt reverenced and ſpoken of, for the great power and ſtrength of the ſame. As now here in England, the biſhop of Lincoln in ſeſſions and ſitings hath the preeminence of the other biſhops, not that he is the head and ruler of them; but for the dignity of the biſhopric [and therewith the people ſmiled.] Wherefore the doctors in their writings have ſpoken moſt reverently of this ſee of Rome, and in their writings prefered it; and this is the prerogative which your lordſhip did rehearſe the ancient doctors to give to the ſee of Rome.

Semblably, I cannot, nor dare not but commend, reverence, and honour the ſee of Rome, as long as it continued in the promotion and ſetting forth of God's glory and in due preaching of the goſpel, as it did many years after Chriſt. But after that the biſhops of that ſee, ſeeking their own pride, and not God's honour, began to ſet themſelves above kings and emperors, challenging to them the title of God's vicars, the dominion and ſupremacy over all the world, I cannot but with St. Gregory, a biſhop of Rome alſo, confeſs that the biſhop of that place is the very true Antichriſt, whereof St. John ſpeaketh by the name of the whore of Babylon; and ſay with the ſaid St. Gregory, He that maketh himſelf a biſhop over all the world, is worſe than Antichriſt.

Now whereas you ſay St. Auguſtine ſhould ſeem not only to give ſuch a prerogative, but alſo ſupremacy to the ſee of Rome, in that he ſaith all the chriſtian world is ſubject to the church of Rome, and therefore ſhould give to that ſee a certain kind of ſubjection: I am ſure that your lordſhip knoweth, that in St. Auſtin's time there were four patriarchs, of Alexandria, Conſtantinople, Antioch, and Rome, which patriarchs had under them certain countries; as in England the archbiſhop of Canterbury hath under him divers biſhoprics in England and Wales, to whom he may be ſaid to be their patriarch. Alſo your lordſhip knoweth right well, that at what time St. Auſtin wrote that book, he was biſhop in Africa. Further, you are not ignorant, that between Europe and Africa lieth the ſea called the Mediterranean Sea, ſo that all the countries in Europe to him which is in Africa, may be called countries beyond the ſea. Hereof St. Auſtin ſaith, All the chriſtian countries beyond the ſeas and remote regions, are ſubject to the ſee of Rome. If I ſhould ſay all countries beyond the ſea, I do except England, which to me now being in England, is not beyond the ſea. In this ſenſe St. Auſtin ſaith, All the countries beyond the ſea are ſubject to the ſee of Rome; declaring thereby that Rome was one of the ſees of the four patriarchs, and under it Europe, by what ſubjection I pray you? Only for a pre-eminence; as we here in England ſay, that all the biſhoprics in England are ſubject to the archbiſhoprics of Canterbury and York.

For this preeminence alſo the other doctors (as you recited) ſay, that Rome is the mother of churches, as the biſhopric of Lincoln is mother to the biſhopric of Oxford, becauſe the biſhopric of Oxford came from the biſhopric of Lincoln, and they were once both one; and ſo is the archbiſhopric of Canterbury mother to the other biſhoprics which are in her province. In like manner the archbiſhop of York is mother to the North biſhoprics; and yet no man will ſay, that Lincoln, Canterbury, or York, is ſupreme head to other biſhoprics; neither then ought we to confeſs the ſee of Rome to be the ſupreme head, becauſe the doctors in their writings confeſs the ſee of Rome to be mother of churches.

Now where you ſay, I was once of the ſame religion which you are of, the truth is I cannot but confeſs the ſame. Yet ſo was St. Paul a perſecutor of Chriſt. But in that you ſay, that I was one of you not long ago, in that I, doing my meſſage to my lord of Wincheſter, ſhould deſire him to ſtand ſtout in that groſs opinion of the ſupper of the Lord; in very deed I was ſent (as your lordſhip ſaid) from the council to my lord of Wincheſter, to exhort him to receive alſo the true confeſſion of juſtification: and becauſe he was very refractory, I ſaid to him, Why, my lord, what make you ſo great a matter herein? You ſee many anabaptiſts riſe againſt the ſacrament of the altar; I pray you, my lord, be diligent in confounding of them: for at that time my lord of Wincheſter and I had to do with two anabaptiſts in Kent. In this ſenſe I willed my lord to be ſtiff in the defence of the ſacrament againſt the deteſtable errors of anabaptiſts, and not in the confirmation of that groſs and carnal opinion now maintained.

In like ſort as touching the ſermon which I made at Paul's Croſs, you ſhall underſtand that there were at Paul's, and divers other places, fixed railing bills againſt the ſacrament, terming it Jack of the Box, The ſacrament of the Halter, Round Robbin, with ſuch unſeemly terms; for which cauſes, I to rebuke the unreverend behaviour of certain evil-diſpoſed perſons, preaching as reverendly of that matter as I might, declaring what eſtimation and reverence ought to be given to it, what danger enſued the miſhandling thereof, affirming in that ſacrament to be truly and verily the body and blood of Chriſt, effectually by grace and ſpirit: which words the unlearned underſtanding not, ſuppoſed that I had meant of the groſs and carnal being which the Romiſh decrees ſet forth, that a body having life and motion, ſhould be indeed under the ſhapes of bread and wine.

With that the biſhop of Lincoln, interrupting him, ſaid:

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley, thus you wreſt places to your own pleaſure; for whereas St. Auguſtine ſaith, That the whole chriſtian world is ſubject to the ſee of Rome without any limitation, and uſed theſe words, Beyond the ſeas, and remote regions, only to expreſs the latitude of the dominion of the ſee of Rome, willing thereby to declare that all the world, yea countries far diſtant from Rome, yet nevertheleſs are ſubject to that ſee, yet you would wreſt it, and leave it only to Europe. I am ſure you will not deny, but all the countries is more than Europe.

Ridley. Indeed, my lord, if St. Auguſtine had ſaid ſimply, All the countries, and not added, Beyond the ſeas, it had been without limitation; but in that he ſaid, All the countries beyond the ſeas, he himſelf doth limit the univerſal propoſition, declaring how far he meant by All the countries.

The biſhop, not ſtaying for his anſwer, proceeded, ſaying:

Lincoln. Well, if I ſhould ſtay upon this place, I could bring many more places of the fathers for the confirmation thereof; but we have certain inſtructions, according to which we muſt proceed, and came not hither to diſpute the matter with you, but only to take your anſwers to certain articles, and uſed this in the way of diſputation, in which you interrupted me; wherefore I will return thither again.

Ye muſt conſider that the church of Chriſt lieth not hid, but is a city on the mountain, and a candle on the candleſtick. Ponder with yourſelf, that the church of Chriſt is catholic, and univerſally ſpread throughout the world, not contained in the alligation of places, not comprehended in the circuit of England, not contained in the compaſs of Germany and Saxony, as your church is.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, for God's love, be ye not ſingular; acknowledge with all the realm the truth, it ſhall not be (as you alledge) prejudicial to the crown; for the king and queen their majeſties have renounced that uſurped power taken of their predeceſſors, and juſtly have renounced it. For I am ſure you know there are two powers, the one declared by the ſword, the other by the keys. The ſword is given to kings and rulers of countries; the keys were delivered by Chriſt to Peter, and of him left to all the ſucceſſors. As touching our goods, poſſeſſions, and lives, we with you acknowledge us ſubjects to the king and queen, who hath the temporal ſword; but as concerning matters of religion, as touching God's quarrel and his word, we acknowledge another head: and as the king and the queen their highneſs do in all worldly affairs juſtly challenge the prerogative and primacy, ſo in ſpiritual and eccleſiaſtical matters they acknowledge themſelves not to be heads and rulers, but members of Chriſt's body. Why therefore ſhould you ſtick at that matter, which their majeſties have forſaken, and yielded.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, you ſhall not only not do injury to the crown, and be prejudicial to their majeſties honour, in acknowledging with all Chriſtendom the pope's holineſs to be ſupreme head of Chriſt's church militant here on earth, but do a thing moſt agreeable to them, and moſt deſired of his holineſs. Thus if ye will do, revoking together all your errors, acknowledging, with the reſidue of the realm, the common and public fault, you will do what all men moſt heartily deſire; you will bring quietneſs to your conſcience, and health to your ſoul; then ſhall we with great joy, by the authority committed to us from the cardinal's grace, receive you into the church again, acknowledging you to be no longer a rotten, but a lively member of the ſame; but if you ſhall ſtill obſtinately perſevere in your errors, ſtubbornly maintaining your former hereſies, then we muſt, againſt our will, according to our commiſſion, ſeparate you from us, and cut you off from the church, leſt the rottenneſs of one part, in proceſs of time, putrify and corrupt the whole body, then muſt we confeſs and publiſh you to be none of ours; then muſt we yield you up to the temporal judges, of whom, except it otherwiſe pleaſe the king and queen's highneſs, you muſt receive puniſhment by the laws of this realm, due for heretics.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, conſider your ſtate, remember your former degrees, ſpare your body, eſpecially conſider your ſoul, which Chriſt ſo dearly bought with his precious blood; do not you raſhly caſt away that which was precious in God's ſight; enforce not us to do all that we may do, which is only to publiſh you to be none of us, to cut you off from the church: we do not, and cannot condemn you to die (as moſt untruly hath been reported of us) but that is the office of the temporal judges; we only declare you to be none of the church, and then you muſt, according to the tenor of them, and pleaſure of the rulers, abide their determination, ſo that we, after we have given you up to the temporal rulers, have no further to do with you.

But I truſt, Mr. Ridley, we ſhall not have occaſion to do what we may. I truſt you will ſuffer us to reſt in that point of our commiſſion, which we moſt heartily deſire, that is, upon recantation and repentance to receive you, to reconcile you, and again to adjoin you to the unity of the church.

Then Dr. Ridley, with often interruption, at length ſpake.

Ridley. My lord, I acknowledge an unſpotted church of Chriſt, in which no man can err, without which no man can be ſaved, which is ſpread throughout all the world, that is, the congregation of the faithful; neither do I alligate or bind the ſame to any one place, as you ſaid, but confeſs the ſame to be ſpread throughout all the world; and where Chriſt's ſacraments are duly adminiſtered, his goſpel truly preached and followed, there doth Chriſt's church ſhine as a city upon an hill, and as a candle in the candleſtick: but rather it is ſuch as you that would have the church of Chriſt bound to a place, who appoint the ſame to Rome, that there and no where elſe is the foundation of Chriſt's church. But I am fully perſuaded that Chriſt's church is every where founded, in every place where his goſpel is truly received, and effectually followed. And in that the church of God is in doubt, I uſe herein the wiſe counſel of Vincentius Lyrienſis, whom I am ſure you will allow, who giving precepts how the catholic church may be in all ſchiſms and hereſies known, writeth in this manner: When (ſaith he) one part is corrupted with hereſies, then prefer the whole world before that one part; but if the greateſt part be infected, then prefer antiquity.

In like manner now when I perceive the greateſt part of chriſtianity to be infected with the poiſon of the ſee of Rome, I repair to the uſage of the primitive church, which I find clean contrary to the pope's decrees; as in that the prieſt receiveth alone, that it is made unlawful to the laity to receive in both kinds, and ſuch like: wherefore it requireth, that I prefer the antiquity of the primitive church, before the novelty of the Romiſh church.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, theſe faults which you charge the ſee of Rome withal, are indeed no faults. For firſt it was never forbid the laity, but that they might, if they demanded, receive under both kinds. You know alſo, that Chriſt after his reſurrection, at what time he went with his apoſtles to Galilee, opened himſelf by breaking of bread. You know that St. Paul, after his long ſailing towards Rome, brake bread, and that the apoſtles came together in breaking of bread, which declareth that it is not unlawful to adminiſter the ſacrament under the form of bread only: and yet the church had juſt occaſion to decree, that the laity ſhould receive in one kind only, thereby to take away an opinion of the unlearned, that Chriſt was not wholly both fleſh and blood under the form of bread. Therefore to take away their opinion, and to eſtabliſh better the people's faith, the Holy Ghoſt in the church thought fit to decree, that the laity ſhould receive only in one kind; and it is no news for the church upon juſt conſideration to alter rites and ceremonies. For you read in the Acts of the apoſtles, that St. Paul writing to certain of the Gentiles, who had received the goſpel, biddeth them to abſtain from things ſtifled, and from blood; ſo that this ſeemeth to be an expreſs commandment; yet who will ſay but that it is lawful to eat bloodings? How is it lawful but by the permiſſion of the church?

Ridley. My lord, ſuch things as St. Paul enjoined to the Gentiles for a ſufferance, by a little and little to win the Jews to Chriſt, were only commandments of time, and reſpected not the ſucceſſors: but Chriſt's commandment, Do this (that is, that which he did in remembrance, which was not to adminiſter in one kind only) was not a commandment for a time, but to perſevere to the world's end.

But the biſhop of Lincoln, not attending to this anſwer, without any ſtay proceeded in this oration.

So that the church ſeemeth to have authority by the Holy Ghoſt, whom Chriſt ſaid he would ſend after his aſcenſion, which ſhould teach the apoſtles all truth, to have power and juriſdiction to alter ſuch points of the ſcripture, ever reſerving the foundation: but we came not, as I ſaid before, in this ſort to reaſon the matter with you, but have certain inſtructions miniſtered unto us, according to the tenor of which we muſt proceed, purpoſing certain articles, unto which we require your anſwer directly, either affirmatively, or negatively, to every of them, either denying them or granting them without farther diſputations or reaſoning; for we have already ſtretched our inſtructions, in that we ſuffered you to debate and reaſon the matter, in ſuch ſort as we have done: which articles you ſhall hear now, and to-morrow at eight of the clock in St. Mary's church we will require and take your anſwers; and then according to the ſame proceed: and if you require a copy of them, you ſhall have it, pen, ink, and paper, alſo ſuch books as you ſhall demand, if they be to be gotten in the univerſity.

The Articles.

IN the name of God, Amen. We, John of Lincoln, James of Glouceſter, and John of Briſtol, biſhops, &c.

1. We do object to thee Nicholas Ridley, and to thee Hugh Latimer, jointly and ſeverally, firſt, that thou Nicholas Ridley in this high univerſity of Oxford, in the year 1554, in the months of April, May, June, July, or in ſome one or more of them, haſt affirmed and openly defended and maintained, and in many other times and places beſides, that the true and natural body of Chriſt, after the conſecration of the prieſt, is not really preſent in the ſacrament of the altar.

2. Item, That in the year and months aforeſaid thou haſt publicly affirmed and defended, that in the ſacrament of the altar remaineth ſtill the ſubſtance of bread and wine.

3. Item, That in the ſaid year and months thou haſt openly affirmed, and obſtinately maintained, that in the maſs is no propitiatory ſacrifice for the quick and the dead.

4. Item, That in the year, place, and months aforeſaid, theſe the foreſaid aſſertions ſolemnly had been condemned, by the ſcholaſtical cenſure of this ſchool, as heretical and contrary to the catholic faith, by the worſhipful Dr. Weſton, prolocutor then of the convocation-houſe, as alſo by other learned men of both the univerſities.

5. Item, That all and ſingular the premiſes be true, notorious, famous, and openly known by public fame, as well to them near hand, and alſo to them in diſtant places far off.

All theſe articles I thought good here to place together, that as often as hereafter rehearſal ſhall be made of any of them, the reader may have recourſe hither, and peruſe the ſame, and not to trouble the ſtory with ſeveral repetitions thereof.

Exami-

Examination upon the ſaid Articles.

AFTER theſe articles were read, the biſhops took counſel together. At laſt the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid, Theſe are the very ſame articles which you in open diſputation here in the univerſity did maintain and defend. What ſay you unto the firſt? I pray you anſwer affirmatively, or negatively.

Ridley. Why, my lord, I ſuppoſed your gentleneſs had been ſuch, that you would have given me ſpace until to-morrow, that upon good advice I might bring a determinate anſwer.

Lincoln. Yea, Mr, Ridley, I mean not that your anſwers now ſhall be prejudicial to your anſwers to-morrow. I will take your anſwers at this time, and yet notwithſtanding it ſhall be lawful to you to add, diminiſh, alter, and charge theſe anſwers to-morrow what you will.

Ridley. Indeed, in like manner at our laſt diſputations I had many things promiſed, and few performed. It was ſaid, that after diſputations I ſhould have a copy thereof, and licenſe to change mine anſwers, as I ſhould think good. It was meet alſo that I ſhould have ſeen what was written by the notaries at the time. So your lordſhip pretended great gentleneſs in giving me a time; but this gentleneſs is the ſame that Chriſt had of the high-prieſt. For you, as your lordſhip ſaith, have no power to condemn me, neither at any time to put a man to death: ſo in like ſort the high-prieſts ſaid, that it was not lawful for them to put any man to death, but committed Chriſt to Pilate, neither would ſuffer him to abſolve Chriſt, although he ſought all the means for it that he might.

Then ſpake Dr. Weſton, one of the audience, What, do you make the king Pilate?

Rid. No, Mr. Doctor, I do but compare your deeds with Caiaphas his deeds and the high-prieſts, which ſhould condemn no man to death, as ye will not, and yet would not ſuffer Pilate to abſolve and deliver Chriſt.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, we mind not but that you ſhall enjoy the benefit of anſwering to-morrow, and will take your anſwers now as now, to morrow you ſhall change, take out, add, and alter what you will. In the mean ſeaſon we require you to anſwer directly to every article, either affirmatively or negatively.

Ridley. Seeing you appoint me a time to anſwer to-morrow, and yet will take mine anſwers out of hand: firſt, I require the notaries to take and write my proteſtation, that in no point I acknowledge your authority, or admit you to be my judges, in that point you are authorized from the pope. Therefore whatſoever I ſhall ſay or do, I proteſt I neither ſay it, neither do it willingly, thereby to admit the authority of the pope; and if your lordſhip will give me leave, I will ſhew the cauſes which move me thereunto.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Ridley, we have inſtructions to the contrary. We may not ſuffer you.

Ridley. I will be ſhort; I pray your lordſhips ſuffer me to ſpeak in few words.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Ridley, we may not abuſe the hearers ears.

Ridley. Why, my lord, ſuffer me to ſpeak three words.

Lincoln. Well Mr. Ridley, to-morrow you ſhall ſpeak forty. The time is far paſt; therefore we require your anſwer determinately. What ſay you to the firſt article? and thereupon rehearſed the ſame.

Ridley. My proteſtation always ſaved, that by this mine anſwer, I do not condeſcend to your authority, in that you are legate to the pope, I anſwer thus: In a ſenſe the firſt article is true, and in a ſenſe it is falſe; for if you take really for truly, for ſpiritually by grace and efficacy, then it is true that the natural body and blood of Chriſt is in the ſacrament really and truly; but if you take theſe terms ſo groſly, that you would conclude thereby a natural body having motion, to be contained under the forms of bread and wine, really and truly, then really is not the body and blood of Chriſt in the ſacrament, no more than the Holy Ghoſt is in the element of water in our baptiſm. Becauſe this anſwer was not underſtood, the notaries knew not how to note it; wherefore the biſhop of Lincoln deſired him to anſwer affirmatively or negatively, either to grant the article, or to deny it.

Ridley. My lord, you know that where any equivocation (which is a word having two ſignifications) is, except deſtinction be given, no direct anſwer can be made; for it is one of Ariſtotle's fallacies, containing two queſtions under one, the which cannot be ſatisfied with one anſwer. For both you and I agree herein, that in the ſacrament is the very true and natural body and blood of Chriſt, even that which was born of the virgin Mary, which aſcended into heaven, which ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father, which ſhall come from thence to judge the quick and the dead, only we differ in the way and manner of being; we confeſs all one thing to be in the ſacrament, and diſſent in the manner of being there. I being fully by God's word thereunto perſuaded, confeſs Chriſt's natural body to be in the ſacrament indeed by ſpirit and grace, becauſe that whoſoever worthily receiveth that bread and wine receiveth effectually Chriſt's body, and drinketh his blood, that is, he is made effectually partaker of his paſſion; and you make a groſſer kind of being, incloſing a natural, a lively, and a moving body, under the ſhape or form of bread and wine.

Now, this difference conſidered, to the queſtion thus I anſwer that in the ſacrament of the altar is the natural body and blood of Chriſt really and truly, for ſpiritually by grace and efficacy; for ſo every worthy receiver receiveth the very true body of Chriſt; but if you mean really and indeed, ſo that thereby you would include a lively and a moveable body under the forms of bread and wine, then in that ſenſe is not Chriſt's body in the ſacrament really and indeed.

This anſwer taken and pened of the notaries, the biſhop of Lincoln propoſed the ſecond queſtion or article. To whom he anſwered:

Ridley. Always my proteſtation is reſerved, I anſwer thus: that in the ſacrament is a certain change, in that that bread, which was before common bread, is now made a lively repreſentation of Chriſt's body, and not only a figure, but effectually repreſenteth his body, that even as the mortal body was nouriſhed by that viſible bread, ſo is the internal ſoul fed with the heavenly food of Chriſt's body, which the eyes of faith ſeeth, as the bodily eyes ſeeth only bread. Such a ſacramental mutation I grant to be in the bread and wine, which truly is no ſmall change, but ſuch a change as no mortal man can make, but only that omnipotency of Chriſt's word.

Then the biſhop of Lincoln deſired him to anſwer directly, either affirmatively or negatively, without further declaration of the matter. Then he anſwered:

Ridley. That notwithſtanding the ſacramental mutation of the which he ſpake, and all the doctors confeſſed, the true ſubſtance and nature of bread and wine remaineth: with which the body is in like ſort nouriſhed, as the ſoul is by grace and ſpirit with the body of Chriſt. Even ſo in baptiſm the body is waſhed with the viſible water, and the ſoul is cleanſed from all filth by the inviſible Holy Ghoſt, and yet the water ceaſeth not to be water, but keepeth the nature of water ſtill; in like manner in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper the bread ceaſeth not to be bread.

Then the notaries pened, that he anſwered affirmatively to the ſecond article. The biſhop of Lincoln declared a difference between the ſacrament of the altar and baptiſm, becauſe that Chriſt did not ſay by the water, This is the Holy Ghoſt, as he did by the bread, This is my body.

Then

Then Dr. Ridley cited St. Auguſtine, which confered both the ſacraments one with the other: but the biſhop of Lincoln notwithſtanding, thereupon recited the third article, and required a direct anſwer. To whom Ridley ſaid:

Ridley. Chriſt as St. Paul writeth, made one perfect ſacrifice for the ſins of the whole world, neither can any man reiterate that ſacrifice of his, and yet is the communion an acceptable ſacrifice to God of praiſe and thankſgiving; but to ſay that thereby ſins are taken away (which wholly and perfectly was done by Chriſt's paſſion, of which the communion is only a memory) that is a great derogation from the merits of Chriſt's paſſion: for the ſacrament was inſtituted, that we receiving it, and thereby recognizing and remembering his paſſion, ſhould be partakers of the merits of the ſame. For otherwiſe doth this ſacrament take upon it the office of Chriſt's paſſion, whereby it might follow, that Chriſt died in vain.

The notaries pened this his anſwer to be affirmative.

Lincoln. Indeed as you alledge out of St. Paul, Chriſt made one perfect oblation for all the whole world, that is, that bloody ſacrifice upon the croſs: yet nevertheleſs he hath left this ſacrifice, but not bloody, in the remembrance of that by which ſins are forgiven; which is no derogation of Chriſt's paſſion.

Then the biſhop of Lincoln recited the fourth article. To which Dr. Ridley anſwered:

Ridley. That in ſome part the fourth was true, and in ſome part falſe; true, in that thoſe his aſſertions were condemned as hereſies, although unjuſtly: falſe, in that it was ſaid, they were condemned Scientia Scholaſtica, in that the diſputations were in ſuch ſort ordered, that it was far from any ſchool act.

This anſwer being pened by the notaries, the biſhop of Lincoln rehearſed the fifth article. To which Dr. Ridley anſwered:

Ridley. That the premiſes were in ſuch ſort true, as in theſe anſwers he had declared. Whether that all men ſpake evil of them, he knew not, in that he came not ſo much abroad to hear what every man reported.

When this anſwer was always taken by the notaries, the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid:

Lincoln. To-morrow at eight of the clock you ſhall appear before us in St. Mary's church, and then becauſe we cannot well agree upon your anſwer to the firſt (for it was long before he was underſtood) if it will pleaſe you to write your anſwer, you ſhall have pen, ink and paper, and books, ſuch as you ſhall require; but if you write any thing more than your anſwers to theſe articles, we will not receive it. So he, charging the mayor with him, declaring alſo to the mayor, that he ſhould ſuffer him to have a pen and ink, diſmiſſed Dr. Ridley, and ſent for Mr. Latimer, who being brought to the divinity-ſchool, there tarried till they called for him.

Mr. Latimer, appeareth before the Commiſſioners.

NOW after Dr. Ridley was committed to the mayor, then the biſhop of Lincoln commanded the bailiffs to bring in the other priſoner, who as ſoon as he was placed, ſaid to the lords.

Latimer. My lords, if I appear again, I pray you not to ſend for me until you be ready. For I am an old man, and it is a great hurt to mine old age to tarry ſo long gazing upon the cold walls. Then ſaid the biſhop of Lincoln:

Lincoln. Mr. Latimer, I am ſorry you are brought ſo ſoon, although it is the bailiff's fault, and not mine; but it ſhall be amended.

Then Mr. Latimer bowed his knee down to the ground, holding his hat in his hand, having a kerchief on his head, and upon it a night-cap or two, and a great cap (ſuch as townſmen uſe, with two broad flaps to button under the chin) wearing an old thread-bare Briſtow frize gown girded to his body with a penny leather girdle, at which hanged, by a long ſtring of leather, his Teſtament and his ſpectacles without a caſe, depending about his neck upon his breaſt. After this the biſhop of Lincoln began on this manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Latimer, you ſhall underſtand, that I and my lords here have a commiſſion from my lord cardinal Pool's grace, legate a lettre to this realm of England, from our moſt reverend father in God, the pope's holineſs, to examine you upon certain opinions and aſſertions of yours, which you as well here openly in diſputations in the year of our Lord 1554, as at ſundry and at divers other times did affirm, maintain, and obſtinately defend. In which commiſſion be ſpecially two points; the one which we muſt deſire you is, that if you ſhall now recant, revoke, and diſannul theſe your errors, and together with all this realm, yea, all the world confeſs the truth, we, upon due repentance on your part, ſhall receive you, reconcile you, acknowledge you no longer a ſtrayed ſheep, but adjoin you again to the unity of Chriſt's church, from which you, in the time of ſchiſm, fell. So that it is no new place to which I exhort you; I deſire you to return thither from whence you went.

Conſider, Mr. Latimer, that without the unity of the church there is no ſalvation, and in the church can be no errors. Therefore what ſhould hinder you to confeſs that which all the realm confeſſeth, to forſake that which the king and queen their majeſties have renounced, and all the realm recanted: it was a common error, and it is now of all confeſſed; it will be no more ſhame to you than it was to us all. Conſider, Mr. Latimer, that within theſe twenty years this realm alſo with all the world confeſſed one church, acknowledged in Chriſt's church an head, and by what means, and for what occaſion it cut off itſelf from the reſt of chriſtianity, and renounced that, which in all times and ages was confeſſed, it is well known, and might be now declared upon what good foundation the ſee of Rome was forſaken, ſave that we muſt ſpare them that are dead, to whom the rehearſal would be opprobrious: it is no uſurped power, as it hath been termed, but founded upon Peter by Chriſt, a ſure foundation, a perfect builder, as by divers places, as well of the ancient fathers, as by the expreſs word of God may be proved.

With that Mr. Latimer, who before leaned his head on his hand, began to remove his cap and kerchief from his ears. The biſhop proceeded, ſaying,

For Chriſt ſpake expreſly to Peter, ſaying, Feed my ſheep, and rule my ſheep, which word doth not only declare a certain ruling of Chriſt's flock, but includeth alſo a certain pre-eminence and government; and therefore is the king called a King from ruling: ſo that in ſaying Rule, Chriſt declared a power which he gave to Peter, which juriſdiction and power Peter by hand delivered to Clement, and ſo in all ages hath it remained in the ſee of Rome. This, if you ſhall confeſs with us, and acknowledge with all the realm your errors and falſe aſſertions, then will you do what we moſt deſire, then ſhall we reſt upon the firſt part of our commiſſion, then ſhall we receive you, acknowledge you one of the church, and according to the authority given unto us, miniſter unto you, upon due repentance, the benefit of abſolution, to which the king and queen their majeſties were not aſhamed to ſubmit themſelves, although they of themſelves were unſpotted, and needed no reconciliation, yet leſt the putrifaction and rottenneſs of all the body might be noiſome, and do damage to the head alſo, they (as I ſaid) moſt humbly ſubmitted themſelves to my lord cardinal's grace, by him, as a legate to the pope's holineſs, to be partakers of the reconciliation. But if you ſhall ſtubbornly perſevere in your blindneſs, if you will not acknowledge your errors, if you, as you now ſtand alone, will be ſingular in your opinions, if by ſchiſm and hereſy you will divide yourſelf from your church, then muſt we proceed to the ſecond part of the commiſſion, which we would be loth to do, that is, not to condemn you, for that we cannot do (that the temporal ſword of the realm, and not we, will do) but to ſeparate you from us, acknowledge you to be none of us, to renounce you as no member of the church, to declare that you are the ſon of perdition, a loſt child, and as you are a rotten member of the church, ſo to cut you off from the church, and ſo to commit you to the temporal judges, permitting them to proceed againſt you, according to the tenor of their laws.

Therefore, Mr. Latimer, for God's love conſider your eſtate, remember you are a learned man, you have taken degrees in the ſchools, borne the office of a biſhop; remember you are an old man, ſpare your body, accelerate not your death, and eſpecially remember your ſoul's health, and the peace of your conſcience; conſider that if you ſhould die in this ſtate, you ſhall be a ſtinking ſacrifice to God; for it is the cauſe that maketh the martyr, and not the death: conſider that if you die in this ſtate, you die without grace, for without the church can be no ſalvation. Let not vain-glory have the upper hand, humble yourſelf, captivate your underſtanding, ſubdue your reaſon, ſubmit yourſelf to the determination of the church; do not force us to do all that we may do, let us reſt in that part which we moſt heartily deſire, and I, for my part [then the biſhop put off his cap] again with all my heart exhort you.

After the biſhop had ſomewhat pauſed, then Mr. Latimer lift up his head (for before he leaned on his elbow) and aſked whether his lordſhip had done ſpeaking; and the biſhop anſwered, Yea.

Latimer. Then will your lordſhip give me leave to ſpeak a word or two?

Lincoln. Yea, Mr. Latimer, ſo that you uſe a modeſt kind of talk, without railing or taunts.

Latimer. I beſeech your lordſhip, licence me to ſit down.

Lincoln. At your pleaſure, Mr. Latimer, take as much eaſe as you will.

Latimer. Your lordſhip gently exhorted me in many words to come to the unity of the church. I confeſs (my lord) a catholic church ſpread throughout all the world, in which no man may err, without which unity of the church no man can be ſaved; but I know perfectly by God's word, that this church is in all the world, and hath not its foundation in Rome only, as you ſay; and methought your lordſhip brought a place out of the ſcripture to confirm the ſame, that there was a juriſdiction given to Peter, in that Chriſt bade him govern his people. Indeed, my lord, St. Peter did his office well and truly, in that he was bid to govern; but ſince the biſhops of Rome have taken a new kind of government. Indeed they ought to govern, but how my lord? not as they will themſelves: but this government muſt be hedged in and ditched in. They muſt rule, but according to the word of God.

But the biſhops of Rome have turned the rule according to the word of God, into the rule according to their own pleaſures, and as it pleaſeth them beſt: as there is a book ſet forth which hath divers points in it, and amongſt others, this point is one which your lordſhip went about to prove by this word, Rule, and the argument which he bringeth forth for the proof of that matter, is taken out of Deuteronomy, where it is ſaid, If there ariſeth any controverſy among the people, the prieſts of the order of Levi ſhall decide the matter, according to the law of God; ſo it muſt be taken. This book perceiving this authority to be given to the prieſts of the old law, taketh occaſion to prove the ſame to be given to the biſhops and other the clergy of the new law: but in proving this matter, whereas it was ſaid there, as the prieſts of the order of Levi ſhould determine the matter according to God's law, that [according to God's law] is left out, and only is recited, as the prieſts of the order of Levi ſhall decide the matter, ſo it ought to be taken of the people; a large authority, I aſſure you. What gelding of ſcripture is this? What clipping of God's coin? [with which terms the audience ſmiled.] This is much like the ruling which your lordſhip talked of. Nay, nay, my lords, we may not give ſuch authority to the clergy, to rule all things as they will. Let them keep themſelves within their commiſſion. Now, I truſt, my lord, I do not rail yet.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Latimer, your talk is more like taunts than railing: but in that I have not read the book which you blame ſo much, nor know of any ſuch, I can ſay nothing therein.

Latimer. Yes, my lord, the book is open to be read, and is intituled to one which is biſhop of Glouceſter, whom I never knew, neither did at any time ſee him to my knowledge. [With that the people laughed, becauſe the biſhop of Glouceſter ſate there in commiſſion.]

Then the biſhop of Glouceſter ſtood up, and ſaid it was his book.

Latimer. Was it yours, my lord? Indeed I knew not your lordſhip, neither ever did I ſee you before, neither yet ſee you now, through the brightneſs of the ſun ſhining betwixt you and me. Then the audience laughed again; and Mr. Latimer ſpake unto them, ſaying, Why, my maſters, this is no laughing matter. I anſwer upon life and death. Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye ſhall weep.

The biſhop of Lincoln commanded ſilence, and then ſaid: Mr. Latimer, if you had kept yourſelf within your bounds, if you had not uſed ſuch ſcoffs and taunts this had not been done.

After this the biſhop of Glouceſter ſaid, in excuſing of his book: Mr. Latimer, hereby every man ſee what learning you have.

Then Mr. Latimer interrupted him, ſaying: Lo you look for learning at my hands who have gone ſo long to the ſchool of oblivion, making the bare walls my library, keeping me ſo long in priſon without book, or pen and ink; and now you let me looſe to come and anſwer to articles. You deal with me as though two were appointed to fight for life and death, and over-night the one thro' friends and favour, is cheriſhed, and hath good counſel given him how to encounter with his enemy. The other, for envy or lack of friends, all the whole night is ſet in the ſtocks. In the morning when they ſhall meet, the one is in ſtrength and luſty; the other is ſtiff in his limbs, and almoſt dead for feebleneſs. Think you, that to run thro' this man with a ſpear is not a goodly victory?

But the biſhop of Glouceſter interrupting his anſwer, proceeded, ſaying: I went not about to recite any places of ſcripture in that place of my book; for then if I had not recited it faithfully, you might have had juſt occaſion of reprehenſion: but I only in that place formed an argument a majore, in this ſenſe; that if in the old law the prieſts had power to decide matters of controverſy, much more then ought the authority to be given to the clergy in the new law: and I pray you in this point what availeth their rehearſal, According to the law of God?

Latimer. Yes, my lord, very much. For I acknowledge authority to be given to the ſpirituality to decide matters of religion, and as my lord ſaid even now, to rule; but they muſt do it according to the word and law of God, and not after their own will, after their own imaginations and fancies.

The biſhop of Glouceſter would have ſpoke more, ſaving that the biſhop of London ſaid, that they came not to diſpute with Mr. Latimer, but to take his determinate anſwer to their articles, and ſo began to propoſe the ſame articles which were propoſed to Dr. Ridley. But Mr. Latimer interrupted him, ſpeaking to the biſhop of Glouceſter; Well, my lord, I could wiſh more faithful dealing with God's word, and not to leave out a part here, and another there, but to rehearſe the whole faithfully.

But

But the biſhop of Lincoln, not attending to this ſaying of Mr. Latimer, proceeded in rehearſing the articles in form and ſenſe as I declared before in the examination of the articles, propoſed to Dr. Ridley, and required Mr. Latimer's anſwer to the firſt. Then Mr. Latimer making his proteſtation, that notwithſtanding theſe his anſwers, it ſhould not be taken that thereby he ſhould acknowledge any authority of the biſhop of Rome, ſaying, that he was the king and queen's majeſty's ſubject, and not the pope's, neither could ſerve two maſters at one time, except he ſhould now renounce one of them; required the notaries ſo to take his proteſtation, that whatſoever he ſhould ſay or do, it ſhould not be taken as though he did thereby agree to any authority that came from the biſhop of Rome.

The biſhop of Lincoln ſaid, that his proteſtation ſhould be ſo taken; he required him to anſwer briefly, affirmatively, or negatively, to the firſt article, and ſo recited the ſame again: and Mr. Latimer anſwered as followeth:

Latimer. I do not deny, my lord, that in the ſacrament, by ſpirit and grace, is the very body and blood of Chriſt, becauſe that every man, by receiving bodily that bread and wine, ſpiritually receiveth the body and blood of Chriſt, and is made partaker thereby of the merits of Chriſt's paſſion: but I deny that the body and blood of Chriſt is in ſuch a manner in the ſacrament as you would have it.

Lincoln. Then, Mr. Latimer, you anſwer affirmatively.

Latimer. Yea, if you mean of that groſs and carnal being which you do take.

The notaries took his anſwer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What ſay you, Mr. Latimer, to the ſecond article? and recited the ſame.

Latimer. There is, my lord, a change in the bread and wine, and ſuch a change as no power, but the omnipotency of God can make, in that that which before was bread, ſhould now have the dignity to exhibit Chriſt's body, and yet the bread is ſtill bread, and the wine ſtill wine: for the change is not in the nature, but in the dignity, becauſe now that which was common bread hath the dignity to exhibit Chriſt's body: for whereas it was common bread, it is now no more common bread, neither ought it to be ſo taken, but as holy bread ſanctified by God's word.

With that the biſhop of Lincoln ſmiled, ſaying: Lo, Mr. Latimer, ſee what ſtedfaſtneſs is in your doctrine. That which you abhorred and deſpiſed moſt, you now moſt eſtabliſh: for whereas you moſt railed at holy bread, you now make your communion holy bread.

Latimer. Tuſh, a ruſh for your holy bread. I ſay the bread in the communion is an holy bread indeed.

But the biſhop of Lincoln interrupted him, and ſaid: O, you make a difference betwixt holy bread and holy bread [with that the audience laughed]. Well, Mr. Latimer, is not this your anſwer, that the ſubſtance of bread and wine remaineth after the words of conſecration?

Latimer. Yes verily, it muſt needs be ſo. For Chriſt himſelf calleth it bread, St. Paul calleth it bread, the doctors confeſs the ſame, the nature of a ſacrament confirmeth the ſame, and I call it holy bread, not in that I make no difference between your holy bread and this, but for the holy office which it beareth, that is, to be a figure of Chriſt's body, and not only a bare figure, but effectually to repreſent the ſame.

So the notaries pened his anſwer in the affirmative.

Lincoln. What ſay you to the third queſtion? and recited the ſame.

Latimer. No, no, my lord, Chriſt made one perfect ſacrifice for all the whole world, neither can any man offer him again, neither can the prieſt offer up Chriſt again for the ſins of man, which he took away by offering himſelf once for all (as St. Paul ſaith) upon the croſs, neither is there any propitiation for our ſins, ſaving his croſs only.

So the notaries pened his anſwer to this article alſo affirmatively.

Lincoln. What ſay you to the fourth, Mr. Latimer? and then recited it. After the recital whereof, when Mr. Latimer anſwered not, the biſhop aſked him whether he heard him or no?

Latimer. Yes, but I do not underſtand what you mean thereby.

Lincoln. Marry, only this, that theſe your aſſertions were condemned by Dr. Weſton as hereſies: it is not ſo, Mr. Latimer?

Latimer. Yes, I think they were condemned. But how unjuſtly, he that ſhall be judge of all, knoweth.

The notaries alſo took this anſwer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What ſay you, Mr. Latimer, to the fifth article? and recited it.

Latimer. I know not what you mean by theſe terms. I am no lawyer, I wiſh you would propoſe the matter plainly.

Lincoln. In that we proceed according to the law, we muſt uſe their terms alſo. The meaning only is this, that theſe your aſſertions are notorious, avil ſpoken of, and yet common and frequent in the mouths of the people.

Latimer. I cannot tell how much, nor what men talk of them. I come not ſo much among them, in that I have been ſecluded a long time. What men report of them I know not, and care not.

This anſwer taken, the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid, Mr. Latimer, we mean not that theſe your anſwers ſhall be prejudicial to you. To-morrow you ſhall appear before us again, and then it ſhall be lawful for you to alter and change what you will. We give you reſpite till to-morrow, truſting that after you have pondered well all things againſt to-morrow, you will not be aſhamed to confeſs the truth.

Latimer. Now, my lord, I pray you give me licence in three words, to declare the cauſes why I have refuſed the authority of the pope.

Lincoln. Nay, Mr. Latimer, to-morrow you ſhall have licence to ſpeak forty words.

Latimer. Nay, my lords, I beſeech you to do with me now as it ſhall pleaſe your lordſhips: I pray you let not me be troubled to-morrow again.

Lincoln. Yes, Mr. Latimer, you muſt needs appear again to-morrow.

Latimer. Truly, my lord, as for my part, I require no reſpite, for I am at a point; you ſhall give me a reſpite in vain: therefore I pray you let me not trouble you to-morrow.

Lincoln. Yes, for we truſt, God will work with you againſt to-morrow. There is no remedy, you muſt needs appear again to-morrow at eight of the clock in St. Mary's church. And forthwith the biſhop charged the mayor with Mr. Latimer, and diſmiſſed him, and then brake up their ſeſſion for that day, about one of the clock in the afternoon.

The ſecond Seſſion.

THE next day following (which was the firſt of October) ſomewhat after eight of the clock, the ſaid lords repaired to St. Mary's church, and after they were ſet in a high throne well trimed with cloth of tiſſue and ſilk, then appeared Dr. Ridley, who was ſet at a framed table a good ſpace from the biſhop's feet, which table had a ſilk cloth caſt over it, and the place was encompaſſed about with framed ſeats in quadrate form, partly for gentlemen who repaired thither (for this was the ſeſſion-day of goal-delivery) and heads of the univerſity to ſit, and partly to keep off the preſs of the audience: for the whole body, as well of the univerſity as of the town, came hither to ſee the end of theſe two perſons.

ſons. After Dr. Ridley's appearance, and the ſilence of the audience, the biſhop of Lincoln ſpake in manner following:

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, yeſterday when we challenged you for not uncovering your head, you excuſed yourſelf of that whereof no man accuſed you, in ſaying you did not put on your cap for any obſtinacy towards us, who as touching our own perſons deſired no ſuch obedience of you, but only in reſpect of them whoſe perſons we bear; neither (you ſaid) for any contempt that you bear to this worſhipful audience, which, although juſtly may, yet in this caſe, require no ſuch humility of you; neither for any derogation of honour to my lord cardinal's grace, in that he is deſcended from the royal blood, in that he is a man moſt noble, both for his excellent qualities and ſingular learning: for as touching thoſe points, you ſaid, you would with all humility, honour, reverence, and worſhip his grace, but in that he is legate to the moſt reverend father in God the pope's holineſs [with that the biſhop with all then preſent put off their caps, but Dr. Ridley moved not his;] you ſaid you neither could, nor would by any means be induced to give him honour: but foraſmuch as this is the point, as we told you yeſterday, why were quire honour and reverence of you, we tell you now as we did then, except you take the pains to move your bonnet, we will take care to cauſe your bonnet to be taken from you, unleſs you pretend ſickneſs, as yeſterday you did not.

Ridley. I pretend now none other cauſe, than I did yeſterday, that is, only that hereby it may appear that not only in word and confeſſion, but alſo by all my geſture and behaviour, in no point I agree or admit any authority or power that ſhall come from the pope, and not for any pride of mind (as God is my judge) neither for contempt of your lordſhips, or of this worſhipful audience, neither for derogation of honour due to my lord cardinel's grace, as concerning thoſe points which your lordſhip ſpake of, that is, his noble parentage and ſingular graces in learning. And as for taking my cap away, your lordſhip may do as it ſhall pleaſe you, it ſhall not offend me, but I ſhall be content with your ordinance in that behalf.

Lincoln. Foraſmuch as you do now anſwer as you did yeſterday, we muſt do alſo as we did then; and forthwith one of the beadles very haſtily ſnatched his cap from his head.

After this the biſhop of Lincoln began the examination in the following manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, yeſterday we took your anſwer to certain articles, which we then propoſed unto you: but becauſe we could not be thoroughly ſatisfied with your anſwer then to the firſt article, neither could the notaries take any determinate anſwer of you, we (you requiring the ſame) granted you licence to bring your anſwer in writing, and thereupon commanded the mayor that you ſhould have pen, paper, and ink, yea, any books alſo that you would require, if they were to be gotten: we licenced you then alſo to alter your former anſwers this day at your pleaſure; therefore we are come now hither, to ſee whether you are in the ſame mind now that you were in yeſterday (which we could not wiſh) or contrary, contented to revoke all your former aſſertions, and in all points conſent to ſubmit yourſelf to the determination of the univerſal church, and I for my part moſt earneſtly exhort you [and therewith he put off his cap] not becauſe my conſcience pricketh me, as you ſaid yeſterday, but becauſe I ſee you a rotten member, and in the way of perdition.

Yeſterday I brought forth among others, St. Auguſtine, to prove that authority hath always been given to the ſee of Rome, and you wreſted the words far contrary to St, Auguſtine's meaning, in that you would have all the world to be applied only to Europe, which is but a third part of all the world, whereas indeed the proceſs of St. Auguſtine's words will not admit of your interpretation. For he ſaith not, All the chriſtian countries beyond the ſeas, &c. but firſt all the chriſtian countries are ſubject to the church of Rome, and afterward addeth, Beyond the Sea, but only to argument the dominion of the ſee of Rome.

But Dr. Ridley ſtill perſevered in his former anſwer, ſaying; I am ſure, my lord, you have ſome ſkill in coſmography, in which you ſhall underſtand that there is a ſea called The Mediterranean ſea, caſt between Europe and Africa, in which he meant Europe beyond the ſea, even as if I ſhould ſay the whole world beyond the ſea, excepting in England in which I ſtand: and here many words were ſpent upon the interpretation of the ſame place of St. Auſtin.

After long diſceptation, the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid, that the meaning of St. Auguſtine might be known by the conſent of the other doctors, and rehearſed divers.

But Dr. Ridley required the rehearſal of the places, and to read the very words of the doctors, ſaying, that perhaps thoſe which the biſhop rehearſed, being propounded in other terms in the doctors, would admit a contrary meaning and interpretation: but in that book, out of which the biſhop rehearſed them, was none of the doctors, but only the ſentences drawn out of the doctors by ſome ſtudious man: he could not recite the very words of the doctors.

Then after the biſhop of Lincoln mentioned Cyril, who (as he ſaid) made againſt Mr. Ridley in the ſacrament, even by Philip Melancthon his own alledging in his common places, and forthwith called for Melancthon, but in vain, becauſe all ſuch books were burned a little before, wherefore he paſſed it over.

Cyril alſo in another place proving to the Jews that Chriſt was come, uſeth this reaſon, Altars are erected in Chriſt's name in Britain, and in far countries: Ergo, Chriſt is come. But we may uſe the contrary, of that reaſon; Altars are plucked down in Britain: Ergo, Chriſt is not come. A good argument a contrariis. I will ſtand to it in the ſchools by and by with any man. Ye ſee what a good argument this your doctrine maketh for the Jews, to prove that Chriſt is not come.

Dr. Ridley ſmiling, anſwered: Your lordſhip is not ignorant that this word Altar in the ſcripture ſignifieth as well the altar whereupon the Jews were wont to make their burnt ſacrifices, as the table of the Lord's ſupper. Cyril meaneth there by this word Altars, not that the Jewiſh altar, but the table of the Lord, and by that ſaying (Altars are erected in Chriſt's name: Ergo, Chriſt is come) he meaneth, that the communion is adminiſtered in his remembrance: Ergo, Chriſt is come: for the ſtrength of his argument is, becauſe the remembrance of a thing cannot be, except itſelf be paſt: then could not all countries celebrate the communion in remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion, except Chriſt had been come and ſuffered. As for the taking down of the altars, it was done upon juſt conſiderations, for that they ſeemed to come too nigh to the Jewiſh uſage. Neither was the ſupper of the Lord at any time better adminiſtered, or more duly received, than in thoſe latter days when all things were brought to the rites and uſage of the primitive church.

Lincoln. A goodly receiving, I promiſe you, to ſet an oyſter-table inſtead of an altar, and to come from puddings at Weſtminſter to receive; and yet when your table was conſtituted, you could never be content, in placing the ſame now Eaſt, now North, now one way, then another, until it pleaſed God of his goodneſs to place it clean out of the church.

Ridley. Your lordſhip's unreverend terms do not elevate the thing. Perhaps ſome men came more devoutly from puddings, than other men do now from other things.

Lincoln. As for that, Mr. Ridley, you ought to be judge of no man: but by this your reaſoning you cauſe us to ſtretch and inlarge our inſtructions. We came not to reaſon, but to take your determinate anſwers to our articles; articles; and then he read the firſt article in manner above ſpecified.

Now, Mr. Ridley, what ſay you to the firſt article? If you have brought your anſwer in writing, we will receive it: but if you have written any other matter, we will not receive it.

Then Dr. Ridley took a ſheet of paper out of his boſom, and began to read that which he had written, but the biſhop of Lincoln commanded the beadle to take it from him. But he deſired licence to read it, ſaying, that it was nothing but his anſwers, but the biſhop would in no wiſe ſuffer him.

Ridley. Why, my lord, will you require my anſwer, and not ſuffer me to publiſh it? I beſeech you, my lord, let the audience bear witneſs in this matter. Your lordſhips may handle it at your pleaſure: therefore let the audience be witneſs to your doings.

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley, we will firſt ſee what you have written, and then if we ſhall think it good to be read, you ſhall have it publiſhed; but except you will deliver it firſt, we will take none at all of you.

With that Dr. Ridley, ſeeing no remedy, delivered it to an officer, who immediately delivered it to the biſhop of Lincoln, who after he had ſecretly communicated it to the other two biſhops, declared the ſenſe, but would not read it as it was written, ſaying, that it contained words of blaſphemy: therefore he would not fill the ears of the audience therewithal, and ſo abuſe their patience: notwithſtanding Dr. Ridley deſired very inſtantly to have it publiſhed, ſaying, that except a line or two, there was nothing contained but the ancient fathers ſaying for the confirmation of his aſſertions.

After the ſaid biſhops had ſecretly viewed the whole, then the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid: In the firſt part, Mr. Ridley, is nothing contained but your proteſtation, that you would not have theſe your anſwers ſo to be taken, as though you ſeemed thereby to conſent to the authority or juriſdiction of the pope's holineſs.

Ridley. No, my lord, I pray you read it out, that the audience may hear it: but the biſhop of Lincoln would in no wiſe, becauſe (he ſaid) there were contained words of blaſphemy.

Then the biſhop of Lincoln recited the firſt article, and required Dr. Ridley's anſwer to it. Then Dr. Ridley ſaid, that his anſwer was there in writing, and deſired that it might be publiſhed: but the biſhop would not read the whole, but here and there a piece of it. So the notaries took his anſwer, that he refered him to his anſwer in writing exhibited now, and alſo before at the time of diſputation, Dr. Weſton being prolocutor.

In like manner the biſhop of Lincoln recited the ſecond article, and required an anſwer, and Dr. Ridley refered him to his anſwer in writing exhibited now, and alſo before at the time of diſputation: and like anſwers were taken to all the reſt of the articles.

Theſe anſwers in this manner rehearſed, taken and pened by the notaries, the biſhop of Glouceſter began an exhortation to move Dr. Ridley to turn.

Glouceſter. If you would once empty your ſtomach, captivate your ſenſes, ſubdue your reaſon, and together with us conſider what a feeble ground of your religion you have, I do not doubt but you might eaſily be brought to acknowledge one church with us, to confeſs one faith with us, and to believe one religion with us. For what a weak and feeble ſtay in religion is this I pray you? Latimer leaneth to Cranmer, Cranmer to Ridley, and Ridley to the ſingularity of his own wit; ſo that if you overthrow the ſingularity of Ridley's wit, then muſt needs the religion of Cranmer and Latimer fall alſo. You remember well, Mr. Ridley, that the prophet ſpeaketh moſt truly, ſaying, Woe, woe be to them which are ſingular and wiſe in their own conceits.

But you will ſay here, It is true that the prophet ſaith: but how know you that I am wiſe in mine own conceit? Yes, Mr. Ridley, you refuſe the determination of the catholic church; you muſt needs be ſingular and wiſe in your own conceit, for you bring ſcripture for the proof of your aſſertions, and we alſo bring ſcriptures; you underſtand them in one ſenſe, and we in another. How will you know the truth herein? If you ſtand to your own interpretation, then you are ſingular in your own conceit: but if you ſay you will follow the minds of the doctors and ancient fathers, likely you underſtand them in one meaning, and we take them in another; how will you know the truth herein? If you ſtand to your own judgment, then are you ſingular in your own conceit, then can you not avoid the woe which the prophet ſpeaketh of.

Wherefore if you have no ſtay but the catholic church in matters of controverſy, except you will reſt upon the ſingularity and wiſdom of your own brain, if the prophet moſt truly ſaith, Woe, woe be to them that are wiſe in their own conceit: then for God's love, Dr. Ridley, ſtand not ſingular, be not you wiſe in your own conceit, pleaſe not yourſelf overmuch. How were the Arians, the Manichees, Eutychians, with divers other heretics which have been in the church, how I pray you were they ſuppreſſed and convinced? By reaſoning in diſputations? No truly, the Arians had no more places for the confirmation of their hereſy, than the catholics for the defence of the truth. How then were they convinced? Only by the determination of the church. And indeed, except we do conſtitute the church our foundation, ſtay, and judge, we can have no end of controverſies, no end of diſputations. For in that we all bring ſcriptures and doctors for the proof of our aſſertions, who ſhould be judge of this our controverſy? If we ourſelves then be ſingular and wiſe in our own conceits, then cannot we avoid the woe that the prophet ſpeaketh of.

It remaineth therefore that we ſubmit ourſelves to the determination and arbitrement of the church, with whom God promiſed to remain to the world's end, to whom he promiſed to ſend the Holy Ghoſt which ſhould teach it the truth. Wherefore. Mr. Ridley, if you will avoid the woe that the prophet ſpeaketh of, be not you wiſe in your own judgment: If you will not be wiſe and ſingular in your own judgment, captivate your own underſtanding, ſubdue your reaſon, and ſubmit yourſelf to the determination of the church.

This is briefly the ſum of the oration of the biſhop of Glouceſter, by which he endeavoured in many more words, amplifying and enlarging the matter eloquently, with ſundry points of rhetoric, to move affections, to perſuade Dr. Ridley to recant and forſake his religion.

To whom Dr. Ridley anſwered, in few words, That he ſaid moſt truly with the prophet, Woe be to him that is wiſe in his own conceit; but that he acknowledgeth no ſuch ſingularity in him, nor knew any cauſe why he ſhould attribute ſo much to himſelf. And whereas he ſaid Dr. Cranmer leaned to him, that was moſt untrue, in that he was but a young ſcholar in compariſon of Dr. Cranmer; for when he was but a young ſcholar, Mr. Cranmer was then a doctor; ſo that he confeſſed Mr. Cranmer might have been his ſchoolmaſter for many years. It ſeemed that he would have ſpoke more, but the biſhop of Glouceſter interrupted him, ſaying:

Why, Mr. Ridley, it is your own confeſſion, for Mr. Latimer, at the time of his diſputation, confeſſed his learning to lye in Mr. Cranmer's books, and Mr. Cranmer alſo ſaid that it was your doing.

The biſhop of Lincoln likewiſe with many words, and gently holding his cap in his hand, deſired him to turn. But Dr. Ridley made an abſolute anſwer, that he was fully perſuaded the religion which he defended to be grounded upon God's word, and therefore without great offence towards God, great peril and damage of his ſoul, he could not forſake his maſter and Lord God; but deſired the biſhop to perform his grant, in that his lordſhip ſaid, the day before, that he ſhould have licence to ſhew his cauſe, why he could not with a ſafe conſcience admit the authority of the pope. But the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid, that whereas then he had demanded licence to ſpeak three words, he was contented then that he ſhould ſpeak forty, and that grant he would perform.

Then ſtepped forth Dr. Weſton, who ſat by, and ſaid, Why, my lord, he hath ſpoken four hundred already.

Dr. Ridley confeſſed he had, but they were not of his preſcribed number, neither of that matter. The biſhop of Lincoln bade him take his licence: but he ſhould ſpeak but forty, and he would tell them upon his fingers; and preſently Dr. Ridley began to ſpeak: but before he had ended half a ſentence, the doctors ſitting by, cried out, and ſaid, that his number was out; and with that he was put to ſilence.

After this the biſhop of Lincoln, who ſat in the midſt, began to ſpeak as followeth:

Now I perceive, Mr. Ridley, you will not permit nor ſuffer us to ſtay in that point of our commiſſion which we moſt deſired: for indeed, for my part, I take God to witneſs, I am ſorry for you. Whereupon Dr. Ridley anſwered:

I believe it well, my lord, foraſmuch as one day it will be burdenous to your ſoul.

Lincoln. Nay, not ſo, Mr. Ridley, but becauſe I am ſorry to ſee ſuch ſtubbornneſs in you, that by no means you may be perſuaded to acknowledge your errors, and receive the truth; but ſeeing it is ſo, becauſe you will not ſuffer us to perſiſt in the firſt, we muſt of neceſſity proceed to the other part of our commiſſion. Therefore I pray you hearken to what I ſhall ſay, and forthwith he read the ſentence of condemnation, which was written in a long proceſs: the tenor of which, becauſe it is ſufficiently already expreſſed before, we thought meet in this place to omit, foraſmuch as they are rather words of courſe, than things deviſed upon deliberation. Howbeit indeed the effect was, that foraſmuch as the ſaid Nicholas Ridley did affirm, maintain, and ſtubbornly defend certain opinions, aſſertions and hereſies, contrary to the word of God, and the received faith of the church, as in denying the true and natural body of Chriſt, and his natural blood, to be in the ſacrament of the altar: Secondly, in affirming the ſubſtance of bread and wine to remain after the words of the conſecration. Thirdly, in denying the maſs to be a lively ſacrifice of the church for the quick and the dead, and by no means would be brought from theſe his hereſies: they therefore, the ſaid John of Lincoln, James of Glouceſter, John of Briſtol, did judge and condemn the ſaid Nicholas Ridley as an heretic, and ſo adjudged him preſently both by word and alſo in deed to be degraded from the degree of a biſhop, from prieſthood and all eccleſiaſtical order; declaring moreover the ſaid Nicholas Ridley to be no member of the church, and therefore committed him to the ſecular powers, of them to receive due puniſhment according to the tenor of the temporal laws; and further excommunicating him by the great excommunication.

The laſt Appearance and Examination of Mr. Latimer before the Commiſſioners.

THIS ſentence being publiſhed by the biſhop of Lincoln, Dr. Ridley was committed as a priſoner to the mayor, and immediately Mr. Latimer was ſent for: But in the mean ſeaſon the carpet of cloth, which lay upon the table whereat Dr. Ridley ſtood, was removed, becauſe (as men reported) Mr. Latimer had never the degree of doctor, as Dr. Ridley had. But as ſoon as Mr. Latimer appeared, as he did the day before, perceiving no cloth upon the table, he laid his hat, which was an old felt, under his elbows, and immediately ſpake to the commiſſioners, ſaying:

Latimer. My lords, I beſeech your lordſhips to ſet a better order here at your entrance: for I am an old man, and have a very evil back, ſo that the preſs of the multitude doth me much harm.

Lincoln. I am ſorry, Mr. Latimer, for your hurt. At your departure we will ſee to better order.

With that Mr. Latimer thanked his lordſhip, making a very low courteſy. After this the biſhop of Lincoln began, on this manner.

Mr. Latimer; although yeſterday after we had taken your anſwers to thoſe articles which we propoſed, we might have juſtly proceeded to judgment againſt you, eſpecially in that you required the ſame: yet we, having a good hope of your returning, deſiring not your deſtruction, but rather that you would recant, revoke your errors, and turn to the catholic church, defered farther proceſs till this day; and now, according to the appointment, we have called you here before us, to hear whether you are content to revoke your heretical aſſertions, and ſubmit yourſelf to the determination of the church, as we moſt heartily deſire, and I for my part, as I did yeſterday, moſt earneſtly do exhort you, or to know whether you perſevere ſtill the man that you were, for which we would be ſorry.

It ſeemed that the biſhop would have further proceeded, if Mr. Latimer had not interrupted him by ſaying:

Your lordſhip doth often repeat the catholic church, as though I ſhould deny the ſame. No, my lord, I confeſs there is a catholic church, to the determination of which I will ſtand, but not the church which you call catholic, which ought rather to be termed diabolic. And whereas you join together the Romiſh and catholic church, ſtay there, I pray you. For it is one thing to ſay Romiſh church, another thing to ſay catholic church: I muſt uſe here in this mine anſwer the councel of Cyprian, who when cited before certain biſhops that gave him leave to take deliberation and counſel, to try and examine his opinion, he anſwereth them thus: In ſticking and perſevering in the truth, there muſt no counſel or deliberation be taken. And again, being demanded of them ſitting in judgment, which was moſt like to be of the church of Chriſt, whether he who was perſecuted, or they who did perſecute: Chriſt, ſaid he, hath foreſhewed, that he that doth follow him, muſt take up his croſs. Chriſt gave knowledge that his diſciples ſhould have perſecution and trouble. How think you then, my lords, is it like that the ſee of Rome, which hath been a continual perſecutor, is rather the church, or that ſmall flock which hath continually been perſecuted by it, even to death? Alſo the flock of Chriſt hath been but few in compariſon to the reſidue, and ever in ſubjection: whom he proved, beginning at Noah's time, even to the apoſtles.

Lincoln. Your cauſe and Cyprian's is not one, but clean contrary; for he ſuffered perſecution for the ſake of Chriſt and his goſpel; but you are in trouble for your errors and falſe aſſertions, contrary to the word of God, and the received truth of the church.

Mr. Latimer interrupted him, ſaying, Yes verily, my cauſe is as good as St. Cyprian's: for his was for the word of God, and ſo is mine.

Lincoln. Alſo at the beginning and foundation of the church, it could not be but the apoſtles ſhould ſuffer great perſecution. Further, before Chriſt's coming, continually there were very few which truly ſerved God: but after his coming began the time of grace, then began the church to increaſe, and was continually augmented, until it came unto this perfection, and now hath juſtly that juriſdiction which the unchriſtian princes before, by tyranny, did reſiſt: there is a diverſe conſideration of the ſtate of the church now in the time of grace, and before Chriſt's coming. But Mr. Latimer, although we had inſtructions given us determinately to take your anſwer to ſuch articles as we ſhould propoſe, without any reaſoning or diſputations, yet we, hoping, by talk, ſomewhat to prevail with you, appointed you to appear before us yeſterday in the divinity-ſchool, a place for diſputations. And whereas then notwithſtanding you had licence cence to ſpeak your mind, and were anſwered to every matter, yet you could not be brought from your errors; we thinking that from that time ye would with good conſideration ponder your ſtate, gave you reſpite from that time yeſterday, when we diſmiſſed you, until this time, and now have called you again here in this place, by your anſwers to learn whether you are the ſame man you were then or no. Therefore we will propoſe unto you the ſame articles which we did then, and require of you a determinate anſwer, without further reaſoning; and he immediately recited the firſt article.

Latimer. Always my proteſtation ſaved, that by theſe mine anſwers it ſhould not be thought that I did condeſcend and agree to your lordſhip's authority, in that you are legaced by the authority of the pope, ſo that thereby I might ſeem to conſent to his juriſdiction: To the firſt article I anſwer now as I did yeſterday, that in the ſacrament, the worthy receiver receiveth the very body of Chriſt, and drinketh his blood by the ſpirit and grace. But after a corporal being, which the Romiſh church preſcribeth, Chriſt's body and blood is not in the ſacrament under the forms of bread and wine.

The notaries took his anſwer affirmatively. For the ſecond article he refered himſelf to his anſwers made before.

After this the biſhop of Lincoln recited the third article, and required a determinate anſwer.

Latimer. Chriſt made one oblation and ſacrifice for the ſins of the whole world, and that a perfect ſacrifice; neither needeth there to be any other, neither can there be any other propitiatory ſacrifice.

The notaries took his anſwer affirmatively.

In like manner did he anſwer to the articles, not varying from his anſwers made the day before.

After his anſwers were pened by the notaries, and the biſhop of Lincoln had exhorted him in like ſort to recant as he did Dr. Ridley, and revoke his errors and falſe aſſertions, and Mr. Latimer had anſwered that he neither would nor could deny his maſter Chriſt, and his verity, the biſhop of Lincoln deſired Mr. Latimer to hearken to him: and then Mr. Latimer hearkening for ſome new matter and other talk, the biſhop of Lincoln read his condemnation, after which the ſaid three biſhops brake up their ſeſſions, and diſmiſſed the audience.

But Mr. Latimer required the biſhop to perform his promiſe, in ſaying the day before that he ſhould have licence briefly to declare the cauſe why he refuſed the pope's authority.

But the biſhop of Lincoln ſaid, that now he could not hear him, neither ought to talk with him.

Then Mr. Latimer aſked him, whether it were not lawful for him to appeal from this his judgment. And the biſhop aſked him again, to whom he would appeal. To the next general council, ſaid Mr. Latimer, which ſhall be truly called in God's name, With that appellation the biſhop was content; but he ſaid it would be a long ſeaſon before ſuch a convocation as he meant would be called.

Then the biſhop committed Mr. Latimer to the mayor, ſaying, Now he is your priſoner, Mr. Mayor. Becauſe the preſs of the people was not diminiſhed, each man looking for a farther proceſs, the biſhop of Lincoln commanded avoidance, and deſired Mr. Latimer to tarry till the preſs was diminiſhed, leſt he ſhould take hurt at his going out, as he did at his entrance. And ſo Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer continued in durance till the 16th day of the ſaid month of October.

A Communication between Dr. Brooks Biſhop of Glouceſter, and Dr. Ridley, in the Houſe of Mr. Iriſh, Mayor of Oxford, October 15. 1555. at which Time he was degraded.

ON the 15th day in the morning, Dr. Brooks biſhop of Glouceſter, and the vice-chancellor of Oxford, Dr. Marſhal, with divers others of the chief, and heads of the ſame univerſity, and many others accompanying them, came to the houſe of Mr. Iriſh, then mayor of Oxford, where Dr. Ridley late biſhop of London was cloſe priſoner. And when the biſhop of Glouceſter came into the chamber where the ſaid Dr. Ridley did lie, he told him for what porpoſe their coming was unto him, ſaying, That yet once again the queen's majeſty did offer unto him, by them, her gracious mercy, if that he would receive the ſame, and come home again to the faith which he was baptized in, and revoke his erroneous doctrine that he of late had taught abroad to the deſtruction of many. And further ſaid, That if he would not recant and become one of the catholic church with them, then they muſt needs (againſt their wills) proceed according to the law, which they would be very loth to do, if they might otherwiſe. But, ſaith he, we have been oftentimes with you, and have requeſted that you would recant this your fantaſtical and deviliſh opinion, which hitherto you have not, although you might in ſo doing win many, and do much good. Therefore, good Mr. Ridley, conſider with yourſelf the danger that ſhall enſue both of body and ſoul, if that you ſhall ſo wilfully caſt yourſelf away in refuſing mercy offered unto you at this time.

My lord, ſaid Dr. Ridley, you know my mind fully herein; and as for the doctrine which I have taught, my conſcience aſſureth me that it was found, and according to God's word (to his glory be it ſpoken); which doctrine, the Lord God being my helper, I will maintain ſo long as my tongue ſhall wag, and breath is within my body, and in confirmation thereof ſeal the ſame with my blood.

Brooks. Well, you were beſt, Mr. Ridley, not to do ſo, but to become one of the church with us. For you know this well enough, that whoſoever is out of the catholic church cannot be ſaved: Therefore I ſay once again, that while you have time and mercy offered you, receive it, and confeſs with us the pope's holineſs to be the chief head of the ſame church.

Ridley. I marvel that you will trouble me with any ſuch vain and fooliſh talk. You know my mind concerning the uſurped authority of that Romiſh Antichriſt. As I confeſſed openly in the ſchools, ſo do I now, that both by my behaviour and talk I do no obedience at all unto the biſhop of Rome, nor to his uſurped authority, and that for divers good and godly conſiderations. And here Dr. Ridley would have reaſoned with the ſaid Brooks biſhop of Glouceſter, of the biſhop of Rome's authority, but could not be ſuffered, and yet he ſpake ſo earneſtly againſt the pope therein, that the biſhop told him, if he would not hold his peace, he ſhould be compelled againſt his will. And ſeeing, ſaith he, that you will not receive the queen's mercy now offered unto you, but ſtubbornly refuſe the ſame, we muſt, againſt our wills, proceed according to our commiſſion to degrading, taking from you the dignity of prieſthood. For we take you for no biſhop, and therefore we will the ſooner have done with you: ſo committing you to the ſecular power, you know what doth follow.

Ridley. Do with me as it ſhall pleaſe God to ſuffer you, I am well content to abide the ſame with all my heart.

Brooks. Put off your cap, and put upon you this ſurplice.

Ridley. Not I truly.

Brooks. But you muſt.

Ridley. I will not.

Brooks. You muſt, therefore make no more ado but put this ſurplice upon you.

Ridley. Truly if it come upon me, it ſhall be againſt my will.

Brooks. Will you not do it upon you?

Ridley. No, that I will not.

Brooks. It ſhall be put upon you by one or other.

Ridley. Do therein as it ſhall pleaſe you, I am well content with that, and more than that; the ſervant is not above his maſter. If they dealt ſo cruelly with our Saviour Chriſt, as the ſcripture maketh mention, and he ſuffered the ſame patiently, how much more doth it become us his ſervants? And in ſaying theſe words they put upon the ſaid Dr. Ridley a ſurplice, with all the trinkets appertaining to the maſs. And as they were putting on the ſame, Dr. Ridley did vehemently inveigh againſt the Romiſh biſhop, and all that fooliſh apparel, calling him Antichriſt, and the apparel fooliſh and abominable, yea too fooliſh for a vice in a play, inſomuch that Brooks was exceeding angry with him, and bade him hold his peace, for he did but rail. Dr. Ridley anſwered him again, and ſaid, So long as his tongue and breath would ſuffer him, he would ſpeak againſt their abominable doings, whatſoever happened unto him for ſo doing.

Brooks. Well, you had beſt hold your peace, leſt your mouth be ſtopped. At which words one Edrige, the reader then of the Greek lecture, ſtanding by, ſaid to Dr. Brook; Sir, the law is that he ſhould be gagged, therefore let him be gagged. At which words Dr. Ridley looking earneſtly upon him that ſo ſaid, ſhook his head at him, and made no anſwer; but ſaid with a ſigh, Oh well, well, well.

So they proceeded in their doings, yet nevertheleſs Dr. Ridley was ever ſpeaking things not pleaſant to their ears, although one or other bade him hold his peace, leſt he ſhould be cauſed againſt his will.

But when they came to that place where Dr. Ridley ſhould hold the chalice and the wafer cake (called the ſingleneſs of bread) they bade him hold the ſame in his hands: ſaid Dr. Ridley, They ſhall not come in my hands; for if they do, they ſhall fall to the ground for all me. Then there was one appointed to hold them in his hand, while biſhop Brooks read a certain thing in Latin, touching the degradation of ſpiritual perſons, according to the pope's law.

Then they put a book in his hand, and read another thing in Latin, the effect whereof was, "We do take from thee the office of preaching the goſpel, &c." At which Dr. Ridley gave a great ſigh, looking up towards heaven, ſaying, O Lord God, forgive them this their wickedneſs.

Having put on him the maſs-gear, they began to take it away (beginning with the uppermoſt garment), again reading a thing in Latin, according to the order contained in the pope's law. Now when all was taken from him, ſaving only the ſurplice left on his back, as they were reading and taking it away, Dr. Ridley ſaid unto them, Lord God, what power be you of, that you can take from a man that which he never had? I was never ſinger in all my life, and yet you would take from me that which I never had.

So when all their abominable and ridiculous degredation was ended very ſolemnly, Dr. Ridley ſaid unto Dr. Brooks, Have you done? If you have done, then give me leave to talk with you a little concerning theſe matters. Brooks anſwered and ſaid, Mr. Ridley, we may not talk with you, you be out of the church, and our law is, that we may not talk with any that be out of the church. Then Dr. Ridley ſaid; Seeing that you will not ſuffer me to talk, neither will vouchſafe to hear me, what remedy but patience? I refer my cauſe to my heavenly Father, who will reform things that be amiſs, when it ſhall pleaſe him.

At which words they would have been gone, but Mr. Ridley ſaid, My lord, I would wiſh that your lordſhip would vouchſafe to read over and peruſe a little book of Bertram's writing, concerning the ſacrament. I promiſe you, you ſhall find much good learning therein, if you will read the ſame with an indifferent judgment. To which Dr. Brooks made no anſwer, but was going away. Then ſaid Dr. Ridley, Oh, I perceive you cannot away with this manner of talk. Well, as it is to no purpoſe, I will ſay no more, I will ſpeak of worldly affairs. I pray you therefore, my lord, hear me, and be a means to the queen's majeſty, in behalf of a great many poor men, and eſpecially my poor ſiſter and her huſband who ſtandeth there. They had a poor living granted unto them by me, when I was in the ſee of London, which is taken away from them, by him that occupieth the ſame room, without all law or conſcience.

Here I have a ſupplication to the queen's majeſty in their behalf. You ſhall hear the ſame read, ſo ſhall you perceive the matter the better. Then he read the ſame, and when he came to the place in the ſupplication that touched his ſiſter by name, he wept, ſo that for a little time he could not ſpeak for weeping. But recovering himſelf, he ſaid, This is nature that moveth me, but I have now done: and with that read out the reſt, and delivered the ſame unto his brother, commanding him to put it up to the queen's majeſty, and to ſue not only for himſelf, but alſo for ſuch as had any leaſes or grants by him, and were put from the ſame by Dr. Bonner then biſhop of London. Whereunto Brooks ſaid, Indeed, Mr. Ridley, your requeſt, in this ſupplication, is very lawful and honeſt; therefore I muſt needs in conſcience ſpeak to the queen's majeſty for them.

Ridley. I pray you for God's ſake do ſo.

Brooks. I think your requeſt will be granted, except one thing hinder it, and that is (I fear) becauſe you do not allow the queen's proceedings, but obſtinately withſtand the ſame, that it will hardly be granted.

Ridley. What remedy? I can do no more but ſpeak and write. I truſt I have diſcharged my conſcience therein, and God's will be done.

Brooks. I will do what lieth in me.

A Copy of the Supplication written to the Queen.

Dr. Ridley to the Queen's Majeſty.

MAY it pleaſe your majeſty for Chriſt our Saviour's ſake in a matter of conſcience (and not for myſelf, but for other poor men), to vouchſafe to hear and underſtand this humble ſupplication. It is ſo (honourable princeſs) that in the time while I was in the miniſtry of the ſee of London, divers poor men, tenants thereof, have taken new leaſes of their tenantries and holdings: and ſome have renewed and changed their old, and therefore have payed fines and ſums of money, both to me and to the chapter of Paul's, for the confirmation of the ſame.

Now I ſay, that the biſhop who at preſent occupieth the ſame room, will not allow the aforeſaid leaſes, which muſt redound to many a poor man's utter ruin and decay. Wherefore this is mine humble ſupplication unto your honourable grace, that it may pleaſe the ſame for Chriſt's ſake to be unto the aforeſaid poor men their gracious patroneſs and defender, either that they may enjoy their aforeſaid leaſes and years renewed, as I ſuppoſe when their matter ſhall be heard with conſcience, both juſtice, conſcience, and equity ſhall require, for that their leaſes ſhall be found (I truſt) made without fraud or cunning, either of their part, or of mine, and always alſo the old rents reſerved to the ſee without any kind of damage thereof: or if this will not be granted, then that it may pleaſe your gracious highneſs, to command that the poor men may be reſtored to their former leaſes and years, and to have have rendered to them again ſuch ſums of money as they paid to me and to the Chapter-houſe for their leaſes and years, ſo now taken from them. Which thing concerning the fines paid to me, may be eaſily done, if it ſhall pleaſe your majeſty to command ſome portion of thoſe goods which I left in my houſe when I fled, in hope of pardon for my treſpaſs towards your grace, which goods (as I have heard) be yet reſerved in the ſame houſe. I ſuppoſe that half the value of my plate that I left in mine offices, and eſpecially in an iron cheſt in my bed-chamber, will go nigh to reſtore all ſuch fines received, the true ſums and parcels whereof are not ſet in their leaſes; and therefore if that way ſhall pleaſe your highneſs, they muſt be known by ſuch ways and means, as your majeſty, by the advice of men of wiſdom and conſcience, ſhall appoint: but yet for Chriſt's ſake I crave and humbly beſeech your majeſty of your gracious pity and mercy, that the former way may take place.

I have alſo a poor ſiſter that came to me out of the north, with three fatherleſs children, for relief, whom I married after to a ſervant of mine own houſe: ſhe is put out of that which I did provide for them. I beſeech your honourable grace, that her caſe may be mercifully conſidered, and that the rather, in contemplation that I never had of him, which ſuffered indurance at my entrance into the ſee of London, not one penny of his moveable goods, for it was almoſt half a year after his depoſition, before I entered into that place: yea, and alſo if any were left, known to be his, he had licence to carry it away, or there for his uſe it did lie ſafe, as his officers do know, I paid for the lead which I found there, when I occupied any of it to the behoof of the church, or of the houſe. And moreover, I had not only no part of his moveable goods, but alſo (as his old receiver, and then mine, called Mr. Stanton, can teſtify) I paid for them towards his ſervants common liveries and wages, after his depoſition, fifty-three or fifty-five pounds, I cannot tell which.

In all theſe matters I beſeech your honourable majeſty to hear the advice of men of conſcience, and eſpecially the archbiſhop of York; which for that he was continually in my houſe a year and more, before mine impriſonment, I ſuppoſe he is not altogether ignorant of ſome part of theſe things, and alſo his grace doth know my ſiſter, for whoſe ſuccour, and ſome relief, now unto your highneſs I make moſt humble ſute.

October 16, 1555.

This degradation being paſt, and all things finiſhed, Dr. Brooks called the bailiffs, delivering to them Dr. Ridley, with this charge, to keep him ſafely from any man ſpeaking with him, and that he ſhould be brought to the place of execution when they were commanded. Then Dr. Ridley in praiſing God, burſt out in theſe words and ſaid; God I thank thee, and to thy praiſe be it ſpoken, there is none of you all able to lay to my charge any open or notorious crime: for if you could, it ſhould ſurely be laid in my lap, I ſee very well. Whereunto Brooks ſaid, he play'd the part of a proud Phariſee, exalting and praiſing himſelf.

But Dr. Ridley ſaid, No, no, no, as I have ſaid before, to God's glory be it ſpoken. I confeſs myſelf to be a miſerable wretched ſinner, and have great need of God's help and mercy, and do daily call and cry for the ſame: therefore I pray you have no ſuch opinion of me. Then they departed; and in going away, a certain warden of a college, of whoſe name I am not ſure, adviſed Dr. Ridley to repent and forſake that erroneous opinion. Whereunto Dr. Ridley ſaid, Sir, repent you, for you are out of the truth; and I pray God (if it be his bleſſed will) have mercy upon you, and grant you the underſtanding of his words Then the warden being in a paſſion thereat, ſaid, I truſt that I ſhall never be of your erroneons and deviliſh opinion, either yet to be in that place whither you ſhall go. He is, ſaith he, the moſt obſtinate and wilful man that ever I heard talk ſince I was born.

The Behaviour of Dr. Ridley at his Supper, the Night before his Suffering.

THE night before he ſuffered, his beard was waſhed and his legs; and as he ſate at ſupper, the ſame night, at the houſe of Mr. Iriſh (who was his keeper) he bade his hoſteſs, and the reſt at the table, to his marriage: for, ſaith he, to-morrow I muſt be married; and ſo ſhewed himſelf to be as merry as ever he was at any time before. And wiſhing his ſiſter at his marriage, he aſked his brother, ſitting at the table, whether ſhe could find in her heart to be there or no: And he anſwered, Yea, I dare ſay, with all her heart. At which word he ſaid, He was glad to hear of her ſo much therein. At this diſcourſe Mrs. Iriſh wept.

But Dr. Ridley comforted her, and ſaid, O Mrs. Iriſh, you love me not now, I ſee well enough; for in that you weep, it doth appear you will not be at my marriage, neither are content therewith. Indeed you be not ſo much my friend, as I thought you had been. But quiet yourſelf, though my breakfaſt ſhall be ſomewhat ſharp and painful, yet I am ſure my ſupper ſhall be more pleaſant and ſweet.

When they aroſe from the table, his brother offered to watch all night with him. But he ſaid, No, no, that you ſhall not. For I intend (God willing) to go to-bed, and to ſleep as quietly to-night, as ever I did in my life. So his brother departed, exhorting him to be of good cheer, and to take his croſs quietly, for the reward was great, &c.

The Behaviour of Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer at the Time of their Death, October 16, 1555.

UPON the north ſide of the town, in the ditch over-againſt Baliol-college, the place of execution was appointed: And for fear of any tumult that might ariſe to hinder the burning of them, the lord Williams was commanded by the queen's letters, and the houſholders of the city to be their aſſiſtant, ſufficiently appointed; and when every thing was in a readineſs, the priſoners were brought forth by the mayor and the bailiffs.

Dr. Ridley had a fair black gown furred, and faced with foins, ſuch as he was wont to wear being biſhop, and a tippet of velvet furred likewiſe about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, and a corner-cap upon the ſame, going in a pair of ſlippers to the ſtake, and going between the mayor and an alderman, &c.

After him came Mr. Latimer in a poor Briſtow freez frock much worn, with his buttoned cap, and a kerchief on his head, all ready to the fire, a new long ſhroud hanging over his hoſe down to the feet: which at the firſt ſight ſtirred men's hearts to pity them, beholding on the one ſide the honour they ſometime had, and on the other the calamity whereunto they were fallen.

Dr. Ridley, as he paſſed toward Bocardo, looked up where Dr. Cranmer lay, hoping belike to have ſeen him at the glaſs-window, and to have ſpoke unto him. But Dr. Cranmer was then buſy with friar Soto and his fellows diſputing together, ſo that he could not ſee him through that occaſion. Then Dr. Ridley looking back, eſpied Mr. Latimer coming after. Unto whom he ſaid, Oh, be ye there? Yea, ſaid Mr. Latimer, have after as faſt as I can follow. So he following a pretty way off, at length they both came to the ſtake one after the other, where firſt Dr. Ridley entering the place, marvellouſly and earneſtly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven: Then ſhortly after ſeeing Mr. Latimer, with a wondrous chearful look he ran to him, embraced and kiſſed him, and as they that ſtood near reported, comforted him, ſaying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either aſſuage the fury of the flame, or elſe ſtrengthen us to abide it."

With that he went to the ſtake, kneeled down by it, and earneſtly prayed, and behind him Mr. Latimer kneeled, as earneſtly calling upon God as he. After they aroſe, the one talked with the other a little while, till they which were appointed to ſee the execution, removed themſelves out of the ſun. What they ſaid I can learn of no man.

Then Dr. Smith began his ſermon to them upon this text of St. Paul, in the 13th chapter of the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians: "If I yield my body to the fire to be burnt, and have not charity, I ſhall gain nothing thereby." Wherein he alledged, that the goodneſs of the cauſe. and not the order of death, maketh the holineſs of the perſon; which he confirmed by the examples of Judas, and of a woman of Oxford that of late hanged herſelf, for that they and ſuch like as he recited, might then be adjudged righteous, which deſperately ſundered their lives from their bodies, as he feared that thoſe men that ſtood before him would do. But he cried ſtill to the people to beware of them, for they were heretics, and died out of the church. And on the other ſide, he declared their diverſities in opinions, as Lutherans, Oecolampadians, Zuinglians, of which ſect they were he ſaid, and that was the worſt: but the old church of Chriſt, and the catholic faith believed far otherwiſe. At which place they lifted up both their hands and eyes to heaven, as it were calling God to witneſs of the truth. Which countenance they made in many other places of his ſermon, where they thought he ſpake amiſs. He ended with a very ſhort exhortation to them to recant and come home again to the church, and ſave their lives and ſouls, which elſe were condemned. His ſermon was ſcarce in all a quarter of an hour.

Dr. Ridley ſaid to Mr. Latimer, Will you begin to anſwer the ſermon, or ſhall I? Mr. Latimer ſaid, Begin you firſt I pray you. I will, ſaid Dr. Ridley.

Then the wicked ſermon being ended, Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer kneeled down on their knees to my lord Williams of Tame, the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and divers other commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe, who ſate upon a form thereby. Unto whom Dr. Ridley ſaid, I beſeech you my lord, even for Chriſt's ſake, that I may ſpeak but two or three words: and whilſt my lord bent his head to the mayor and vice chancellor, to know (as it appeared) whether he might have leave to ſpeak, the bailiffs and Dr. Marſhal the vice-chancellor, ran haſtily unto him, and with their hands ſtopped his mouth, and ſaid, Mr. Ridley, if you will revoke your erroneous opinions, and recant the ſame, you ſhall not only have liberty ſo to do, but alſo the benefit of a ſubject, that is, have your life. Not otherwiſe, ſaid Dr. Ridley? No, quoth Dr. Marſhal: therefore if you will not ſo do, then there is no remedy but you muſt ſuffer for your deſerts. Well, quoth Dr. Ridley, ſo long as the breath is in my body, I will never deny my Lord Chriſt, and his known truth: God's will be done in me. And with that he roſe up, and ſaid with a loud voice, Well, then I commit our cauſe to Almighty God, who will indifferently judge all.

To whoſe ſaying, Mr. Latimer added his old poſey, Well, there is nothing hid but it ſhall be opened: and he ſaid, he could anſwer Smith well enough, if he might be ſuffered. Incontinently they were commanded to make themſelves ready, which they with all meekneſs obey'd. Dr. Ridley took his gown and his tippet, and gave it to his brother-in-law Mr. Shipſide, who all his time of impriſonment, although he might not be ſuffered to come to him, lay there at his own charges to provide him neceſſaries, which from time to time he ſent him by the ſerjeant that kept him. Some other of his apparel that was little worth, he gave away, the others the bailiffs took.

He gave away divers other ſmall things to gentleme ſtanding by, and divers of them pitifully weeping; as to Sir Henry Lea he gave a new groat, and to divers of my lord Williams's gentlemen, ſome napkins, ſome nutmegs and races of ginger, his dial, and ſuch other things as he had about him, to every one that ſtood next him. Some plucked the points off his hoſe. Happy was he that might get any rag of him.

Mr. Latimer gave nothing, but very quietly ſuffered his keeper to pull off his hoſe, and his other array, which to look unto was very ſimple: and being ſtripped into his ſhroud, he ſeemed as comely a perſon to them that were there preſent, as one could well ſee: and whereas in his cloaths he appeared a withered and crooked ſilly old man, he now ſtood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might behold.

Then Dr. Ridley, ſtanding as yet in his truſs, ſaid to his brother, It were beſt for me to go in my truſs ſtill. No, quoth his brother, it will put you to more pain: and the truſs will do a poor man good. Whereunto Dr. Ridley ſaid; Be it ſo in the name of God; and ſo unlaced himſelf. Then being in his ſhirt, he ſtood upon the aforeſaid ſtone, and held up his hands and ſaid; Oh heavenly Father, I give unto thee moſt hearty thanks, for that thou haſt called me to be a profeſſor of thee, even unto death; I beſeech thee, Lord God, take mercy on this realm of England, and deliver the ſame from all her enemies.

Then the ſmith took a chain of iron, and brought the ſame about both their middles: and as he was knocking in a ſtaple, Dr. Ridley took the chain in his hand and ſhaked it, for it did gird in his belly; and looking aſide to the ſmith, ſaid, Good fellow, knock it in hard, for the fleſh will have its courſe. Then his brother brought him a bag of gunpowder, and tied it about his neck. Dr. Ridley aſked him what it was; his brother ſaid, gunpowder. Then, ſaid he, I will take it to be ſent of God, therefore I will receive it as ſent from him. And have you any, ſaid he, for my brother? (meaning Mr. Latimer.) Yea, Sir, that I have, quoth his brother. Then give it unto him, ſaid he, betime, leſt ye come too late. So his brother went, and carried ſome gunpowder to Mr. Latimer.

In the mean time Dr. Ridley ſpake unto my lord Williams, and ſaid, My lord, I muſt be a ſuiter unto your lordſhip in the behalf of divers poor men, and eſpecially in the cauſe of my poor ſiſter: I have made a ſupplication to the queen's majeſty in their behalfs. I beſeech your lordſhip, for Chriſt's ſake, to be a mean to her grace for them. My brother here hath the ſupplication, and will reſort to your lordſhip to certify you hereof. There is nothing in all the world that troubleth my conſcience (I praiſe my God) this only excepted. Whilſt I was in the ſee of London, divers poor men took leaſes of me, and agreed with me for the ſame. Now I hear ſay the biſhop that now occupieth the ſame room, will not allow my grants to them made, but contrary to all law and conſcience, hath taken from them their livings, and will not ſuffer them to enjoy the ſame. I beſeech you, my lord, be a means for them: you ſhall do a good deed, and God will reward you.

Then they brought a lighted faggot, and laid at Dr. Ridley's feet. Thereupon Mr. Latimer ſaid, Be of good comfort, Mr. Ridley, and play the man; we ſhall this day light ſuch a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I truſt ſhall never be put out. When Dr. Ridley ſaw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried, with a wonderful loud voice, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my ſpirit; and after repeated this often, Lord, Lord, receive my ſpirit. Mr. Latimer cried as vehemently on the other ſide, O Father of heaven, receive my ſoul: who received the flame, as it were embracing of it: After he had ſtroaked his face with his hands, and as it were bathed them a little in the fire, he ſoon died (as it appeareth) with very little or no pain. And thus much concerning the the end of this old and faithful ſervant of God, Mr. Latimer, for whoſe laborious travels, fruitful life, and conſtant death, the whole realm hath cauſe to give thanks to Almighty God.

But Dr. Ridley by the ill making of the fire, the faggots being green, and built too high about the goſs, ſo that the fire being kept down by the green wood, burned fiercely beneath, which put him to ſuch exquiſite pain, that he deſired them for God's ſake to let the fire come unto him; which his brother-in-law heard, but not well underſtood, intending to rid him out of his pain (for which cauſe he gave attendance), as one in ſuch ſorrow, not well adviſed what he did, heaped faggots upon him, ſo that he clean covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned clean all his nether parts, before it touched the upper, and that made him leap up and down under the foggots, and often deſired them to let the fire come to him, ſaying, I cannot burn. Which indeed plainly appeared: for after his legs were conſumed by reaſon of his ſtrugling through the pain (whereof he had no releaſe, but only the comfort he had from God), he ſhewed that ſide towards us clean, ſhirt and all untouched with flame. Yet in all this torment he forgot not to call upon God ſtill, having in his mouth, Lord have mercy upon me, intermingling his cry, Let the fire come unto me, I cannot burn. In which pains he laboured till one of the ſtanders by with his bill pulled off the faggots above, and where he ſaw the fire flame up, he wreſted himſelf to that ſide. And when the fire touched the gunpowder, he was ſeen to ſtir no more, but burned on the other ſide, falling down at Mr. Latimer's feet: which ſome ſaid, happened by reaſon that the chain looſed; others ſaid, that he fell over the chain by reaſon of the poiſe of his body, and the weakneſs of the nether limbs.

Some ſaid that before he was like to fall from the ſtake, he deſired them to hold it with their bills. However it was, ſurely it moved hundreds to tears, in beholding the horrible ſight. For I think there were none, that had not clean baniſhed all humanity and mercy, which would not have lamented to behold the fury of the fire ſo to rage upon their bodies. Signs there were of ſorrow on every ſide. Some took it grievouſly to ſee their deaths, whoſe lives they held full dear. Some pitied their perſons, that thought their ſouls had no need thereof. His brother moved many men, ſeeing his miſerable caſe, ſeeing him (I ſay) compelled to ſuch infelicity, that he thought then to do him beſt ſervice when he haſtened his end. Some cried out of the luck, to ſee his endeavour, who moſt dearly loved him, and ſought his releaſe, turn to his greater vexation, and increaſe of pain. But whoſo conſidered their preferments in time paſt, the places of honour that they ſometime occupied in this commonwealth, the favour they were in with their princes, and the opinion of learning they had, could not chooſe but grieve with tears, to ſee ſo great dignity, honour and eſtimation, ſo neceſſary members ſometime accounted, ſo many godly virtues, the ſtudy of ſo many years, ſuch excellent learning, to be put into the fire, and conſumed in one moment. Well, dead they are, and the reward of this world they have already. What reward remaineth for them in heaven, the day of God's glory, when he cometh with his ſaints, ſhall ſhortly, I truſt, declare.

A Letter written by Dr. Ridley, inſtead of his laſt Farewel, to all his true and faithful Friends in God, with a ſharp Admonition withal to the Papiſts.

AT the name of Jeſus let every knee bow, both of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and let every tongue confeſs that Jeſus Chriſt is the Lord, unto the glory of God the Father, Amen.

As a man intending to take a far journey, and to depart from his familiar friends, commonly and naturally hath a deſire to bid his friends farewel before his departure; ſo likewiſe now I looking daily when I ſhould be called to depart hence from you (O all ye my dearly beloved brethren and ſiſters in our Saviour Chriſt that dwell here in this world), having a like mind towards you all, to bid you all, my dear brethren and ſiſters (I ſay in Chriſt), that dwell upon the earth, after ſuch a manner as I can, farewel.

Farewel my dear brother George Shipſide, whom I have ever found faithful, truſty, and loving in all ſtates and conditions, and now in the time of my croſs over all others to be moſt friendly and ſtedfaſt, and that which pleaſed me beſt over all other things, in God's cauſe ever hearty.

Farewel my dear ſiſter Alice his wife. I am glad to hear of thee, that thou doſt take Chriſt's croſs which is laid now (bleſſed be God) both on thy back and mine, in good part. Thank thou God that hath given thee a godly and loving huſband: ſee that thou honour him and obey him, according to God's law. Honour thy mother-in-law his mother, and love all thoſe that pertain unto him, being ready to do them good as it ſhall lie in thy power. As for thy children, I doubt not of thy huſband, but that he who hath given him an heart to love and fear God, and in God them that pertain unto him, ſhall alſo make him friendly and beneficial unto thy children, even as if they had been begotten of his own body.

Farewel my dearly beloved brother John Ridley of the Waltoun, and you my gentle and loving ſiſter Elizabeth: whom beſides the natural league of amity, your tender love, which you were ſaid ever to bear towards me above the reſt of your brethren, doth bind me to love. My mind was to have acknowledged this your loving affection, and to have acquitted with deeds, and not with words alone. Your daughter Elizabeth I bid farewel, whom I love for the meek and gentle ſpirit that God hath given her, which is a precious thing in the ſight of God.

Farewel my beloved ſiſter of Unthank, with all your children, nephews and nieces; ſince the departing of my brother Hugh, my mind was to have been unto them inſtead of their father, but the Lord God muſt and will be their father, if they would love and fear him, and live according to his law.

Farewel my well-beloved and worſhipful couſins, Mr. Nicholas Ridley of Willimountſwike, and your wife, and I thank you for all your kindneſs both ſhewed unto me, and alſo to all your own kinsfolk and mine. Good couſin, as God hath ſet you in our ſtock and kindred (not for any reſpect of your perſon, but of his abundant grace and goodneſs), to be as it were the bell-weather to order and conduct the reſt, and hath alſo endued you with his manifold gifts of grace both heavenly and worldly above others; ſo I pray you, good couſin, (as my truſt and hope is in you), continue and increaſe in the maintenance of the truth, honeſty, righteouſneſs, and all true godlineſs, and to the uttermoſt of your power, to withſtand falſhood, untruth, unrighteouſneſs, and all ungodlineſs, which is forbidden and condemned by the word and laws of God.

Farewel my young couſin Ralph Whitfield. Oh! your time was very ſhort with me. My mind was to have done you good, and yet you caught in that little time a loſs, but I truſt it ſhall be recompenced as it ſhall pleaſe Almighty God.

Farewel all my whole kindred and countrymen, farewel in Chriſt altogether. The Lord, who is the ſearcher of ſecrets, knoweth, that according to my heart's deſire, my hope was of late that I ſhould have come among you, and to have brought with me abundance of Chriſt's bleſſed goſpel, according to the duty of that office and miniſtry, whereunto among you I was choſen, named and appointed by the mouth of that late peerleſs prince, king Edward, and ſo denounced openly in his court, by his privy council.

I warn you all my beloved kinsfolk and countrymen, that ye be not amazed or aſtoniſhed at the kind of my departure or diſſolution; for I aſſure you I think it the greateſt honour that ever I was called to in all my life: and therefore I heartily thank my Lord God for it, that it hath pleaſed him to call me of his great mercy unto this high honour, to ſuffer death willingly for his cauſe and for his ſake; unto which honour he hath called the holy prophets, and dearly beloved apoſtles, and his bleſſed choſen martyrs. For know ye that I doubt no more, that the cauſes for which I am put to death are God's cauſes, and the cauſes of the truth, than I doubt that the goſpel which John wrote is the goſpel of Chriſt, or that Paul's epiſtles are the very word of God. And to have a heart willing to abide, and ſtand in God's cauſe, and in Chriſt's quarrel, even unto death, I aſſure thee, (O man) it is an ineſtimable and an honourable gift of God, given only to the true elect, and dearly beloved children of God and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. For the holy apoſtle, and alſo martyr in Chriſt's cauſe St. Peter, ſaith, If ye ſuffer rebuke in the name of Chriſt, that is, in Chriſt's cauſe, and for his truth's ſake, then are ye happy and bleſſed, for the glory of the Spirit of God reſteth upon you. If for rebuke's ſake ſuffered in Chriſt's name, a man is pronounced, by the mouth of that apoſtle, bleſſed and happy: how much more happy and bleſſed is he that hath the grace to ſuffer death alſo? Wherefore all ye that be my true lovers and friends, rejoice, and rejoice with me again, and render with me hearty thanks to God our heavenly Father, that for his Son's ſake my Saviour and redeemer Chriſt, he hath vouchſafed to call me, being elſe without his gracious goodneſs, in myſelf but a ſinful and vile wretch, to call me, I ſay, unto this high dignity of his true prophets, of his faithful apoſtles, and of his holy elect and choſen martyrs, that is, to die, and to ſpend this temporal life in the defence and maintenance of his eternal and everlaſting truth,

Ye know, that be my countrymen dwelling upon the borders, where (alas) the true man ſuffereth oftentimes much wrong at the thief's hand, if it chance a man to be ſlain of a thief (as it often doth there) which went out with his neighbour to help him to reſerve his goods again, that the more cruelly he be ſlain, and the more ſtedfaſtly he ſtuck by his neighbour in the fight againſt the faith of the thief, the more favour and friendſhip ſhall all his poſterity have for the ſlain man's ſake, of all them that be true, as long as the memory of this fact and his poſterity doth endure: even ſo that ye be my kinsfolk and countrymen, know ye (howſoever the blind, ignorant, wicked world hereafter ſhall rail upon my death, which thing they cannot do worſe than their fathers did, of the death of Chriſt our Saviour, of his holy prophets, apoſtles, and martyrs:) know ye, I ſay, that both before God, and all them that be godly, and that truly know and follow the laws of God, ye have, and ſhall have by God's grace, ever cauſe to rejoice, and to thank God highly, and to think good of it, and in God rejoice of me your fleſh and blood, whom God of his goodneſs hath vouchſafed to aſſociate unto the bleſſed company of his holy martyrs in heaven: and I doubt not in the infinite goodneſs of my Lord God, nor in the faithful fellowſhip of his elect and choſen people, but at both their hands in my cauſe, ye ſhall rather find the more favour and grace: for the Lord ſaith, that he will be both to them and theirs that love him, the more loving again in a thouſand generations: the Lord is ſo full of mercy to them, I ſay, and theirs who do love him indeed. And Chriſt ſaith again, that no man can ſhew more love than to give his life for his friend.

Now alſo know ye, all my true lovers in God, my kinsfolk and countrymen, that the cauſe for which I am put to death, is even after the ſame ſort and condition, but touching more near God's cauſe, and in more weighty matters, but in the general kind all one: For both is God's cauſe, both is in the maintenance of right, and both for the common-wealth, and both for the weal alſo of the chriſtian brother, although yet there is in theſe two no ſmall difference, both concerning the enemies, the goods ſtolen, and the manner of the fight. For know ye all, that like as there when the poor man is robbed by the thief of his goods truly gotten (whereupon he and his houſhold ſhould live) he is greatly wronged, and the thief, in ſtealing and robbing with violence the poor man's goods, doth offend God, doth tranſgreſs his law, and is injurious both to the poor man, and to the common-wealth: ſo I ſay, know ye that even here in the cauſe of my death, it is with the church of England, I mean the congregation of the true choſen children of God in this realm of England, which I acknowledge not only to be my neighbours, but rather the congregation of my ſpiritual brethren and ſiſters in Chriſt, yea, members of one body, wherein by God's grace I am and have been grafted in Chriſt. This church of England hath of late of the infinite goodneſs and abundant grace of Almighty God, great ſubſtance, great riches of heavenly treaſure, great plenty of God's true ſincere word, the true and wholeſome adminiſtration of Chriſt's holy ſacraments, the whole profeſſion of Chriſt's religion truly and plainly ſet forth in baptiſm, the plain declaration and underſtanding of the ſame, taught in the holy catechiſm, to have been learned of all true chriſtians.

The church had alſo a true and ſincere form and manner of the Lord's ſupper, wherein according to Jeſus Chriſt's own ordinance and holy inſtitution, Chriſt's commandments were executed and done. For upon the bread and wine ſet upon the Lord's table, thanks were given, the commemoration of the Lord's death was had; the bread, in the remembrance of Chriſt's body torn upon the croſs, was broken, and the cup in the remembrance of Chriſt's blood ſhed, was diſtributed, and both communicated unto all that were preſent and would receive them, and alſo they were exhorted of the miniſter ſo to do.

All was done openly in the vulgar tongue, ſo that every thing might be moſt eaſily heard, and plainly underſtood by all the people, to God's high glory, and the edification of the whole church. This church had of late the whole divine ſervices, all common and public prayers ordained to be ſaid and heard in the common congregation, not only framed and faſhioned to the true vein of holy ſcripture, but alſo ſet forth according to the commandment of the Lord's, and St. Paul's doctrine, for the people's edification, in their vulgar tongue.

It had alſo holy and wholeſome homilies in commendation of the principal virtues, which are commended in ſcripture: and likewiſe other homilies againſt the moſt pernicious and capital vices that uſe (alas) to reign in this realm of England. This church had, in matters of controverſy, articles ſo pened and framed after the holy ſcriptures, and grounded upon the true underſtanding of God's word, that in ſhort time, if they had been univerſally received, they ſhould have been able to have ſet in Chriſt's true religion, and to have expelled many falſe errors and hereſies, wherewith this church, alas, was almoſt overgone.

But alas, of late into this ſpiritual poſſeſſion of the heavenly treaſure of theſe godly riches, are entered in thieves, that have robbed and ſpoiled all this treaſure away. I may well complain on theſe things, and cry out upon them with the prophet, ſaying, "O Lord God, the Gentiles, heathen nations, are come into thy heritage: they have defiled thy holy temple, and made Jeruſalem an heap of ſtones, that is, they have broken and beaten down to the ground thy holy city." This heatheniſh generation, the e theſe thieves be of Samaria, theſe Sabæi and Chaldæi, theſe robbers, have ruſhed out of their dens, and have robbed the church of England of all the aforeſaid holy treaſure of God; they have carried it away and overthrown it, and inſtead of God's holy word, the true and right adminiſtration of Chriſt's holy ſacraments, as of baptiſm and others, they mixt their miniſtry with man's fooliſh fantaſies, and many wicked and ungodly traditions withal.

Inſtead of the Lord's holy table, they give the people, with much ſolemn diſguiſing, a thing which they call their maſs, but in deed and in truth, it is a very maſking and mockery of the true ſupper of the Lord; or rather I may call it a crafty juggling, whereby theſe falſe thieves and jugglers have bewitched the minds of the ſimple people, that they have brought them from the true worſhip of God unto pernicious idolatry, and make them to believe that to be Chriſt our Lord and Saviour, which indeed is neither God nor man, nor hath any life in itſelf, but in ſubſtances is the creature of bread and wine, and in uſe of the Lord's table is the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood: and for this holy uſe, for which the Lord hath ordained them in his table, to repreſent unto us his bleſſed body torn upon the croſs for us, and his blood there ſhed, it pleaſeth him to call them his body and blood: which, underſtanding Chriſt, declareth to be his true meaning, when he ſaith, Do this in remembrance of me. And again, St. Paul likewiſe doth ſet out the ſame more plainly, ſpeaking of the ſame ſacrament, after the words of conſecration, ſaying, As often as ye ſhall eat of this bread and drink of this cup, ye ſhall ſet forth (he meaneth with the ſame) the Lord's death until his coming again. And here again theſe thieves have alſo robbed the people of the Lord's cup, contrary to the plain words of Chriſt written in his goſpel.

Now for the common public prayers which were in the vulgar tongue, theſe thieves have brought in again a ſtrange tongue, whereof the people underſtand not one word. Wherein what do they elſe, but rob the people of their divine ſervice, wherein they ought to pray together with the miniſter? And to pray in a ſtrange tongue, what is it but (as St. Paul calleth it) barbarouſneſs, childiſhneſs, unprofitable folly, yea, and plain madneſs.

For the godly articles of unity in religion, and for the wholeſome homilies, what do theſe thieves place in the ſtead of them, but the pope's laws and decrees, lying legends, feigned fables, and miracles to delude and abuſe the ſimplicity of the rude people? Thus this robbery and theft is not only committed, nay, ſacrilege, and wicked ſpoil of heavenly things, but alſo in the ſtead of the ſame, is brought in and placed the abominable deſolation of the tyrant Antiochus, of proud Senacherib, of the ſhameleſs faced king, and of the Babylonical beaſt. Unto this robbery, this theft and ſacrilege, for that I cannot conſent, nor (God willing) ever ſhall ſo long as the breath is in my body, becauſe it is blaſphemy againſt God, high treaſon againſt Chriſt our heavenly King, Lord, Maſter, and our only Saviour and Redeemer, it is plainly contrary to God's word, and to Chriſt's goſpel, it is the ſubverſion of all true godlineſs, and againſt the ſalvation of mine own ſoul, and of all my brethren and ſiſters, whom Chriſt my Saviour hath ſo dearly bought, with no leſs price than with the effuſion and ſhedding forth of his moſt precious blood: therefore all ye my true lovers in God, kinsfolk and countrymen, for this cauſe, I ſay, know ye that I am put to death, which by God's grace I ſhall willingly take, with hearty thanks to God, therefore, in certain hope, without any doubting, to receive at God's hand again, of his free mercy and grace, everlaſting life.

Although the cauſe of the true man ſlain of the thief, helping his neighbour to recover his goods again, and the cauſe for which I am to be put to death, in a generality is both one (as I ſaid before;) yet know ye that there is no ſmall difference. Theſe thieves againſt whom I do ſtand, are much worſe than the robbers and thieves of the borders. The goods which they ſteal are much more precious, and their kinds of fight are far divers. Theſe thieves are worſe (I ſay) for they are more cruel, more wicked, more falſe, more deceitful and crafty: for thoſe will but kill the body, but theſe will not ſtick to kill both body and ſoul. Thoſe, for the general theft and robbery, be called, and are indeed, thieves and robbers; but theſe, for their ſpiritual kind of robbery, are called Sacrilegi, as you would ſay, Church-robbers. They are more wicked: for thoſe go about to ſpoil men of worldly things, worldly riches, gold and ſilver, and worldly ſubſtance; theſe go about, in the ways of the devil their ghoſtly father, to ſteal from the univerſal church, and particularly from every man, all heavenly treaſure, true faith, true charity, and hope of ſalvation in the blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, yea, to ſpoil us of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, of his goſpel, of his heavenly Spirit, and of the heavenly heritage of the kingdom of heaven, ſo dearly purchaſed unto us, with the death of her maſter and Saviour Chriſt. Theſe be the goods and godly ſubſtance whereupon the chriſtian before God muſt live, and without which he cannot live: theſe goods, I ſay, theſe thieves, theſe church-robbers go about to ſpoil us of. Which goods, as to the man of God, they excel and far paſs all worldly treaſure; ſo to withſtand even unto death ſuch thieves as go about to ſpoil both us and the whole church of ſuch goods, is moſt high and honourable ſervice done to God.

Theſe church-robbers be alſo much more falſe, crafty, and deceitful than the thieves upon the borders; for theſe have not the craft ſo to commend their theft, that they dare avouch it, and therefore as acknowledging themſelves to be evil, they ſteal commonly in the night, they dare not appear at judgments and ſeſſions, where juſtice is executed, and when they are taken and brought thither, they never hang any man, but they be oftentimes hanged for their faults. But theſe church-robbers can ſo cloak and colour their ſpiritual robbery, that they can make people to believe falſhood to be truth, and truth falſhood; good to be evil, and evil good; light to be darkneſs, and darkneſs light; ſuperſtition to be true religion, and idolatry to be the true worſhip of God, and that which is in ſubſtance the creature of bread and wine, to be none other ſubſtance but only the ſubſtance of Chriſt the living Lord, both God and man. And with this their falſhood and craft, they can ſo juggle and bewitch the underſtanding of the ſimple, and they dare avouch it openly in court and in town, and fear neither hanging nor heading, as the poor thieves of the borders do; but ſtout and ſtrong like Nembroth, dare condemn to be burned in flaming fire, quick and alive, whoſoever will go about to bewray their falſhood.

The kind of fight againſt theſe church-robbers is alſo of another ſort and kind, than that is which is againſt the thieves of the borders. For there the true men go forth againſt them with ſpear and launce, with bow and bill, and all ſuch kinds of bodily weapons as the true men have: but here, as the enemies be of another nature, ſo the watchmen of Chriſt's flock, the warriors that fight in the Lord's war, muſt be armed, and fight with another kind of weapons and armour. For here the enemies of God, the ſoldiers of Antichriſt, although the battle is ſet forth againſt the church by mortal men, being fleſh and blood, and nevertheleſs members of their father the devil, yet for that their grand maſter is the power of darkneſs, their members are ſpiritual wickedneſs, wicked ſpirits, ſpirits of errors, of hereſies, of all deceit and ungodlineſs, ſpirits of idolatry, ſuperſtition and hypocriſy, which are called by St. Paul, principalities and powers, lords of the world, rulers of the darkneſs of this world, and ſpiritual ſubtilties concerning heavenly things; therefore our weapons muſt be fit and meet to fight againſt ſuch, not carnal nor bodily weapons, as ſpear and launce, but ſpiritual and heavenly: we muſt fight againſt ſuch with the armour of God, not intending to kill their bodies, but their errors, their falſe craft and hereſies, their idolatry, ſuperſtition, and hypocriſy, and to ſave (as much as lieth in us) both their bodies and their ſouls.

And therefore, as St. Paul teacheth us, "We fight not againſt fleſh and blood," that is, we fight not with bodily weapons to kill the man, but with the weapons of God, to put to flight his wicked errors and vice, and to ſave both body and ſoul. Our weapons therefore are faith, hope, charity, righteouſneſs, truth, patience, prayer unto God, and our ſword wherewith we ſmite our enemies, beat and batter and bear down all falſhood, is the word of God. With theſe weapons, under the banner of the croſs of Chriſt, we do fight, ever having our eye upon our grand maſter and captain, Chriſt; and then we reckon ourſelves to triumph and to win the crown of everlaſting bliſs, when induring in this battle without any ſhrinking or yielding to the enemies, after the example of our grand captain Chriſt our maſter, after the example of his holy prophets, apoſtles and martyrs, when (I ſay) we are ſlain in our mortal bodies by our enemies, and are moſt cruelly, and without all mercy, murdered down like a flock of ſheep. And the more cruel, the more painful, the more vile and ſpiteful the kind of death is whereunto we be put, the more glorious in God, the more bleſſed and happy we reckon (without all doubt) our martyrdom to be.

And thus much, dear lovers and friends in God, my countrymen and kinsfolk, I have ſpoke for your comfort, leſt at my death ye might be abaſhed, or think any evil: whereas ye have rather cauſe to rejoice (if ye love me indeed) that it hath pleaſed God to call me to a greater honour and dignity, than ever I did enjoy before, either in Rocheſter, or in the ſee of London, or ever ſhould have had in the ſee of Durham, whereunto I was laſt of all elected and named: yea, I count it greater honour before God indeed to die in his cauſe (whereof I nothing doubt) than is any earthly or temporal promotion or honour that can be given to a man in this world. And who is he that knoweth the cauſe to be God's, to be Chriſt's quarrel, and of his goſpel, to be the commonweal of all the elect and choſen children of God, of all the inheritors of the kingdom of heaven; who is he (I ſay) that knoweth this aſſuredly by God's word, and the teſtimony of his own conſcience (as I, through the infinite goodneſs of God, not of myſelf, but by his grace, acknowledge myſelf to do) who is he, I ſay, that knoweth this, and both loveth and feareth God in deed and in truth, loveth and believeth his maſter Chriſt, and his bleſſed goſpel; loveth his brotherhood, the choſen children of God, and alſo luſteth and longeth for everlaſting life: who is he, I ſay again, that would not or cannot find in his heart in this cauſe to be content to die? The Lord forbid that any ſuch ſhould be that ſhould forſake this grace of God. I truſt in my Lord God, the God of mercies, and Father of all comfort, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, that he which hath put this mind, will, and affection, by his Holy Spirit, in my heart, to ſtand againſt the face of the enemy in his cauſe, and to chuſe rather the loſs of all my worldly ſubſtance, yea, and of my life too, than to deny his known truth; that he will comfort me, aid me, and ſtrengthen me evermore even unto the end, and to the yielding up of my ſpirit and ſoul into his holy hands, whereof I moſt heartily beſeech his moſt holy ſacred Majeſty of his infinite goodneſs and mercy, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

Now that I have taken leave of my countrymen and kinsfolk, and the Lord doth lend me life, and giveth me leiſure, I will bid my other good friends in God of other places alſo, farewel. And whom firſt or before other, than the univerſity of Cambridge, where I have dwelt longer, found more faithful and hearty friends, received more benefits (the benefits of my natural parents only excepted) than ever I did even in mine own country wherein I was born.

Farewel therefore (Cambridge) my loving mother and tender nurſe. If I ſhould not acknowledge thy manifold benefits, yea, if I ſhould not, for thy benefits at leaſt, love thee again, truly I were to be accounted too ungrateful and unkind. What benefits hadſt thou ever, that thou uſeſt to give and beſtow upon thy beſt beloved children, that thou thoughteſt too good for me? Thou didſt beſtow on me all thy ſchool-degrees, the common offices, the chaplainſhip of the univerſity, the office of the proctorſhip, and of a common reader; and of thy private advantages and emoluments in colleges, what was it that thou madeſt me not partner of? Firſt to be a ſcholar, then to be fellow, and after my departure from thee, thou calledſt me again to a maſterſhip of a right worſhipful college. I thank thee, my loving mother, for all this thy kindneſs, and I pray God that his laws, and the ſincere goſpel of Chriſt may ever be truly taught and faithfully learned in thee.

Farewel Pembroke Hall, of late mine own college, my cure and my charge: what caſe thou art in now God knoweth, I know not well. Thou waſt ever named ſince I knew thee, which is not thirty years ago, to be ſtudious, well learned, and a great promoter of Chriſt's goſpel, and of God's true word; ſo I found thee, and bleſſed be God, ſo I left thee indeed. Woe is me for thee mine own dear college, if ever thou ſuffer thyſelf by any means to be brought from that trade. In thy orchard (the walls, buts and trees, if they could ſpeak, would bear me witneſs) I learned without book almoſt all St. Paul's epiſtles, yea, and I think all the canonical epiſtles, ſave only the Apocalyps. Of which ſtudy, although in time a great part did depart from me, yet the ſweet ſmell thereof I truſt I ſhall carry with me into heaven: for the profit thereof I think I have felt in all my life-time ever after, and I think of late (whether they abide now or no, I cannot tell) there were others that did the like. The Lord grant that this zeal and love toward that part of God's word, which is a key and true commentary to all the holy ſcripture, may ever abide in that college ſo long as the world ſhall endure.

From Cambridge I was called into Kent by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, that moſt reverend father, and of him prefered to be vicar of Herne in Eaſt-Kent. Wherefore farewel Herne, thou worſhipful and wealthy pariſh, the firſt cure whereunto I was called to preach God's word. Thou haſt heard of my mouth oftentimes the word of God preached, not after the popiſh trade, but after Chriſt's goſpel: O that the fruit had anſwered to the ſeed. And yet I muſt acknowledge me to be thy debtor for the doctrine of the Lord's ſupper, which at that time I acknowledge God had not revealed unto me: but I bleſs God in all that godly virtue and zeal of God's word, which the Lord by preaching of his word did kindle manifeſtly both in the heart and in the life and works of that godly woman there, my lady Phines; the Lord grant that his word took like effect there in many others.

Farewel thou cathedral church of Canterbury, the metropolic ſee, whereof once I was a member. To ſpeak things pleaſant unto thee I dare not for danger of conſcience, and diſpleaſure of my Lord God; and to ſay what lieth in my heart were now too much, and I fear were able to do thee now but little good. Nevertheleſs for the friendſhip I have found in ſome there, and for charity ſake, I wiſh thee to be waſhed clean of all worldlineſs and ungodlineſs, that thou mayſt be found of God after thy name Chriſt's-church, in deed and in truth.

Farewel Rocheſter, ſometime my cathedral ſee, in whom (to ſay the truth) I did find much gentleneſs and obedience, and I truſt thou wilt not ſay the contrary, but I did uſe it to God's glory, and unto thine own profit in God.

God. O that thou hadſt and mighteſt have continued and gone forward in the trade of God's law wherein I did leave thee; then thy charge and burden ſhould not have been ſo terrible and dangerous, as I ſuppoſe verily it is like to be (alas) in the latter day.

To Weſtminſter other advertiſement in God I have not now to ſay, than I have ſaid before to the cathedral church of Canterbury, and ſo God give thee of his grace that thou mayſt learn in deed and in truth to pleaſe him after his own laws: and thus fare you well.

O London, London, to whom now may I ſpeak in thee, or whom ſhall I bid farewel? Shall I ſpeak to the prebendaries of Paul's? Alas, all that loved God's word, and were the true ſetters forth thereof, are now (as I hear ſay) ſome burnt and ſlain, ſome exiled and baniſhed, and ſome confined in hard priſon, and appointed daily to be put to moſt cruel death for Chriſt's goſpel's ſake. As for the reſt of them, I know they could never brook me well, nor could I ever delight in them.

Shall I ſpeak to the ſee thereof, wherein of late I was placed almoſt, and not fully the ſpace of three years? But what may I ſay to it, being (as I hear ſay I am) depoſed and expulſed by judgment as unjuſt uſurper of that room. O judgment, judgment. Can this be juſt judgment to condemn the chief miniſter of God's word, the paſtor and biſhop of the dioceſe, and never bring him into judgment, that he might have heard what crimes were laid to his charge, nor ever ſuffer him to have any place or time to anſwer for himſelf? Thinkeſt thou that hereafter when true juſtice ſhall have place, this judgment can ever be allowed either of God or man? Well, as for the cauſe or whole matter of my depoſition, and the ſpoil of my goods which thou poſſeſſeſt yet, I refer it unto God who is a juſt judge; and I beſeech God, if it be his pleaſure, that that which is but my perſonal wrong, be not laid to thy charge in the latter day, this only I can pray for.

O thou now wicked and bloody ſee, why doſt thou ſet up again many altars of idolatry, which by the word of God were juſtly taken away? Why doſt thou daily delude thy people, maſking in thy maſſes inſtead of the Lord's holy ſupper, which ought to be common as well (ſaith Chryſoſtom, yea the Lord himſelf), to the people as to the prieſt? How dareſt thou deny to the people of Chriſt, contrary to his expreſs commandment in the goſpel, his holy cup? Why bableſt thou to the people the Common Prayer in a ſtrange tongue, wherein St. Paul commandeth in the Lord's name, that no man ſhould ſpeak before the congregation, except it ſhould be by and by declared in their common tongue, that all might be edified? Nay, hearken thou whoriſh bawd of Babylon, thou wicked limb of Antichriſt, thou bloody wolf, why ſlayeſt thou down, and makeſt havock of the prophets of God? Why murdereſt thou ſo cruelly Chriſt's poor ſilly ſheep, which will not hear thy voice, becauſe thou art a ſtranger, and will follow none other but their own paſtor Chriſt his voice? Thinkeſt thou to eſcape, or that the Lord will not require the blood of his ſaints at thy hands? Thy God, which is the work of thy hands, and, whom thou ſayeſt thou haſt power to make, that thy deaf and dumb god, I ſay, will not indeed, nor can (although thou art not aſhamed to call him thy Maker), make thee to eſcape the revenging hand of the high and Almighty God. But be thou aſſured, that the living Lord our Saviour and Redeemer, who ſitteth on the right hand of his Father in glory, he ſeeth all thy wicked ways and cruelty done to his dear members, and he will not forget his holy ones, and his hands (O thou whoriſh drab) ſhalt thou never eſcape. Inſtead of my farewel to thee, now I ſay, Fie upon thee, fie upon thee, filthy drab, and all thy falſe prophets.

Yet thou (O London) I may not leave thee thus. Although thy epiſcopal ſee, now being joined in league with the ſeat of Satan, thus hath now both handled me and the ſaints of God, yet I do not doubt, but in that great city there may be many private mourners, who do daily mourn for that miſchief, who never did nor ſhall conſent to that wickedneſs, but to deteſt and abhor it as the ways of Satan. But theſe privy mourners here I will paſs by, and bid them farewel with their fellows hereafter, when place and occaſion ſhall more conveniently require. Among the worſhipful of the city, and eſpecially which were in office of mayoralty, yea, and in other cities alſo (whom now to name is not neceſſary), in the time of my miniſtry, which was from the latter part of Sir Rowland Hill's year, unto Sir George Barnes's year, and a great part thereof, I do acknowledge that I found no ſmall humanity and gentleneſs as methought: but (to ſay the truth), that I do eſteem above all other for true chriſtian kindneſs, which is ſhewed in God's cauſe, and done for his ſake. Wherefore, O Dobs, Dobs, alderman and knight, thou in thy year didſt win my heart for evermore, for that honourable act, that moſt bleſſed work of God, of the erection and ſetting up of Chriſt's holy hoſpitals, and truly religious houſes, which by thee and through thee were begun. For thou like a man of God, when the matter was moved for the relief of Chriſt's poor ſilly members to be holpen from extreme miſery, hunger, and famine, thy heart, I ſay, was moved with pity, and as Chriſt's high honourable officer in that cauſe, thou calledſt together thy brethern, the aldermen of the city, before whom thou breakedſt the matter for the poor; thou didſt plead their cauſe, yea, and not only in thine own perſon thou didſt ſet forth Chriſt's cauſe, but to further the matter, thou broughteſt me into the council-chamber of the city before the aldermen alone, whom thou hadſt aſſembled there together to hear me ſpeak what I could ſay, as an advocate by office and duty, in the poor men's cauſe. The Lord wrought with thee, and gave thee the conſent of thy brethren; whereby the matter was brought to the common-council, and ſo to the whole body of the city; by whom, with an uniform conſent, it was committed to be drawn, ordered, and deviſed, by a certain number of the moſt witty citizens and politic, endued alſo with godlineſs, and with ready hearts to ſet forward ſuch a noble act, as could be choſe in all the whole city: and they like true and faithful miniſters, both to their city and their maſter Chriſt, ſo ordered, deviſed, and brought forth the matter, that thouſands of ſilly poor members of Chriſt, which elſe for extreme hunger and miſery ſhould have famiſhed and periſhed, ſhall be relieved, holpen, and brought up, and ſhall have cauſe to bleſs the aldermen of that time, the common-council, and the whole body of the city, but eſpecially thee, O Dobs, and thoſe choſen men, by whom this honourable work of God was begun and wrought, and that ſo long throughout all ages, as that godly work ſhall endure; which I pray Almighty God may be ever unto the world's end, Amen.

And thou, O Sir George Barnes, the truth is to be confeſſed to God's glory, and to the good example of others, thou waſt in thy year not only a furtherer and continuer of that which before thee by thy predeceſſor was well begun, but alſo didſt labour ſo to have perfected the work, that it ſhould have been an abſolute thing, and perfect ſpectacle of true charity and godlineſs unto all Chriſtendom. Thine endeavour was to have ſet up an houſe of occupations, both that all kind of poverty, being able to work, ſhould not have lacked, whereupon profitably they might have been occupied to their own relief, and to the profit and commodity of the commonwealth of the city, and alſo to have retired thither the poor babes brought up in the hoſpitals, when they had come to a certain age and ſtrength, and alſo all thoſe which in the hoſpitals aforeſaid had been cured of their diſeaſes. And to have brought this to paſs, thou obtainedſt, not without great diligence and labour, both of thee and of thy brethren, and of that godly king Edward, that chriſtian and peerleſs prince's hand, his princly palace of Bridewell, and what other things, to the performance of the ſame, and under what condition, it is not unknown. That this thine endeavour hath not had like ſucceſs, the fault is not in thee, but in the condition and ſtate of the time, which the Lord of his infinite mercy vouchſafe to amend when it ſhall be his gracious will and pleaſure.

Farewel now all ye citizens that be of God, of what ſtate and condition ſoever ye be. Undoubtedly in London ye have heard God's word truly preached. My heart's deſire and daily prayer ſhall be for you, as for whom, for my time, I know to my Lord God I am accountable, that ye never ſwerve, neither for loſs of life nor worldly goods, from God's holy word, and yield unto Antichriſt: whereupon muſt needs follow the extreme diſpleaſure of God, and the loſs both of your bodies and ſouls into perpetual damnation for evermore.

Now that I have gone through the places where I have dwelt any ſpace in the time of my pilgrimage here upon earth, remembering that for the ſpace of king Edward's reign, which was for the time of mine office in the ſees of London and Rocheſter, I was a member of the higher houſe of the Parliament; therefore ſeeing my God hath given me leiſure, and the remembrance thereof, I will bid my lords of the temporalty farewel. They ſhall have no juſt cauſe, by God's grace, to take in ill part what I intend to ſay. As for the ſpiritual prelacy, that now is, I have nothing to ſay to them, except I ſhould repeat again a great part of that I have ſaid before now already to the ſee of London. To you therefore my lords of the temporality will I ſpeak, and this would I have you firſt to underſtand, that when I wrote this I looked daily when I ſhould be called to the change of this life, and thought that this my writing ſhould not come to your knowledge before the time of the diſſolution of my body and ſoul ſhould be expired: and therefore know ye, that I had before mine eyes only the fear of God, and chriſtian charity toward you, which moved me to write; for of you hereafter I look not in this world, either for pleaſure or diſpleaſure. If my talk ſhall do you never ſo much pleaſure or profit, you cannot promote me, nor if I diſpleaſe you, can ye hurt me or harm me, for I ſhall be out of your reach. Now therefore if you fear God, and can be content to hear the talk of him that ſeeketh nothing at your hands, but to ſerve God, and to do you good, hearken what I ſay. I ſay unto you as St. Paul ſaid to the Galatians, I wonder my lord's what hath bewitched you that you ſo ſuddenly are fallen from Chriſt to Antichriſt, from Chriſt's goſpel to men's traditions, from the Lord that bought you unto the biſhop of Rome. I warn you of your peril; be not deceived, except you will be found willingly conſenters unto your own death. For if you think thus, We are laymen, this is a matter of religion, we follow as we are taught and led; if our teachers and governors teach us and lead us amiſs, the fault is in them, they ſhall bear the blame: My lords, this is true (I grant you) that both the falſe teachers and the corrupt governor, ſhall be puniſhed for the death of their ſubject, whom they have falſly taught and corruptly led, yea, and his blood ſhall be required at their hands: but yet nevertheleſs ſhall the ſubject die the death himſelf alſo; that is, he ſhall alſo be damned for his own ſin; for if the blind lead the blind, Chriſt ſaith, not the leader only, but he ſaith, both ſhall fall into the ditch. Shall the ſynagogue and the ſenate of the Jews (think ye) which forſook Chriſt, and conſented to his death, therefore be excuſed, becauſe Annas and Caiaphas, with the ſcribes and phariſees, and their clergy, did teach them amiſs? Yea, and alſo Pilate the governor, and the emperor's lieutenant, by his tyranny did without cauſe put him to death: forſooth no, my lords, no. For notwithſtanding that corrupt doctrine, or Pilate's waſhing of his hands, neither ſhall excuſe that ſynagogue, or Pilate; but at the Lord's hand, for the effuſion of that innocent blood, all ſhall drink of the deadly whip. Ye are witty, and underſtand what I mean, therefore I will paſs over this, and return to tell you how ye are fallen from Chriſt to his adverſary the biſhop of Rome.

And leſt, my lords, ye may peradventure think, thus barely to call the biſhop of Rome Chriſt's adverſary, or (to ſpeak in plain terms) to call him Antichriſt, that it is done in mine anguiſh, and that I do but rage, and as a deſperate man do not care what I ſay, or upon whom I rail; therefore that your lordſhips may perceive my mind, and thereby underſtand that I ſpeak the words of truth and ſobriety (as St. Paul ſaid unto Feſtus) be it known unto your lordſhips all, that as concerning the biſhop of Rome, I neither hate the perſon nor the place. For I aſſure your lordſhips (the living Lord beareth me witneſs, before whom I ſpeak) I do think many a good holy man, many martyrs and ſaints of God have ſat and taught in that place Chriſt's goſpel truly, which therefore juſtly may be called Apoſtolici, that is, true diſciples of the apoſtles, and alſo that church and congregation of chriſtians to be a right apoſtolic church, yea, and that certain hundred years after the ſame was firſt erected and built upon Chriſt, by the true apoſtolical doctrine taught by the mouths of the apoſtles themſelves. If ye will know how long that was, and how many hundred years, to be curious in pointing the preciſe number of the years I will not be too bold, but thus I ſay, So long and ſo many hundred years as that ſee did truly preach and teach that goſpel, that religion, exerciſed that power, and ordered every thing by thoſe laws and rules which that ſee received of the apoſtles, (as Tertullian ſaith) the apoſtles of Chriſt, and Chriſt of God; ſo long, I ſay, that ſee might well have been called Peter and Paul's chair, and the biſhop thereof, Apoſtolicus, or true diſciple and ſucceſſor of the apoſtles, and a miniſter of Chriſt.

But ſince the time that that ſee hath degenerated from the trade of truth and true religion, which it received of the apoſtles at the beginning, and hath preached another goſpel, hath ſet up another religion, hath exerciſed another power, and hath taken upon it to order and rule the church of Chriſt by other ſtrange laws, canons and rules, than ever it received of the apoſtles, or the apoſtles of Chriſt, which things it doth at this day, and hath continued ſo doing (alas) too long a time; ſince the time, I ſay, that the ſtate and condition of that ſee hath thus been changed, in truth it ought, out of duty and of right, to have the names changed both of the ſee and of the ſitter therein. For underſtand, my lords, it was neither for the privilege of the place or perſon thereof, that that ſee and biſhops thereof were called apoſtolic; but for the true trade of Chriſt's religion, which was taught and maintained in that ſee at the firſt, and of thoſe godly men. And therefore as truly and juſtly as that ſee then, for that true trade of religion, and conſanguinity of doctrine with the religion and doctrine of Chriſt's apoſtles, was called apoſtolic; ſo as truly and juſtly for the contrariety of religion, and diverſity of doctrine from Chriſt and his apoſtles, that ſee and biſhop thereof, at this day both ought to be called, and are indeed antichriſtian.

The ſee is the ſee of Satan, and the biſhop of the ſame, that maintaineth the abominations thereof, is Antichriſt himſelf indeed. And for the ſame cauſes this ſee at this day is the ſame which St. John calleth in his Revelation, Babylon, or the whore of Babylon, and ſpiritual Sodoma and Egyptus, the mother of fornications and of the abominations upon the earth. And with this whore doth ſpiritually meddle, and lieth with her, and committeth moſt ſtinking and abominable adultery before God, all thoſe kings and princes, yea, and all nations of the earth which do conſent to her abominations, and uſe or practiſe the ſame; that is (of the innumerable multitude of them to rehearſe ſome for example's ſake), her diſpenſations, her pardons and pilgrimages, her invocation of ſaints, her worſhipping of images, her her falſe counterfeit religion in her monkery and frierage, and her traditions, whereby God's laws are defiled: as her maſſing and falſe miniſtering of God's word and the ſacraments of Chriſt, clean contrary to Chriſt's word and the apoſtle's doctrine, whereof in particular I have touched ſomething before in my talk had with the ſee of London, and in other treatiſes more at large; wherein (if it ſhall pleaſe God to bring the ſame to light) it ſhall appear, I truſt by God's grace, plainly to the man of God, and to him whoſe rule in judgment of religion is God's word, that that religion, that rule and order, that doctrine and faith which this whore of Babylon, and the beaſt whereupon ſhe doth ſit, maintaineth at this day with all violence of fire and ſword, with ſpoil and baniſhment (according to Daniel's prophecy) and finally with all falſhood, deceit, hypocriſy, and all kind of ungodlineſs, are as clean contrary to God's word, as darkneſs is unto light, or light unto darkneſs, white to black, or black to white, or as Belial to Chriſt, or Chriſt to Antichriſt himſelf.

I know, my lords, and foreſaw when I wrote this, that ſo many of you as ſhould ſee this my writing, not being before endued with the Spirit of grace and the light of God's word, ſo many (I ſay) would at theſe my words lord-like ſtamp and ſpurn, and ſpit thereat. But ſober yourſelves with patience, and be ſtill, and know ye that in my writing of this, my mind was none other, but in God (as the living God doth bear me witneſs) both to do you profit and pleaſure. And otherwiſe, as for your diſpleaſure, by that time this ſhall come to your knowledge, I truſt by God's grace, to be in the hands and protection of the Almighty, my heavenly Father, and the living Lord, which is (as St. John ſaith) the greateſt of all, and then I ſhall not need, I ſuppoſe, to fear what any lord, no nor what king or prince can do unto me.

My lords, if in times paſt ye have been contented to hear me ſometimes in matters of religion before the prince in the pulpit, and in the parliament-houſe, and have not ſeemed to have deſpiſed what I have ſaid (when as elſe if ye had perceived juſt occaſion, ye might then have ſuſpected me in my talk, though it had been reaſonable, either deſire of worldly gain, or fear of diſpleaſure) how hath then your lordſhips more cauſe to hearken to my word, and to hear me patiently, ſeeing now ye cannot juſtly think of me, being in this caſe appointed to die, and looking daily when I ſhall be called to come before the eternal Judge, otherwiſe but that I only ſtudy to ſerve my Lord God, and to ſay that thing which I am perſuaded, aſſuredly by God's word, ſhall and doth pleaſe him, and profit all them to whom God ſhall give grace to hear and believe what I do ſay? And I do ſay even that I have ſaid heretofore, both of the ſee of Rome and of the biſhop thereof, I mean after this their preſent ſtate at this day, wherein if ye will not believe the miniſters of God, and true preachers of his word, verily I denounce unto you, in the word of the Lord, except ye do repent betime, it ſhall turn to your confuſion, and to your ſmart on the latter day. Forget not what I ſay, my lords, for God's ſake forget not, but remember it upon your bed. For I tell you moreover, as I know I muſt be accountable for this my talk, and of my ſpeaking thus, to the eternal Judge (who will judge nothing amiſs) ſo ſhall you be accountable of your duty in hearing, and you ſhall be charged, if ye will not hearken to God's word, for not obeying to the truth. Alas, my lords, how chanceth this, that this matter is now new again to be perſuaded unto you? Who would have thought of late, but your lordſhips had been perſuaded indeed ſufficiently, or that ye could ever have agreed ſo uniformly, with one conſent to the aboliſhment of the uſurpation of the biſhop of Rome? If that matter were then but a matter of policy, wherein the prince muſt be obeyed; how is it now made a matter wherein (as your clergy ſaith now, and ſo ſaith the pope's law indeed) ſtandeth the unity of the catholic church, and a matter of neceſſity of our ſalvation? Hath the time, being ſo ſhort ſince the death of the two laſt kings, Henry the eighth, and Edward his ſon, altered the nature of the matter? If it have not, but was of the ſame nature and danger before God as it is now, and be now (as it is ſaid by the pope's laws, and the inſtructions ſet forth in Engliſh to the curates of the dioceſe of York) indeed a matter of neceſſity to ſalvation: how then chanced it that ye were all (O my lords) ſo light, and ſo little paſſed upon the catholic faith, and the unity thereof, without which no man can be ſaved, as for your princes' pleaſure, who were but mortal men, to forſake the unity of your catholic faith, that is, to forſake Chriſt and his goſpel? And furthermore, if it were both then, and now is ſo neceſſary to ſalvation, how chanced it alſo that ye, all the whole body of the parliament agreeing with you, did not only aboliſh and expel the biſhop of Rome, but alſo did abjure him in your own perſons, and did decree in your acts great oaths to be taken both of the ſpirituality and temporality, whoſoever ſhould enter into any weighty and chargeable office in the commonwealth? But on the other ſide, if the law and decree which maketh the ſupremacy of the ſee and biſhop of Rome over the univerſal church of Chriſt, be a thing of neceſſity required unto ſalvation by an Antichriſtian law (as it is indeed) and ſuch inſtructions as are given to the dioceſe of York, be indeed a ſetting forth of the power of the beaſt of Babylon, by the craft and falſhood of his falſe prophets (as of truth, compared to God's word, and truly judged by the ſame, it ſhall plainly appear that they be) then, my lords, never think other, but the day ſhall come when ye ſhall be charged with this your undoing of that, that once you had well done, and with this your perjury, and breach of your oath, which oath was done in judgment, juſtice and truth, agreeable to God's law. The whore of Babylon may well for a time dally with you, and make you ſo drunken with the wine of her filthy ſtews and whoredom (as with her diſpenſations and promiſes of pardon for puniſhment and crime) that for drunkenneſs and blindneſs ye may think yourſelves ſafe. But be ye aſſured, when the living Lord ſhall try the matter by the fire, and judge it according to his word, when all her abominations ſhall appear what they be, then ye, my lords (I give your lordſhips warning in time) repent, if ye will be happy, and love your own ſouls health; repent, I ſay, or elſe, without all doubt, ye ſhall never eſcape the hands of the living Lord, for the guilt of your perjury, and breach of your oath. As ye have banquetted and lain by the whore in the fornication of her whoriſh diſpenſations, pardons, idolatry, and ſuch like abominations, ſo ſhall ye drink with her (except ye repent betime) of the cup of the Lord's indignation and everlaſting wrath, which is prepared for the beaſt, his falſe prophets, and all their partakers. For he that is partner with them in their whoredom and abominations, muſt alſo be partner with them of their plagues, and in the latter day ſhall be thrown with them into the lake burning with fire and brimſtone, and unquenchable fire. Thus fare ye well, my lords all. I pray God give you underſtanding of his bleſſed will and pleaſure, and make you to believe and embrace the truth, Amen.

Another Farewel to the Priſoners in the Cauſe of Chriſt's Goſpel, and to all them who, for the ſame Cauſe, are exiled and baniſhed out from their own Country, chooſing rather to leave all worldly Commodity, than their Maſter Chriſt.

FAREWEL, my dearly beloved brethren in Chriſt, both ye, my fellow-priſoners, and ye alſo that be exiled and baniſhed out of your countries, becauſe ye will rather forſake all worldly advantages, than the goſpel of Chriſt.

Farewel all ye together in Chriſt; farewel and be merry, for ye know that the trial of your faith bringeth forth patience, and patience ſhall make us perfect, whole and ſound on every ſide, and ſuch, after trial (ye know) ſhall receive the crown of life, according to the promiſe of the Lord made to his dearly beloved; let us therefore be patient unto the coming of the Lord. As the huſbandman abideth patiently the former and the latter rain for the increaſe of his crop, ſo let us be patient, and pluck up our hearts, for the coming of the Lord approacheth apace. Let us, my dear brethren, take example of patience in tribulation of the prophets, who likewiſe ſpake God's word truly in his name. Let Job be to us an example of patience, and the end which the Lord ſuffered, which is full of mercy and pity. We know, my brethren, by God's word, that our faith ismuch more precious than any corruptible gold, and yet that is tried by the fire: even ſo our faith is therefore tried likewiſe in tribulations, that it may be found, when the Lord ſhall appear, laudable, glorious, and honourable. For if we for Chriſt's cauſe do ſuffer, that is grateful before God; for thereunto are we called, that is our ſtate and vocation, wherewith let us be content. Chriſt we know, ſuffered for us afflictions, leaving us an example that we ſhould follow his foot-ſteps; for he committed no ſin, nor was there any guile found in his mouth: when he was railed upon, and all to be reviled, he railed not again: when he was evil intreated, he did not threaten, but committed the puniſhment thereof to him that judgeth aright.

Let us ever have in freſh remembrance thoſe wonderful comfortable ſentences ſpoken by the mouth of our Saviour Chriſt, Bleſſed are they which ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Bleſſed are ye when men revile you, perſecute you, and ſpeak evil againſt you for my ſake: rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for ſo did they perſecute the prophets which were before you. Therefore let us alway bear this in our minds, that if any incommodity do happen unto us for righteouſneſs ſake, happy are we whatſoever the world doth think of us. Chriſt our maſter hath told us beforehand, that the brother ſhould put the brother to death, and the father the ſon, and the children ſhould riſe againſt their parents and kill them, and that Chriſt's true apoſtles ſhould be hated of all men for his name's ſake; but he that ſhall abide patiently to the end, ſhall be ſaved.

Let us then endure in all our troubles patiently, after the example of our maſter Chriſt, and be content therewith, for he ſuffered being our maſter and Lord: how doth it not then become us to ſuffer; for the diſciple is not above his maſter, nor the ſervant above his lord? It may ſuffice the diſciple to be as his maſter, and the ſervant to be as his lord. If they have called the Father of the family, the Maſter of the houſhold, Beelzebub, how much more ſhall they call them ſo of his houſhold? Fear them not then (ſaith our Saviour) for all privities ſhall be made plain; there is now nothing ſecret, but it ſhall be ſhewed in light. Of Chriſt's words let us neither be aſhamed nor afraid to ſpeak them: for ſo Chriſt commandeth us, ſaying, That I tell you privily, ſpeak openly abroad, and that I tell you in your ear, preach it upon the houſe-top. And fear not them which kill the body, for the ſoul they cannot kill; but fear him which can caſt both body and ſoul into hell-fire.

Know ye that the heavenly Father hath ever a gracious eye and reſpect toward you, and a fatherly providence for you, ſo that without his knowledge and permiſſion nothing can do you harm. Let us therefore caſt all our care upon him, and he ſhall provide that which ſhall be beſt for us. For if two ſmall ſparrows, which both are ſold for a mite, one of them lighteth not on the ground without your Father, and all the hairs of our head are numbered; fear not them (ſaith our maſter Chriſt) for ye are more worth than many ſmall ſparrows. And let us not ſtick to confeſs our maſter Chriſt for fear of danger, whatſoever it ſhall be, remembering the promiſe that Chriſt maketh, ſaying, Whoſoever ſhall confeſs me before men, him ſhall I confeſs before my Father which is in heaven; but whoſoever ſhall deny me, him ſhall I deny before my father which is in heaven. Chriſt came not here to give us a carnal amity, and a worldly peace, or to knit his unto the world in eaſe and peace, but rather to ſeparate and divide from the world, and to join them unto himſelf: in whoſe cauſe we muſt, if we will be his, forſake father and mother, and ſtick unto him. If we forſake him or ſhrink from him for trouble or death's ſake, which he calleth his croſs, he will none of us, we cannot be his. If for his cauſe we ſhall loſe our temporal lives here, we ſhall find them again, and enjoy them for evermore: but if in his cauſe we will not be contented to leave nor loſe them here, then ſhall we loſe them ſo, that we ſhall never find them again, but in everlaſting death. What though our troubles here are painful for the time, and the ſting of death bitter and unpleaſant? yet we know that they ſhall not laſt, in compariſon of eternity, no not the twinkling of an eye, and that they patiently taken in Chriſt's cauſe, ſhall procure and get us unmeaſurable heaps of heavenly glory, unto which theſe temporal pains of death and troubles compared, are not to be eſteemed, but to be rejoiced upon. Wonder not, ſaith St. Peter, as though it were a ſtrange matter that ye are tried by the fire (he meaneth of tribulation) which thing, ſaith he, is done to prove you; nay, rather in that ye are partners of Chriſt's afflictions, rejoice that in his glorious revelation ye may rejoice with merry hearts. If ye ſuffer rebukes in Chriſt's name, happy are ye, for the glory and Spirit of God reſteth upon you. Of them God is reviled and diſhonoured, but of you he is glorified.

Let no man be aſhamed of that which he ſuffereth as a chriſtian, and in Chriſt's cauſe? for now is the time that judgment and correction muſt begin at the houſe of God: and if it begin firſt at us, what ſhall be the end of thoſe, think ye, which believe not the goſpel? And if the righteous ſhall be hardly ſaved, the wicked and the ſinner, where ſhall he appear? Wherefore they which are afflicted, according to the will of God, let them lay down and commit their ſouls to him by well doing, as to a truſty and faithful maker. This, as I ſaid, may not ſeem ſtrange to us, for we know that all the whole fraternity of Chriſt's congregation in this world is ſerved with the like, and by the ſame is made perfect. For the fervent love that the apoſtles had unto their maſter Chriſt, and for the great advantages and increaſe of all godlineſs which they felt by their faith to inſue of afflictions in Chriſt's cauſe, and thirdly for the heaps of heavenly joys which the ſame do get unto the godly, which ſhall endure in heaven for evermore; for theſe cauſes (I ſay) the apoſtles did joy of their afflictions and rejoiced in that they were had and accounted worthy to ſuffer contumelies and rebukes for Chriſt's name. And St. Paul, as he glorifieth in the grace and favour of God, whereunto he was brought and ſtood in by faith; ſo he rejoiced in his afflictions for the heavenly and ſpiritual profits which he numbered to riſe upon them: yea, he was ſo far in love with that that the carnal man loatheth ſo much, that is, with Chriſt's croſs, that he judged himſelf to know nothing elſe but Chriſt crucified; he will glory, he ſaith, in nothing elſe but in Chriſt's croſs, yea, and he bleſſeth all thoſe, as the only true Iſraelites and elect people of God, with peace and mercy, which walk after that rule and after none other.

O Lord, what a wonderful ſpirit was that that made Paul, in ſetting forth of himſelf againſt the vanity of Satan's falſe apoſtles, and his claim there, that he in Chriſt's cauſe did excel and paſs them all? What wonderful ſpirit was that, I ſay, that made him to reckon up all his troubles, his labours, his beatings, his whipings and ſcourgings, his ſhipwrecks, his dangers and perils by water ter and by land, his famine, hunger, nakedneſs, and cold, with many more, and the daily care of all the congregations of Chriſt, among whom every man's pain did pierce his heart, and every man's grief was grievous unto him? O Lord, is this Paul's primacy, whereof he thought ſo much good that he did excel others? Is not this Paul's ſaying unto Timothy his own ſcholar? And doth it not pertain to whoſoever will be Chriſt's true ſoldiers? Bear thou, ſaith he, affliction like a good ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt. This is true: If we die with him (he meaneth Chriſt) we ſhall live with him; if we ſuffer with him, we ſhall reign with him; if we deny him, he ſhall deny us; if we be faithleſs, he remaineth faithful, he cannot deny himſelf. This, Paul would have known to every body; for there is none other way to heaven but Chriſt and his way: and all that will live godly in Chriſt, ſhall (ſaith St. Paul) ſuffer perſecution. By this way went to heaven the patriarchs, the prophets, Chriſt our maſter, his apoſtles, his martyrs, and all the godly ſince the beginning. And as it hath been of old, that he which was born after the fleſh, perſecuted him which was born after the ſpirit, for ſo it was in Iſaac's time: ſo ſaid St. Paul, it was in his time alſo. And whether it be ſo now or no, let the ſpiritual man, the ſelf-ſame man I mean, that is indued with the Spirit of Almighty God, let him be judge. Of the croſs of the patriarchs, as ye may read in their ſtories, if ye read the book of Geneſis, ye ſhall perceive. Of others, St. Paul in few words comprehendeth much matter, ſpeaking in a generality of the wonderful afflictions, death and torments, which the men of God in God's cauſe, and for the truth's ſake willingly and gladly did ſuffer. After much particular rehearſal of many, he ſaith, Others were racked and deſpiſed, and would not be delivered, that they might obtain a better reſurrection. Others again were tried with mockings and ſcourgings, and moreover with bonds and impriſonment; they were ſtoned, hewn aſunder, tempted, fell, and were ſlain upon the edge of the ſword, ſome wandered to and fro in ſheepſkins, in goat-ſkins, forſaken, oppreſſed, afflicted, ſuch godly men as the world was unworthy of, wandering in wilderneſſes, in mountains, in caves, and in dens, and all theſe were commended for their faith. And yet they abide for us the ſervants of God, and for thoſe their brethren which are to be ſlain as they were for the word of God's ſake, that none be ſhut out, but that we may all go together to meet our maſter Chriſt in the air at his coming, and ſo to be in bliſs with him in body and ſoul for evermore.

Therefore ſeeing we have ſo much occaſion to ſuffer and to take afflictions for Chriſt's name ſake patiently, ſo many advantages thereby, ſo weighty cauſes, ſo many good examples, ſo great neceſſity, ſo pure promiſes of eternal life and heavenly joys of him that cannot lye: let us throw away whatſoever might hinder us, all burden of ſin, and all kind of carnality, and patiently and conſtantly let us run for the beſt game in this race that is ſet before us, ever having our eyes upon Jeſus Chriſt the captain and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy that was ſet before him endured the croſs, not minding the ſhame and ignominy thereof, and is ſet now at the right hand of the throne of God. Conſider this, that he ſuffered ſuch ſtrife of ſinners againſt himſelf, that ye ſhould not give over nor faint in your minds. As yet, brethren, we have not withſtood unto death, fighting againſt ſin. Let us never forget, dear brethren, for Chriſt's ſake, that fatherly exhortation of the wiſe man, that ſpeaketh unto us as unto his children, the godly wiſdom of God, ſaying thus, My ſon, deſpiſe not the correction of the Lord, nor fall from him when thou art rebuked of him: for whom the Lord loveth, him doth he correct, and ſcourgeth every child whom he receiveth. What child is he, whom the father doth not chaſten? If ye be free from chaſtiſement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye baſtards, and no children. Seeing then, when as we have had carnal parents which chaſtened us, we reverenced them, ſhall not we much more be ſubject unto our ſpiritual Father, that we might live? And they for a little time have taught us after their own mind, but this Father teacheth us to our advantage, to give unto us his holineſs. All chaſtiſement, for the preſent time, appeareth not pleaſant, but painful; but afterward it rendereth the fruit of righteouſneſs on them which are exerciſed in it. Wherefore let us be of good cheer, good brethren, and let us pluck up our feeble members that were fallen or began to faint, heart, hands, knees, and all the reſt, and let us walk upright and ſtraight, that no limping or halting bring us out of the way. Let us not look upon the things that be preſent, but with the eyes of our faith let us ſtedfaſtly behold the things that be everlaſting in heaven, and ſo chooſe rather in reſpect of that which is to come, with the choſen members of Chriſt, to bear Chriſt's croſs, than for this ſhort life-time to enjoy all the riches, honours, and pleaſures of the broad world. Why ſhould we, chriſtians, fear death? Can death deprive us of Chriſt, which is all our comfort, our joy, and our life? Nay, forſooth: but contrary, death ſhall deliver us from this mortal body, which loadeth and beareth down the ſpirit, that it cannot ſo well perceive heavenly things; in which, ſo long as we dwell, we are abſent from God.

Wherefore, underſtanding our ſtate in that we be chriſtians, that if our mortal body, which is our earthly houſe, were deſtroyed, we have a building, a houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, &c. therefore we are of good cheer, and know that when we are in the body, we are abſent from God; for we walk by faith, and not by ſight. Nevertheleſs we are bold, and had rather be abſent from the body, and preſent with God. Wherefore we ſtrive, whether we be preſent at home, or abſent abroad, that we may always pleaſe him. And who that hath true faith in our Saviour Chriſt, whereby he knoweth ſomewhat truly what Chriſt our Saviour is, that he is the eternal Son of God, Life, Light, the Wiſdom of the Father, all goodneſs, all righteouſneſs, and whatſoever is good that heart can deſire, yea infinite plenty of all theſe, above that that man's heart can either conceive or think (for in him dwelleth the fullneſs of the Godhead corporally) and alſo that he is given us of the Father, and made of God to be our wiſdom, our righteouſneſs, our holineſs, and our redemption: who (I ſay) is he that believeth this indeed, that would not gladly be with his maſter Chriſt? Paul, for this knowledge, coveted to have been looſed from the body, and to have been with Chriſt, for that he counted it much better for himſelf, and had rather to be looſed than to live. Therefore theſe words of Chriſt to the thief on the croſs, that aſked of him mercy, were full of comfort and ſolace: This day ſhalt thou be with me in paradiſe. To die in the defence of Chriſt's goſpel, it is our bounden duty to Chriſt, and alſo to our neighbour. To Chriſt, becauſe he died for us, and roſe again, that he might be Lord over all. And ſeeing he died for us, we alſo, ſaith St. John, ſhould hazard, yea, give our life for our brethren; and this kind of giving and loſing, is getting and winning indeed: for he that giveth or loſeth his life thus, getteth and winneth it for evermore. Bleſſed are they therefore that die in the Lord, and if they die in the Lord's cauſe, they are moſt happy of all. Let us not then fear death, which can do us no harm, otherwiſe than for a moment to make the fleſh to ſmart: but that our faith, which is ſurely faſtened and fixed upon the word of God, telleth us that we ſhall be anon after death in peace, in the hands of God, in joy, in ſolace, and that from death we ſhall go ſtrait unto life. For St. John ſaith, He that liveth, and believeth in me, ſhall never die. And in another place, He ſhall depart from death unto life. And therefore this death of the chriſtian is not to be called death, but rather a gate or entrance unto everlaſting life. Therefore Paul calleth it but a diſſolution and reſolution, and both Peter and Paul, a putting-putting-off this tabernacle or dwelling-houſe: meaning thereby the mortal body, as wherein the ſoul or ſpirit doth dwell here in this world for a ſmall time. Yea, this my death may be called to the chriſtian, and end of all miſeries. For ſo long as we live here, we muſt paſs thro' many tribulations before we can enter into the kingdom of heaven. And now, after that death hath ſhot his bolt, all the chriſtian men's enemies have done what they can; after that they have no more to do. What could hurt or harm poor Lazarus that lay at the rich man's gate; his former penury and poverty; his miſery, beggary, and horrible ſores and ſickneſs? For ſo ſoon as death had ſtruck him with his dart, ſo ſoon came the angels and carried him ſtrait up into Abraham's boſom. What loſt he by death, who from miſery and pain is conducted by the miniſtry of angels, into a place of joy and felicity?

Farewel, dear brethren, farewel; let us comfort our hearts in all troubles, and in death, with God's word; for heaven and earth ſhall periſh, but the word of the Lord endureth for ever.

Farewel Chriſt's dearly beloved ſpouſe here wandering in this world in a ſtrange land, encompaſſed about with deadly enemies, who ſeek thy deſtruction.

Farewel, farewel, O ye the whole univerſal congregation of the choſen of God here living upon earth, the true church militant of Chriſt, the true myſtical body of Chriſt, the very houſhold and family of God, and the ſacred temple of the Holy Ghoſt, farewel.

Farewel, O thou little flock of the high heavenly paſtors of Chriſt, for to thee it hath pleaſed the heavenly Father to give an everlaſting and eternal kingdom. Farewel.

Farewel thou ſpiritual houſe of God, thou holy and royal prieſthood, thou choſen generation, thou holy nation, thou won ſpouſe. Farewel, farewel.

Another Treatiſe of Biſhop Ridley, wherein is contained, firſt a Lamentation for the Change of Religion, in England: Then a Compariſon between the Doctrine of the Goſpel, and the Romiſh Religion, with wholeſome Inſtructions in the End to all Chriſtians, how to behave themſelves in Time of Trial.

ALAS what miſery is thy church brought unto, O Lord, at this day? Where of late the word of the Lord was truly preached, was read and heard in every town, in every village, yea, and almoſt in every honeſt man's houſe, alas, now it is exiled and baniſhed out of the whole realm. Of late who was not taken for a lover of God's word, for a reader, for a ready hearer, and for a learner of the ſame? And now, alas, who dare bare any open countenance toward it, but ſuch as are content in Chriſt's cauſe, and for his word ſake to ſtand to the danger and loſs of all they have?

Of late there was to be found, of every age, of every degree and kind of people, that gave their diligence to learn (as they could), out of God's word, the articles of the chriſtian faith, the commandments of God, and the Lord's prayer: the babes and young children were taught theſe things by their parents, by their maſters, and weekly by their curates in every church: and the aged folk, which had been brought up in blindneſs, and in ignorance of thoſe things which every chriſtian is bound to know, when otherwiſe they could not, yet they learned the ſame by often hearing their children and ſervants repeat the ſame: but now (alas, and alas, again) the falſe prophets of Antichriſt which are paſt all ſhame, do openly preach in pulpits unto the people of God, that the catechiſm is to be accounted hereſy; whereby their old blindneſs is brought home again: for the aged are afraid of the higher powers, and the youth is abaſhed and aſhamed, even of that which they have learned, tho' it be God's word, and dare no more meddle.

Of late in every congregation throughout all England, prayer and petition was made unto God to be delivered from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and all his deteſtable enormities, from all falſe doctrine and hereſy; and now alas, Satan hath perſuaded England by his falſhood and craft, to revoke her old godly prayer, to recant the ſame, and provoke the fearful wrath and indignation of God upon her own pate.

Of late by ſtrict laws and ordinances, with the conſent of the nobles and commonalty, and full agreement and counſel of the prelates and clergy, the beaſt of Babylon was baniſhed hence, with laws, I ſay, and with oaths, and all means that could be deviſed for ſo godly a purpoſe: but now, alas, all theſe laws are trodden under foot; the nobles, the commonalty, the prelates and clergy are quite changed, and all thoſe oaths, though they were made in judgment, juſtice and truth, and the matter never ſo good, doth no more hold than a bond of ruſhes or of a barley ſtraw, nor public perjury no more terrifieth them, than a ſhadow upon the wall.

Of late it was agreed in England of all hands, according to St. Paul's doctrine, and Chriſt's commandment, that nothing ought to be done in the church, in the public congregation, but in that tongue which the congregation could underſtand, that all might be edified thereby, whether it where common-prayer, adminiſtration of the ſacraments, or any other thing belonging to the miniſtry of God's holy and wholeſome word: but, alas, all is turned upſide down, Paul's doctrine is put apart, Chriſt's commandment is not regarded. For nothing is heard commonly in the church, but a ſtrange tongue, that the people do not underſtand.

Of late all men and women were taught after Chriſt's doctrine, to pray in that tongue which they could underſtand, that they might pray with heart that which they ſhould ſpeak with their tongue: now, alas, the unlearned people are brought into that blindneſs again, to think that they pray, when they ſpeak with their tongue they cannot tell what, nor whereof their hearts are nothing mindful at all, for that it can underſtand never a whit thereof.

Of late the Lord's ſupper was duly adminiſtered, and taught to be made common to all that are true chriſtians, with thankſgiving, and ſetting forth of the Lord's death and paſſion until his returning again, to judge both quick and dead: but now, alas, the Lord's table is quite overthrown, and that which ought to be common to all godly, is made private to a few ungodly, without any kind of thankſgiving, or any ſetting forth of the Lord's death at all, that the people is able to underſtand.

Of late, all that were endued with the light and grace of underſtanding God's holy myſteries, did bleſs God, who had brought them out of that horrible blindneſs and ignorance, whereby in times paſt, being ſeduced by Satan's ſubtilties, they believed that the ſacrament was not the ſacrament, but the thing itſelf whereof it is a ſacrament, that the creature was the Creator, and that the thing which hath neither life nor ſenſe (alas, ſuch was the horrible blindneſs) was the Lord himſelf, which made the eye to ſee, and hath given all ſenſes and underſtanding unto man; but now, alas, England is returned again like a dog to her own vomit and ſpewing, and is in worſe caſe than ever ſhe was: for it had been better never to have known the truth, than to forſake the truth once received and known: and now, not only that light is turned into darkneſs, and God's grace is received in vain, but alſo laws of death are made by high court of parliament, maſterfully to maintain by ſword, fire, and all kind of violence, that heinous idolatry, wherein that adoration is given unto the lifeleſs and dumb creature, which is only due unto the everliving God: yea, they ſay they can, and do make of bread both man and God, by their tranſubſtantiation. O wicked men, and Satan's own brood!

Of late was the Lord's cup at his table diſtributed according to his own commandment, by his expreſs words in the goſpel, as well to the laity as to the clergy, which order order Chriſt's church obſerved ſo many hundred years after, as all the ancient eccleſiaſtical writers do teſtify, without contradiction of any one of them, that can be ſhewed unto this day; but now, alas, not only the Lord's commandment is broken, his cup is denied to his ſervants, to whom he commandeth it ſhould be diſtributed, but alſo with the ſame is ſet up a new blaſphemous kind of ſacrifice to ſatisfy and pay the price of ſins both of the quick and the dead, to the great and intolerable contumely of Chriſt our Saviour's death and paſſion, which was and is the only ſufficient and everlaſting available ſacrifice ſatisfactory for all the elect of God, from Adam the firſt, to the laſt that ſhall be born in the end of the world.

Of late the commandment of God, "Thou ſhalt not make to thyſelf any graven image, nor any ſimilitude or likeneſs of any thing in heaven above, or in earth beneath, or in the water under the earth, thou ſhalt not bow down to them nor worſhip them:" This commandment of God, I ſay, was graven almoſt every where in churches, was learned by every body, both young and old; whereupon, images that provoked the ſimple and ignorant people unto idolatry, as the wiſe man ſaith, were taken out of the churches, and ſtrictly forbidden that none ſhould any where either bow down to them, or worſhip them: But now, alas, God's holy word is blotted and razed out of churches, and ſtocks and ſtones are ſet up in the place thereof. God commanded his word ſo to be ordered, that it might be had in continual remembrance at all times, and in every place: and on the other ſide, he forbade images and idols ſo to be either made or ſet in any place, where any ſhould bow or worſhip them: but now, alas, that which God commanded is not minded, and that which he forbideth, is powerfully maintained by falſhood and craft, and wickedly upheld.

Of late all miniſters that were admitted to the public office and miniſtry of God's holy word, in their admiſſion made a ſolemn profeſſion before the congregation, that they ſhould teach the people nothing as doctrine neceſſary to eternal ſalvation, but that which is God's own holy word, or may be thereon grounded without any doubt; whereby vaniſhed and melted away of themſelves many vain, yea, wicked traditions of man, as wax before the fire; but now at one brunt they are revived, and are in full hope alſo to return again in as great ſtrength as ever they have been. And how can any man look for any other thing, but when you have received the head, you muſt alſo receive the whole body withal, or elſe how can the head abide? The head, under Satan, of all miſchief is Antichriſt and his brood, the ſame is he which is the Babylonical beaſt. The beaſt is he, whereupon the whore ſitteth. The whore is that city, ſaith John in plain words, which hath empire over the kings of the earth. This whore hath a golden cup of abomination in her hand, whereof ſhe maketh to drink the kings of the earth, and of the wine of this harlot have all nations drunk, yea and kings of the earth have lain by this whore, and merchants of the earth by virtue of her pleaſant merchandize have been made rich.

Now what city is there in all the whole world, that when John wrote, ruled over the kings of the earth; or what city can be read of in any time, that of the city itſelf challenged the empire over the kings of the earth, but only the city of Rome, and that ſince the uſurpation of that ſee hath grown to her full ſtrength? and is it not read that the old and ancient writers underſtand Peter's former epiſtle to be written at Rome, and it to be called of him in the ſame epiſtle in plain terms, Babylon? By the abominations thereof I underſtand all the whole trade of the Romiſh religion, under the name and title of Chriſt, which is contrary to the only rule of true religion, that is, God's word. What word of God hath that deviliſh drab for the maintenance of her manifold abominations, and to ſet to ſale ſuch merchandize, wherewith (alas! the madneſs of man) the wicked harlot hath almoſt bewitched the whole world? Did not Peter, the very true apoſtle of Chriſt (of whom this ſtinking ſtrumpet beareth herſelf ſo high, but falſly and without all juſt cauſe) did not he, I ſay, give all the world warning of her pelf and traſh, of her falſe doctors and apoſtles (for this whore will be called the Lord's apoſtle, whoſoever ſay nay) after this manner in his latter epiſtle? "There was among the people in times paſt falſe prophets, as there ſhall be among you in time to come falſe teachers, which ſhall privily bring in peſtilent ſects, even denying the Lord which hath bought them and redeemed them, procuring to themſelves ſwift damnation, and many ſhall follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth ſhall be railed upon, and through covetouſneſs by counterfeit tales or ſermons, they ſhall make merchandize upon you, &c." And doth not John likewiſe in his Revelation, after he hath reckoned up a great rabblement of this whore's myſtical merchandize, at the laſt (as though he would knit up all in plain words, without any miſt at all, ſetting out the whore's merchandize) reckon up amongſt the reſt, and concludeth, ſaying, And the ſouls of men too? Whereupon I pray you elſe roſe this true proverb in Latin, Omnia Romæ venalia, that is, All things for money are ſet to ſale at Rome?

Was not that a worthy commendation of Chriſt's vicar in earth, that was written of our holy father, one of the Alexanders, a biſhop of Rome?

Alexander our holy father the pope of Rome,
Selleth for money both right and doom;
And all kind of holineſs the holy father doth not ſtick
To ſet to ſale, ready money for to get:
And eke Chriſt himſelf he dare be bold,
To chop and change for ſilver and gold.
And why ſhould any think this to be ſore,
For what doth he ſell but that he bought before.

I grant theſe verſes are very mean; but alas, ſuch conditions were more wicked and lewd than any wit could expreſs. If theſe had been but the faults of one or a few in number, they had been leſs pernicious, and might have been taken for perſonal crimes, and not to be imputed unto that ſee: But now (alas) the matter is more than evident to all that have godly underſtanding, that theſe crimes are grounded upon laws, eſtabliſhed by cuſtom, and ſet forth by all kind of wicked doctrine, falſhood and craft; and therefore now are not to be eſteemed for any one man's, or a few men's perſonal crimes, but are now by laws, cuſtom and doctrine incorporated into that wicked ſee, and maketh indeed the body of the beaſt whereupon the abominable whore doth ſit.

But you would know which be thoſe merchandizes which I ſaid this whore ſeſteth forth to ſell, for which all her falſe prophets, with all their juglings and crafty gloſſes cannot bring one jot of God's word. Surely, ſurely, they be not only all theſe abominations which are come into the church of England already (whereof I have ſpoke ſomewhat before) but alſo an innumerable rabblement of abominations and wicked abuſes, which now muſt needs follow; as popiſh pardons, pilgrimages, Romiſh purgatory, Romiſh maſſes, diſpenſations, and immunities from all godly diſcipline, laws and good order, pluralities, unions, with a thouſand more. Now ſhall come in the flattering friars and the falſe pardoners, and play their old pranks and knavery as they were wont to do. Now ſhall you have (but of the ſee of Rome only and that for money) canonizing of ſuch ſaints as have ſtood ſtout in the pope's cauſe, ſhrining of relics, and from any kind of wickedneſs (if you will pay well for it) clear abſolution from puniſhment and crime, for thouſands of pears, yea, and at every biſhop's hand and ſuffragan, ye ſhall have hallowing of churches, chapels, altars, ſuper-altars, chalices, and of all the whole houſhold-ſtuff and adornment which ſhall be uſed in the church after the Romiſh guiſe, for all theſe things muſt be eſteemed of ſuch high price, that they may not be done but by a conſecrated biſhop only. O Lord, all theſe things are ſuch as thy apoſtles never knew. As for conjuring (they call it hallowing, but it is conjuring indeed) of water and ſalt, of chriſtening of bells, and ſuch like things, what need I to ſpeak? For every prieſt that can but read, hath power (they ſay) not only to do that, but alſo hath ſuch power over Chriſt's body, as to make both God and man once at leaſt every day of a wafer cake.

After the rehearſal of the ſaid abominations, and remembrance of a number of many more, which (the Lord knoweth) grieveth me to think upon, and were too long to deſcribe; when I conſider on the other ſide the eternal word of God that abideth for ever, and the undefiled law of the Lord which turneth the ſoul from all wickedneſs, and giveth wiſdom unto the innocent babes, I mean that milk that is without all guile, as Peter calleth it, that good word of God, that word of truth which muſt be engraven within the heart, and then is able to ſave men's ſouls; that wholeſome ſeed, not mortal but immortal, of the eternal and everlaſting God, whereby the man is born anew, and made the child of God, that ſeed of God, whereby the man of God ſo being born, cannot ſin, as John ſaith, (he meaneth ſo long as that ſeed abideth in him) that holy ſcripture which hath not been deviſed by the wit of man, but taught from heaven by the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, which is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to inſtruct, and to give order in all righteouſneſs, that the man of God may be whole and ſound, ready to perform every good work: when, I ſay, I conſider this holy and wholeſome true word that teacheth us truly our bounden duty towards our Lord God in every point, what his bleſſed will and pleaſure is, what his infinite great goodneſs and mercy is, what he hath done for us, how he hath given us his own only dearly beloved Son to death for our ſalvation, and by him hath ſent us the revelation of his bleſſed will and pleaſure, what his eternal word willeth us both to believe, and alſo to do; and hath for the ſame purpoſe inſpired the holy apoſtles with the Holy Ghoſt, and ſent them abroad into all the world, and alſo made them and other diſciples of Chriſt inſpired the ſame Spirit, to write and leave behind them the ſame things that they taught (which as they did proceed of the Spirit of truth, ſo by the confeſſion of all them that ever were endued with the Spirit of God, were ſufficient to the obtaining of eternal ſalvation:) and likewiſe when I conſider that all that man doth profeſs in his regeneration, when he is received into the holy catholic church of Chriſt, and is now to be accounted for one of the lively members of Chriſt's own body, all that is grounded upon God's holy word, and ſtandeth in the profeſſion of that faith, and obedience of thoſe commandments which are all contained and compriſed in God's holy word.

And furthermore, when I conſider whom our Saviour Chriſt pronounceth in his goſpel to be bleſſed, and to whom Moſes giveth his benedictions in the law, what ways the law, the prophets, the pſalms, and all holy ſcriptures, both new and old, do declare to be the ways of the Lord, what is good for man to obtain and abide in God's favour, which is that faith which juſtifieth before God, and what is that charity that doth paſs and excel all, which be the properties of heavenly wiſdom, and which is that undefiled religion which is allowed of God, which things Chriſt himſelf calleth the weighty matters of the law, what thing is it which is only available in Chriſt, and what knowledge is that that St. Paul eſteemed ſo much, that he counted himſelf only to know what ſhall be the manner of the extreme judgment of the latter day, who ſhall judge, and by what he ſhall judge, and what ſhall be required at our hands at that fearful day, how all things muſt be tried by the fire, and that only ſhall ſtand for ever which Chriſt's words ſhall allow, which ſhall be the judge of all fleſh, to give ſentence upon all fleſh, and every living ſoul, either of eternal damnation, or of everlaſting ſalvation, from which ſentence there ſhall be no place of appeal, no wit ſhall ſerve to deludge, nor any power to withſtand or revoke. When (I ſay) I conſider all theſe things, and confer to the ſame again and again all thoſe ways wherein ſtandeth the ſubſtance of the Romiſh religion (whereof I ſpake before) it may be evident and eaſy to perceive, that theſe two ways, theſe two religions, the one of Chriſt, the other of the Romiſh ſee, in theſe latter days be as far diſtant the one from the other, as light and darkneſs, good and evil, righteouſneſs and unrighteouſneſs, Chriſt and Belial. He that is hard of belief, let him note and weigh well with himſelf the places of holy ſcriptures whereupon this talk is grounded, and by God's grace he may receive ſome light. And unto the contemner I have nothing now to ſay, but to rehearſe the ſaying of the prophet Iſaiah, which Paul ſpake to the Jews in the end of the Acts of the apoſtles. After he had expounded to them the truth of God's word, and declared to them Chriſt out of the law of Moſes and the prophets, all the day long from morning to night, he ſaid unto them that would not believe: "Well (ſaid he) ſpake the Holy Ghoſt unto our fathers, ſaying, Go unto this people and tell them, ye ſhall hear with your ears, and not underſtand, and ſeeing you ſhall behold, and not ſee the thing: for the heart of this people is waxed groſs and dull, and with their ears they are hard of hearing, and they have ſhut together their eyes, that they ſhould not ſee, nor hear with their ears, nor underſtand with their hearts, that they might return, and I ſhould heal them, ſaith the Lord God.".

Alas, England, alas, that this heavy plague of God ſhould fall upon thee. Alas, my dearly beloved country, what thing is it now that may do thee good? Undoubtedly thy plague is ſo great, that it is utterly uncurable, but by the bottomleſs mercy and infinite power of Almighty God. Alas, my dear country, what haſt thou done that thou haſt provoked the wrath of God, and cauſed him to pour out his vengeance upon thee for thine own deſerts? Canſt thou be content to hear thy faults told thee? Alas, thou haſt heard oft, and wouldſt never amend. England, thy faults of all degrees and ſorts of men, of magiſtrates, of the miniſters, and of the common people, were never more plainly told ſince thou beareſt that name, than thou didſt hear them of late, even before the magiſtrates in king Edward's days, but thou hearedeſt them only, and didſt amend never a whit. For even of thy greateſt magiſtrates ſome (the king's highneſs then, that innocent, that godly-hearted and peerleſs young chriſtian prince excepted), evermore unkindly and ungently, againſt thoſe that went about moſt buſily and moſt wholeſomely to cure their ſore backs, ſpurned privily, and would not ſpare to ſpeak evil of them, even unto the prince himſelf, and yet would they towards the ſame preachers outwardly bear a jolly countenance and a fair face.

I have heard that Cranmer, and another whom I will not name, were both in high diſpleaſure, the one for ſhewing his conſcience ſecretly, but plainly and fully in the duke of Somerſet's cauſe, and both of late, but eſpecially Cranmer, for repugning, as they might, againſt the late ſpoil of the church goods, taken away only by commandment of the higher powers, without any law or order of juſtice, and without any requeſt or conſent of them to which they did belong. As for Latimer, Lever, Bradford and Knox, their tongues were ſo ſharp, they ripped in ſo deep in their galled backs, to have purged them (no doubt) of that filthy matter that was feſtered in their hearts, of inſatiable covetouſneſs, of filthy carnality and voluptuouſneſs, of intolerable ambition and pride, of ungodly loathſomeneſs to hear poor men's cauſes, and to hear God's word, that theſe men of all others theſe magiſtrates then could never abide.

Other

Others there were very godly men, and well learned, that went about by the wholeſome plaiſters of God's word, howbeit after a more ſoft manner of handling the matter, but alas all ſped alike. For all that could be done of all hands, their diſeaſe did not diminiſh, but daily did increaſe, which, no doubt, is no ſmall occaſion in that ſtate of the heavy plague of God that is poured upon England at this day. As for the common ſort of other inferior magiſtrates, as judges of the laws, juſtices of peace, ſerjeants, common lawyers, it may be truly ſaid of them, as of the moſt part of the clergy, of curates, vicars, parſons, prebendaries, doctors of the law, archdeacons, deans, yea, and I may ſay, of biſhops alſo, I fear, for the moſt part, (although I doubt not but God had, and hath ever, whom he in every ſtate knew and kneweth to be his) but for the moſt part, I ſay, they were never perſuaded in their hearts, but from the teeth forward, and for the king's ſake, in the truth of God's word, and yet all theſe did diſſemble, and bear a copy of a countenance, as if they had been ſound within.

And this diſſimulation Satan knew well enough, and therefore deſired, and hath ever gone about, that the high magiſtrates by any manner of means might be deceived in matters of religion; for then he being of counſel with the diſſimulation in the worldly, knew well enough that he ſhould bring to paſs, and rule all even after his own will.

Hypocriſy and diſſimulation St. Jerome doth well call a double wickedneſs; for neither it loveth the truth (which is one great evil) and alſo falſly it pretendeth to deceive the ſimple for another thing. This hypocriſy and diſſimulation with God, in matters of religion, no doubt, hath wholly alſo provoked the anger of God. And as for the common people, although there were many good, where they were well and diligently taught: yet (God knoweth) a great number received God's true word and high benefits with unthankful hearts. For it was great pity, and a lamentable thing to have ſeen in many places the people ſo loathſomely and unreligiouſly to come to the holy communion, and to receive it accordingly, and to the common prayers, and other divine ſervice, which were according to the true vein of God's holy word, and in all points ſo godly and wholeſomely ſet forth, in compariſon of that blind zeal, and undiſcreet devotion which they had aforetime to thoſe things, whereof they underſtood never one whit, nor could be edified by them any thing at all.

And again, as for our alms-deeds, which are taught in God's word, whereby we are certain that God is pleaſed with them, and doth and will require ſuch at our hands, which are a part of true religion, as St. James ſaith, and ſuch as he ſaith himſelf he ſetteth more by than by ſacrifice; as to provide for the fatherleſs, infants and orphans, for the lame, aged, and impotent poor needy folk, and to make public proviſion that the poor that might labour, ſhould have wherewithal to labour upon, and ſo be kept from ſhameful beggary and ſtealing in theſe works: I ſay, how wayward were many, in compariſon (I mean) of that great prodigality whereby in times paſt, they ſpared not to ſpend upon flattering friars, falſe pardoners, painting, gilding of ſtocks and ſtones, to be ſet up and honoured in churches, plainly againſt God's word? And yet becauſe no place is to be defrauded of their juſt commendation, London, I muſt confeſs, for ſuch godly works in Sir Richard Dobs, knight, then lord mayor, his year began marvellous well: the Lord grant the ſame may ſo likewiſe perſevere, continue, yea and increaſe, to the comfort and relief of the needy and helpleſs, that was ſo godly begun, Amen.

All theſe things do adminiſter more matter of mourning and bewailing the miſerable ſtate that now is: for by this it may be perceived, how England hath deſerved this juſt plague of God. And alſo it is greatly to be feared, that theſe good things, whatſoever they were that had their beginning in the time when God's word was ſo freely preached, now with the exile and baniſhment of the ſame will depart again.

But to return again to the conſideration of this miſerable ſtate of Chriſt's church in England, and to leave farther and more exquiſite ſearching of the cauſes thereof unto God's ſecret and unſearchable judgments, let us ſee what is beſt now to be done for Chriſt's little flock. This is one maxim and principle in Chriſt's law; He that denieth Chriſt before men, him ſhall Chriſt deny before his Father and all the angels in heaven. And therefore every one that looketh to have, by Chriſt our Saviour, everlaſting life, let him prepare himſelf ſo, that he deny not his maſter Chriſt, or elſe he is but a caſtaway, and a wretch, howſoever he be counted or taken here in the world.

Now then ſeeing the doctrine of Antichriſt is returned again into this realm, and the higher powers (alas) are ſo deceived and bewitched, that they are perſuaded it to be truth, and Chriſt's true doctrine to be error and hereſy, and the old laws of Antichriſt are allowed to return with the power of their father again: what can be hereafter looked for, by reaſon, to the man of God, and true chriſtian, abiding in this realm, but extreme violence of death, or elſe to deny his maſter? I grant, the hearts of princes are in God's hands, and whitherſoever he will, he can make them bow: and alſo that chriſtian kings, in old time, uſed a more gentle kind of puniſhment, even to them which were heretics indeed; as degradation, and depoſition out of their rooms and offices, exile and baniſhment out of their dominions and countries: and alſo (as it is read) the true biſhops of Chriſt's church were ſometime interceſſors for the heretics unto princes, that they would not kill them, as is read of St. Auguſtine. But as yet Antichriſt's kingdom was not ſo erected at that time, nor is now accuſtomed ſo to order them that will not fall down and worſhip the beaſt and his image (but even as all the world knoweth) after the ſame manner, that both John and Daniel hath propheſied before, that is, by violence of death; and Daniel declareth farther, that the kind of death accuſtomably ſhould be by ſword, fire, and impriſonment.

Therefore if thou, O man of God, doſt purpoſe to abide in this realm, prepare and arm thyſelf to die: for both by Antichriſt's accuſtomable laws, and theſe propheſies, there is no appearance or likelihood of any other thing, except thou will deny their maſter Chriſt, which is the loſs at the laſt both of body and ſoul unto everlaſting death. Therefore my good brother or ſiſter in Chriſt, whatſoever thou be, to thee that canſt and mayſt ſo do, that counſel that I think is the beſt ſafeguard for thee, both for thy body, and moſt ſurety for thy ſoul's health, is that which I ſhall ſhew thee hereafter. But firſt I warn thee to underſtand me to ſpeak to him or her, which be not in captivity, or called already to confeſs Chriſt, but are at liberty abroad.

My counſel, I ſay, therefore is this, to fly from the plague, and get thee hence. I conſider not only the ſubtilties of Satan, and how he is able to deceive by his falſe perſuaſions (if it were poſſible) even the choſen of God, and alſo the great frailty, which is oftentimes more in a man, than he doth know in himſelf, which he in the time of temptation then will utter itſelf: I do not only conſider theſe things, I ſay, but that our maſter Chriſt, whoſe life was and is a perfect rule of the chriſtian man's life, that he himſelf avoided oftentimes the fury and madneſs of the Jews, by departing from the country or place.

Paul likewiſe, when he was ſought in Damaſcus, and the gates of the city were laid in wait for him, he was conveyed by night, being let down in a baſket out at a window over the wall: and Elias the prophet fled the perſecution of wicked Jeſabel: and Chriſt our Saviour ſaith in the goſpel, "When they perſecute you in one city, fly unto another:" and ſo did many good, great, learned and virtuous men of God, who were great and maintainers of Chriſt and his truth, in due time and place.

place. Of ſuch was the great clerk Athanaſius. But this is ſo plain to be lawful by God's word, and examples of holy men, that I need not to ſtand in it.

Having this for my ground, I ſay to thee, O man of God, this ſeemeth to me to be the moſt ſure way for thy ſafeguard, to depart and fly far from the plague, and that ſwiftly alſo: for truly before God, I think, that the abomination that Daniel propheſied of ſo long before, is now ſet up in the holy place. For all the doctrine of Antichriſt, his laws, rites and religion contrary to Chriſt, and ſo to the true ſerving and worſhipping of God I underſtand to be that abomination: therefore now is the time in England for thoſe words of Chriſt, "Then they that be in Judea, let them fly into the mountains. Then (ſaith he) mark this Chriſt's (Then) for truly I am perſuaded, and I truſt by the Spirit of God, that this (Then) is commanded: "Then (ſaith Chriſt) they that be in Jewry, let them fly into the mountains, and he that is on the houſe top, let him not come down to take away any thing out of his houſe, and he that is abroad in the field, let him not return to take his cloaths. Woe to be the great-bellied women, and to them that give ſuck; but pray (ſaith Chriſt) that your flight be not in winter, or on the ſabbath day.

Theſe words of Chriſt are myſtical, and therefore had need of interpretation. I underſtand all thoſe to be in Jewry ſpiritually, which truly confeſs one true living God, and the whole truth of his word, after the doctrine of the goſpel of Chriſt. Such as they whom Chriſt here biddeth, in the time of the reign of Antichriſt's abominations, to fly unto the mountains: which ſignifieth places of ſafeguard, and all ſuch things which are able to defend from the plague. That he biddeth him that is on the houſe top, not to come down, and him that is on the field, not to return to take with him his cloaths; he meaneth that they ſhould ſpeed them to get them away betime, leſt in their tarrying and trifling about working proviſion, they be trapped in the ſnare ere ever they be aware, and caught by the back, and for gain of ſmall worldly things, endanger and caſt themſelves into great perils of more weighty matters. And where he ſaith, Woe be to the great-bellied women, and to them that give ſuck; women great with child, and nigh to their lying down, and to be brought to-bed, and not able to travail: and alſo thoſe women which are brought to-bed, and now give their babes ſuck: by theſe therefore Chriſt ſpiritually underſtandeth all ſuch to be in extreme danger, which this word (Woe) ſignifieth: all ſuch, I ſay, as are ſo hindered by any manner of means, that they no ways be able to fly from the plague. And where Chriſt ſaith, Pray you that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the ſabbath day: in winter, the common courſe of the year teacheth us, that the ways be foul, and therefore it is a hard thing then to take a far journey, for many incommodities and dangers of the ways in that time of the year; and on the ſabbath-day it was not lawful to journey, but a little way. Now Chriſt therefore meaning that we ſhould have need, both to ſpeed our journey quickly, which cannot be done in winter, for the badneſs of the ways, and alſo to go far, which cannot be done on the ſabbath day: he biddeth us therefore pray that our flight be not in the winter, nor on the ſabbath day; that is, to pray that we may fly in time, and alſo far enough from the danger of the plague. Now, the cauſes why we ſhould fly, follow in the ſame place of St. Matthew's goſpel, which I now paſs over; thou mayſt read them there.

And in the eighteenth chapter of the Revelation, the angel is ſaid to have cried mightily with a loud voice, "Fly, my people, out of Babylon, leſt you be infected with her faults, and ſo be made partners of her plagues: for her offences and ſins are grown ſo great, that they ſwell, and are come unto the heavens:" Certainly the time doth approach, and the Lord's day is at hand. Hear, I beſeech you, alſo holy Paul, that bleſſed apoſtle, he plainly forbiddeth us, "To join or couple ourſelves with the unfaithful: for what fellowſhip can there be, ſaith he, of righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs, what company hath light with darkneſs, or what agreement hath Chriſt with Belial? Or what part can the faithful have with the unfaithful? Or how doth the temple of God agree with images or idols? For you are the temple of the living God: as God hath ſaid, I will walk and dwell in them, I will be their God, and they ſhall be my people: wherefore depart from amongſt them, and get you from them, ſaith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing: and I will receive you, and be to you in the ſtead of your father, and you ſhall be unto me as my ſons and daughters, ſaith the Almighty God."

This counſel to depart the realm, I do not marvel it doth ſeem to divers (even of them I mean that bear favour to Godward) diverſly. Many (I truſt) that be learned ſhall think the counſel good. Others there be, peradventure, that will think it rather a thing to be more tolerable, and that it may be indeed by God's word lawfully done, rather than to be counſelled to be done, for they will peradventure ſay, we ſhould counſel a man always to do that which is beſt of all, and of moſt perfection: but boldly in Chriſt's cauſe to ſpend a man's life, is beſt of all, and of moſt perfection, and to fly, it may ſeem to ſmell of cowardice. In many things, that which is beſt for one at ſome times, is not beſt for all at all times, and it is not moſt perfection, nor meet for a child to covet to run, before he can go. I will not make here a diſcourſe in this matter, what might here be objected, and what might be anſwered again; I leave that to the witty and eloquent men of the world.

This is my mind, which I would thou ſhouldeſt know, O man of God, as I would wiſh, and I do pray to Almighty God it may be, that every true chriſtian, either brother or ſiſter (after they be called, and brought into the wreſtling-place, to ſtrive in Chriſt's cauſe for the beſt game, that is, to confeſs the truth of the goſpel, and of the chriſtian faith, in hope of everlaſting life) ſhould not ſhrink nor relent one inch, nor give back, whatſoever ſhall befal, but to ſtand to their tackle, and ſtick by it even unto death, as they will Chriſt ſhall ſtick by them at the latter day: ſo likewiſe I dare not wiſh nor counſel any, either brother or ſiſter, of their own ſwinge, to ſtart up into the ſtage, or to caſt themſelves either before, and farther in danger than time and need ſhall require: for undoubtedly, when God ſeeth his time, and his pleaſure is, that his glory ſhall be ſet forth, and his church edified by thy death and confeſſion, means ſhall be found by his fatherly univerſal providence, that thou, without thine own preſumptuous provocation, ſhall be lawfully called, to do thy feat, and to play thy part. The miſerable end that one Quintus came unto, may be a warning, and a fearful example for all men to beware of preſumption, and raſhneſs in ſuch things (as Euſebius writeth in his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory) for evermore.

But a third ſort of men there be, who alſo will be counted favourers of God's word, and are (I fear) in number far more, and worſe to be perſuaded to that which is the godly mean. I mean of ſuch as will peradventure ſay or think, that my former counſel, which was to fly the infection of the Antichriſtian doctrine by departing out of the realm, is more than needeth, and other ways and means may be found, both to abide, and alſo to be clear out of danger of the aforeſaid plague. If that could be found, both to abide, and alſo to be clear out of danger of the aforeſaid plague, truly agreeable to God's word, I would be as glad to hear it, God is my witneſs, as who is the other. Yes, peradventure will ſome ſay, thus it may be: Thou mayſt keep thyſelf, thy faith, and thy religion cloſe to thyſelf, and inwardly and privily worſhip God in ſpirit and truth, and outwardly ſee thou be no open meddler, nor talker, nor tranſgreſſor of common order: ſo mayeſt thou be ſuffered in the commonwealth, and yet uſe thy religion yet, without offence of thy conſcience. In other countries ſomewhere this peradventure might be uſed, but in England what ſhall be, God knoweth: but it was never yet, ſo far as ever I have known or heard. And alſo how can it be, but either thou muſt tranſgreſs the common order, and the Romiſh laws and cuſtoms, which have been uſed in England, in the times paſt of popery, and now (it is certain) they return again: I ſay, thou muſt either be a breaker of theſe rites, laws, and cuſtoms, and ſo bewray thyſelf, or elſe if thou be indeed a man of God, thou ſhalt offend thy conſcience; for in obſerving of them thou ſhalt be compelled to break God's law, which is the rule of conſcience to the man of God. For how canſt thou reſort every holy-day to the church, and bear a face to worſhip the creature inſtead of the Creator, as thou muſt do, and peradventure confeſs it too with thy mouth, and to ſprinkle thyſelf with the conjured water.

Thou muſt be contributor alſo to the charges of all their popery, as of books of Antichriſt's ſervice, of lights of the rood-loft, of the ſepulchre for ſetting up and painting images (nay indeed of idols), and thou muſt bear a face to worſhip them alſo, or elſe thou muſt be had by the back. Thou muſt ſerve the turn, to give the holy loaves, as they call it, which is nothing elſe but a very mockery of the Lord's holy table. Thou muſt be a contributor to the charges of all the diſguiſed apparel, that the popiſh ſacrificing prieſt, like unto Aaron, muſt play his part in. Yea, when the pardoner goeth about, or the flattering friar to beg for the maintenance of ſuperſtition, except thou do as thy neighbours do, look not long to live at reſt. If any of thy family die, if thou wilt not pay money for ringing, and ſinging, for Requiem, maſſes, Dirges, and commendations, and ſuch like trumpery of the Antichriſtian religion, thinkeſt thou that thou ſhalt be reckoned for a catholic man, or for Cæſar's friend? An hundred things more may be reckoned, and many of more weight, and of more evident ſuperſtition and idolatry, than ſome of theſe which I have now reheatſed, which, God knoweth, be ill enough: but theſe are enough to declare, and to ſet before thine eyes, the thing that I intend, that is, if thou abide and wilt dwell in England, thou muſt either do theſe, and many others more contrary to God's word, which forbiddeth not only the thing which are evil, but alſo ſaith, Abſtain from all things that have any appearance of evil; or elſe if thou wilt not do them, how thou canſt live in England in reſt ſafe from the ſtake, truly I cannot tell.

But peradventure (as a man is ready to find, and invent ſome colour to cloak his conſcience, to do that thing that his heart deſireth), thou wilt ſay, though at any time I ſhall be forced to do any of theſe things, and ſuch-like, yet will I have no confidence in them, but outwardly with my body; I will keep mine heart unto God, and will not do that of mine own mind willingly neither, but to avoid another inconvenience: I truſt therefore God will hold me excuſed, for he ſhall have my heart: what can I do more?

O my friend, beware, for God's ſake, and know that the ſubtilties of Satan are very deep. He that is not able by God's word to perceive them, is heavily laden. Pray therefore with David; Lord let me not have a mind to invent excuſes to cloak my ſin: examine, my dear friend, theſe thy wily ways with the word of God, and if they do agree, thou mayeſt uſe them: if not, know, though they may ſeem never ſo fine and goodly, yet indeed they be of Satan's brood. God's word is certain, that forbideth to worſhip the creature for the Creator, for that is heinous idolatry, and againſt the firſt commandment of God, and it is alſo againſt the ſecond commandment of the firſt table to bow down, or to worſhip unto any images of God, or of any other thing: and God's word requireth not only the belief of the heart, but alſo the confeſſion of the mouth: and to bear part of the charges, to the maintenance of things ungodly, what is that, but in thy ſo doing, a conſent to the thing done? Now conſenters and the doers of God's word accounteth to be guilty both: and it is not lawful, by St. Paul's doctrine, which was inſpired him by the Spirit of God, to do ill, that thereof the thing which is good may come.

Thy heart, thou ſayeſt, God ſhall have, and yet wilt ſuffer thy body to do the thing that God doth abhor. Beware, O man, take heed what thou ſayeſt; man may be deceived, but no man may deceive God, for he is called, and is truly the ſearcher of the heart. Now, to give God thy heart, is to give him thy whole heart, to love him, to dread him, and to truſt in him above all other things. "He that hath my commandments, ſaith Chriſt, and obſerveth and keepeth them, it is he that loveth me:" And to dread God above all others, is rather willingly to incur the danger and peril of all fearful things, than wittingly to do that thing which is contrary to his bleſſed will and commandment; and to truſt in him above all things, is aſſuredly to truſt to his promiſe of his reward, and of his tuition, and of his goodneſs and mercy, and to prefer that above all things in the world, ſeem they never ſo ſtrong, ſo wiſe, or ſo good. Now, canſt thou ſay truly, that God hath thy heart after this manner of ſort (which is to have thy heart indeed), when thy deeds do declare far another thing? Thy body, O man, is God's, and all the parts thereof, even as thy ſoul is: he made them both, and Chriſt with his blood redeemed them both, and is Lord of both, for he hath bought them both dearly; and dareſt thou ſuffer any part of either of them to do ſervice to Satan? Surely in ſo doing thou commiteſt ſacrilege and doſt rob God, thou defileſt the living temple of the living God, if thou ſuffer thy body to do Satan ſervice. "Do you not know, ſaith St. Paul, that your body is a lively temple of God?" And may a man then take and uſe any part thereof but in the ſervice of God? No, ſurely, it is not lawful ſo to do for the man of God, neither with hand, tongue, nor feet, nor any part of the whole body.

Doth not Paul command that to the Romans, which pertaineth to every chriſtian ſoul? "As you have in times paſt, ſaith he, given your members to do ſervice unto uncleanneſs and wickedneſs, from one wickedneſs to another; ſo now give your members to do ſervice unto righteouſneſs, that you may be ſanctified." And I pray thee, good brother, what doſt thou think it is to bear the mark of the beaſt in the forehead, and in the hand that St. John ſpeaketh of? I know we ought warily to ſpeak of God's myſteries, which he ſhewed by the Spirit of propheſying to his ſervant John, yet to read them with reverence, and to pray for the ſame, ſo much as God knoweth is neceſſary for our time to know, I think it neceſſary and good. Wherefore what I ſuppoſe is to bear the beaſt's mark, I will tell thee, and commit the judgment of mine interpretation, as in all other things, to the ſpiritual man. I ſuppoſe he beareth the beaſt of Babylon's mark in his forehead, which is not aſhamed of the beaſt's ways, but will profeſs them openly to ſet forth his maſter the beaſt of Abaddon. And likewiſe he beareth his mark in his head, that will and doth practiſe the works of the beaſt with his power and hand. And likewiſe I will not let to tell thee, what I think to be ſigned in the forehead for the ſervant of God is, whereof John alſo ſpeaketh, reckoning up many thouſands ſo to have been ſigned of every tribe. I ſuppoſe he is ſigned in the forehead for the ſervant of God, whom God hath appointed of his infinite goodneſs, and hath given him grace and ſtrength ſtoutly to confeſs him, and his truth before the world. And to have grace and ſtrength to confeſs Chriſt, and the doctrine of the croſs, and to lament and mourn for the abominations of Antichriſt, I ſuppoſe is to be ſigned with Tau, whereof Ezekiel the prophet doth ſpeak. Thus I ſuppoſe theſe prophecies are ſpiritually to be underſtood: and to look for other corporal marks, to be ſeen in men's foreheads, or in their hands, is nothing elſe but to look that there ſhould come ſome brute beaſt out of Babylon, or ſome elephant, leopard, lion or camel, or ſome other ſuch monſtrous beaſt with ten horns, that ſhould do all the wonderful things ſpoken in John: and yet of a beaſt ſpeaketh John, but I underſtand him ſo to be called, not for that he ſhall be any ſuch brute beaſt, but for that he is and ſhall be the child of perdition, which for his cruelty and beaſtly manners is well called a beaſt.

The carnal Jews knew there was a promiſe made, that Elias ſhould come before Chriſt the Meſſias, the anointed of God, to prepare his ways: they knew alſo there was a promiſe of Meſſias, that he ſhould come, and be a king, and reign in the houſe of David for evermore: but they underſtood all ſo groſly, and ſo carnally, that they neither knew Elias, nor Meſſias, when they came; for they looked for Elias to come down from heaven in his own perſon, and for Meſſias to come and reign in worldly pomp, power, riches and glory, when as the prophecies of both were ſpiritually to have been underſtood: of Elias, that he ſhould not come in perſon but in ſpirit, that is, one that ſhould be indued with the ſpirit and gifts of grace of Elias, which was indeed John Baptiſt, as Chriſt himſelf did declare to his apoſtles: and of Meſſias reign, all the prophets were to be underſtood of the reign of his ſpiritual kingdom over the houſe of Jacob, and the true Iſraelites for evermore. And ſo by that their groſs and carnal underſtanding, they miſtook both Elias and the true Meſſias, and when they came, knew neither of them both. So likewiſe, I fear, nay it is certain, the world that wanteth the light of the Spirit of God (for the world is not able to receive him, ſaith John), neither doth, nor ſhall know the beaſt, nor his marks, though he rage cruelly, and live never ſo beaſtly, and though his marked men be in number like the ſand of the ſea. The Lord therefore vouchſafe to open the eyes of the blind with the light of grace, that they may ſee and perceive, and underſtand the words of God, after the mind of his Spirit, Amen.

Here remain two objections, which may ſeem weighty, and which may peradventure move many not to follow the former counſel. The former reaſon is, A man will ſay, O Sir, it is no ſmall matter ye ſpeak of, to depart from a man's own native country into a ſtrange realm. Many men have ſo great hindrances, as how is it poſſible that they can, or may do ſo? Some have lands and poſſeſſions, which they cannot carry with them: ſome have father, mother, wife, children and kinsfolk, from whom to depart is as hard a thing (and all one almoſt), as to ſuffer death, and to go to a ſtrange country that thou knoweſt not, neither the manner of the people, nor how thou mayeſt away either with the people, or with the country: or what a hard thing it is to live among a ſtrange people, whoſe language thou doſt not underſtand, &c.

I grant here thou mayſt heap a number of worldly diſadvantages, which are ſurely very likely to enſue the departure out of a man's native country, I mean out of the whole realm into a ſtrange land: but what of all theſe, and a thouſand more of the like ſort? I will ſet unto them one ſaying of our Saviour Chriſt, which unto the faithful child of God, and to the true chriſtian, is able to countervail all theſe, yea, and to weigh them down. Chriſt our Saviour ſaith in Luke, "If any come to me and do not hate his father and mother, [he meaneth, and will not in his cauſe forſake his father and mother] his wife, children, and brethren, yea, and his life too, he cannot be my diſciple: and whoſoever doth not bear my croſs and come after me, he cannot be my diſciple." And in the ſame place he declareth by the two parables, one of a builder, and the other of a king that is a warrior, that every man that will not in Chriſt's cauſe forſake all that ever he hath, he cannot be his diſciple. Look the places who will, the matter is ſo plainly ſet forth, that no gloſſes, nor cloaking of conſcience to the man of God, can ſerve to the contrary. Many places there be for the ſame purpoſe for the embracing of Chriſt's croſs, when Chriſt and his cauſe layeth it upon our back; but this is ſo plain, that I need here to rehearſe no more.

This latter reaſon and objection, whereof I ſpake before, is of more force, and includeth a neceſſity, which after the common ſaying, hath no law, and therefore it is more hard to ſhape for it a good anſwer. This may be objected of ſome: alas, Sir, I grant all theſe things do grieve me, and becauſe I underſtand they do not agree with God's word, which is the rule of my conſcience, I loth either to look on them, or to hear them. But, Sir, alas, I am an impotent man, an aged man, a ſick man, a lame man; or I have ſo many ſmall infants, and a lame wife, who all live by my labour, and by my proviſion: if I leave them they ſhall ſtarve, and I am not able to carry them with me, ſuch is my ſtate. Alas, Sir, what ſhall I do? And theſe cauſes may chance to ſome men of God, whereby either it ſhall be for them utterly impoſſible to depart the country, or elſe in departing they ſhall be inforced to forſake ſuch in extreme neceſſity, of whom both God and nature hath committed unto them the care.

Alas! what counſel is here to be given? O lamentable ſtate! O ſorrowful heart! that neither can depart, and without extreme danger and peril is not able to tarry ſtill. And theſe are they whom our Saviour Chriſt ſaw before ſhould be, and called them, in his prophecy of the latter time, great-belly'd, or travailing women, and women that give, after they be brought to-bed, ſuck to their babes. Of the ſtate of ſuch as are not able to fly the infection of the peſtiferous plague of Antichriſt's abominations, Chriſt lamenting, and not curſing, ſaith, "Woe be to the great-belly'd and travailing women, and women that give ſuck in thoſe days." For theſe, alas, my heart mourneth the more, the leſs I am able to give any comfortable counſel but this; that always, as they look for everlaſting life, they abide ſtill in the confeſſion of his truth, whatſoever ſhall befal, and for the reſt, to put their truſt now wholly in God, who is able to ſave them againſt all appearance; and commonly in extremities, when all worldly comfort faileth, and the danger is at higheſt, then unto his he is wont, after his accuſtomed mercy, to be moſt ready to put his helping hand. God ſuffered Daniel to be caſt into the den of lions, and the three children into the hot burning furnace, and yet he ſaved them all. Paul was plucked out of the mouth of the lion (as he ſaith of himſelf) and in Aſia he was brought into ſuch trouble, that he looked for nothing leſs than preſent death, and yet he that raiſed the dead to life again, brought him out of all his troubles, and taught him and all others that be in trouble for Chriſt's cauſe, not to truſt to themſelves, but in Almighty God.

Of God's gracious aid in extreme perils toward them that put their truſt in him, all ſcripture is full, both of old and new. What dangers were the patriarchs oftentimes brought into, as Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, but of all others Joſeph, and how mercifully were they delivered again? In what perils was Moſes when he was fain to fly for the ſafeguard of his life? And when was he ſent again to deliver the Iſraelites from their ſervile bondage? Not before they were brought into extreme miſery. And when did the Lord mightily deliver his people from ſword of Pharaoh? Not before they were brought into ſuch ſtraits, that they were ſo encompaſſed on every ſide, the main ſea on the one ſide, and the main hoſt on the other, that they could look for none other, (yea, what did they indeed elſe look for? but either to have been drowned in the ſea, or elſe to have fallen on the edge of Pharaoh's ſword. Thoſe judges which wrought moſt wonderful things in the delivery of the people, were ever given when the people was brought to moſt miſery before, Othniel, Ehud, Samgar, Gideon, Jephtha, Samſon. And ſo was Saul endued with ſtrength and boldneſs neſs from above, againſt the Ammonites, Philiſtines, and Amalekites, for the defence of the people of God. David likewiſe felt God's help moſt ſenſibly ever in his extremeſt perſecutions. What ſhall I ſpeak of the prophets of God, whom God ſuffered ſo oft to be brought into extreme perils, and ſo mightily delivered them again; as Elias, Jeremiah, Daniel and Jonah, and many others, whom it were too long to rehearſe and ſet out at large? And did the Lord uſe his ſervants otherwiſe in the new law after Chriſt's incarnation? Read the Acts of the apoſtles, and you ſhall ſee, no. Were not the apoſtles caſt into priſon, and brought out by the mighty hand of God? Did not the angel deliver Peter out of the ſtrong priſon, and bring him out by the iron gates of the city, and ſet him free? And when, I pray you? Even the ſame night before Herod appointed to have brought him to judgment to have ſlain him, as he had a little before killed James the brother of John. Paul and Silas, after they had been ſore ſcourged, and were put into the inner priſon, and there were laid faſt in the ſtocks, I pray you, what appearance was there that the magiſtrates ſhould be glad to come the next day themſelves to them, to deſire them to be content, and to depart in peace? Who provided for Paul, that he ſhould be ſafely conducted out of all danger, and brought to Felix the emperor's deputy, when as both the high-prieſt, the phariſees, and rulers of the Jews had conſpired to enquire judgment of death againſt him, he being faſt in priſon, and alſo more than forty men had ſworn each one to another, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul? A thing wonderful, that no reaſon could have invented, or man could have looked for: God provided Paul his own ſiſter's ſon, a young man that diſappointed that conſpiracy, and all their former conjuration. The manner how the thing came to paſs, thou mayſt read in the twenty-third of the Acts. I will not be tedious unto thee with the rehearſal thereof.

Now to deſcend from the apoſtles to the martyrs that followed next in Chriſt's church, and in them likewiſe to declare how gracious our good God ever hath been to work wonderfully with them who in his cauſe have been in extreme perils, it were matter enough to write a long book. I will here name but one man and one woman, that is, Athanaſius the great clerk and godly man ſtoutly ſtanding in Chriſt's cauſe againſt the Arians, and that holy woman Blandina, ſtanding ſo conſtantly in all extreme pains, in the ſimple confeſſion of Chriſt. If thou wilt have of examples of more, look and thou ſhalt have both theſe, and an hundred more, in Euſebius's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and in Tripartita Hiſtoria.

But for all theſe examples, both of holy ſcripture, and of other hiſtories, I fear me the weak man of God, incumbered with frailty and infirmity of the fleſh, will have now and then ſuch thoughts and qualmes (as they call them) to run over his heart, and to think thus: All theſe things which are rehearſed out of the ſcripture I believe to be true, and of the reſt truly I do think well, and can believe them alſo to be true; but all theſe we muſt needs grant were ſpecial miracles of God, which now in our days are ceaſed, we ſee: and to require them at God's hands, were it not to tempt God?

Well-beloved brother, I grant ſuch were great wonderful works of God, and we have not ſeen many of ſuch miracles in our time, either for that our ſight is not clear, or elſe becauſe we have not the like faith of them for whoſe cauſe God wrought ſuch things, or becauſe, after that he had ſet forth the truth of his doctrine by ſuch miracles then ſufficiently, the time of ſo many miracles to be done was expired withal. Which of theſe is the moſt ſpecial cauſe of all other, or whether there be any other, God knoweth; I leave that to God. But know thou this, my well-beloved in God, that God's hand is as ſtrong as ever it was, he may do what his gracious pleaſure is, and he is as good and gracious as ever he was. Man changeth as the garment doth; but God our heavenly Father is even the ſame now that he was, and ſhall be for evermore.

The world without doubt, (this I do believe, and therefore I ſay) draweth towards an end, and in all ages God hath had his own manner, after his ſecret and unſearchable wiſdom, to uſe his elect, ſometimes to deliver them, and keep them ſafe, and ſometimes to ſuffer them to drink of Chriſt's cup, that is, to feel the ſmart, and to feel of the whip. And though the fleſh ſmarteth at the one, and feeleth eaſe in the other, is glad of the one, and ſore vexed in the other; yet the Lord is all one towards them in both, and loveth them no leſs when he ſuffereth them to be beaten, yea, and to be put to bodily death, than when he worketh wonders for their marvellous delivery. Nay, rather he doth more for them, when in anguiſh of the torments he ſtandeth by them, and ſtrengtheneth them in their faith, to ſuffer in the confeſſion of the truth and his faith, the bitter pangs of death, than when he openeth the priſon door and letteth them go looſe; for here he doth but reſpite them to another time, and leaveth them in danger to fall in like peril again; and there he maketh them perfect, to be without danger, pain or peril, after that for evermore. But this his love towards them, however the world doth judge of it, is all one, both when he delivereth, and when he ſuffereth them to be put to death. He loved as well Peter and Paul, when (after they had, according to his bleſſed will, pleaſure and providence, finiſhed their courſes, and done their ſervices appointed them by him here in preaching of his goſpel) the one was beheaded, and the other was hanged or crucified of the cruel tyrant Nero, as the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory ſaith, as when he ſent the angel to bring Peter out of priſon, and for Paul's delivery he made all the doors of the priſon to fly wide open, and the foundation of the ſame, like an earthquake, to tremble and ſhake.

Thinkeſt thou, O thou man of God, that Chriſt our Saviour had leſs affection to the firſt martyr St. Stephen, becauſe he ſuffered his enemies even at the firſt conflict to ſtone him to death; No ſurely; nor James, John's brother, who was one of the three that Paul calleth primates or principals among the apoſtles of Chriſt. He loved him never a whit the worſe than he did the other, although he ſuffered Herod the tyrant's ſword to cut off his head. Nay, doth not Daniel ſay, ſpeaking of the cruelty of Antichriſt's time, And the learned (he meaneth truly learned in God's law) ſhall teach many, and ſhall fall upon the ſword, and in the flame, (that is, ſhall be burned in the flaming fire) and in captivity (that is, ſhall be in priſon, and be ſpoiled and robbed of their goods for a long ſeaſon.) And afterwards in the ſame place of Daniel it followeth; and of the learned there be, which ſhall fall or be overthrown, that they may be known, tried, choſen, and made white; he meaneth, be burniſhed and ſcoured anew, picked and choſen, and made freſh and luſty. If that then was foreſeen to be done to the godly learned, and for ſo gracious cauſes, let every one to whom any ſuch thing, by the will of God, doth chance, be merry in God and rejoice, for it is to God's glory, and to his own everlaſting wealth. Wherefore well is he that ever he was born, for whom thus graciouſly God hath provided, having grace of God, and ſtrength of the Holy Ghoſt to ſtand ſtedfaſtly in the height of the ſtorm. Happy is he that ever he was born, whom God his heavenly Father hath vouchſafed to appoint to glorify him, and to edify his church by the effuſion of his blood.

To die in Chriſt's cauſe is an high honour, to which no man certainly ſhall or can aſpire, but to whom God vouchſafeth that dignity: for no man is allowed to preſume to take unto himſelf any office of honour, but he who is thereunto called of God. Therefore John ſaith well, ſpeaking of them who have obtained the victory by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of his teſtimony, that they loved not their lives, even unto death.

And our Saviour Chriſt ſaith, "He that ſhall loſe his life for my cauſe ſhall find it." And this manner of ſpeech pertaineth not to one kind of chriſtians (as the worldly doth wickedly dream), but to all that do truly pertain unto Chriſt. For when Chriſt had called unto him the multitude together with his diſciples, he ſaid unto them (mark that he ſaid not this to the diſciples and apoſtles only, but he ſaid it to all). Whoſoever will follow me, let him forſake and deny himſelf, and take up his croſs and follow me: for whoſoever will ſave his life ſhall loſe it (he meaneth, whoſoever will, to ſave his life, forſake or leave him and his truth), and whoſoever ſhall loſe his life for my cauſe and the goſpel's ſake, ſhall ſave it. For what ſhall it profit a man if he ſhall win the whole world, and loſe his own ſoul, his own life? or what ſhall a man give to recompence that loſs of his own life, and of his own ſoul? Whoſoever ſhall be aſhamed of me and my words (that is, to confeſs me and my goſpel), before this ſinful and adulterous generation, of him ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels. Know thou, O man of God, that all things are ordained for thy behoof, and to the furtherance of thee, towards thy ſalvation. All things, ſaith Paul, worketh with good to goodneſs, even the enemies of God, and ſuch kind of puniſhments whereby they go about to deſtroy them, ſhall be forced by God's power, might, and fatherly providence, to do them ſervice.

It is not as the wicked thinketh, that poverty, adverſity, ſickneſs, tribulation, yea, painful death of the godly be tokens that God doth not love them; but even clean the contrary, as all the whole courſe of ſcripture doth evidently declare; for then he would never have ſuffered his moſt dearly beloved the patriarchs to have had ſuch troubles, his prophets, his apoſtles, his martyrs, and chief champions and maintainers of his truth and goſpel, ſo cruelly of the wicked to have been murdered and ſlain. Of whom ſome were racked, as the apoſtle ſaith, and would not be delivered, that they might receive a better reſurrection. Some were tried by mockings and ſcourgings, yea, moreover by bonds and impriſonment: they were ſtoned, they were ſawn aſunder, they were tempted, they were ſlain with the ſword, they wandered up and down in ſheep-ſkins and goat-ſkins, being forſaken, afflicted, and tormented, ſuch men as the world was not worthy to have, wandering in wilderneſſes, in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth. All theſe were approved by the teſtimony of faith, and received not the promiſe, becauſe God provided better for us, that without us they ſhould not be conſummated. They tarry for us now undoubtedly, longing for the day: but they are commanded to have patience, yet (ſaith the Lord) a little while, until the number of their fellow-ſervants be fulfilled, and of their brethren which are yet to be ſlain, as they were.

Now (thou O man of God) for our Lord's ſake, let us not for the love of this life, tarry then too long, and be occaſion of delay of that glorious conſummation, in hope and expectation whereof they departed in the Lord, and which alſo the living, indued with God's Spirit, ought ſo earneſtly to deſire and to groan for with all the creatures of God. Let us all, with John the ſervant of God, cry in our hearts unto our Saviour Chriſt, Come, Lord Jeſus, come. For then when Chriſt, who is our life, ſhall be made manifeſt, and appear in glory, then ſhall the children of God appear what they be, even like unto Chriſt: for this our weak body ſhall be transfigured, and made like unto Chriſt's glorious body, and that by the power whereby he is able to ſubdue all things unto himſelf. Then that which is now corruptible, ſhall be made incorruptible: that which now is vile, ſhall be made glorious: that which is now weak, ſhall riſe then mighty and ſtrong: that which is groſs and carnal, ſhall be made fine and ſpiritual: for then we ſhall ſee and have the unſpeakable joy and fruition of the glorious Majeſty of our Lord, even as he is.

Who, or what then ſhall hinder us to jeopard, yea, to ſpend this life which we have here in Chriſt's cauſe? O therefore, thou man of God, thou that art loaden, and ſo hindered like unto a great-bellied woman, that thou canſt not fly the plague, yet if thou luſt after ſuch things as I have ſpoken of, ſtand faſt whatſoever ſhall befal, in thy Maſter's cauſe; and take this thy hindrance to fly, for a calling of God to fight in thy maſter Chriſt his cauſe. Of this be thou certain, they can do nothing unto thee, which thy Father is not aware of, or hath not foreſeen before: they can do no more than it ſhall pleaſe him to ſuffer them to do for the furtherance of his glory, edifying of his church, and thine own ſalvation. Let them then do what they ſhall, ſeeing to thee, O man of God, all things ſhall be forced to ſerve, and to work with thee unto the beſt before God. O be not afraid, and remember the end.

All this which I have ſpoke for the comfort of the lamentable caſe of the man whom Chriſt called great-bellied woman, I mean to be ſpoke likewiſe the captive and priſoner in God's cauſe: for ſuch I count to be as it were already ſummoned and preſſed to fight under the banner of the croſs of Chriſt, and as it were ſoldiers allowed and taken up for the Lord's wars, to do their Lord and Maſter good and honourable ſervice, and to ſtick to him, as men of truſty ſervice in his cauſe, even unto death, and to think their life loſt in his cauſe, is to win it in eternal glory for evermore.

Therefore, now to conclude and make an end of this treatiſe, I ſay unto all that love God our heavenly Father, that love Chriſt Jeſus our Redeemer and Saviour; that love to follow the ways of the Holy Ghoſt which is our comforter and ſanctifier of all; unto all that love Chriſt's ſpouſe and body, the true catholic church of Chriſt, yea, that love life and their own ſoul's health; I ſay unto all theſe, hearken my dear brethren and ſiſters, all you that be of God, all ſorts, ages, dignities, or degrees; hearken to the word of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt ſpoken to his apoſtles, and meant to all his, in St. Matthew's goſpel, Fear not them which kill the body, for they cannot kill the ſoul, but fear him more which may deſtroy and caſt both body and ſoul into hell-fire. Are not two ſmall ſparrows ſold for a mite, and one of them ſhall not fall or light upon the ground without your Father? All the hairs of your head be numbered. Fear them not, you are much more worth than are the little ſparrows. Every one that confeſſeth me before men, him ſhall I likewiſe confeſs before my Father which is in heaven. But whoſoever ſhall deny me before men, I ſhall deny him likewiſe before my Father which is in heaven.

The Lord grant us therefore of his heavenly grace and ſtrength, that here we may ſo confeſs him in this world amongſt this adulterous and ſinful generation, that he may confeſs us again at the latter day before his Father which is in heaven, to our glory and everlaſting comfort, joy, and ſalvation.

To our heavenly Father, to our Saviour and Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, and to the Holy Ghoſt, be all glory and honour now and for ever. Amen.

The Hiſtory of Stephen Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter.

THE next month after the burning of Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer, which was the month of November, Stephen Gardiner, biſhop and chancellor, a man hated of God and all good men, ended his wretched life. This viper's bird crept of the town of Bury, in Suffolk, was brought up, moſt part of his youth, in Cambridge; his wit, capacity, memory, and other endowments of nature were not to be complained of, if he had well uſed, and righly applied the ſame; wherein there was was no great want of God's part in him, if he had not rather himſelf wanted to the goodneſs of his gifts. Through this promptneſs, activity, and towardneſs of his, he profited not a little in ſuch ſtudies as he gave his head unto, as firſt in the civil law, then in languages, and ſuch other like, eſpecially in thoſe arts and faculties which had any proſpect to dignity and preferment to be hoped for. Beſides other ornaments or helps of nature, memory chiefly ſeemed in him very beneficial, rather than diligence of ſtudy.

To theſe gifts and qualities were joined again his great or greater vices, which not ſo much followed him, as overtook him, not ſo much burdened him, as made him burdenſome to the whole realm. He was of a proud ſtomach, and high-minded, in his own opinion and conceit flattering himſelf too much; in wit, crafty and ſubtil; toward his ſuperiors, flattering and fair ſpoken: to his inferiors, fierce; againſt his equal, ſtout and envious, eſpecially if in judgment and ſentence he any thing withſtood him, as appeared between the good Lord Cromwel and him, in the reign of king Henry the eighth. Who, although he would give no place to men, yet notwithſtanding I wiſh he would have given place to truth, according as he ſeemed not altogether ignorant of that truth. What his knowledge was therein is evident, partly by his book De vera Obedientia, as alſo by his ſermon before king Edward; alſo by his anſwers to the council the ſame time, and moreover by his own words it may be gathered in ſundry places, as more plainly may appear by that which hereafter followeth.

Upon his eſtimation and fame he ſtood too much, more than was meet for a man of his coat and calling, whoſe profeſſion was to be crucified unto the world, which thing made him ſo ſtiff in maintaining that which he once begun to take upon him.

What his learning was in the civil and canon law I have not to ſay: What it was in other liberal arts and ſciences, this I ſuppoſe, that neither his continuance in ſtudy, nor diligence of reading was ſuch (by reaſon of his too much intermedling in princes' matters) as could truly well merit unto him the title of a deep learned man. But what learning or cunning ſoever it was he had, ſo it fared in him, as it doth in butchers, which uſe to blow up their fleſh: even ſo he, with boldneſs and ſtoutneſs, and eſpecially with authority, made thoſe gifts that he had to appear much greater than they really were. Whereunto uſe, peradventure, and experience abroad, made no little helps, rather than any quickneſs of wit, or happineſs of education.

And as touching divinity, he was ſo variable, wavering with time, that no conſtant cenſure can be given what to make of him. If his doings and writings were according to his conſcience, no man can rightly ſay whether he was a right proteſtant or papiſt. If he wrote otherwiſe than he thought, for fear, or to bear with time, then was he a double deep diſſembler before God and man, to ſay and unſay, to write and unwrite, to ſwear and forſwear ſo as he did. For firſt, in the beginning of queen Anne Bullen's time, who was ſo forward or ſo buſy in the matter of the king's divorce as Stephen Gardiner, who was firſt ſent to Rome, and then to the emperor with Edward Fox, as chief agent in the behalf of the lady Anne? By whom alſo he was prefered to the biſhopric of Wincheſter, and Edmund Bonner was prefered to the biſhopric of London. Again, at the aboliſhing of the pope, who ſo ready to ſwear, or ſo vehement to write againſt the pope as he, as not only by his ſermons, but alſo by his book De Obedientia may appear? In which book, leſt any ſhould think him drawn thereunto otherwiſe than by his own conſent, he plainly declareth, how not raſhly nor on a ſudden, but upon a long deliberation and advertiſement in himſelf about the matter, he at length uttered his judgment: and moreover ſo he uttered his judgment in writing againſt the uſurped ſupremacy of the pope, that coming to Lovain afterward, he was there accounted for a perſon excommunicate and ſchiſmatic, inſomuch that he was not permitted in their church to ſay maſs; and moreover, in their public ſermons they openly cried out againſt him. Whereof read hereafter.

And thus long continued he firm and forward, ſo that who but Wincheſter during all the reign of queen Ann? After her deceaſe, that time by little and little carried him away, till at length the emulation of the lord Cromwel's eſtate, and eſpecially (as it ſeemeth), for his ſo much favouring of Bonner (whom Wincheſter at that time in no caſe could abide), made him an utter enemy both againſt him, and alſo his religion: till again in king Edward's days he began a little to rebate from certain points of popery, and ſomewhat to ſmell of the goſpel, as both by his ſermon before king Edward, as alſo by his ſubſcribing to certain articles, may appear; and this was an half turn of Stephen Gardiner from popery again to the goſpel, and (no doubt) he would have farther turned, had not the unlucky decay of the duke of Somerſet clean turned him away from true divinity, to plain popery; wherein he continued a cruel perſecutor to his dying day.

And thus much concerning the trade and profeſſion of Stephen Gardiner's popiſh divinity. In which his popiſh trade, whether he followed more true judgment, or elſe time, or rather the ſpirit of ambition and vain-glory, it is doubtful to ſay, and ſo much the more doubtful, becauſe in his doings and writings a man may ſee him not only contrary to himſelf, but alſo in ſome points contrary to other papiſts. And furthermore, where he agreeth with them, he ſeemeth therein not ſo much to follow his own ſenſe, as the mind and meaning of Pereſeus; out of whoſe book the greateſt part of Wincheſter's divinity ſeemeth to be borrowed.

And therefore as in the true knowledge of God's holy word and ſcripture he appeareth nobody; ſo in his pen and ſtyle of writing no leſs far is he from commendation, than he is from all plainneſs and perſpicuity. In whoſe obſcure and perplexed kind of writing, altho' peradventure ſome ſenſe may be found with ſome ſearching, yet ſhall no reader find any ſweetneſs in his reading.

What moved him to be ſo ſturdy againſt Mr. Cheek, and Mr. Thomas Smith, for the Greek pronunciation, others may think what they pleaſe; I ſpeak but what I think, that ſo he did, for that he ſaw it a thing rather newly begun, than truly impugned. Such was the diſpoſition of the man (as it ſeemeth) that of purpoſe he ever affected to ſeem to be a patron of old cuſtoms, tho' they were never ſo rotten with age. Amongſt other matters, this one thing I cannot but marvel at in my mind, when I ſee how proudly he braggeth, and vainly vaunteth himſelf (as well in his letters to the lord protector, and others of king Edward's council, as alſo in his long matter articulated and exhibited by him unto the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other the king's commiſſioners), of the high favour he had of the noble king, of famous memory, king Henry the eighth, when indeed nothing was leſs true; neither did the king leſs favour any of his council, than him, affirming very often that he greatly ſuſpected the ſaid biſhop, to be a ſecret maintainer of the biſhop of Rome's uſurped authority, and a ſtout diſturber and hinderer of his proceedings in reformation of religion. And therefore he did ſo much diſlike him, that he did not only mind (if it had pleaſed God to grant his highneſs longer life), to have uſed the extremity of the law againſt him, upon very ſore and juſt matter of old committed by him (and yet not taken away by any pardon) thereupon often commanding the lord Pagot, then his ſecretary, to keep ſafe certain writings which he had againſt him; but alſo commanded that he ſhould be put clean out of his laſt will and teſtament, not ſuffering him either to be one of his executors, or elſe in any caſe of his ſon's council, no; although he were earneſtly intreated to the contrary by ſundry of the lords, and other of his highneſs's council, ſaying, he was a wilful, troubleſome, and headſtrong man, and not meet to be about his ſon, or to have any thing to do by his will.

Now amongſt other cauſes that moved the king thus to ſuſpect his fidelity towards his godly proceedings to religion, I find this to be one. It pleaſed his majeſty after his aboliſhing of the biſhop of Rome's uſurped authority (amongſt other ambaſſages to foreign princes), to ſend the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter, and Sir Henry Knevet knight, as joint ambaſſadors to the emperor, being then at a diet or council at Ratiſbon, appointing alſo Sir John Berkley, Sir William Blunt, knights, and Andrew Bainton, eſquire (his highneſs's ſervants), to give their attendance upon the ſaid Sir Henry Knevet, for the more honouring of his embaſſage. It happened alſo at that time, that Sir Henry Knevet entertained into his ſervice (as ſteward of his houſhold) one William Wolfe, who had in the ſame capacity before ſerved Sir Thomas Wyat, knight, the king's former ambaſſador there, and by that means had good acquaintance in thoſe parts, as well in the emperor's court, as elſewhere. This Wolfe, towards the latter end of the diet or council, happened to walk (as often he did) towards the emperor's palace to hear ſome news, where he met with one Ludovico, an Italian merchant, one of his old acquaintance. Who, ſuppoſing the ſaid Wolfe to have attended upon the biſhop of Wincheſter (not knowing of any joint ambaſſador), required Wolfe, for old acquaintance, to do him a pleaſure; whereupon he willingly granted. Whereupon Ludovico ſhewed him, that the pope's legate, or the ambaſſador to the emperor (which was cardinal Contarene) departing the day before towards Rome, and having no leiſure to end his buſineſs himſelf, had put the ſaid Ludovico in truſt for the accompliſhment of them: and amongſt all other things he had eſpecially charged him that he ſhould repair to the ambaſſador of England, and require of him an anſwer to the pope's letters, which the legate did of late ſend unto him, addreſſed to him from Rome, and that upon receipt thereof he ſhould ſend them after with all ſpeed; and therefore if his lord ambaſſador would write by that courier, he prayed Wolfe to tell him that it was time to write, for the courier went away within a day or two.

At this tale, Wolfe being abaſhed, and yet partly gueſſing which ambaſſador he meant, thought it not meet to tell him whoſe ſervant he was, but by other ſoothing talk perceived that he meant the biſhop of Wincheſter. And to the end that Ludovico ſhould ſuſpect nothing, he anſwered him, that he, being not the ambaſſador's ſecretary, could ſay little therein; howbeit he would not fail to put his ſecretary in remembrance of it: which thing Ludovico alſo deſired him to do, for that he had no other acquaintance with the ambaſſador; and ſo for that time they departed. This matter ſeeming to Wolfe of ſome importance, he immediately revealed it to Sir Henry Knevet his maſter: who weighing alſo the greatneſs of the caſe, and what diſadvantage it were upon one man's ſo bare a report to attempt ought, in a place and time, whereby ſuch a perſon was to be touched, charged Wolfe to adviſe himſelf, that no hatred, diſpleaſure, or other paſſion, did not move him to diſcloſe this, but truth only. Wolfe replyed, That he weighed well the weightineſs of the cauſe, meet, as to his own reſpect, to be paſſed over in ſilence, for avoiding of his private diſpleaſure, if duty of allegiance bound him not otherwiſe. But Sir (quoth he) if you think not my hearing thereof, one to one, to be ſufficient, I warrant you to deviſe means, that ſome others of your ſervants ſhall hear the like words from Ludovico's own mouth as well as I. Upon which talk Sir Henry Knevet deviſed which of his ſervants he might uſe to that purpoſe, and at laſt reſted upon Mr. Thomas Chalenor, his ſecretary, becauſe he had the Italian tongue. Not making him privy to any matter, but deſired Wolfe to take him abroad with him, as of his own private motion, for they were very familiar friends. Whereupon the next morning, being Sunday, Wolfe came to Chalenor's chamber, and prayed him familiarly to talk a walk with him abroad to the Piazza, or market-ſtead, which he readily did, not knowing of any ſpecial cauſe why. When they came to the Piazza, over againſt the emperor's palace (near whereunto alſo the pope's legate had lodged) and had there walked a while together, there came thither the ſaid Ludovico, and eſpying Wolfe, ſaluted him very friendly, and entered into talk about the Exchange, and ſundry other matters, Chalenor being ſtill with them. At laſt upon occaſion, they entered into like talk about the former letters that the ambaſſador of England had received from Rome by the pope's legate, of which Ludovico had in charge to receive an anſwer, affirming that the poſt departed the next day, and therefore prayed Wolfe to put the ambaſſador's ſecretary in remembrance of them. Whereunto Wolfe anſwered, That he would willingly do it; but he did not well know which ambaſſador he meant, for that there were two: one the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the other a gentlemen of the king's privy chamber. To whom Ludovico replied, That he meant not the gentleman of the privy chamber, but the biſhop. By which talk, and much the like (as upon the former day), Mr. Chalenor being moved (and not knowing yet of his maſter's and Wolfe's purpoſe), after the departure of Ludovico from them, ſaid unto Wolfe, that Ludovico had had but homely talk with him, not to be paſſed over lightly, and therefore he would tell his maſter of it. To whom Wolfe anſwered, Do as you will, if you think any matter therein. And therefore, at his return home, he told Sir Henry Knevet what ſpeech he had heard at Ludovico's mouth.

Sir Henry Knevet, being thus further aſcertained of the matter, opened the whole to Sir John Berkley, Sir William Blunt, and to Mr. Bainton, who all agreed yet to make a farther trial thereof. And therefore deviſed that Wolfe ſhould procure Ludovick to bring certain velvet and other ſilks, unto Sir Henry Knevet's lodging, as well for himſelf as for the other gentlemen, which that afternoon he did accompliſh, and brought Ludovick unto Sir Henry, where alſo were the other gentlemen. After they had a while viewed the ſilks, and had ſome talk about the prince, Wolfe took occaſion again to aſk Ludovick, if Sir Henry were the ambaſſador of whom he was to demand an anſwer of the letters ſent by the pope's legate? To whom the merchant anſwered, No, it was not his ſeigniority, but it was a biſhop, terming him Reverendiſſimo, whereby they eaſily perceived whom he meant. Sir Henry Knevet thereupon ſomewhat diſſembling the matter, entered into further talk about it, whereby Ludovick opened as much in effect to them as he had done before to Wolfe; but yet at laſt perceiving that as well Sir Henry, as alſo the other gentlemen, beheld him ſomewhat angrily, he brake off his talk. Wherewith Sir Henry Knevet, making as though he had noted nothing, did lovingly diſmiſs him, praying him, that when he had received the biſhop's letters, he would alſo repair to him for a packet to an Engliſh gentleman of his acquaintance at Milan; which he promiſed to do, and ſo departed again. When Sir Henry had thus made ſufficient trial of this matter, he forthwith wrote his letters unto the king's majeſty, ſignifying unto him the whole at large, as he had learned. In the mean while Ludovick the next morning repaired to the biſhop of Wincheſter's lodging, to demand an anſwer of thoſe letters the legate had ſent unto him: but how he uſed himſelf, or whether he uttered the diſcourſe he had with Sir Henry Knevet and with Wolfe, whom he ſuppoſed at the firſt to be the biſhop's man, it is not certainly known. But the biſhop, perceiving that by miſtaking one for another, (and in ſuppoſing Wolfe to to be the biſhop's ſervant) Ludovick had uttered all his meſſage from the legate unto Wolfe, and that thereby his practices would come to light; in great haſte and rage he cauſed Ludovick to be ſtayed in his own houſe, while in the mean time himſelf went to Gravela, one of the emperor's council, and ſo practiſed with him, that Ludovick was ſecretly committed to priſon, in cuſtody of one of the emperor's marſhals, ſo as he could be no more talked with, all the time of their abode there. And then ſending in great haſte to Sir Henry Knevet to come and ſpeak with him (which he did), he fell into very hot ſpeech with him, ſaying, that he had poiſon in his diſh, and that a knave was ſuborned to be his deſtruction; with many ſuch like words. Sir Henry told him again how he underſtood it; and prayed him that Ludovick might be brought face to face, to be examined in both their preſences. Which the biſhop would in no caſe agree unto, affirming, that he had ſo declared the caſe to Gravela, being indifferent (as he thought) to them both, that he would not meddle with Ludovick, nor ſpeak with him: but that the emperor's council ſhould examine him, and try what he was for him. To whom Sir Henry Knevet again very earneſtly objected, That he marvelled that the biſhop, in matters touching the king's majeſty, their maſter, would uſe the aid or means of Gravela a foreign prince's miniſter, to make him privy of their queſtion. But ſay and do what he could, he could never come to the ſpeech of Ludovick any more ever after. Whereupon there aroſe great and long controverſies between them (both writing letters unto the king about the matter) until at laſt the king's majeſty, perceiving his affairs otherwiſe to ſlack thereby, wrote unto them both, that they ſhould lay all thoſe things under foot, and join together in his ſervice as before; which they did accordingly. But howſoever this matter was afterward ſalved here with the king's majeſty, as either by the death of Sir Henry Knevet (which I think was not long after) or by other friends the biſhop had here at home, I know not: yet Wolfe, who within two months after died of a long cough of the lungs, upon his death-bed did again affirm the premiſes to be moſt true; and therefore, in the preſence of Sir Henry Knevet, and divers of his ſervants, he proteſted, that he had not invented, ſought or procured this at Lodovick's hands, for any malice or diſpleaſure borne to the biſhop, but only for diſcharge of his faith and duty unto the king's majeſty, deſiring that the ſame his proteſtation might be inſerted in the end of his laſt will and teſtament, which was then preſently done, and thereunto he ſet his hand.

Now, whether this was the matter that the king moved ſo often Mr. ſecretary Paget (being after lord keeper) to keep ſafe, as ſore matter againſt the biſhop, I know not; but yet it appears by ſome depoſitions of the nobility and others, in the proceſs had againſt him in king Edward's days, that the king's majeſty, Henry the eighth, had this matter ever in his mind: for in every general pardon that he granted by parliament after this practice, he did ſtill except all treaſons committed beyond the ſeas; meaning thereby, as it was ſuppoſed, that the biſhop ſhould not take any benefit by any general pardon, if at any time his majeſty would call him to account: and therefore all things well weighed, he had ſmall cauſe to vaunt of his great favour he had with king Henry, his maſter. Howbeit it ſeemeth he was brought into this fool's paradiſe by the Lord Paget; who (as he himſelf reporteth in his depoſitions) in his meſſages from the king to the ſaid biſhop, deluded him, telling him much otherwiſe than the king had ſpoke, and concealing always the king's hard ſpeeches againſt him, which thing puffed up this vain-glorious Thraſo not a little.

But whoſoever he was, ſeeing he is now gone, I refer him to his judge, to whom he ſhall ſtand or fall. As concerning his death and manner thereof, I would they which were preſent thereat would teſtify to us what they ſaw. This we have all to think, that his death happened ſo opportunely, that England hath a mighty cauſe to give thanks to the Lord for it: not ſo much for the great hurt he had done in times paſt in perverting his princes, in bringing in the ſix articles, in murdering God's ſaints, in defacing Chriſt's ſincere religion, &c. but alſo and eſpecially for that he had thought to have brought to paſs in murdering alſo the lady Elizabeth. For whatſoever danger it was of death that ſhe was in, it did (no doubt) proceed from the bloody biſhop, who was the cauſe thereof. And if it be certain, which we have heard, that her highneſs being in the Tower, a writ came down from certain of the council for her execution; it is out of controverſy that Wincheſter was the framer of that engine, who (no doubt) in that one day had brought this whole realm into woful ruin, had not the Lord's moſt gracious counſel, through Mr. Bridges, then the lieutenant, coming in haſte to the queen, certified her of the matter, and prevented his bloody devices. For which thanks be to the ſame our Lord and Saviour, in the congregation of all Engliſh churches, Amen.

Of things uncertain I muſt ſpeak uncertainly, for lack of fuller information, or elſe peradventure there are ſome in the realm that can ſay more than I have here expreſſed. For as Bonner, Story, Thornton, Harpsfield, Dunning, with others, were occupied in puting the poor branches of God's ſaints to death, ſo this biſhop for his part bent all his devices, and had ſpent all his powder in aſſailing the root, and in caſting ſuch a platform (as he himſelf, in words, at his death is ſaid to confeſs) to build his popery upon, as he thought ſhould have ſtood for ever. But (as I ſaid before) of things uncertain I can ſpeak but uncertainly. Wherefore as touching the manner and order of his death, how rich he died, what words he ſpake, what little repentance he ſhewed, whether he died with his tongue ſwoln and out of his mouth, as did Thomas Arundel archbiſhop of Canterbury, or whether he ſtunk before he died as cardinal Wolſey did, or whether he died in deſpair as Latomus and others did, &c. All this I refer either to their reports of whom I heard it, or leave it to the knowledge of them which know it better.

Notwithſtanding, here by the way, touching the death of this aforeſaid biſhop, I thought not to overpaſs a certain hear-ſay, which not long ſince came to me by information of a certain worthy and credible gentlewoman, and another gentleman of the ſame name and kindred, which Mrs. Munday, the wife of Mr. Munday, ſome time ſecretary to the old lord Thomas, duke of Norfolk, a preſent witneſs of this that is teſtified, thus openly reported in the houſe of a worſhipful citizen, bearing yet office in this city, in words and effect as followeth. The ſame day as biſhop Ridley and Mr. Latimer ſuffered at Oxford, being about the 19th day of October, there came into the houſe of Stephen Gardiner, the old duke of Norfolk, with the aforeſaid Mr. Munday his ſecretary above-named, reporter hereof. The old aged duke there waiting for his dinner, the biſhop being not yet diſpoſed to dine, defered the time to three or four of the clock in the afternoon. At length about four of the clock cometh his ſervant, poſting in all poſſible ſpeed from Oxford, bringing intelligence to the biſhop what he had heard and ſeen; of whom the ſaid biſhop diligently enquiring the truth of the matter, and hearing by his man that fire moſt certainly was ſet unto them, cometh out rejoicing to the duke, Now, ſaith he, let us go to dinner. Whereupon they being ſet down, meat immediately was brought, and the biſhop began merrily to eat. But what followed? The bloody tyrant had not eaten a few bits, but the ſudden ſtroke of God's terrible hand fell upon him in ſuch ſort, as immediately he was taken from the table, and ſo brought to his bed, where he continued the ſpace of fifteen days in ſuch intolerable anguiſh and torments, that all that mean while, during the fifteen days, he could not avoid by urine, or otherwiſe, any thing that he received: whereby his body being miſerably ſerably inflamed within, who had inflamed ſo many good martyrs before (was brought to a wretched end. And thereof, no doubt, as moſt like it is, came the thruſting out of his tongue from his mouth ſo ſwoln and black, with the inflammation of his body. A ſpectacle worthy to be noted and beheld of all ſuch bloody burning perſecutors.

But to proceed farther in the ſequel of our ſtory: I could name the man (but I abſtain from names) who being then preſent, and a great doer about the ſaid Winchester, reported to us, concerning the ſaid biſhop, that when Dr. Day, biſhop of Chicheſter, came to him, that he began to comfort him with words of God's promiſe, and with the free juſtification in the blood of Chriſt our Saviour, repeating the ſcriptures to him; Wincheſter bearing that, What my lord (quoth he) will you open that gap now? then farewel all together. To me, and ſuch others in my caſe, you may ſpeak it, but open this window to the people, then farewel all together.

Moreover, what Dr. Bonner then ſaw in him, or what he heard of him, and what words paſſed between them about the time of this extremity, betwixt him and him be it. If Bonner did there behold any thing which might turn to his good example, I exhort him to take it, and to beware in time, as I pray God he may. Here I could bring in the frivolous epitaph that was made on his death, deviſed by a papiſt for a popiſh biſhop, but I omit it, and inſtead thereof I have here inſerted certain things gathered out of his ſermons, words, and writings, wherein may appear what an earneſt and vehement enemy he was to the pope, if he would have been conſtant in himſelf; and how inconſtantly he varied from himſelf; and alſo, how he ſtanding upon a ſingularity of his own wit, varied from other papiſts in certain points. In the gathering whereof although there be ſome pains, and tediouſneſs alſo in reading; yet I thought not to omit the ſame, upon certain conſiderations, namely, for that ſo many yet to this day there be, who ſtick ſo much to Gardiner's wit, learning and religion, taking him for ſuch a ſubſtantial pillar of the pope's church. To the intent therefore, that ſuch as hitherto have been deceived by him, may not longer be abuſed therein, if they will either credit his own works, words, ſermons, writings, diſputations; or elſe will be judged by his own witneſſes of his own party produced, we have here collected ſuch manifeſt probations, which may notoriouſly declare how effectually firſt he withſtood the pope's ſupremacy; and likewiſe afterward may declare the manifeſt contrariety and repugnancy of the ſaid Gardiner, firſt with other writers, and laſtly with himſelf: firſt beginning with his ſermon preached before king Edward. The ſum and effect of which ſermon briefly collected by Mr. Udal, hereunder followeth.

The Sum and Effect of Biſhop Gardiner's Sermon preached before King Edward, Anno 1550.

MOST honourable audience, I purpoſe, by the grace of God, to declare ſome part of the goſpel that is accuſtomably uſed to be read in the church at this day. And becauſe that without the ſpecial grace of God, neither can I ſpeak any thing to your edifying, nor ye receive the ſame accordingly, I ſhall deſire you all that we may jointly pray all together for the aſſiſtance of his grace. In which prayer I commend to Almighty God your moſt excellent majeſty, our ſovereign lord king of England, France and Ireland, and of the church of England and Ireland, next and immediately under God here on earth, the ſupreme head, queen Katherine dowager, my lady Mary's grace, my lady Elizabeth's grace, your majeſty's moſt dear ſiſters, my lord protector's grace, with all others of your moſt honourable council, the ſpirituality and temporality, and I ſhall deſire you to commend unto God, with your prayer, the ſouls departed unto God in Chriſt's faith, and amongſt theſe moſt eſpecially our late ſovereign lord king Henry VIII. your majeſty's moſt noble father. For theſe and for grace neceſſary, I ſhall deſire you to ſay a Pater Noſter, and ſo forth.

The GOSPEL beginneth,

MATTHEW XVI. 13, 14, 15, 16.

When Jeſus was come into the parts of Ceſarea, a city that Philippus builded, he aſked his diſciples, and ſaid, Whom do men ſay that the ſon of man is? They ſaid, Some ſay that thou art John the Baptiſt, ſome that thou art Elias, ſome that thou art Jeremiah, or ſome one of the Prophets. He ſaid to them, But whom do ye ſay that I am? Then anſwered Simon Peter, and ſaid, Thou art Chriſt the Son of the Living God.

I Cannot have time, I think, to ſpeak of the goſpel thoroughly, for other matters that I have here now to ſay, but I ſhall note unto you ſuch things as I may, and firſt of the diverſity of opinions concerning Chriſt, which were among the people variable: but among this, that is, the diſciples of Chriſt's ſchool, there was no variety, they agreed all together in one truth, and among them there was no variety. For when Peter had with all the reſt, and in the name of all the reſt made his anſwer, that Chriſt was the Son of God, they all confeſſed with one conſent, that he had ſpoken the truth. Yet theſe opinions of Chriſt that the people had of him, though they were ſundry, yet were they honourable and not ſlanderous: for to ſay that Chriſt was Elias, and John the Baptiſt, was honourable: for ſome thought him ſo to be, becauſe he did frankly, ſharply, and openly rebuke vice. They that called him Jeremiah, had alſo an honourable opinion of him, and thought him ſo to be, becauſe of his great learning which they perceived in him, and marvelled where he had it. And they that ſaid he was one of the prophets, had an honourable opinion of him, favoured him, and thought well of him.

But there was another ſort of people that ſpake evil of him, and ſlandered him, and railed on him, ſaying that he was a glutton, and a drinker of wine, that he had a devil in him, that he was a deceiver of the people, that he was a carpenter's ſon, as though he were the worſe for his father's craft. But of theſe he aſked no queſtion: for among theſe none agreed with the other. Wherein ye ſhall note that man of his own power and ſtrength can do nothing: no, nothing that good is he can do of his own invention or device, but erreth and faileth; when he is left to his own invention, he erreth in his imagination. So proud is man, and ſo ſtout of his own courage, that he deviſeth nothing well, whenſoever he is left to himſelf without God; and then never do any ſuch agree in any truth, and wander and err in all that they do. As men of law, if they be aſked their opinion in any point touching the law, ye ſhall not have two of them agree in opinion: if there be two or three of them aſked their opinion in any matter, if they ſhould anſwer all one thing, they fear leſt they ſhould be ſuppoſed and thought to have no learning. Therefore be they never ſo many of them, they will not agree in their anſwers, but devile each man a ſundry anſwer in any thing that they are aſked.

The philoſophers that were not of Chriſt's ſchool erred every one in their vain opinions, and no one of them agreeth with the other.

Yea, men of ſimplicity, though they mean well, yet being out of Chriſt's ſchool, they varied and agreed not in their opinions of Chriſt, though they thought well of him. Some ſaid he was John, ſome Elias, ſome Jeremiah miah, but none made the right anſwer. He that anſwered here, was Simon the ſon of Jonas, and he ſaid, Thou art Chriſt, the Son of the living God.

Where ye ſhall note the properties that were in Peter, He was called Simon, which is obedience, and Jonas is a dove; ſo that in him that is of Chriſt's ſchool, muſt be theſe two properties, obedience and ſimplicity. He muſt be humble and innocent as a dove, that will be of Chriſt's ſchool. Pride is a hindrance of Chriſt's ſchool: for as the wiſe man ſaith, God reſiſteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble and meek. And according to the ſame doth Chriſt in the goſpel ſay, Oh Father, I confeſs unto thee, that is, I laud and magnify thee; for that thou had hidden theſe things from the wiſe, and haſt opened them unto the little ones. Whereupon ſaith St. Auguſtine, that the gifts of learning and knowledge of ſciences are no hindrance to Chriſt's ſchool, but a furtherance thereunto, if they be well applied and uſed as they ought to be: but he that is proud, and feedeth himſelf with his own conceit and opinion of himſelf, and abuſeth the gifts of God, applying his learning and knowledge to the ſatisfying and following of his own fantaſy, is no right diſciple of Chriſt, but falleth into error. When they ſaid and affirmed themſelves to be wiſe, they were made fools.

The philoſophers had every one a ſect of his own, and had many gay ſentences for the commendation of their opinions, and every man thought his own opinion to be beſt: but becauſe they applied all to their own pride and glory, and not to the honour of God, nor humbled themſelves as they ought to have done, but followed their own fantaſy, they erred, and fell out of the way, and were not of Chriſt's ſchool: and all that have gone out of Chriſt's ſchool, pride hath brought them out of it; and ſuch as have not entered, have kept themſelves out of it with pride likewiſe: therefore all ſuch as will be ſcholars of Chriſt's ſchool and diſcipline, muſt be humble and meek; otherwiſe, When they ſaid and affirmed themſelves to be wiſe, they were made fools.

He that cannot learn this leſſon of Peter, and humbly confeſs with Peter, that Chriſt is the Son of the living God, is no ſcholar of Chriſt's ſchool, be he otherwiſe never ſo well learned, never ſo well ſeen in other ſciences. But now concerning the anſwer of Peter, Matthew here in this place ſaith, he anſwered, "Thou art Chriſt the Son of the living God." St. Luke ſaith he anſwered, "Thou art the Chriſt of God." And St. Mark ſaith, he anſwered, "Thou art the Chriſt." But in all that is no variety: for to ſay, Chriſt the Son of the living God; and to ſay, The Chriſt of God; and to ſay, The Chriſt, is in effect all one, and no diverſity in it, for Chriſt alone is the whole, and he that confeſſeth thoroughly Chriſt, is thoroughly a chriſtian man, and doth therein confeſs him to be the Lord and Saviour of the world. But now we muſt conſider what Chriſt is: Chriſt was ſent to be our Meſſias, our Saviour: he was ſent to be our biſhop, and alſo our ſacrifice: he was ſent from the Trinity to be our Mediator between God and us, and to reconcile us to the favour of God the Father: he was the biſhop that offered for our ſins, and the ſacrifice that was offered: and as he is our biſhop, ſo is he our mean to pacify God for us, for that was the office of a biſhop, to ſacrifice for the ſins of the people, and to make interceſſion for the people; and as he was our ſacrifice, ſo was he our reconciliation to God again.

But we muſt confeſs and believe him thoroughly I ſay: for as he was our biſhop then, ſo is it he that ſtill keepeth us in favour with God: and like as his ſacrifice then made was ſufficient as to deliver us from our ſins, and to bring us in favour with God; ſo to continue us in the ſame favour of God, he ordained a perpetual remembrance of himſelf, he ordained himſelf for a memory of himſelf at his laſt ſupper, when he inſtituted the ſacrament of the altar, not for another redemption, as though the world needed a new redemption from ſin, but that we might thoroughly remember his moſt holy paſſion, he inſtituted the ſacrament by his moſt holy word, ſaying, "This is my body," which word is ſufficient to prove the ſacrament, and maketh ſufficiently for the ſubſtance thereof. And this daily ſacrifice he inſtituted to be continued among chriſtian men, not for need of another redemption or ſatisfaction for the ſins of the world, for that was ſufficiently performed by the ſacrifice of his body and blood done upon the croſs; neither that he is our biſhop for need of any further ſacrifice to be made for ſin, but to continue us in the remembrance of his paſſion ſuffered for us, to make us ſtrong in believing the fruit of his paſſion, to make us diligent in thankſgiving for the benefit of his paſſion, to eſtabliſh our faith, and to make it ſtrong in acknowledging the efficacy of his death and paſſion ſuffered for us. And this is the true underſtanding of the maſs, not for another redemption, but that we may be ſtrong in believing the benefits of Chriſt's death and blood-ſhedding for us upon the croſs. And this it is that we muſt believe of Chriſt, and believe it thoroughly: and therefore by your patience, as Peter made his confeſſion, ſo will I make confeſſion, wherein by your majeſty's leave and ſufferance, I will plainly declare what I think of the ſtate of the church of England at this day, how I like it, and what I think of it.

Where I ſaid of the maſs, that it was a ſacrifice ordained to make us the more ſtrong in the faith and remembrance of Chriſt's paſſion, and for commending unto God the ſouls of ſuch as be dead in Chriſt (for theſe two things are the ſpecial cauſes why the maſs was inſtituted) the parliament very well ordained maſs to be kept; and becauſe we ſhould be the more ſtrong in the faith and devotion towards God, it was well done of the parliament, for moving the people more and more to devotion, to ordain that the ſacrament ſhould be received in both kinds: therefore I ſay, that the act of parliament for receiving of the ſacrament of the altar in both kinds, was well made.

I ſay alſo, that the proclamation which was made, That no man ſhould unreverently ſpeak of the ſacrament, or otherwiſe ſpeak of it than ſcripture teacheth them, was well made. For this proclamation ſtoppeth the mouths of all ſuch as will unreverently ſpeak of the ſacrament: for in ſcripture there is nothing to be found that maketh any thing againſt the ſacrament, but all maketh with it. Wherefore, if they were the children of obedience, they would not uſe any unreverend talk againſt the ſacrament, nor blaſpheme the holy ſacrament. For no word of ſcripture maketh any thing againſt it.

But here it may be ſaid unto me, Why, ſir, is this your opinion? It is good you ſpeak plainly in this matter, without any colouring or covert ſpeaking. The act for the diſſolving and ſuppreſſing of the chauntries ſeemeth to make againſt the maſs, how like ye that act? what ſay you of it? or what would you ſay of it, if you were alone? I will ſpeak what I think of it, I will uſe no colourable or covert words, I will not uſe a deviſed ſpeech for a time, and afterward go from it again. If chauntries were abuſed by applying the maſs for the ſatisfaction of ſin, or to bring men to heaven, or to take away ſin, or to make men, of wicked, juſt, I like the act well, and they might well be diſſolved, for the maſs was not inſtituted for any ſuch purpoſe:, yet nevertheleſs for them that were in them (I ſpeak now as in the cauſe of the poor) it were well done that they were provided of livings. The act doth graciouſly provide for them during their lives, and I doubt not but that your majeſty, and the lords of your moſt honourable council, have taken order that they ſhould be well looked unto, but yet how they ſhall be uſed at the hands of other officers, God knoweth; full hardly, I fear. But as for the chauntries themſelves, if there were any ſuch abuſe in them concerning the maſs, it is no matter if they be taken away.

King Henry the eighth, a noble and wiſe prince, not without great pain maintained the maſs, and yet in his doctrine it was confeſſed that maſſes of Scala Cœli were not to be uſed, or allowed, becauſe they did pervert the right uſe and inſtitution of the maſs. For when men add unto the maſs an opinion of ſatisfaction, or of a new redemption, then do they put it to another uſe than it was ordained for. I that allow maſs ſo well, and I that allow praying for the dead (as indeed the dead are of chriſtian charity to be prayed for) yet can agree with the realm in that matter of putting down chauntries.

But yet ye would ſay unto me, There be fewer maſſes by putting away the chauntries. So were there when abbeys were diſſolved: ſo be there, when ye unite many churches in one. But this is no injury nor prejudice to the maſs; it conſiſteth not in the number, nor in the multitude, but in the thing itſelf: ſo that the decay of the maſs, by taking away the chauntries, is anſwered by the abbeys. But yet I would have it conſidered for the perſons that are in them. I ſpeak of the poor men's livings.

I have now declared what I think of the act of parliament made for the receiving of the ſacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Chriſt in both kinds. Ye have my mind and opinion concerning a proclamation that came forth for the ſame act, and I have ſhewed my mind therein even plainly as I think, and I have ever been agreeable to this point, I have often times reaſoned in it, I have ſpoken and alſo written in it, beyond the ſeas, and on this ſide the ſeas; my books be abroad, which I cannot unwrite again. I was ever of this opinion, that it might be received in both kinds, and it was a conſtitution provincial, ſcarce two hundred years agone, made by Peckam, then archbiſhop of Canterbury, that it ſhould be received in both kinds, or at leaſtwiſe in the great churches, for in the ſmaller churches it was not thought to be expedient. Thus have I ever thought of this matter, I have never been of other mind, nor have I changed my conſcience, but have obeyed and followed the order of the realm, and I pray you to obey orders as I have obeyed, that we may be all the children of obedience.

Now I will return to the text. When Simon had anſwered, Thou art Chriſt, the Son of the living God: Then Chriſt ſaid unto him, Bleſſed art thou Simon Barjona, for fleſh and blood have not opened that unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven; and I ſay unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell ſhall not prevail againſt it. Bleſſed art thou (ſaith he) for fleſh and blood hath not opened that unto thee. For otherwiſe in John, Andrew told of Chriſt, and ſaid, I have found the Meſſias, which is Chriſt. But this is not enough. He that ſhall confeſs Chriſt muſt have an inward teaching, and muſt be ſpiritually taught by the Father of heaven, for Andrew's confeſſion was nothing but a carnal confeſſion, and ſuch a one as any other might have made by natural reaſon: but the confeſſion of Peter was above the reaſon of man: for Chriſt was there a very man, and St. Peter's eyes told him that he was a man, and nothing elſe; but he was inwardly taught by the Father of heaven, and had a ſecret knowledge given him from heaven, not by fleſh and blood, that is to ſay, by man's reaſon, but inwardly by the Father of heaven: and ſeeing this was above reaſon, it is a marvellous thing that reaſon ſhould be uſed to impugn faith, which is not within the precinct of carnal men, and ſuch as uſe groſs reaſon.

But Peter had another reaſon inwardly taught him, and becauſe he could learn his leſſon, Chriſt gave him a new name: for Petra is a ſtone, a new name for a chriſtian man; for upon this confeſſion of thy faith, here I will build my church, that is, I will eſtabliſh all thoſe which I intend to gather unto thee, and the devils ſhall not prevail againſt it: for he that with a good heart and ſure faith confeſſeth this, he is ſure from all evil: this world nor Satan can do him no harm.

But now for a further declaration, it is a marvellous thing, that upon theſe words the biſhop of Rome ſhould found his ſupremacy: for whether it be Super Petram, or Petrum, all is one matter, it maketh nothing at all for the purpoſe to make a foundation of any ſuch ſupremacy. For otherwiſe (when Peter ſpake carnally to Chriſt as in the ſame chapter a little following) Satan was his name, where Chriſt ſaid, Get thee behind me, Satan: ſo that the name of Peter is no foundation for the ſupremacy, but as it is ſaid in ſcripture, Ye are built upon the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, that is, by participation (for godly participation giveth names of things) he might be called the head of the church, as the head of the river is called the head, becauſe he was the firſt that made this confeſſion of Chriſt, which is not an argument for dignity, but for the quality that was in the man. For the firſt man is not evermore the beſt. The head man of a queſt is not always the beſt man in the queſt, but is choſen to be the head man for ſome other quality that is in him. Virtue may allure men, ſo that the inferior perſon in dignity may be the better in place, as the king ſometime chooſeth a mean man to be of his council, of whom he hath a good opinion, yet is the king the king ſtill. And in ſome caſe the king of England might ſend to Rome, and if the biſhop of Rome were a man of ſuch wiſdom, virtue and learning, that he were able in matter of controverſy concerning religion, to ſet an unity in the church of England; the king might well enough ſend to him for his counſel and help, and yet ſhould not in ſo doing, give the biſhop of Rome any ſuperiority over the king. For if a king be ſick, he will have the beſt phyſician: if he have war, he will have the beſt captain; and yet are not theſe the ſuperiors, but the inferiors.

A ſchoolmaſter is a ſubject, a phyſician is a ſubject, a captain is a ſubject, counſellors are ſubjects; yet do theſe order and direct the king. Wherefore leaving the biſhop of Rome, this I ſay to declare what opinion I am of. I do not ſpeak now what I could ſay. I have ſpoken beyond the ſeas, I have written, my books be abroad. But this is not the place here, I ſay that this place maketh nothing for the biſhop of Rome, but for Chriſt only; for other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jeſus Chriſt.

But now to go forth declaring my mind; in my time had come many alterations. Firſt, a great alteration it was to renounce the biſhop of Rome's authority, and I was one that ſtood in it. A great alteration it was that abbeys were diſſolved. A great alteration it was that images were pulled down: and to all theſe I condeſcended, and yet have I been accounted a maintainer of ſuperſtition, and have been called a maſter of ceremonies and of outward things, and I have been noted to take that religion which conſiſteth in outward things, as though he were a right chriſtian that fulfilled the outward ceremonies, whereof I promiſed to declare my conſcience, and ſo I will, and how I have eſteemed ceremonies, and that I have never been of other opinion than I am concerning ceremonies, and mine opinion I have gathered of Auguſtine and Jerome, ancient fathers and doctors of the church.

Ceremonies ſerve to move men to ſerve God, and as long as they be uſed for that purpoſe, they may be well uſed in the church: but when man maketh himſelf ſervant to them, and not them to ſerve him, then be our ceremonies brought to an abuſe. If by overmuch familiarity of them men abuſe them, they do evil. For we muſt not ſerve creatures but God. We had monkery, nunnery, friery, of a wonderous number, much variety of garments, variety of devices in dwelling, many ſundry orders and faſhions in moving of the body. Theſe things were firſt ordained to admoniſh them of their duty to God, to labour for the neceſſity of the poor, and to ſpare from their own bellies to the poor; and therefore was their fare ordained and prepared. And becauſe they abuſed theſe things, and ſet them in an higher place than they ought to do, not taking monition thereby the better to ſerve God, but eſteeming perfection to conſiſt in them, they were diſſolved, their houſes and garments were taken away.

But one thing king Henry would not take away, that was the vow of chaſtity. The vow of obedience he converted to himſelf, the vow of chaſtity he willeth ſtill to remain with them.

We had many images whereto pilgrimages were done, and many tombs that men uſed to viſit, by reaſon whereof they fell in a fancy of idolatry and ſuperſtition, above the things that they might have been taken for; and becauſe they had not the uſe that they were ordained for, they were left. When men put the images in a higher place than they ſerved for, then were they taken clean away: as give a child a gay book to learn upon, and then if he gaze upon the gorgeouſneſs of his book, and learn not his leſſon, according to the intent that that book was given for, the book is taken away from him; ſo the images, when men had them in higher place and eſtimation than they were firſt ſet up in the church for, then they might be taken away! And I was never of other mind, nor ever had other opinion of them. Divers things there be in the church which be in the liberty of the ruler to order as he ſeeth cauſe; and he that is ruler may either let them ſtand, or elſe may cauſe them to be taken away.

There be two manner of reformations. We have had of both ſorts. There be things in the church, which if they be abuſed, may not be taken away. As for baptiſm, if it be abuſed, there may not another thing be put in the place of it, but the thing muſt be reformed, and brought into the right uſe again. Alſo preaching, if it be abuſed, may not be taken away, but muſt be reformed, and brought to the right uſe; but there be other things uſed in the church, in which the rulers have liberty either to reform them or to take them away. And becauſe it was an eaſier way to take them away, than to bring them to the right uſe that they were ordained for, they were all clean taken away, and ſo they might be. Yea, ſir, will ye ſay, but ye have maintained and defended them, and have preached againſt ſuch perſons as deſpiſed them. It is truth, I have preached againſt the deſpiſers of them, and have ſaid, that images might be ſuffered and uſed in the church as lay-men's books, yet I never otherwiſe defended them, but to be uſed for ſuch purpoſe as they were firſt ſet up in the church for, but now that men be waxed wanton, they are clean taken away, wherein our religion is no more touched, than when books were taken away for abuſing of them.

There was an order taken for books not to be uſed, wherein ſome might have ſaid, the books are good, and I know how to uſe them, I may therefore uſe them well enough. I will therefore uſe them though they be forbidden: but if thou have any charity, thou oughteſt to be contented rather to have them clean taken away, than to declare thyſelf to have another opinion than thou oughteſt to have.

As touching ceremonies, I eſteem them all as Paul eſteemeth them, things indifferent, where he ſaith, That the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, &c. So of ceremonies. Nevertheleſs we have time, place, and number, as a certain number of Pſalms to be ſaid at times, which may be done without ſuperſtition; but theſe things muſt ſerve us, and not we ſerve them. Yet if an order be ſet in them by ſuch as have power, we muſt follow it, and we muſt obey the rulers that appoint ſuch time, place, and number to be kept. Ye may not ſay, If the time will ſerve me, then I will come an hour after. No, ſir, ye muſt keep this time, and this hour, becauſe it is ſo appointed by the rulers, not for the things, but for the order that is ſet. I have been ever of this opinion.

We had palms and candles taken away, which things may indifferently have either of the two reformations aboveſaid. When they were in place, they ſhould have put men in remembrance of their duty and devotion towards God but becauſe they were abuſed, they were and might be taken away. But the religion of Chriſt is not in theſe exerciſes, and therefore in taking away of them the religion of Chriſt is nothing touched nor hindered. But men muſt in ſuch things be conformable, not for the ceremony, but for obedience ſake. St. Paul ſaith that we ſhould rebuke every brother that walketh inordinately. I have told you mine opinion, and my conſcience telleth me that I have ſpoken plainly, that ye may know what I am, and that ye may not be deceived in me nor be ſlandered in me, nor make any further ſearch to know my heart.

I like well the communion, becauſe it provoketh men more and more to devotion. I like well the proclamation, becauſe it ſtoppeth the mouths of all ſuch as unreverently ſpeak or rail againſt the ſacrament. I like well the reſt of the king's majeſty's proceedings concerning the ſacrament. I have now told you what I like. But ſhall I ſpeak nothing of that I miſlike? ye will then ſay I ſpeak not plainly. I will therefore ſhew you my conſcience plainly.

I miſlike thoſe preachers who preach by the king's licence, and thoſe readers which by the king's permiſſion and ſufferance do read open lectures, do openly and blaſphemouſly talk againſt the maſs, and againſt the ſacrament. And to whom may I liken ſuch readers and preachers? I may liken them unto poſts, for the proverb ſaith, That poſts do bear truth in their letters, and lies in their mouths; and ſo do they; and to ſpeak ſo againſt the ſacrament, it is the moſt marvellous matter that ever I ſaw or heard of. I would wiſh therefore that there were a ſtay and an order in this behalf, and that there might be but one order and rule. And let no man of his own head begin matters, nor go before the king. They call it going before the king, and ſuch make themſelves kings. Well, what miſliketh me elſe?

It miſliketh me, that prieſts, and men that vowed chaſtity, ſhould openly marry, and avow it openly: which is a thing that ſince the beginning of the church hath not been ſeen at any time, that men, that have been admited to any eccleſiaſtical adminiſtration ſhould marry. We read of married prieſts, that is to ſay, of married men choſen to be prieſts and miniſters in the church. And in Epiphanius we read, that ſome ſuch for neceſſity were winked at. But that men being prieſts already ſhould marry, was never yet ſeen in Chriſt's church from the beginning of the apoſtle's time. I have written in it, and ſtudied for it; and the very ſame places that are therein alledged to maintain the marriage of prieſts, being diligently read, ſhall plainly confound them that maintain your prieſts to marry, or at the fartheſt within two lines after.

Thus have I ſhewed my opinion in order, proceeding from the inferiors, and in order proceeding from the higher powers. And thus I have (as I truſt plainly declared myſelf) without any covering or counterfeiting. And I beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty to eſteem and take me as I am, and not to be ſlandered in me; for I have told you the plain truth as it is, and I have opened my conſcience unto you. I have not played the poſt with you, to carry truth in my letters, and lies in my mouth: for I would not for all the world make a lye in this place; but I have diſcloſed the plain truth as it lieth in my mind. And thus I commit your moſt excellent majeſty, and all your moſt honourable counſellors, with the reſt of the devout audience here preſent, unto God. To whom be all honour, praiſe, and glory, world without end.

Thus having compriſed the ſum and chief purpoſe of his ſermon, with other ſuch matters above-mentioned, wherein may appear the double-faced doings of this biſhop ſhop in matters of religion: now for the more fortification of that which hath been ſaid, if any ſhall deny this aforeſaid ſermon, or any part thereof, to be true, to confirm therefore the ſame, we will adjoin certain brief notes, collected as well out of the teſtimonies and depoſitions of his own friends and ſervants, and others which were ſworn truly to declare their knowledge in this behalf, as alſo out of his own writings and works agreeing with the ſame.

The Pope's Supremacy impugned by Biſhop Gardiner.

FIRST, as touching the confeſſion and judgment of Stephen Gardiner againſt the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, read in his book De vera Obedientia.

Item, The ſaid biſhop Gardiner in his ſermons and preachings, as where he expoundeth the place [Thou art Peter] nothing at all to make for the authority of the Romiſh biſhop, marvelled how the pope could uſurp ſo much to take up that place to build upon, when Chriſt had taken it up before to build his church.

Item, The confeſſion of Peter was the confeſſion of all the apoſtles, like as the bleſſing given to Peter pertained as well to all the apoſtles as to Peter.

Item, That the place, Feed my ſheep, was not ſpecial to Peter alone, but general to all the apoſtles. Alſo that the Greek church did never receive the ſaid biſhop of Rome for their univerſal head.

Item, That the church was built upon Chriſt's faith, and not upon Peter.

And though Peter was called the prince of the apoſtles, that was nothing elſe but like as it is in an inqueſt, where the foreman, or headman is not ſo called, becauſe he is beſt or chiefeſt of that company, but becauſe he ſpeaketh firſt.

The ſaid biſhop in his book De vera Obedientia, did not only write againſt the pope's ſupremacy, but alſo did defend the ſame at Lovain. And moreover in his ſermons did alledge and preach the ſame.

Item, For the ſpace of fourteen years together, he preached againſt the pope's ſupremacy in divers ſermons, and eſpecially in one ſermon before king Henry.

Ceremonies, Images, Chauntries, &c. impugned by Biſhop Gardiner.

Item, For ceremonies and images which were abuſed, to be taken away by public authority, he did well allow it, as a child to have his book taken from him when he abuſeth it, or delighteth only in the golded cover.

Item, The diſſolving of monaſtries and religious houſes, he allowed and granted that they were juſtly ſuppreſſed.

Friars he never liked in all his life.

Monks he counted but belly-gods.

The going about of St. Nicholas, St. Katherine, and St. Clement, he affirmeth to be children's toys.

The taking away or tranſpoſing of Chauntry Obits, he referreth to the arbitrement of the politic rulers, granting that if they did diſſolve them, it might well be done.

Item, He wiſheth them to be committed to a better uſe, and that monaſteries were juſtly taken away.

The obſerving of days, hours, number, time and place, if they be orderly and publicly commanded by the rulers, it is but to ſet the church in an outward and public order; but if a man inwardly and privately be addicted to the ſame, thinking his prayer otherwiſe not available, but by obſerving thereof, is an error.

The Communion is ſet out by king Edward he liked well.

The book of Common Service he was content both to keep himſelf, and cauſe it to be kept by others.

For the homilies, he exhorted the people in his preaching, to come to the church to hear them.

In ſum, to all injunctions, ſtatutes, and proclamations ſet forth by the king and ſuperior powers, he yielded and granted.

Now (gentle reader), lay theſe writings, preachings, and doings of this biſhop in the days of king Henry and king Edward, with his doings in queen Mary's time, and thou ſhalt ſee how variable he was, how inconſtant and contrary to himſelf, how perjured and falſe, and far differing from that which he was reported to be in a certain Engliſh book ſet out in queen Mary's time, which ſaith that there were three only in England, whoſe conſcience had been never ſtained in religion: of whom he falſly ſaith, the aforeſaid biſhop of Wincheſter was one.

Although biſhop Gardiner, in granting to theſe points of religion (as ye have heard), and other ſome again denying, could not therefore deſerve the name and fame of a perfect chriſtian, yet notwithſtanding, if he had continued in his judgment ſtill, and been conſtant in himſelf, he might have won more commendation both with God and men. But as ſoon as the time began to alter, he likewiſe, altering with the time, was ſo far changed from that he ſeemed, that neither he agreed with other papiſts, nor yet with himſelf, as Dr. Ridley in certain treatiſes hath well noted of him: wherein as in a glaſs may be ſeen the manifeſt contrariety and repugnance in him, not only from the truth of God's bleſſed word, but alſo how the ſaid biſhop, ſtanding ſo much in ſingularity by himſelf, neither agreeth with other his fellow-writers of his own faction, nor yet fully accordeth with himſelf in certain caſes of the ſacrament, as the aforeſaid Dr. Ridley in examining his words and works, hath well declared.

Here haſt thou (good reader) this ſtout prelate of Wincheſter, with all his proſperities, doings, and qualifications, as in a certain anatomy proportioned out unto thee, whereby thou mayſt boldly judge (and nothing err in thy judgment), what is to be eſteemed of him by his fruits, as who neither was true proteſtant, nor right papiſt: neither conſtant in his error, nor yet ſtedfaſt in the truth: falſe in king Henry's time, a diſſembler in king Edward's time, double perjured, and a murderer in queen Mary's time, mutable and inconſtant in all times.

To deſcribe and paint out the unſtable mutability of this biſhop aforeſaid, no more need be added; yet notwithſtanding, ſeeing the matter is not long, it may not be amiſs to annex a piece of Driander's letter written to one Criſpin, phyſician in Oxford, ſent from Antwerp, concerning the doings and behaviour of this biſhop of Wincheſter, whoſe ſtory we have now in hand. The copy of which Driander's letter, written to the ſaid Criſpin his friend, being in Latin, is thus tranſlated into Engliſh.

BEFORE my departure from the city of Paris, I wrote unto you by our friend the Engliſh-man, &c.

Now you ſhall be contented only with the narration of your biſhop of Wincheſter, who (as appertained to the ambaſſador of ſo noble a prince), came to Lovain with a great bravery, and was there received at one Jeremy's houſe, and moſt honourably entertained, where the faculty of divines for honour's ſake, preſented him wine in the name of the whole univerſity. But our famous doctors, and learned maſters, for they would more deeply ſearch and underſtand the learning and excellency of the prelate, peruſed and ſcanned a certain oration made by him, and now extant, intituled, De vera Obedientia, in which oration he did impugn the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, and preferred his lord's and king's authority before the holy apoſtolic ſee (as they term it), which being read and conſidered by them, they did not only repent that they had given him ſuch honour, but alſo recanted canted that which they had done: and did not ſo much honour him before, but now they were as earneſt and as ſpiteful againſt him. Richard Lothomus, interpreter of terms, with the favourers of that fraternity, and other champions of the fallen church, diſputed with him concerning the pope's ſupremacy. The biſhop ſtoutly defended his ſaid oration. The divines contrary ſtiffly maintained their opinion, and divers times openly with exclamations, called the ſaid biſhop an excommunicate perſon, and a ſchiſmatic, to no little reproach and infamy of the Engliſh nation. The biſhop not long after minding to ſay maſs in St. Peter's church, they did deny unto him, as to an excommunicate perſon, the ornaments and veſtments meet for the ſame; wherewith he being highly offended, ſuddenly haſted his journey from thence. The next day after, the dean made an eloquent oration, wherein he openly diſgraced and defamed him. You have heard now a true ſtory, for our doctor was a beholder of the whole tragedy, &c.

And this now being ſufficient for Gardiner's ſtory, to leave him to his judge, and to let him go, we ſhall return and proceed (by God's leave), as the courſe of thoſe doleful days ſhall lead us, to proſecute the reſidue of Chriſt's martyrs, as now in order followeth.

The Martyrdom of John Webb, gentleman, George Roper, and Gregory Parke, at Canterbury.

JOHN WEBB was brought before the biſhop of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, or ſome other deputed in their room, on the 16th of September, and there had propounded unto him ſuch articles as were commonly adminiſtered by Bonner to thoſe of his juriſdiction: and being willed for that preſent to depart, and to deliberate with himſelf upon the matter, againſt the next time of his appearance, he made anſwer that he would no otherwiſe ſay (by God's grace), than he had already ſaid, which was this; As touching the ſacrament of Chriſt's body, ſaid he, I do believe it to be left unto his church (with thankſgiving), in commemoration of his death and paſſion, until his coming again. So that it is left in remembrance of his body, and not by the words of conſecration to be made his body, really, ſubſtantially, and the ſame body that was born of the virgin Mary: I utterly deny that.

After this (beſides ſundry other times), the third day of October, the ſaid John Webb, George Roper, and Gregory Parke, were all brought together before the ſaid judges: who there and then agreeing, and ſtedfaſtly allowing the former anſwer made before by Mr. Webb, were by the bloody prelates adjudged heretics; and therefore about the end of the ſame month, they were brought out of priſon together to the place of martyrdom; ſaying certain pſalms mournfully as they were going to the ſtake.

And being thus brought (as I ſaid) to the ſtake, and there encompaſſed about with a chain, were burnt all together in one fire at Canterbury, moſt patiently enduring their torments, and accounting themſelves happy and bleſſed of the Lord that they were made worthy to ſuffer for Chriſt's goſpel.

William Wiſeman.

THE 13th of December, William Wiſeman, a clothworker of London, died in Lollard's-Tower, where he was in priſon and bonds for the goſpel of Chriſt. Some thought, that either through famine, or ill handling of ſome murdering papiſt, he was made away. By reaſon whereof the coroner, named John Gibbs, gentleman, with an inqueſt of twelve men, were fain to ſit upon him, who although to the outward appearance were ſaid to find nothing in him elſe but only God's viſitation, yet what other privy cauſes there might be of his death, the Lord knoweth, I have nought to ſay.

After the ſaid William Wiſeman was departed (as is ſaid) in the Tower, the papiſts caſt him out into the fields, commanding that no man ſhould bury him, according as their devout manner is to do with all ſuch as die in like ſort, whom they account as prophane, and worthy of no burial, but to be caſt to dogs and birds. And yet notwithſtand this their mercileſs commandment, ſome good Tobits there were which buried him in the evening, as commonly they did all the reſt thrown out in like manner, whom they were wont privily by night to cover, and many times the archers in the fields ſtanding by, and ſinging pſalms together at their burial.

In the ſame month of December, James Gore alſo died in the priſon at Colcheſter, laid there in bonds for the truth of God's word.

The Hiſtory of Mr. John Philpot, who was examined, condemned, and martyred for the Defence of the Goſpel of Chriſt.

THE troubles of Mr. Philpot have been partly related before, in the beginning of queen Mary's time, in proſecuting the diſputation in the convocation-houſe. He came of a worſhipful family, the ſon of a knight, born in Hampſhire, brought up at New College, in Oxford, where he ſtudied the civil law about ſix or ſeven years, beſides other liberal arts, eſpecially languages, and particularly he wonderfully advanced in the Hebrew tongue. In wit he was pregnant and happy, of a ſingular courage, in ſpirit fervent, in religion zealous, and alſo well practiſed and exerciſed in the ſame (which is no ſmall matter in a true divine), of nature plain and apert, far from all flattery (as doth evidently appear in all his behaviour), farther from all hypocriſy and deceitful diſſimulation. What his learning was, his own examinations penned with his own hand can declare.

From Oxford, deſirous to ſee other countries as occaſion ſerved thereunto, he went over into Italy, and places thereabouts, where he coming upon a time from Venice to Padua, was in danger through a certain Franciſcan friar accompanying him in his journey, who coming to Padua ſought to accuſe him of hereſy. At length returning into England, as the time miniſtered more boldneſs to him in the days of king Edward, he had divers conflicts with biſhop Gardiner in the city of Wincheſter.

After that, having had an advowſon by the ſaid biſhop, he was made there archdeacon of Wincheſter under Dr. Poinet, who then ſucceeded Gardiner in that biſhopric. Thus he continued during the time of king Edward, to the great profit of thoſe parts thereabouts. When that pious king was taken away, and Mary his ſiſter came in place, whoſe ſtudy was wholly bent to alter the ſtate of religion in the woeful realm of England, firſt ſhe cauſed a convocation of the prelates and learned men to be aſſembled for the accompliſhment of her deſire.

In which convocation, Mr. Philpot being preſent according to his room and degree, with a few others ſuſtained the cauſe of the goſpel manfully againſt the contrary part (as has been already recited), for which cauſe, notwithſtanding the liberty of the houſe promiſed before, he was called to account before biſhop Gardiner, the chancellor, then being his ordinary, by whom he was firſt examined, although that examination came not to our hands. From thence again he was removed to biſhop Bonner and other commiſſioners, with whom he had divers conflicts, as may appear by the following examinations.

The firſt Examination of Mr. John Philpot, before the Queen's Commiſſioners, Mr. Cholmley, Mr. Roper, and Dr. Story, and one of the Scribes of the Arches, at Newgate, Seſſions-Hall, October 2, 1555.

BEFORE I was called into an inner parlour where the commiſſioners ſat, Dr. Story came out into the hall where I was, to view me among others that were there; and paſſing by me, he ſaid, Ha, Mr. Philpot! and in returning immediately again, ſtayed againſt me, beholding me, and ſaying, that I was well fed indeed.

Philpot. If I be fat, and in good liking, Mr. Doctor, it is no marvel, ſince I have been ſtalled up in priſon theſe twelve months and a half in a cloſe corner. I am come to know your pleaſure wherefore you have ſent for me.

Story. We hear that thou art a ſuſpected perſon, and of heretical opinions, and therefore have ſent for thee.

Philpot. I have been in priſon thus long, only upon the occaſion of diſputation made in the convocation-houſe, and upon ſuſpicion of ſetting forth the report thereof.

Story. If thou wilt revoke the ſame, and become an honeſt man, thou ſhalt be ſat at liberty, and do right well; er elſe thou ſhalt be committed to the biſhop of London. How ſayſt thou, wilt thou revoke it or no?

Philpot. I have already anſwered in this behalf to mine ordinary.

Story. If thou anſwereſt thus when thou comeſt before us anon, thou ſhalt hear more of our minds; and with that he went into the parlour, and I within a little after was called in.

The Scribe. Sir, what is your name?

Philpot. My name is John Philpot. And ſo he intituled my name.

Story. This man was archdeacon of Wincheſter, of Dr. Poinet's preſentment.

Philpot. I was archdeacon indeed, but none of his preſentment; but by virtue of a former advowſon given by my lord chancellor that now is.

Story. Ye may be ſure that my lord chancellor would not make any ſuch as he is archdeacon.

Roper. Come hither to me Mr. Philpot. We hear ſay that you are out of the catholic church, and have been a diſturber of the ſame; out of which whoſo is, he cannot be the child of ſalvation. Wherefore if you will come into the ſame, you ſhall be received, and find favour.

Philpot. I am come before your worſhipful maſterſhips at your appointment, underſtanding that you are magiſtrates authorized by the queen's majeſty, whom I own, and will do my due obedience to the uttermoſt. Wherefore I deſire to know what cauſe I have offended in, for which I am now called before you. And if I cannot be charged with any particular matter done contrary to the laws of this realm, I deſire your maſterſhips that I may have the benefit of a ſubject, and be delivered out of my long wrongful impriſonment, where I have lain a year and a half, without any calling to anſwer before now, and my living taken from me without all law.

Roper. Though we have no particular matter to charge you withal, yet we may, by our commiſſion and by the law, drive you to anſwer to the ſuſpicion of a ſlander going on you: and beſides this, we have ſtatutes to charge you herein withal.

Philpot. If I have offended any ſtatute, charge me therewithal, and if I have incurred the penalty thereof, puniſh me accordingly. And becauſe you are magiſtrates, and executors of the queen's majeſty's laws, by force whereof you do now ſit, I deſire that if I be found no notorious tranſgreſſor of any of them, I may not be burdened with more than I have done.

Cholmley. If the juſtice do ſuſpect a felon, he may examine him upon ſuſpicion thereof, and commit him to priſon tho' there be no fault done.

Story. I perceive whereabouts this man goeth: he is plain in Cardmaker's caſe, for he made the ſame allegations. But they will not ſerve thee; for thou art an heretic, and holdeſt againſt the bleſſed maſs: how ſayſt thou to that?

Philpot. I am no heretic.

Story. I will prove thee an heretic. Whoſoever hath held againſt the bleſſed maſs, is an heretic: but thou haſt held againſt the ſame, therefore thou art an heretic, Philpot. That which I ſpake, and which you are able to charge me withal, was in the convocation, where by the queen's majeſty's will and her whole council, liberty was given to every man of the houſe to utter his conſcience, and to ſpeak his mind freely of ſuch queſtions in religion, as there were propounded by the prolocutor; for which now I thought not to be moleſted and impriſoned, as I have been, neither now be compelled by you to anſwer for the ſame.

Story. Thou ſhalt go to Lollards-Tower, and be handled there like an heretic as thou art, and anſwer to the ſame that thou there didſt ſpeak, and be judged by the biſhop of London.

Philpot. I have already been convented of this matter before the lord chancellor mine ordinary, who this long time hath kept me in priſon: therefore if his lordſhip will take my life away, as he hath done my liberty and living, he may: which I think he cannot do of his conſcience, and therefore hath let me lie thus long in priſon: wherefore I am content to abide the end of him herein that is mine ordinary, and do refuſe the auditory of the biſhop of London, becauſe he is an incompetent judge for me, and not mine ordinary.

Story. But, Sir, thou ſpakeſt words in the convocation-houſe, which is in the biſhop of London's dioceſe, and therefore thou ſhalt be carried to the Lollard's Tower, to be judged by him for the words thou ſpakeſt in his dioceſe againſt the bleſſed maſs.

Philpot. Sir, you know it is againſt all equity, that I ſhould be twice vexed for one cauſe, and that by ſuch as by the law have nothing to do with me.

Roper. You cannot deny, but that you ſpake againſt the maſs in the convocation-houſe.

Story. Doſt thou deny that which thou ſpakeſt there, or no?

Philpot. I cannot deny that I have ſpoken there; and if by the law you may put me to death for it, I am here ready to ſuffer whatſoever ſhall be judged unto.

The Scribe. This man is fed of vain-glory.

Cholmley. Play the wiſe gentleman and be conformable, and be not ſtubborn in your opinions, neither caſt yourſelf away. I would be glad to do you good.

Philpot. I deſire you, Sir, with the reſt here, that I be not charged further at your hands, than the law chargeth me, for that I have done, ſince there was no law directly againſt that werewith I am now charged. And you Mr. Doctor (of old acquaintance in Oxford) I truſt willl ſhew me ſome friendſhip, and not extremity.

Story. I tell thee, if thou wouldeſt be a good catholic man, I would be thy friend, and ſpend my gown to do thee good; but I will be no friend to an heretic, as thou art: but I will ſpend both my gown and my coat, but I will burn thee. How ſayſt thou to the ſacrament of the altar?

Phil. Sir, I am not come now to diſpute with your maſterſhip, and the time now ſerveth not thereto, but to anſwer to that I may be lawfully charged withal.

Story. Well, ſince thou wilt not revoke that thou haſt done, thou ſhalt be had into the Lollards-Tower.

Phil. Sir, ſince you will needs ſhew me this extremity, and charge me with my conſcience, I do deſire to ſee your commiſſion, whether you have this authority ſo to do, and after the view thereof I ſhall (according to my duty), make you further anſwer, if you may by the virtue thereof burthen me with my conſcience.

Roper. Let him ſee the commiſſion: is it here?

Story. Shall we let every vile perſon ſee our commiſſion?

Cholmley. Let him go from whence he came, and on Thurſday he ſhall ſee our commiſſion.

Story. No, let him lie in the mean while in the Lollards-Tower; for I will ſweep the Kings Bench and all other priſons alſo of theſe heretics, they ſhall not have that reſort as they have had, to ſcatter their hereſies.

Philpot. You have power to transfer my body from place to place at your pleaſure: but you have no power over my ſoul. And I mind not whither you commit me, for I cannot be worſe intreated than I am, kept all day in a cloſe chamber; wherefore it is no marvel that my fleſh is puft up, wherewithal Mr. Doctor is offended.

Story. Marſhal, take him home with you again, and ſee that you bring him again on Thurſday, and then we ſhall rid your fingers of him, and afterward of your other heretics.

Philpot. God hath appointed a day ſhortly to come, in which he will judge us with righteouſneſs, howſoever you judge of us now.

Roper. Be content to be ruled by Mr. Doctor, and ſhew yourſelf a catholic man.

Philpot. Sir, if I ſhould ſpeak otherwiſe than my conſcience is, I ſhould but diſſemble with you: and why be you ſo earneſt to have me ſhew myſelf a diſſembler both to God and you, which I cannot do?

Roper. We do not require you to diſſemble with us to be a catholic man.

Phil. If I do ſtand in any thing againſt that, wherein any man is able to burthen me with one jot of the ſcripture, I ſhall be content to be counted no catholic man, or an heretic as you pleaſe.

Story. Have we ſcripture, ſcripture? And with that he roſe up ſaying; Who ſhall be judge, I pray you? This man is like his fellow Woodman, which the other day would have nothing elſe but ſcripture. And this is the beginning of this tragedy.

The ſecond Examination of Mr. Philpot before the Queen's Commiſſioners, Mr. Cholmley, Mr. Roper, Dr. Story, Dr. Cook, and the Scribe, Oct. 24. 1555. at Newgate Seſſions-Hall.

AT my coming, a man of Aldgate of mine acquaintance ſaid unto me, God have mercy on you, for you are already condemned in this world; for Dr. Story ſaid, that my lord chancellor had commanded to do you away. After a little conſultation had between them, Mr. Cholmley called me unto him, ſaying, Cholmley. Mr. Philpot, ſhew yourſelf a wiſe man, and be not ſtubborn in your own opinion, but be conformable to the queen's proceedings, and live, and you ſhall be well aſſured of great favour and reputation.

Philpot. I ſhall do as it becometh a chriſtian man to do.

Story. This is the rankeſt heretic that hath been in all my lord chancellor's dioceſe, and hath done more hurt than any man elſe there: and therefore his pleaſure is, that he ſhould have the law to proceed againſt him, and I have ſpoken with my lord herein, and he willeth him to be committed to the biſhop of London, and there to recant or elſe burn. He howled and wept in the convocation-houſe, and made ſuch ado as never man did, as all the heretics do when they lack learning to anſwer. He ſhall go after his fellows. How ſayſt thou, wilt thou recant?

Philpot. I know nothing I have done that I ought to recant.

Story. Well; then I pray you let us commit him to Lollards-Tower, there to remain until he be further examined before the biſhop of London; for he is too fine fed in the King's-Bench, and he hath too much favour there; for his keeper ſaid at the door yeſterday, that he was the fineſt fellow, and one of the beſt learned in England: and with this he roſe up and went his way.

Cook. This man hath moſt ſtoutly maintained hereſies ſince the queen's coming in, above any that I have heard of; therefore it is moſt meet he ſhould be adjudged by the biſhop of London, for the hereſies he hath maintained.

Philpot. I have maintained no hereſies.

Cook. No, have you not? Did you not openly ſpeak againſt the ſacrament of the altar in the convocation-houſe? Call you that no hereſy? Wilt thou recant that or not?

Philpot. It was the queen's majeſty's pleaſure that we ſhould reaſon thereof, not by my ſeeking, but by other mens procuring, in the hearing of the council.

Cook. Did the queen give you leave to be an heretic? you may be ſure her grace will not ſo do. Well, we will not diſpute the matter with you; my lord of London ſhall proceed by inquiſition upon thee, and if thou wilt not recant, thou ſhalt be burned.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary in this behalf, and I have already anſwered unto mine ordinary in this matter: and therefore (as I have ſaid before) you ſhall do me great wrong to vex me twice for one matter, ſince I have ſuſtained this long impriſonment, beſides the loſs of my living.

Roper. You were a very unmeet man to be an archdeacon.

Philpot. I know I was as meet a man as he that hath it now.

Cook. A meet man, quoth he? He troubled Mr. Roper and the whole country.

Philpot. There was never poor archdeacon ſo handled at your hands as I am, and that without any juſt cauſe ye be able to lay unto me.

Cook. Thou art no archdeacon.

Philpot. I am archeacon ſtill, although another be in poſſeſſion of my living; for I was never deprived by any law.

Cook. No, ſir, that needeth not: for a notorious heretic ſhould have no ordinary proceeding about his deprivation; but the biſhop may, upon knowledge thereof, proceed to deprivation.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you know that the common law is otherwiſe: and beſide this, the ſtatutes of this realm be otherwiſe, which give this benefit to every perſon, though he be an heretic, to enjoy his living until he be put to death for the ſame.

Cholmley. No, there thou art deceived.

Philpot. Upon the living I mind not. But the unjuſt dealing grieveth me, that I ſhould be thus troubled for my conſcience, contrary to all law.

Cholmley. Why, will not you agree that the queen's majeſty may cauſe you to be examined of your faith?

Philpot. Aſk you Mr. Dr. Cook, and he will tell you that the temporal magiſtrates have nothing to do with matters of faith, for determination thereof. And St. Ambroſe ſaith, that the things of God are not ſubject to the power and authority of princes.

Cook. No? may not the temporal powers commit you to be examined of your faith to the biſhop.

Philpot. Yea, ſir, I deny not that; but you will not grant that the ſame may examine any of their own authority.

Cook. Let him be had away.

Philphot. Your maſterſhip promiſed me the laſt time I was before you, I ſhould ſee your commiſſion by what authority

authority you do call me, and whether I by the ſame be bound to anſwer to ſo much as you demand.

Roper. Let him ſee the commiſſion.

The Scribe. Then he exhibited it to Mr. Roper, and was about to open the ſame.

Cook. No, what will ye do? he ſhall not ſee it.

Philpot. Then do you me wrong, to call me and vex me, not ſhewing your authority in this behalf.

Cook. If we do you wrong, complain on us; and in the mean while thou ſhalt lie in the Lollards-Tower.

Philpot. Sir, I am a poor gentleman; therefore I truſt of your gentleneſs, you will not commit me to ſo vile and ſtrait a place, being found no heinous treſpaſſer.

Cook. Thou art no gentleman.

Philpot. Yea, that I am.

Cook. An heretic is no gentleman: for he is a gentleman that hath gentle conditions.

Philpot. The offence cannot take away the ſtate of a gentleman as long as he liveth, although he were a traytor; but I mean not to boaſt of my gentlemanſhip, but will put it under my foot, ſince you do no more eſteem it.

Story. What will you ſuffer this heretic to prate with you all this day!

Cook. He ſaith he is a gentleman.

Story. A gentlemen, ſaid he? he is a vile heretic knave: for an heretic is no gentleman. Let the keeper of the Lollards-Tower come in, and have him away.

Keeper. Here, ſir.

Story. Take this man with you to the Lollards-Tower, or elſe to the biſhop's Coal-houſe.

Philpot. Sir, if I were a dog, you could not appoint me a worſe and more vile place: but I muſt be content with whatſoever injury you do offer me. God give you a more merciful heart: you are very cruel upon one that never hath offended you. I pray you, Mr. Cholmley, ſhew me ſome friendſhip, that I be not carried to ſo vile a place. And he called me aſide, and ſaid;

Cholmley, I neither underſtand their doings nor their law; I cannot tell what they mean. I would I could do you good.

Philpot. I am content to go whither you will have me. There was never man more cruelly handled than I am at your hands, that without juſt cauſe known ſhould thus be intreated.

Story. Shall we ſuffer this heretic thus to reprove us? Have him hence.

Philpot. God forgive you, and give you merciful hearts, and ſhew you more mercy in the time of need; "Do quickly that you have in hand."

Story. Do you not hear how he maketh us like Judas?

Philpot. That is after your own underſtanding.

After this, I, with four others, were brought to the keeper's houſe in Pater-noſter-row, where we ſupped; and, after ſupper, I was called up to a chamber by the archdeacon of London's ſervant, and that in his maſter's name, who offered me a bed for that night. To whom I gave thanks, ſaying, That it would be a grief to me to lie one night well, and the next night worſe: wherefore I will begin (ſaid I) as I am like to continue, to take ſuch part as my fellows do. And with that we were brought through Pater-noſter-row to my lord of London's coal-houſe; unto which is joined a little blind houſe, with a great pair of ſtocks, appointed both for hand and foot: but, thanks be to God, we have not played of thoſe organs yet, although ſome before have tried them, and there we found a miniſter of Eſſex, a married prieſt, a man of godly zeal, with one other poor man. And the miniſter, at my coming, deſired to ſpeak with me, and did greatly lament his own infirmity, for that, through extremity of impriſonment, he was conſtrained by writing to yield to the biſhop of London: whereupon he was once ſet at liberty, and afterward felt ſuch a hell in his conſcience, that he could ſcarce refrain from deſtroying himſelf, and never could be at quiet until he went to the biſhop's regiſter, deſiring to ſee his bill again; which as ſoon as he had received, he tore it in pieces, and after he was as joyful as a man might be. Of which, when my lord of London had underſtanding, he ſent for him, and fell upon him like a lion, and, like a manly biſhop buffeted him well, ſo that he made his face black and blue, and pluckt away a great piece of his beard: but now, thanks be to God, he is as joyful under the croſs as any of us, and very ſorry for his former infirmity. I write this, becauſe I would all men to take heed how they do contrary to their conſcience; which is, to fall into the pains of hell. And here an end.

The Manner of being called firſt before the Biſhop of London, the ſecond Night of mine Impriſonment in his Coal-houſe.

THE biſhop ſent Mr. Johnſon his regiſter to me with a meſs of meat, and good pot of drink, and bread, ſaying, That my lord had no knowledge before of my being here, for which he was ſorry: therefore he had ſent me and my fellows that meat, knowing whether I would receive the ſame.

I thanked God for my lord's charity, that it pleaſed him to remember poor priſoners, deſiring Almighty God to increaſe the ſame in him, and in all others; and therefore I would not refuſe his beneficence: and therewith took the ſame unto my brethren, praiſing God for his providence towards his afflicted flock, that he ſtirred our adverſaries up to help the ſame in their neceſſity.

Johnſon. My lord would know the cauſe of your being ſent hither (for he knoweth nothing thereof) and wondereth that he ſhould be troubled with priſoners that are not of his own dioceſe.

Philpot. I declared unto him the whole cauſe. After which he ſaid, My lord's will was, that I ſhould have any friendſhip I would deſire: and ſo departed.

Within a while after one of my lord's gentlemen came for me; and I was brought into his preſence, where he ſat at table, with three or four of his chaplains waiting upon him, and his regiſter.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, you are welcome; give me your hand.

With that, becauſe he ſo gently put forth his hand, I, to render courteſy for courteſy, kiſſed my hand, and gave him the ſame.

Bonner. I am right ſorry for your trouble, and I promiſe you before it was within theſe two hours, I knew not of your being here. I pray you tell me what was the cauſe of your ſending hither; for I promiſe you I know nothing thereof as yet, neither would I you ſhould think that I was the cauſe thereof: and I marvel that other men will trouble me with their matters: but I muſt be obedient to my betters, and I fear men ſpeak otherwiſe of me than I deſerve.

Philpot. I ſhewed him the ſum of the matter: that it was for the diſputation in the convocation-houſe, for which I was, againſt all right, moleſted.

Bonner. I marvel that you ſhould be troubled for that if there was none other cauſe but this. But peradventure you have maintained the ſame ſince, and ſome of your friends of late have aſked, whether you do ſtand to the ſame, and you have ſaid, yea; and for this you might be committed to priſon.

Philpot. If it ſhall pleaſe your lordſhip I am burdened no otherwiſe than I have told you, by the commiſſioners who ſent me hither, becauſe I would not recant the ſame.

Bonner. A man may ſpeak in the parliament-houſe, though it be a place of free ſpeech, ſo as he may be impriſoned for it, as in the caſe he ſpeak words of high-treaſon againſt the king or queen; and ſo it might be that that you ſpake otherwiſe than it became you of the church of Chriſt.

Philpot. I ſpake nothing which was out of the articles which were called in queſtion, and agreed upon to be diſputed by the whole houſe, and by permiſſion of the queen and council.

Bonner. Why, may we diſpute of our faith?

Philpot. That we may.

Bonner. Nay, I think not, by the law.

Philpot. Indeed by the civil law I know it is not lawful, but by God's law we may reaſon thereof. For St. Peter ſaith, "Be ye ready to render an account unto all men of the hope which is in you," that demand of you the ſame.

Bonner. Indeed St. Peter ſaith ſo. Why, then I aſk of you what your judgment is of the ſacrament of the altar?

Philpot. My lord, St. Ambroſe ſaith, that the diſputation of our faith ought to be in the congregation, in the hearing of the people, and that I am not bound to render account thereof to every man privately, unleſs it be to edify. But now I cannot ſhew you my mind, but I muſt run upon the pikes in danger of my life for it. Wherefore as the ſaid doctor ſaid unto Valentinian the emperor, ſo ſay I to your lordſhip; Take away the law, and I ſhall reaſon with you. And yet if I come in open judgment, where I am bound by the law to anſwer, I truſt I ſhall utter my conſcience as freely as any that hath come before you.

Bonner. I perceive you are learned, I would have ſuch as you be about me, But you muſt come and be of the church, for there is but one church.

Philpot. God forbid I ſhould be out of the church, I am ſure I am within the ſame: for I know as I am taught by the ſcripture, that there is but one catholic church, one dove, one ſpouſe, one beloved congregation, out of which there is no ſalvation.

Bonner. How chanceth it then, that you go out of the ſame, and walk not with us?

Philpot. My lord, I am ſure I am within the bounds of the church whereupon ſhe is built, which is the word of God.

Bonner. What age are ye of?

Philpot. I am four and forty.

Bonner. You are not now of the ſame faith your godfathers and godmothers promiſed for you, in which you were baptized.

Philpot. Yes, I thank God I am: for I was baptized into the faith of Chriſt which I now hold.

Bonner. How can that be? there is but one faith.

Philpot. I am aſſured of that by St. Paul, ſaying, "That there is but one God, one faith, and one baptiſm," of which I am.

Bonner. You were twenty years ago of another faith than you be now.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, to tell you plain, I was then of no faith, a neuter, a wicked liver, neither hot nor cold.

Bonner. Why do you not think that we have now the true faith?

Philpot. I deſire your lordſhip to hold me excuſed for anſwering at this time. I am ſure that God's word thoroughly, with the primitive church and all the ancient fathers, do agree with this faith I am of.

Bonner. Well, I promiſe you I mean you no more hurt than to mine own perſon: I will not therefore burden you with your conſcience as now; I marvel that you are ſo merry in priſon as you be, ſinging and rejoicing, as the prophet ſaith, Rejoicing in your naughtineſs. Methink you do not well herein; you ſhould rather lament and be ſorry.

Philpot. My lord, the mirth that we make is but in ſinging certain pſalms, according as we are commanded by St. Paul, willing us to be merry in the Lord, ſinging together in hymns and pſalms: and I truſt your lordſhip cannot be diſpleaſed with that.

Bonner. We may ſay unto you as Chriſt ſaid in the goſpel, "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced——

Here my lord ſtumbled, and could not bring forth the text, and required his chaplains to help, and to put him in remembrance of the text better: but they were mum: and I recited out the text unto him, which made nothing to his purpoſe, unleſs he would have us to mourn, becauſe they, if they laugh, ſing ſtill ſorrowful things unto us, threatening faggots and fire.

Philpot. We are, my lord, in a dark, comfortleſs place, and therefore it behoveth us to be merry, leſt, as Solomon ſaith, ſorrowfulneſs eat up our heart. Therefore I truſt your lordſhip will not be angry for our ſinging of pſalms, ſince St. Paul ſaith, "If any man be of an upright mind, let him ſing." And we therefore, to teſtify that we are of an upright mind to God (though we be in miſery) do ſing.

Bonner. I will trouble you no farther as now. If I can do you any good, I ſhall be glad to do it for you. God be with you, good Mr. Philpot, and give you a good night. Have him to the cellar, and let him drink a cup of wine.

Thus I departed, and by my lord's regiſter I was brought to his cellar door, where I drank a good cup of wine. And my lord's chaplain Mr. Couſin followed me, taking acquaintance, ſaying, that I was welcome, and wiſhed that I would not be ſingular.

Philpot. I am well taught the contrary by Solomon, ſaying, Woe be to him that is alone. After that I was carried to my lord's coal-houſe again, where I with my ſix companions do rouſe together in ſtraw as chearfully (we thank God) as others do in their beds of down.

Thus for the third fit.

The fourth Examination of Mr. Philpot in the Archdeacon of London's Houſe, in the Month of October, before the Biſhops of London, Bath, Worceſter, and Glouceſter, BONNER. Mr. Philpot, it hath pleaſed my lords to take pains here to-day, to dine with my poor archdeacon, and in the dinner-time it chanced us to have communication of you, and you were pitied here by many that knew you at New College in Oxford: and I alſo do pity your caſe, becauſe you ſeem unto me, by the talk I had with you the other night, to be learned: and therefore now I have ſent for you to come before them, that it might not be ſaid hereafter, that I had ſo many learned biſhops at my houſe, and yet would not vouchſafe them to talk with you, at my requeſt (I thank them) they conſent ſo to do. Now therefore utter your mind freely, and you ſhall with all favour be ſatisfied. I am ſorry to ſee you lie in ſo evil a caſe as you do, and would fain you ſhould do better, as you may if you pleaſe.

Bath. My lords here have not ſent for you to fawn upon you, but for charity ſake to exhort you to come into the right catholic way of the church.

Worceſter. Before he beginneth to ſpeak, it is beſt that he call to God for grace, and to pray that it might pleaſe God to open his heart, that he may conceive that truth.

Philpot. With that I fell down upon my knees before them, and made my prayer on this manner:

"Almighty God, which art the giver of all wiſdom and underſtanding, I beſeech thee of thy infinite goodneſs and mercy in Jeſus Chriſt, to give me (moſt vile ſinner in thy ſight) the ſpirit of wiſdom to ſpeak and make anſwer in thy cauſe, that it may be to the contentation of the hearers, before whom I ſtand, and alſo to my better underſtanding if I be deceived in any thing."

Bonner. Nay, my lord of Worceſter, you did not well to exhort him to make any prayer. For this is the thing they have a ſingular pride in, that they can often make their vain prayers, in which they glory much. For in this point they are much like to certain arrant heretics, of whom Pliny maketh mention, that did daily ſing praiſe unto God before dawning of the day.

Philpot. My lord, God make me, and all you here preſent ſuch heretics as thoſe were that ſung thoſe morning hymns: for they were right chriſtians, with whom the tyrants of the world were offended for their well doing.

Bath. Proceed to what he hath to ſay. He hath prayed I cannot tell for what.

Bonner. Say on, Mr. Philpot; my lords will gladly hear you.

Philpot. I have, my lords, been this twelvemonth and a half in priſon, without any juſt cauſe that I know, and my living taken from me without any lawful order, and now I am brought (contrary to right) from my own territory and ordinary, into another man's juriſdiction, I know not why. Wherefore, if your lordſhips can burden me with any evil done, I ſtand here before you to purge me of the ſame. And if no ſuch thing may be juſtly laid to my charge, I deſire to be releaſed of this wrongful trouble.

Bonner. There is none here that goeth about to trouble you, but to do you good, if we can. For I promiſe you, ye were ſent hither to me without my knowledge. Therefore ſpeak your conſcience without any fear.

Philpot. My lord, I have learned to anſwer in matters of religion in the congregation, being thereto lawfully called: but now I am not lawfully called, neither is here a juſt congregation where I ought to anſwer.

Bonner. Indeed this man told me, the laſt time I ſpake with him, that he was a lawyer, and would not utter his conſcience in matters of faith, unleſs it were in the hearing of the people, where he might ſpeak to vain-glory.

Philpot. My lord, I ſaid not I was a lawyer, neither do I arrogate to myſelf that name, although I was once a novice in the ſame, where I learned ſomething for mine own defence, when I am called in judgment to anſwer to any cauſe, and whereby I have been taught not to put myſelf further in danger than I need, and ſo far am I a lawyer, and no further.

Bath. If you will not anſwer to my lord's requeſt, you ſeem to be a wilful man in your opinion.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary before whom I am bound to anſwer in this behalf, as Mr. D. Cole (who is a lawyer) can well tell you by the law. And I have not offended my lord of London, wherefore he ſhould call me.

Bonner. Yes, I have to lay to your charge, that you have offended in my dioceſe, by ſpeaking againſt the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar: and therefore I may call you, and proceed againſt you to puniſh you by the law.

Philpot. I have not offended in your dioceſe. For that which I ſpake of the ſacrament was in Paul's church in the convocation-houſe, which (as I underſtand) is a peculiar juriſdiction belonging to the dean of Paul's, and therefore is counted of your lordſhip's dioceſe, but not in your dioceſe.

Bonner. Is not Paul's church in my dioceſe? Well, I think it coſteth me a good deal of money by the year, the leading thereof.

Philpot. That may be, and yet be exempted from your lordſhip's juriſdiction. And albeit I had ſo offended in your dioceſe, yet I ought by the law to be ſent to my ordinary, if I require it, and not be puniſhed by you that are not mine ordinary. And already (as I have told you) I have been convented of mine ordinary for this cauſe, which you go about to enquire of me.

Bonner. How ſay you, Mr. D. Cole, may not I proceed againſt him by the law, for that he hath done in my dioceſe?

Cole. Me thinketh Mr. Philpot needeth not to ſtand ſo much with your lordſhip in that point as he doth, ſince you ſeek not to hinder him, but to further him: therefore I think it beſt that he go to the matter that is laid againſt him of the convocation, and make no longer delay.

Philpot. I would willingly ſhew my mind of the matter, but I am ſure it will be laid againſt me to my prejudice when I come to judgment.

Cole. Why then you may ſpeak by proteſtation.

Philpot. But what ſhall my proteſtation avail in a cauſe of hereſy (as you call it) if I ſpeak otherwiſe than you will have me; ſince that which I ſpake in the convocation-houſe, being a place privileged, cannot now help me?

Bonner. But, Mr. D. Cole, may I not proceed againſt him for that offence he hath done in my dioceſe?

Cole. You may call him before you, my lord, if he be found in your dioceſe.

Philpot. But I have by force been brought out of mine own dioceſe to my lord's, and required to be judged of mine own ordinary: and therefore I know Mr. Doctor will not ſay of his own knowledge, that your lordſhip ought to proceed againſt me. And here Mr. Doctor would ſay nothing.

Worceſter. Do you not think to find before my lord here as good equity in your cauſe, as before your own ordinary?

Philpot. I cannot blame my lord of London's equity, with whom (I thank his lordſhip) I have found more gentleneſs ſince I came, than of mine own ordinary (I ſpeak it for no flattery) this year and half before, who never would call me to anſwer, as his lordſhip hath done now twice. No man is forbid to uſe his own right due unto him; but I ought not to be foreſtalled of my right, and therefore I challenge the ſame for divers other conſiderations.

Bonner. Now you cannot ſay hereafter but that you have been gently communed withal of my lords here, and yet you will be wilful and obſtinate in your error, and in your own opinions, and will not ſhew any cauſe why you will not come into the unity of the church with us.

Philpot. My lords, in that I do not declare my mind according to your expectations, is (as I have ſaid) becauſe I cannot ſpeak without preſent danger of my life. But rather than you ſhould report me by this either obſtinate or ſelf-willed, without any juſt ground whereupon I ſtand; I will open to you ſomewhat of my mind, or rather the whole, deſiring your lordſhips, which ſeem to be pillars of the church of England, to ſatisfy me in the ſame: and I will refer all other cauſes, in which I diſſent from you, unto one or two articles, or rather to one, which includeth them both; in which if I can by the ſcriptures be ſatisfied at your mouths, I ſhall as willingly agree to you as to any other in all points.

Bonner. Theſe heretics come always with their ifs, as this man doth now, ſaying, If he can be ſatisfied by the ſcriptures: ſo that he will always have this exception, I am not ſatisfied, although the matter be never ſo plainly proved againſt him. But will you promiſe to be ſatisfied, if my lords take ſome pains about you?

Philpot. I ſay, my lord, I will be ſatisfied by the ſcriptures in that wherein I ſtand. And I proteſt here before God and his eternal Son Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour, and the Holy Ghoſt and his angels, and you here preſent that be judges of that I ſpeak, that I do not ſtand in any opinion of wilfulneſs or ſingularity, but only upon my conſcience, certainly informed by God's word, from which I dare not go, for fear of damnation: and this is the cauſe of mine earneſtneſs in this behalf.

Bonner. I will trouble my lords no longer, ſeeing that you will not declare your mind.

Philpot. I am about ſo to do, if it pleaſe your lordſhip to hear me ſpeak.

Bath. Give him leave, my lord, to ſpeak that he hath to ſay.

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you that the chief cauſe why you do count me, and ſuch as I am, for heretics, is becauſe we be not at unity with your church. You ſay you are of the true church; and we ſay we are of the true church. You ſay, That whoſoever is out of your church, is damned: and we think verily on the other ſide, that if we depart from the true church, whereon we are grafted in God's word, we ſhould ſtand in the ſtate of damnation. Wherefore if your lordſhip can bring any better authority for your church than we can do for ours, and prove, by the ſcriptures, that the church of Rome now (of which you are) is the true catholic church, as in all your ſermons, writings and arguments, you do uphold, and that all chriſtian perſons ought to be ruled by the ſame, under the pain of damnation, (as you ſay); and that the ſame church (as you pretend) hath authority to interpret the ſcriptures as it ſeemeth her good, and that all men are bound to follow ſuch interpretations only; I ſhall be as conformable to the ſame church as you may deſire me, which otherwiſe I dare not: therefore I require you for God's ſake to ſatisfy me in this.

Cole. If you ſtand upon this point only, you may ſoon be ſatisfied, if you pleaſe.

Philpot. It is the thing that I require, and to this I have ſaid I will ſtand, and refer all other controverſies wherein I ſtand now againſt you, and will put my hand thereto, if you miſtruſt my word.

Bonner. I pray you, Mr. Philpot, what faith were you of twenty years ago? This man will have every year a new faith.

Philpot. My lord, to tell you plain, I think I was of no faith: for I was then a wicked liver, and knew not God then as I ought to do, God forgive me.

Bonner. No faith? that is not ſo. I am ſure you were of ſome faith.

Philpot. My lord, I have declared to you on my conſcience what I then was, and judge of myſelf. And what is that to the purpoſe of the thing I deſire to be ſatisfied of you?

Bonner. Mr. Doctor Cole, I pray you ſpeak your mind to him.

Cole. What will you ſay, if I can prove that it was decreed by an univerſal council, in Athanaſius's time, that all the chriſtian church ſhould follow the determination of the church of Rome? but I do not now remember where.

Philpot. If you, Mr. Doctor, can ſhew me the ſame granted to the ſee of Rome by the authority of the ſcripture, I would gladly hearken thereto. But I think you be not able to ſhew any ſuch thing: for Athanaſius was preſident of the Nicene council, and there was no ſuch thing decreed I am ſure.

Cole. Though it were not then, it might be at another time.

Philpot. I deſire to ſee the proof thereof.

And upon this Mr. Harpsfield, chancellor to the biſhop of London, brought in a book of Ireneus, with certain leaves turned in, and laid it before the biſhops to help them in their perplexity, if it might be: which after the biſhops of Bath and Glouceſter had read together, the biſhop of Glouceſter gave me the book, and ſaid:

Take the book, Mr. Philpot, and look upon that place, and there may you ſee how the church of Rome is to be followed of all men.

Philpot. I took the book and read the place, which after I had read, I ſaid it made nothing againſt me, but againſt the Arians and other heretics, againſt whom Ireneus wrote, proving that they were not to be credited, becauſe they did teach and follow after ſtrange doctrine in Europe, and that the chief church of the ſame was founded by Peter and Paul, and had to this time continued by faithful ſucceſſion of the faithful biſhops in preaching the true goſpel, as they had received of the apoſtles, and nothing like to theſe late ſprung heretics, &c. Whereby he concludeth againſt them, that they were not to be heard, neither to be credited, which thing if you, my lords, be able to prove now of the church of Rome, then had you as good authority againſt me in my cauſe now, as Ireneus had againſt thoſe heretics. But the church of Rome hath ſwerved from the truth and ſimplicity of the goſpel which it maintained in Ireneus's time, and was uncorrupted from that which it is now, wherefore your lordſhip cannot juſtly apply the authority of Ireneus to the church of Rome now, which is ſo manifeſtly corrupted from the primitive church.

Bonner. So will you ſay ſtill it maketh nothing to the purpoſe, whatſoever authority we bring, and will never be ſatisfied.

Philpot. My lord, when I do by juſt reaſon prove, that the authorities which are brought againſt me do not make to the purpoſe, as I have already proved, I truſt you will receive mine anſwer.

Worceſter. It is to be proved moſt manifeſtly by all ancient writers, that the ſee of Rome hath always followed the truth, and never was deceived, until of late certain heretics had defaced the ſame.

Philpot. Let that be proved, and I have done.

Worceſter. Nay, you are of ſuch arrogancy, ſingularity, and vain-glory, that you will not ſee it, be it never ſo well proved.

Philpot. Ha, my lords, is it now time, think you, for me to follow ſingularity or vain-glory, ſince it is now upon danger of my life and death, not only preſently, but alſo before God to come? And I know, if I die not in the true faith, I ſhall die everlaſtingly: and again I know, if I do not as you would have me, you will kill me and many thouſands more: yet had I rather periſh at your hands, than periſh eternally. And at this time I have loſt all my commodities of this world, and lie in a coal-houſe, where a man would not lay a dog, with which I am well contented.

Cole. Where are you able to prove that the church of Rome hath erred at any time? and by what hiſtory? Certain it is by Euſebius, that the church was eſtabliſhed at Rome, by Peter and Paul, and that Peter was biſhop 25 years at Rome.

Philpot. I know well that Euſebius ſo writeth: but if we compare that which St. Paul writeth to the Galatians, chap. 1. the contrary will manifeſtly appear, that he was not half ſo long there. He lived not paſt 35 years after he was called to be an apoſtle: and St. Paul maketh mention of his abiding at Jeruſalem after Chriſt's death more than 13 years.

Cole. What, did Peter write to the Galatians?

Philpot. No, I ſay Paul maketh mention of Peter, writing to the Galatians, and of his abiding at Jeruſalem: And further, I am able to prove, both by Euſebius, and other hiſtoriographers, that the church of Rome hath manifeſtly erred, and at this preſent doth err, becauſe ſhe agreeth not with that which they wrote. The primitive church did uſe according to the goſpel, and there needeth none other proof, but compare the one with the other.

Bonner. I may compare this man to a certain man I read of, who fell into a deſperation, and went in a wood to hang himſelf, and when he came there, he went viewing of every tree, and could find none on which he might vouchſafe to hang himſelf. But I will not apply it as I might. I pray you, Mr. Doctor, go forth with him.

Cole. My lord, there be on every ſide of me ſome who are better able to anſwer him, and I love not to fall into diſputation: for that now-a-days a man ſhall but ſuſtain ſhame and obloquy thereby of the people. I had rather ſhew my mind in writing.

Philpot. And I had rather you ſhould do ſo than otherwiſe, for then a man may better judge of your words, than by argument, and I beſeech you ſo to do. But if I were a rich man, I durſt wager an hundred pounds, that that you ſhall not be able to ſhew that you have ſaid, to be decreed by a general council in Athanaſius's time. For this I am ſure of, that it was concluded by a general council in Africa many years after, that none of Africa (under pain of excommunication), ſhould appeal to Rome: which decree I am ſure they would not have made, if by the ſcriptures and by an univerſal council it had been decreed, that all men ſhould abide and follow the determination of the church of Rome.

Cole. But I can ſhew that they revoked that error again.

Philpot. So you ſay, Mr. Doctor, but I pray you ſhew me where. I have hitherto heard nothing from you to my ſatisfaction, but bare words without any authority.

Bonner. What, I pray you, ought we to diſpute with you of our faith? Juſtinian in the law hath a title, De fide Catholica, to the contrary.

Philpot. I am certain the civil law hath ſuch a conſtitution: but our faith muſt not depend upon the civil law. For as St. Ambroſe ſaith, Not the law, but the goſpel hath gathered the church together.

Worceſter, Mr. Philpot, you have the ſpirit of pride wherewith ye be led, which will not let you yield to the truth: leave it for ſhame.

Philpot. Sir, I am ſure I have the Spirit of faith, by which I ſpeak at this preſent; neither am I aſhamed to ſtand to my faith.

Glouceſter. What? do you think yourſelf better learned than ſo many notable learned men as be here?

Philpot. Elias alone had the truth, when there were four hundred prieſts againſt him.

Worceſter. Oh, you would be counted now for Elias. And yet I tell thee he was deceived: for he thought there had been none good but himſelf; and yet he was deceived, for there were ſeven thouſand beſide him.

Philpot. Yea, but he was not deceived in doctrine, as the other four hundred were.

Worceſter. By my faith you are greatly to blame, that you cannot be content to be of the church which ever hath been of that faithful antiquity.

Philpot. My lord, I know Rome, and have been there, where I ſaw your lordſhip.

Worceſter. Indeed I did fly from hence thither, and I remember not that I ſaw you there. But I am ſorry that you have been there; for the wickedneſs which you have ſeen there peradventure cauſeth you to do as you do.

Philpot. No, my lord, I do not as I do for that cauſe: for I am taught otherwiſe by the goſpel, not altogether to refuſe the miniſter for his evil living, ſo that he bring ſound doctrine out of God's book.

Worceſter. Do you think the univerſal church may be deceived?

Philpot. St. Paul to the Theſſalonians propheſied that there ſhould come an univerſal departing from the faith in the latter days before the coming of Chriſt, ſaying, that "Chriſt ſhall not come, 'till there come a parting firſt."

Cole. Yea, I pray you, how take you the departing there in St. Paul? it is not meant of faith, but of the departing from the empire; for it is in Greek, APOST ASIA.

Philpot. Marry indeed you, Mr. Doctor, put me in good remembrance of the meaning of St. Paul in that place, for APOST ASIA is properly a departing from the faith, and thereof cometh Apoſtata, which properly ſignifieth one that departeth from his faith: and St. Paul in the ſame place after ſpeaketh of the decay of the empire.

Cole. APOST ASIA doth not only ſignify a departing from the faith, but alſo from the empire, as I am able to ſhew.

Philpot. I never read it ſo taken, and when you ſhall be able to ſhew it (as you ſay in words), I will believe it, and not before.

Worceſter. I am ſorry that you ſhould be againſt the chriſtian world.

Philpot. The world commonly, and ſuch as be called chriſtians (for the multitude), hath hated the truth, and been enemies to the ſame.

Glouceſter. Why, Mr. Philpot, do you think that the univerſal church hath erred, and you only to be in the truth?

Philpot. The church that you are of was never univerſal, for two parts of the world, which is Aſia and Africa, never conſented to the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, as at this day they do not, neither do follow his decrees.

Glouceſter. Yes, in the Florentine council they did agree.

Philpot. It was ſaid ſo by falſe report, after they of Aſia and Africa were gone home: but it was not ſo indeed, as the ſequel of them all hitherto doth prove the contrary.

Glouceſter. I pray you by whom will you be judged in matters of controverſy which happen daily?

Philpot. By the word of God. For Chriſt ſaid in St. John, "The word that he ſpake, ſhall be judge in the latter day."

Glouceſter. What if you take the word one way, and I another way: who ſhall he judge then?

Philpot. The Primitive church.

Glouceſter. I know you mean the doctors that wrote thereof.

Philpot. I mean verily ſo.

Glouceſter. What if you take the doctors in one ſenſe, and I in another: who ſhall be judge then?

Philpot. Then let that be taken which is moſt agreeable to God's word.

Cole. My lords, why do you trouble yourſelves to anſwer him in this matter? It is not the thing which is laid to his charge, but his error of the ſacrament, and he to ſhift himſelf of that brought in another matter.

Philpot. This is the matter, Mr. Cole, to which I have referred all other queſtions, and deſire to be ſatisfied.

Worceſter. It is a wonder to ſee how he ſtandeth with a few againſt a great multitude.

Philpot. We have almoſt as many as you. For we have Aſia, Africa, Germany, Denmark, and a great part of France, and daily the number of the goſpel doth increaſe: ſo that I am credibly informed, that for this religion in which I ſtand, and for which I am like to die, a great multitude doth daily come out of France through perſecution, that the cities of Germany be ſcarce able to receive them: and therefore your lordſhip may be ſure, the word of God will one day take place, do what you can to the contrary.

Worceſter. They were well occupied to bring you ſuch news, and you have been well kept to have ſuch reſort unto you. Thou art the arroganteſt fellow, and ſtouteſt fond fellow that ever I knew.

Philpot. I pray your lordſhip to bear with my haſty ſpeech: for it is part of my corrupt nature to ſpeak ſomewhat haſtily: but for all that, I mean with humility to do my duty to your lordſhip.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, my lords will trouble you no farther at this time, but you ſhall go from whence you came, and have ſuch favour as in the mean while I can ſhew you: and upon Wedneſday next you ſhall be called again, to be heard what you can ſay for the maintenance of your error.

Philpot. My lord, my deſire is to be ſatisfied of you in that I have required; and your lordſhip ſhall find me as I have ſaid.

Worceſter. We wiſh you as well as ourſelves.

Philpot. I think the ſame, my lords, but I fear you are deceived, and have a zeal of yourſelves, not according to knowledge.

Worceſter. God ſend you more grace.

Philpot. And alſo God increaſe the ſame in you, and open your eyes that you may ſee to maintain his truth, and his true church.

Then the biſhops roſe up, and conſulted together, and cauſed a writing to be made, in which I think my blood by them was bought and ſold, and thereto they put their hands; and after this I was carried to my coal-houſe again.

Thus ended the fourth part of this tragedy. God haſten the end thereof to his glory, Amen.

Becauſe I have begun to write unto you of mine examinations before the biſhop and others, more to ſatisfy your deſire than it is any thing worthy to be written; I have thought it good to write unto you alſo that which had been done of late, that the ſame might come to light which they do in darkneſs, and in privy corners, and that the world now, and the poſterity hereafter might know how diſorderly, unjuſtly, and unlearnedly theſe ravening wolves do proceed againſt the ſilly and faithful flock of Chriſt, and condemn and perſecute the ſincere doctrine of Chriſt in us, which they are not able by honeſt means to reſiſt, but only by tyranny and violence.

The fifth Examination of Mr. Philpot, before the Biſhops of London, Rocheſter, Coventry, St. Aſaph, and one other whoſe See I know not, Dr. Story, Dr. Curtop, Dr. Saverſon, Dr. Pendleton; with ſeveral other Chaplains, and Gentlemen of the Queen's Chamber, in the Gallery of my Lord of London's Palace.

BONNER. Mr. Philpot, come you hither, I have deſired my lords here, and other learned men, to take ſome pains once again to do you good, and becauſe I do mind to ſit in judgment on you to-morrow, as I am commanded, yet I would you ſhould have as much favour as I can ſhew you, if you will be any thing conformable: therefore play the wiſe man, and be not ſingular in your own opinion, but be ruled by theſe learned men.

Philpot. My lord, in that you ſay you will ſit on me in judgment to-morrow, I am glad thereof: for I was promiſed by them which ſent me unto you, that I ſhould have been judged the next day after: but promiſe hath not been kept with me, to my farther grief. I look for none other but death at your hands, and I am as ready to yield my life in Chriſt's cauſe, as you be to require it.

Bonner. Lo, what a wilful man is this? By my faith it is but folly to reaſon with him, neither with any of theſe heretics. I am ſorry you will be no more tractable, and that I am compelled to ſhew extremity againſt you.

Philpot. My lord, you need not ſhew extremity againſt me unleſs you will: neither by the law: (as I have ſaid) have you any thing to do with me, for that you are not mine ordinary, albeit I am (contrary to all right) in your priſon.

Bonner. Why the queen's commiſſioners ſent you hither unto me, upon your examination had before them. I know not well the cauſe; but I am ſure they would not have ſent you hither to me, unleſs you had made ſome talk to them otherwiſe than it becometh a chriſtian man.

Philpot. My lord, indeed they ſent me hither without any occaſion then miniſtred by me. Only the diſputation I made in the convocation-houſe, requiring me to anſwer the ſame, and to recant it. Which becauſe I would not do, they ſent me hither to your lordſhip.

Bonner. Why did you not anſwer them thereto?

Philpot. For that they were temporal men, and ought not to be judges in ſpiritual cauſes whereof they demanded me, without ſhewing any authority whereby I was bound to anſwer them, and hereupon they committed me to your priſon.

Bonner. Indeed I remember now, you maintained open hereſy in my dioceſe: whereby the commiſſioners ſent you unto me, that I ſhould proceed againſt you, for this you have ſpoke in my dioceſe.

Philpot. My lord, I ſtand ſtill upon my lawful plea in this behalf; that though it were a great hereſy, as you ſuppoſe it, yet I ought not to be troubled for it, in reſpect of the privilege of the parliament-houſe, whereof the convocation-houſe is a member, where all men in matters propounded may frankly ſpeak their minds; and here is preſent a gentlemen of the queen's majeſty that was preſent at the diſputation, and can teſtify the queſtions which were then in controverſy were not ſet forth by me, but by the prolocutor, who required, in the queen's majeſty's name, all men to diſpute their minds freely in the ſame that were of the houſe.

The Queen's Gentleman. Tho' the parliament-houſe be a place of privilege for men of the houſe to ſpeak, yet may none ſpeak any treaſon againſt the queen, or maintain treaſon againſt the crown.

Philpot. But if there be any matter which otherwiſe it were treaſon to ſpeak of, were it treaſon for any perſon to ſpeak therein, eſpecially the thing being propoſed by the ſpeaker? I think not.

The Queen's Gentleman. You may make the matter eaſy enough to you yet, as I perceive, if you will revoke the ſame which you did there ſo ſtubbornly maintain.

St. Aſaph. This man did not ſpeak under reformation, as many there did, but as earneſtly and perſuaſibly as ever I heard any.

Philpot. My lords, ſince you will not ceaſe to trouble me for that I have lawfully done, neither will admit my juſt defence for what was ſpoke in the convocation-houſe by me, contrary to the laws and cuſtom of the realm; I appeal to the whole parliament houſe, to be judged by the ſame, whether I ought thus to be moleſted for that I have there ſpoken.

Rocheſter. But have you ſpoken and maintained the ſame ſince that time, or no?

Philpot. If any man can charge me juſtly therewith, here I ſtand to make anſwer.

Rocheſter. How ſay you to it now? will you ſtand to that you have ſpoken in the convocation-houſe, and do you think you ſaid then well, or no?

Philpot. My lord, you are not mine ordinary to proceed Ex Officio againſt me, and therefore I am not bound to tell you my conſcience of your demands.

St. Aſaph. What ſay you now? is there not in the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar (and with that they all put off their caps for reverence of the idol), the preſence of our Saviour Chriſt, really and ſubſtantially after the words of conſecration?

Philpot. I do believe in the ſacrament of Chriſt's body, duly miniſtred, to be ſuch manner of preſence, as the word teacheth me to believe.

St. Aſaph. I pray you, how is that?

Philpot. As for that I will declare another time, when I ſhall be lawfully called to diſpute my mind of this matter, but I am not yet driven to that point. And the ſcripture ſaith, "All things ought to be done after an order."

Another Biſhop. This is a froward and vain-glorious man.

Bonner. It is not lawful for a man by the civil laws to diſpute of his faith openly, as it appeareth in the title, De ſumma Trinitate & fide Catholica.

Philpot. My lord, I have anſwered you to this queſtion before.

Bonner. Why, I never aſked thee of this before now.

Philpot. Yes, that you did at my laſt examination, by that token I anſwered your lordſhip by St. Ambroſe, that the church is congregated by the word, and not by man's law. Wherefore I now add further of this saying, "That he which refuseth the word, and objecteth the law, is an unjust man, because the just shall live by faith." And moreover, my lord, the title which your lordship alledgeth out of the law, maketh it not unlawful to dispute of all the articles of the faith, but of the Trinity.

Bonner. Thou liest, it is not so: and I will shew you by the book how ignorant he is.

And with that he went with all haste to his study, and fetched his book, and openly read the text, and the title of the law, and charged me with such words as seemed to make for his purpose, saying, How sayest thou to this?

Philpot. My lord, I say as I said before, that the law meaneth of the catholic faith, determined in the council of Chalcedon, where the articles of the creed were only concluded upon.

Bonner. Thou art the veriest beast that ever I heard, I must needs speak it, thou compellest me thereunto.

Philpot. Your lordship may speak your pleasure of me. But what is this to the purpose, which your lordship is so earnest in? You know that our faith is not grounded upon the civil law: therefore it is not material to me whatsoever the law saith.

Bonner. By what law wilt thou be judged? Wilt thou be judged by the common law?

Philpot. No, my lord, our faith dependeth not upon the laws of man.

St. Asaph. He will be judged by no law, but as he will himself.

Worcester. The common laws are but abstracts of the scriptures and doctors.

Philpot. Whatsoever you do make them, they are no ground of my faith, by which I ought to be judged.

Bonner. I must needs proceed against thee to-morrow.

Philpot. If your lordship so do, I will have Exceptionem fori: for you are not my competent judge.

Bonner. By what law canst thou refuse me to be thy judge?

Philpot. By the civil law, De competente judice.

Bonner. There is no such title in the law. In what book is it, as cunning a lawyer as you be?

Philpot. My lord, I take upon me no great cunning in the law: but you drive me to my shifts for my defence, and I am sure if I had the books of the law, I were able to shew what I say.

Bonner. What, De competente judice? I will go fetch thee my books. There is a title indeed, De officiis judicis Ordinarii.

Philpot. Verily that is the same De competente judice which I have alledged. With that he ran to his study, and brought the whole course of the law between his hands, which (as it might appear), he had well occupied, by the dust they were covered with.

Bonner. There be the books: find it now if thou canst, and I will promise to release thee out of prison.

Philpot. My lord, I stand not here to reason matters of the civil law, although I am not altogether ignorant of the same; for that I have been a student in the law six or seven years; but to answer to the articles of faith with which you may lawfully burden me. And whereas you go about unlawfully to proceed, I challenge, according to my knowledge, the benefit of the law in my defence.

Bonner. Why, thou wilt answer directly to nothing thou art charged withal: therefore say not hereafter but you might have been satisfied here by learned men, if you would have declared your mind.

Philpot. My lord, I have declared my mind unto you and to other of the bishops at my last being with you, desiring you to be satisfied but of one thing, whereunto I have referred all other controversies; which if your lordships now, or other learned men, can simply resolve me of, I am as contented to be conformable in all things, as you shall require; which is to prove that the church of Rome (whereof you are) is the catholic church

Coventry. Do you not believe your creed, "I believe the catholic church?"

Philpot. Yes, that I do: but I cannot understand Rome (wherewithal you burden us) to be the same, neither like to it.

St. Asaph. It is most evident that St. Peter did build the catholic church at Rome. And Christ said, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church," Moreover, the succession of bishops in the see of Rome can be proved from time to time, as it can be of none other place so well, which is a manifest probation of the catholic church, as divers doctors do write.

Philpot. That you would have to be undoubted, is most uncertain, and that by the authority which you alledge of Christ, saying unto Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church," unless you can prove that rock to signify Rome, as you would make me falsly believe. And although you can prove the succession of bishops from Peter, yet this is not sufficient to prove that the catholic church, unless you can prove the profession of Peter's faith, whereupon the catholic church is built, to have continued in his successors at Rome, and at this present to remain.

Bonner. Is there any more churches than one catholic church? And I pray tell me into what faith were you baptized?

Philpot. I acknowledge one holy catholic and apostolic church, whereof I am a member (I praise God) and am of that catholic faith of Christ whereinto I was baptized.

Coventry. I pray you, can you tell what this word Catholic doth signify? shew if you can.

Philpot. Yes, that I can, I thank God. The catholic faith, or the catholic church, is not as now-a-days the people are taught, to be that which is most universal, or by most part of men received, whereby you do infer our faith to hang upon the multitude, which is not so: but I esteem the catholic church to be as St. Austin defineth the same: "We judge, saith he, the catholic faith, of that which hath been, is, and shall be." So that if you can be able to prove, that your faith and church hath been from the beginning taught, and is, and shall be; then may you count yourselves catholic, otherwise not. And Catholic is a Greek word, compounded of Cata, which signifieth after, or according, and Holon, a sum, or principal, or whole. So that the catholic faith, is as much as to say, the first, whole, sound, or chiefest faith.

Bonner. Doth St. Austin say so as he alledgeth it? or doth he mean as he taketh the same? how say you Mr. Curtop.

Curtop. Indeed, my lord, St. Austin hath such a saying, speaking against the Donatists, that the catholic faith ought to be esteemed of things in time past, and as they are practised according to the same, and ought to be through all ages, and not after a new manner, as the Donatists began to profess.

Philpot. You have said well, Mr. Curtop, and after the meaning of St. Austin, and to confirm that which I have said for the signification of catholic.

Coventry. Let the book be seen, my lord.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord, be content, or in good faith I will break even off, and let all alone. Do you think the catholic church (until it was within these few years, in which a few upon singularity have swerved from the same) have erred?

Philpot. I do not think that the catholic church can err in doctrine; but I require you to prove this church of Rome to be the catholic church.

Curtop. I can prove that Ireneus (which was within an 100 years after Christ) came to Victor, then bishop of Rome, to ask his advice about the excommunication of certain heretics, which (by all likelihood) he would not not have done, if he had not taken him to be ſupreme head.

Coventry. Mark well this argument. How are you able to anſwer the ſame? Anſwer, if you can.

Philpot. It is ſoon anſwered, my lord, for that is of no force; neither this fact of Ireneus maketh no more for the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, than mine hath done, who have been at Rome as well as he, and might have ſpoken with the pope, if I had liſt: and yet I would none in England did favour his ſupremacy more than I.

St. Aſaph. You are the more to blame (by the faith of my body) for that you favour the ſame no better, ſince all the catholic church (until theſe few years) have taken him to be the ſupreme head of the church, beſides this good man Ireneus.

Philpot. That is not likely, that Ireneus ſo took him, or the primitive church: for I am able to ſhew ſeven general councils after Ireneus's time, wherein he was never ſo taken, which may be a ſufficient proof, that the catholic primitive church never took him for ſupreme head.

The other biſhop. This man will never be ſatisfied, ſay what we can. It is but folly to reaſon any more with him.

Philpot. O, my lords, would you have me ſatisfied with nothing? Judge, I pray you, who hath better authority, he which bringeth the example of one man going to Rome, or I that by theſe many general councils am able to prove, that he was never ſo taken in many hundred years after Chriſt, as by Nicene, Epheſine, the firſt and ſecond Chalcedon, Conſtantinopolitan, Carthagineſe, Aquilenſe.

Coventry. Why will ye not admit the church of Rome to be the catholic church?

Philpot. Becauſe it followeth not the primitive catholic church, neither agreeth with the ſame, no more than an apple is like a nut.

Coventry. Wherein doth it diſſent?

Philpot. It were too long to recite all, but two things I will name, the ſupremacy and tranſubſtantiation.

Curtop. As for tranſubſtantiation, albeit it was ſet forth and decreed for an article of faith not much above three hundred years, yet it was always believed in the church.

Bonner. Yea, that it was. Very well ſaid of you Mr. Curtop.

Philpot. Ye have ſaid right, that tranſubſtantiation is but a late plantation of the biſhop of Rome, and you are not able to ſhew any ancient writer, that the primitive church did believe any ſuch thing; and with this Curtop ſhrank away. And immediately after the ambaſſador of Spain came in, to whom my lord of London went, leaving the others with me. To whom I ſaid, My lords, if you can ſhew me that this church of Rome (whereof you are members) is the true catholic church, I ſhall be content to be one thereof, and as conformable to the ſame as you can require me in all things; for I know there is no ſalvation but within the church?

Coventry. Can you diſprove that the church of Rome is not the catholic church?

Philpot, Yea, that I am able: but I deſire rather to hear of you the proof thereof, And ſeeing I cannot have my requeſt at your hands, neither be ſatisfied with any probable authority, I will ſhew you good proof why it is not. For if the primitive church were catholic, as it was indeed, and ought to be the form and ſchool-miſtreſs of the church to the world's end; then is not the church of Rome now the catholic church, which diſſenteth ſo far from the ſame both in doctrine and uſe of the ſacraments.

Coventry. Now prove you that the church of Rome now diſſenteth in doctrine and uſe of the ſacraments from the primitive church?

Philpot. Compare the one with the other, and it ſhall ſoon appear: as you may ſee both in Euſebius and other eccleſiaſtical and ancient writers.

Coventry. What have you to ſay more, why it is not the catholic church?

Philpot. Becauſe it is not [by your interpretation of catholic] univerſal, neither ever was, albeit you falſly perſuade the people that it is ſo. For the world being divided into three parts, Aſia, Africa, and Europe, two parts thereof, Aſia and Africa, profeſſing Chriſt as well as we, did never conſent to the church of Rome, which is of Europe; which is a ſufficient teſtimony that your faith was never univerſal.

Coventry. How prove you that?

Philpot. All the hiſtorians which write of the proceedings of the church, do teſtify the ſame. Beſides that, this preſent time doth declare that to be true which I ſay: for at this preſent the church of Aſia and Africa do not conſent to the church of Rome. Yea, and beſides all this, moſt part of Europe doth not agree, neither allow the church of Rome; as Germany, the kingdom of Denmark, the kingdom of Poland, a great part of France, England, and Zeland, which is a manifeſt probation that your church is not univerſal.

After this the biſhop of London called away the other biſhops, and left with me divers gentlemen, with certain of his chaplains, as Dr. Saverſon an Engliſhman, who began with me in this manner.

Dr. Saverſon. Mr. Philpot, I remember you beyond ſea ſince the time you reaſoned with the friar (a notable learned man) coming from Venice to Padua in a barge.

Philpot. I cannot forget that; for the friar threatened to accuſe me of hereſy as ſoon as he came to Padua, becauſe I talked with him ſo boldly of the truth. He was not ſo learned a man as you name him to be, but only in his ſchool points a good purgatory friar.

Dr. Saverſon. Well, he was a learned man for all that. And I am ſorry that you this day, having communed with ſo many notable learned men, are no more conformable to them than you be.

Philpot. I will be conformable to all them that be conformable to Chriſt in his word. And I pray you, good Mr. Doctor, be not ſo conformable to pleaſe men more than God, contrary to your learning for worldly eſtimation ſake.

Dr. Saverſon. No, that I am not. Upon what occaſion ſhould you think thus of me.

Philpot. Upon no evil that I do know of you, Mr. Doctor; but I ſpeak as one wiſhing that you ſhould not be led away from the truth for promotion ſake, as many doctors be now-a-days.

Dr. Saverſon. I have heard your arguments hitherto, and me thinketh that a great many of the old ancient writers be againſt you, in that you do not allow the church of Rome, neither the ſupremacy; for St. Cyprian (which is an ancient writer) doth allow the biſhop of Rome to be ſupreme head of the church.

Philpot. That I am ſure he doth not. For he, writing to Cornelius then biſhop of Rome, calleth him but his companion and his fellow-biſhop, neither attributed to him the name either of pope, or elſe of any uſurped terms which now be aſcribed to the biſhop of Rome to the ſetting forth of his dignity.

Dr. Saverſon. You cannot be able to ſhew that St. Cyprian calleth Cornelius his fellow-biſhop.

Philpot. I will wager with you what I am able to make, that I can ſhew it you in St. Cyprian, as I have ſaid.

Dr. Saverſon. I will lay no other wager with you, but book for book that it is not ſo.

Philpot. I agree thereto, and I pray you, one of my lord's chaplains, to fetch us Cyprian hither for the trial hereof. And with that one of them went to my lord's ſtudy, and brought forth Cyprian, and by and by he turned turned to the firſt book of his epiſtles, the third epiſtle, and there would have ſeemed to gather a ſtrong argument for the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, becauſe he ſaith; "It goeth not well with the church when the high prieſt is not obeyed, which ſupplieth the ſtead of Chriſt, after God's word, and the conſent of his fellow-biſhops and the agreement of the people."

Dr. Saverſon. How can you avoid this place which maketh ſo plainly for the biſhop of Rome's ſupremacy?

Philpot. It maketh not ſo plain, Mr. Doctor, on your ſide, as you gather, as by and by I will give you to underſtand. But firſt I challenge the wager we made, that your book is mine. For here you may ſee that he calleth Cornelius his fellow-biſhop, as he doth alſo in other places. And now for the underſtanding of that place, you do miſconſtrue it, to take the high-prieſt only for the biſhop of Rome, and otherwiſe than it was in his time. For there were by the Nicene council four patriarchs appointed, the patriarch of Jeruſalem, the patriarch of Conſtantinople, the patriarch of Alexandria, and the patriarch of Rome, of which four, the patriarch of Rome was placed loweſt in the council, and ſo continued many years, for the time of ſeven or eight general councils, as I can ſhew.

Therefore St. Cyprian, writing to Cornelius, patriarch of Rome (whom he calleth his fellow-biſhop) findeth himſelf offended that certain heretics, being juſtly excommunicated by him (as the Novatians were) did flee from his dioceſe, which was their chief biſhop (refuſing to be obedient to him and to be reformed) to the biſhop of Rome, and to the patriarch of Conſtantinople, and there were received in communion of the congregation, in derogation of good order and diſcipline in the church, and to the maintaining of hereſies and ſchiſms: and that hereſies did ſpring up, and ſchiſms daily riſe hereof, that obedience was not given to the prieſt of God, nor was it once conſidered him to be in the church for the time the prieſt, and for the time the judge in Chriſt's ſtead (as in the decree of the Nicene council was appointed) not the biſhop of Rome only, but every patriarch in his precinct; who had every one of them a college or cathedral church of learned prieſts, in hearing of whom by a convocation of his fellow-biſhops, with the conſent of the people, all hereſies were determined by the word of God: and this is the meaning of St. Cyprian.

Dr. Saverſon. You take it ſo, but it ſeemeth to me otherwiſe.

Philpot. Upon what ground it ſhould ſeem otherwiſe unto you I know not, but this meaning which I have declared, the general councils, ſeven or eight one after another, confirmed it ſo to be, which did not allow one ſupreme head only.

Pendleton. There were not ſo many general councils, but four only allowed.

Philpot. That is not ſo, Mr. Pendleton, although there be four eſpecially allowed for the confirmation of the Trinity, but beſides theſe four, there were many other general councils, as you may learn by many writers.

A chaplain. Did not Chriſt build his church upon Peter? St. Cyprian ſaith ſo.

Philpot. St. Cyprian De ſimplicitate Prælatorum, declareth in what reſpect he ſo ſaid; "God gave in perſon of one man the keys to all, that he might ſignify the unity of all men." And alſo St. Auguſtine ſaith in the tenth of St. John, "If in Peter had not been the myſtery of the church, the Lord had not ſaid unto him, I will give unto thee the keys. For if that were ſaid to Peter, the church hath them not; if the church have them when Peter received them, he ſignified the whole church." And alſo St. Hierom, a prieſt of Rome, writing to Nepotian, ſaith, "That all churches do lean to their own paſtors, where he ſpeaketh of the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy or regiment," where he maketh no mention of of the biſhop of Rome. And to Evagrius, he ſaith, "That whoſoever a biſhop be, whether it be at Rome, or at Eugi, or at Rhegium, he is of one power, and of one juriſdiction.

Dr. Saverſon. St. Hierom De cœleſti Hierarchia? It was Dionyſius you mean.

Philpot. I ſay not that Hierom wrote any book ſo intituled. But I ſay, that in the epiſtle by me alledged, he maketh mention of the eccleſiaſtical regiment.

Dr. Saverſon. I wonder you will ſtand ſo ſtedfaſt in your error to your own deſtruction.

Philpot. I am ſure we are in no error, by the promiſe of Chriſt made to the faithful once, which is, that he will give to his true church ſuch a ſpirit of wiſdom, that the adverſaries thereof ſhould never be able to reſiſt. And by this I know we are of the truth, for that neither by reaſoning, neither by wri ing, your ſynagogue of Rome is able to anſwer. Where is there one of you all that ever hath been able to anſwer any of the godly learned miniſters of Germany, who have diſcloſed your counterfeit religion? Wh ch of you all (at this day) is able to anſwer Calvin's inſtitutions, who is miniſter of Geneva?

Dr. Saverſon. A godly miniſter indeed, a receiver of cut-purſes and runagate traitors. And of late I can tell you, there is ſuch contention fallen between him and his own ſects, that he was obliged to fly the town, about predeſtination. I tell you truth, for I came by Geneva hither.

Philpot. I am ſure you blaſpheme that godly man, and that godly church where he is miniſter: as it is your church's condition, when you cannot anſwer men by learning, to oppreſs them with blaſphemies and falſe reports. For, in the matter of predeſtination, he is in none other opinion than all the doctors of the church be agreeing to the ſcriptures.

Saverſon. Men be able to anſwer him, if they liſt. And I pray you, which of you have anſwered biſhop Fiſher's book.

Philpot. Yes, Mr. Doctor, that book is anſwered, and anſwered again, if you liſt to ſeek what hath been written againſt him.

And after this Dr. Story came in. To whom I ſaid, Mr. Doctor, you have done me great injury, and without law have ſtraitly impriſoned me, more like a dog than a man. And beſides this, you have not kept promiſe with me, for you promiſed that I ſhould be judged the next day after.

Story. I am come to keep promiſe with thee. Was there ever ſuch a fantaſtical man as this is? nay, he is no man, he is a beaſt, yea, thoſe heretics be worſe than brute beaſts: for they will, upon a vain ſingularity, take upon them to be wiſer than all men, being indeed very fools and aſs-heads, not able to maintain that which of an arrogant obſtinacy they do ſtand in.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I am content to abide your railing judgment of me now. Say what you will, I am content; for I am under your feet to be trodden on as you liſt. God forgive it you: yet I am no heretic. Neither you nor any other ſhall be able to prove that I hold any jot againſt the word of God otherwiſe than a chriſtian man ought.

Story. The word of God? forſooth the word of God? It is but a folly to reaſon with theſe heretics, for they are incurable and deſperate. But yet I may reaſon with thee, not that I have any hope to win thee: Whom wilt thou appoint to judge of the word whereto thou ſtandeſt?

Philpot. Verily the word itſelf.

Story. Do you ſee the ignorance of this beaſtly heretic? he willeth the word to be judged of the word. Can the word ſpeak?

Philpot. If I cannot prove that which I have ſaid by good authority, I will be content to be counted an heretic, and an ignorant perſon, and further what you pleaſe.

Story. Let us hear what wiſe authority thou canſt bring in.

Philpot. It is the word of Chriſt in St. John, "The word which I have ſpoken, ſhall judge in the laſt day." If the word ſhall judge in the laſt day, much more it ought to judge our doings now: and I am ſure I have my judge on my ſide, who will abſolve and juſtify me in another world. Howſoever now it ſhall pleaſe you by authority unrighteouſly to judge of me and others, ſure I am in another world to judge you.

Story. What? You purpoſe to be a ſtinking martyr, and to ſit in judgment with Chriſt at the laſt day to judge the twelve tribes of Iſrael?

Philpot. Yea, Sir, I doubt not thereof, having the promiſe of Chriſt, if I die for righteouſneſs ſake, which you have begun to perſecute in me.

Story. I told you it was but vain to argue with this heretic; he is drowned in hereſies without all learning.

Philpot. Sir, I have brought you good authority for that I have ſaid out of God's book, to which you anſwer nothing, but go about ſtill to give railing judgment againſt me without any cauſe.

Story. I will come to you by and by. When the judge in Weſtminſter-Hall giveth ſentence, doth the word give ſentence, or the judge? Tell me.

Philpot. Civil matters be ſubject to civil men, and they have authority by the word to be judges of them. But the word of God is not ſubject to man's judgment, but ought to judge all the wiſdom, thoughts and doings of men; and therefore your compariſon diſproveth nothing that I have ſaid, neither anſwereth any whit thereto.

Story. Wilt thou not allow the interpretation of the church upon the ſcriptures?

Philpot. Yes, if it be according to the word of the true church: and this I ſay to you, as I have ſaid heretofore, that if ye can prove the church of Rome (whereof ye are) to be the true catholic church which I ought to follow, I will be as ready to yield thereto (as long as it can be ſo proved) as you may deſire me.

Story. What a fellow is this? He will believe nothing but what he liſt himſelf. Are we not in poſſeſſion of the church? Have not our forefathers theſe many hundred years taken this church for the catholic church whereof we are now? And if we had no other proof but this, it were ſufficient; for the preſcription of time maketh a good title in the law.

Philpot. You do well, Mr. Doctor, to alledge preſcription of many years, for it is all that you have to ſhew for yourſelves. But you muſt underſtand, that preſcription hath no place in matters belonging unto God, as I am able to ſhew by the teſtimony of many doctors.

Story. Well, Sir, you are like to go after your father Latimer the ſophiſter, and Ridley, who had nothing to alledge for himſelf, but that he had learned his hereſy of Cranmer. When I came to him with a poor bachelor of art, he trembled as though he had had the palſy, as theſe heretics have always ſome token of fear whereby a man may know them, as you may ſee this man's eyes do tremble in his head. But I diſpatched them; and I tell thee that there hath been yet never any one burnt, but I have ſpoke with him, and have been a cauſe of his diſpatch.

Philpot. You have the more to anſwer for, Mr. Doctor, as you ſhall feel in another world, how much ſoever you do now triumph of your proceedings.

Story. I tell thee I will never be confeſſed thereof. And becauſe I cannot now tarry to ſpeak with my lord, I pray one of you tell my lord, that my coming was to ſignify to his lordſhip, that he muſt out of hand rid this heretic out of the way. And going away he ſaid to me, I certify thee, that thou mayſt thank no other man but me.

Philpot. I thank you therefore with all my heart, and God forgive it you.

Story. What, doſt thou thank me? If I had thee in my ſtudy half an hour, I think I ſhould make you ſing another ſong.

Philpot. No, Mr. Doctor, I ſtand upon too ſure a ground to be overthrown by you now. And thus they departed all away from me one after another, until I was left alone. And afterwards going with my keeper to the coal-houſe, as I went I met with my lord of London, who ſpake unto me gently, ſaying, Bonner. Philpot, if there be any pleaſure I may ſhew you in my houſe, I pray you require it, and you ſhall have it.

Philpot. My lord, the pleaſure that I will require of your lordſhip, is to haſten my judgment which is committed unto you, and to diſpatch me forth of this miſerable world unto my eternal reſt. And for all this fair ſpeech I cannot attain hitherto this fortnight's ſpace, neither fire nor candle, neither yet good lodging. But it is good for a man to be brought low in this world, and to be counted amongſt the vileſt, that he may in time of reward receive exaltation and glory. Therefore praiſed be God that hath humbled me, and given me grace with gladneſs to be content therewithal. Let all that love the truth ſay, Amen.

Thus endeth the fifth Tragedy.

The ſixth Examination of Mr. Philpot, before the righ honourable Lords, the Lord Chamberlain to the Queen the Viſcount Hereford, commonly called Lord Ferras, the Lord Rich, the Lord St. John, the Lord Windſor, the Lord Shandois, Sir John Bridges, Lieutenant of the Tower, and two others, whoſe names I know not, with the Biſhop of London, and Dr. Chedſey, Nov. 6. 1555.

WHILE the lords were ſeating themſelves, the biſhop of London came aſide to me and whiſpered in mine ear, willing to behave myſelf prudently before the lords of the queen's majeſty's council, and to take heed what I ſaid; and thus he pretended to give me counſel, becauſe he wiſhed me to do well, as I might now if I would.

And after the lords and other worſhipful gentlemen were ſat, my lord of London placed himſelf at the end of the table, and called me to him, and by the lords I was placed at the upper end againſt him; where I, kneeling down, the lords commanded me to ſtand up, and the biſhop ſpake to me in the following manner.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I have hitherto both privately myſelf, and openly before the lords of the clergy, more times than once cauſed you to be talked withal, to reform you of your errors, but I have not yet found you ſo tractable as I would wiſh: wherefore now I have deſired theſe honourable lords of the temporalty, and of the queen's majeſty's council, who have taken pains with me this day, I thank them for it, to hear you what you can ſay, that they may be judges whether I have ſought all means to do you good or no: and I dare be bold to ſay in their behalf, that if you ſhew yourſelf conformable to the queen's majeſty's proceedings, you ſhall find as much favour for your deliverance as you can wiſh. I ſpeak not this to fawn upon you, but to bring you home into the church. Now let them hear what you can ſay.

Philpot. My lord, I thank God that I have this day ſuch an honourable audience to declare my mind before. And I cannot but commend your lordſhip's equity in this behalf, which agreeth with the order of the primitive church, which was, if any body was ſuſpected of hereſy, as I am now, he ſhould be called firſt before the archbiſhop or biſhop of the dioceſe where he was ſuſpected; ſecondly, in the preſence of others his fellow-biſhops and learned elders; and thirdly, in hearing of the laity: where after the judgment of God's word declared, and with the aſſent of our biſhops and conſent of the people, he was condemned for an heretic, or abſolved. And the ſecond point of that good order I have found at your lordſhip's hands already, in being called before you and your fellow-biſhops: and now have the third ſort of men, at whoſe hands I truſt to find more righteouſneſs in my cauſe, than I have found with my lords of the clergy: God grant I may have at the laſt the judgment of God's word concerning the ſame.

Bonner, Mr. Philpot. I pray you ere you go any further, tell my lords here plainly, whether you were by me or by my procurement committed to priſon or not, and whether I have ſhewed you any cruelty ſince ye have been committed to my priſon.

Philpot. If it ſhall pleaſe your lordſhip to give me leave to declare forth my matter, I will touch that afterward.

Rich. Anſwer firſt of all to my lord's two queſtions, and then proceed forth to the matter. How ſay you? Were you impriſoned by my lord or no? Can you find any fault ſince with his cruel uſing of you?

Philpot. I cannot lay to my lord's charge the cauſe of my impriſonment, neither may I ſay that he hath uſed me cruelly; but rather for my part I may ſay, that I have found more gentleneſs at his lordſhip's hands, than I did at mine own ordinary's, for the time I have been within his priſon, becauſe he hath called me three or four times to mine anſwer, to which I was not called in a year and a half before.

Rich. Well, now go to your matter.

Philpot. The matter is, that I am impriſoned for the diſputations had by me in the convocation-houſe againſt the ſacrament of the altar, which matter was not moved principally by me, but by the prolocutor, with the conſent of the queen's majeſty, and of the whole houſe, and that houſe, being a member of the parliament-houſe, ought to be a place of free ſpeech for all men of the houſe, by the ancient and laudable cuſtom of this realm. Wherefore I think myſelf to have ſuſtained hitherto great injury for ſpeaking my conſcience freely in ſuch a place as I might lawfully do it: and I deſire your honourable lordſhips judgment, who be of the parliament-houſe, whether of right I ought to be impeached for the ſame, and ſuſtain the loſs of my living (as I have done) and moreover of my life, as it is ſought.

Rich. You are deceived herein; for the convocation houſe is no part of the parliament-houſe.

Philpot. My lord, I have always underſtood the contrary by ſuch as are more expert men in things of this realm than I: and again, the title of every act leadeth me to think otherwiſe, which alledgeth the agreement of the ſpiritualty and temporalty aſſembled together.

Rich. Yea, that is meant of the ſpiritual lords of the upper houſe.

Windſor. Indeed the convocation-houſe is called together by one writ of the ſummons of the parliament of an old cuſtom; notwithſtanding that houſe is no part of the parliament-houſe.

Philpot. My lords, I muſt be contented to abide your judgments in this behalf.

Rich. We have told you the truth. Marry yet we would not that you ſhould be troubled for any thing that there was ſpoken; ſo that you having ſpoken amiſs, do declare now that you are ſorry for what you have ſaid.

Bonner. My lords, he hath ſpoken there manifeſt hereſy; yea, and there ſtoutly maintained the ſame againſt the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar (and with that he put off his cap, that all the lords might reverence and vail their bonnets at that idol as he did) and would not allow the real preſence of the body and blood of Chriſt in the ſame: yet my lords, God forbid that I ſhould go about to ſhew him extremity for ſo doing, in caſe he will repent and revoke his wicked ſayings; and if in faith he will do ſo, with your lordſhip's conſent, he ſhall be releaſed by and by; if he will not, he ſhall have the extremity of the law, and that ſhortly.

Lord Chamberlain. My lord of London ſpeaketh reaſonably unto you: take it while it is offered you.

Rich. How ſay you? will you acknowledge the real preſence of the body and blood of Chriſt, as all learned men of this realm do, in the maſs, and as I do, and will believe as long as I live, I do proteſt it?

Philpot. My lord, I do acknowledge in the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt ſuch a preſence as the word of God doth allow and teach me.

Rich. That ſhall be no otherwiſe than you liſt.

Bonner. A ſacrament is the ſign of a holy thing; ſo that there is both the ſign, which is the accident (as the whiteneſs, roundneſs, and ſhape of bread) and there is alſo the thing itſelf, as very Chriſt both God and man. But theſe heretics will have the ſacrament to be but bare ſigns. How ſay you? declare unto my lords here, whether you do allow the thing itſelf in the ſacrament, or no.

Philpot. I do confeſs that in the Lord's ſupper there is in due reſpects both the ſign and the thing ſignified, when it is duly adminiſtered after the inſtitution of Chriſt.

Bonner. You may ſee how he goeth about the buſh (as he hath done before with my lords of the clergy) and dare not utter his mind plainly.

Rich. Shew us what manner of preſence you allow in the ſacrament.

Philpot. If it pleaſe you, my lord of London, to give me leave to proceed orderly thereunto, and to let me declare my mind without interruption, I will thoroughly open my mind therein.

Lord Shandois. I pray you, my lord, let him ſpeak his mind.

Philpot. My lords, that at firſt I have not plainly declared my judgment unto you, the reaſon is this, becauſe I cannot ſpeak hereof without the danger of my life.

Rich. There is none of us here that ſeeketh thy life, or means to take any advantage of that thou ſhalt ſpeak.

Philpot. Although I miſtruſt not your honourable lordſhips that be here of the temporalty; yet here is one that ſitteth againſt me (pointing to the lord of London) that will lay it to my charge even to death. Notwithſtanding, ſeeing your honours do require me to declare of my mind of the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, that ye may perceive that I am not aſhamed of the goſpel of Chriſt, neither do maintain any opinion without probable and ſufficient authority of the ſcripture, I will ſhew you frankly my mind without all colour, whatſoever ſhall enſue unto me therefore, if my lord of London will not hinder me to utter my mind.

Rich. My lord, permit him to ſay what he can, ſeeing he is willing to ſhew his mind.

Bonner. I am content, my lords, let him ſay what he can, I will hear him.

Philpot. That which I do intend to ſpeak unto you (right honourable lords) I do proteſt here, firſt before God and his angels, that I ſpeak it not of vain-glory, neither of ſingularity, neither of wilful ſtubbornneſs, but truly upon a good conſcience, grounded on God's word, againſt which I dare not do for fear of damnation, which will follow that which is done contrary to knowledge. Neither do I diſagree to the proceedings of this realm in the religion, in that I love not the queen (whom I love from the bottom of my heart) but becauſe I ought to love and fear God in his word more than man in his laws, though I ſtand, as I ſeem to do, in this conſideration, and for none other, as God I call to witneſs.

There be two things principally, by which the clergy at this day doth deceive the whole realm; that is, the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, and the name of the catholic church: which both they do uſurp, having indeed none of them both. And as touching their ſacrament, which they term of the altar, I ſay now, as I ſaid in the convocation-houſe, that it is not the ſacrament of Chriſt, neither in the ſame is there any manner of Chriſt's preſence. Wherefore they deceive the queen's majeſty, and you of the nobility of this realm, in making you to believe that to be a ſacrament which is none, and cauſe you to commit manifeſt idolatry in worſhipping that for God, which is no God. And in teſtimony of this to be true, beſide manifeſt proof, which I am able to make to the queen's majeſty, and to all you of her nobility, I will yield my life; which to do, if it were not upon ſure ground, it were to my utter damnation.

And where they take on them the name of the catholic church (whereby they blind many folks eyes) they are nothing ſo, calling you from the true religion which was revealed and taught in king Edward's time, unto vain ſuperſtition. And this I will ſay for the trial hereof, that if they can prove themſelves to be the catholic church (as they ſhall never be able to do) I will never be againſt their doings, but revoke all that I have ſaid. And I ſhall deſire you, my lords, to be a means for me to the queen's majeſty, that I may be brought to the juſt trial hereof. Yea, I will not refuſe to ſtand againſt ten of the beſt of them in this realm. And if they be able to prove otherwiſe than I have ſaid, either by writing or by reaſoning, with good and lawful authority, I will here promiſe to recant whatſoever I have ſaid, and to conſent to them in all points.

And in the declaration of theſe things more at large, which now I write in ſum, the biſhop of London would have interrupted me, but the lords procured my liberty to make out my argument, to the great grief of the lord biſhop of London, as it appeared by the dumps he was in.

Bonner. It hath been told me before, that you love to make a long tale.

Rich. All heretics do boaſt of the Spirit of God, and every one would have a church by himſelf; as Joan of Kent, and the Anabaptiſts. I had myſelf Joan of Kent a week in my houſe after the writ was out for her to be burnt, where my lord of Canterbury, and biſhop Ridley reſorted almoſt daily unto her: but ſhe was ſo high in the ſpirit, that they could do nothing with her for all their learning. But ſhe went wilfully unto the fire, was burnt, and ſo do you now.

Philpot. As for Joan of Kent, ſhe was a vain woman (I knew her well) and an heretic indeed, well worthy to be burnt, becauſe ſhe ſtood againſt one of the manifeſt articles of our faith, contrary to the ſcriptures: and ſuch vain ſpirits be ſoon known from the true Spirit of God and his church, for that the ſame abideth within the limits of God's word, and will not go out of the ſame, neither ſtubbornly maintain any thing contrary to the word, as I have God's word thoroughly on my ſide to ſhew for that I ſtand in.

Bonner. I pray you, how will you join me theſe two ſcriptures together; Pater major me eſt; & Pater & ego unum ſumus. I muſt interpret the ſame, becauſe my lords here underſtand not the Latin, that is to ſay, "The Father is greater than I; and I and the Father are one." But I cry you mercy, my lords, I have miſ-ſpoken, in ſaying you underſtand no Latin; for the moſt part of you underſtand Latin as well as I. But I ſpeak in conſideration of my lord Shandois and Mr. Bridges his brother, whom I take to be no great Latin men. Now ſhew your cunning, and join theſe two ſcriptures by the word if you can.

Philpot. Yes that I can right well. For we muſt underſtand that in Chriſt there be two natures, the divinity and humanity, and in reſpect of his humanity it is ſpoken of Chriſt, "The Father is greater than I." But in reſpect of his Deity he ſaid again, "The Father and I be one."

Bonner. But what ſcripture have you?

Philpot. Yes, I have ſufficient ſcripture for the proof that I have ſaid. For the firſt, it is written of Chriſt in the Pſalms, "Thou haſt made him a little lower than the angels," It is the 19th Pſalm, beginning, "The heavens declare." And there I miſreckoned, wherewithal my lord took me.

Bonner. It is in "O lord, our Lord." Ye may ſee my lords, how well this man is uſed to ſay his matins.

Philpot. Though I ſay not matins in ſuch order as your lordſhip meaneth; yet I remember of old, that "O Lord our Lord," and "The heavens declare" be not far aſunder: and albeit I miſ-named the pſalm, it is no prejudice to the truth that I have proved.

Bonner. What ſay you then to the ſecond ſcripture? how couple you that by the word to the other?

Philpot. The text itſelf declareth, that notwithſtanding Chriſt did abaſe himſelf in our human nature, yet he is ſtill one in Deity with the Father. And this St. Paul to the Hebrews doth more at large ſet forth. And as I have by the ſcriptures joined theſe two ſcriptures together, ſo am I able to do in all other articles of faith which we ought to believe, and by the manifeſt word of God to expound them.

Bonner. How can that be, ſeeing St. Paul ſaith, "That the letter killeth, but it is the Spirit that giveth life," Philpot. St. Paul meaneth not the word of God written in itſelf killeth, which is the word of life, and faithful teſtimony of the Lord; but that the word is unprofitable and killeth him that is void of the Spirit of God, although he be the wiſeſt man of the world, and therefore St. Paul ſaid, "That the goſpel to ſome was a ſavour of life unto life, and to others a ſavour of death unto death." Alſo an example hereof we have in the ſixth of John, of them who, hearing the word of God without the Spirit, were offended thereby; wherefore Chriſt ſaid, "The fleſh profiteth nothing, it is the Spirit that quickeneth."

Bonner. What? do you underſtand that of St. Paul and of St. John ſo?

Philpot. It is not mine own interpretation, it is agreeable to the word in other places: and I have learned the ſame of ancient fathers interpreting it likewiſe. And to the Corinthians it is written, "The natural man perceiveth not the things that be of the Spirit of God, but the ſpiritual man, who is indued with the Spirit judgeth all things."

Bonner. You ſee, my lords, that this man will have his own mind, and will wilfully caſt himſelf away. I am ſorry for him.

Philpot. The words that I have ſpoken be none of mine but the goſpel, whereupon I ought to ſtand. And if you, my lord of London, can bring better authority for the faith you will draw me unto, than that which I ſtand upon, I will gladly hear the ſame by you or by any other in this realm.

Wherefore I kneeling down beſought the lords, to be good unto me a poor gentleman, that would fain live in the world if I might, and teſtify as you have heard me to ſay this day, that if any man can prove that I ought to be of any other manner of faith than that of which I am now, and can prove ſufficiently, I will neither be wilful nor deſperate, as my lord of London would make you believe me to be.

Rich. What countryman be you? are you of the Philpots of Hampſhire?

Philpot. Yea, my lord, I was Sir P. Philpot's ſon of Hampſhire.

Rich. He is my near kinſman; wherefore I am the more ſorry for him.

Philpot. I thank your lordſhip that it pleaſeth you to challenge kindred of a poor priſoner.

Rich. In faith I would go an hundred miles on my bare feet to do you good.

Lord Chamberlain. He may do well enough if he liſt.

St. John. Mr. Philpot, you are my countryman, and I would be glad you ſhould do well.

Rich.

Rich. You ſaid, even now, that you would deſire to maintain your belief before ten of the beſt in the realm. You did not well to compare with the nobility of the realm. But what if you have ten of the beſt in the realm to hear you, will you be tried by them?

Philpot. My lord, your lordſhip miſtaketh me to think that I challenge ten of the beſt of the nobility in this realm. It was no part of my mind, but I meant of the beſt learned on the contrary ſide.

Rich. Well, I take your meaning: what if means be made to the queen's majeſty that you ſhall have your requeſt, will you be judged by them?

Philpot. My lord, it is not meet that a man ſhould be judged by his adverſaries.

Rich. By whom then would you be judged?

Philpot. I will make your honours judges, that ſhall be hearers of us.

Rich. I dare be bold to procure for you of the queen's majeſty that you ſhall have ten learned men to reaſon with you, and twenty or forty of the nobility to hear, ſo you will promiſe to abide their judgment. How ſay you? will you promiſe here before my lords ſo to do?

Philpot. I will be contented to be judged by them.

Rich. Yea, but will you promiſe to agree to their judgment?

Philpot. There be cauſes why I may not ſo do, unleſs I were ſure that they would judge according to the word of God.

Rich. O, I perceive you will have no man judge but yourſelf, and think yourſelf wiſer than all the learned men in this realm.

Philpot. My lord, I ſeek not to be mine own judge, but am willing to be judged by others, ſo that the order of judgment in matters of religion be kept, that was in the primitive church, which is, firſt that God's will by his word was ſought, and thereunto both the ſpiritualty and temporalty was gathered together, and gave their conſents and judgment, and ſuch kind of judgment I will ſtand to.

Bonner. My lords, he would make you believe that he were profoundly ſeen in ancient writers of the judgments of the primitive church, and there was never any ſuch manner of judgment uſed as he now talketh of.

Philpot. In the epiſtles of St. Cyprian I am able to ſhew it you.

Bonner. Ah, I tell you there is no ſuch thing; fetch me Cyprian hither.

Philpot. You ſhall find it otherwiſe when the book cometh. And Dr. Chedſey his chaplain (whom he appointed to fetch the book), whiſpered the biſhop in his ear, and fetched not the book, by likelihood that he ſhould have ſuſtained the reproach thereof if the book had been brought. Well, my lord, quoth I, Mr. Doctor knoweth it is ſo, or elſe he would have brought the book ere this.

Rich. You would have no other judge, I ſee, but the word.

Philpot. Yes, my lord. I will be tried by the word, and by ſuch as will judge according to the word. As for an example, if there were a controverſy between your lordſhip and another upon the words of the ſtatute, muſt not the lords of the ſtatute judge and determine the controverſy?

Rich. No marry, the judges of the law may determine of the meaning thereof.

Bonner. He hath brought as good an example againſt himſelf as can be.

And here the biſhop thought he had a good argument againſt me, and therefore enlarged it with many words to the judgment of the church.

The Lords. He hath overthrown himſelf by his own argument.

Philpot. My lords, it ſeemeth to your honours that you have great advantage of me by the example I brought in to expreſs my cauſe, but if it be pondered thoroughly, it maketh wholly with me, and nothing againſt me, as my lord of London hath pretended. For I will aſk of my lord Rich here, whom I know to have good knowledge in the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, albeit a judge may diſcern the meaning of a ſtatute agreeable to the words, whether the ſame may judge a mean contrary to the expreſs words or no?

Rich. He cannot ſo do.

Philpot. Even ſo ſay I, that no man ought to judge the word of God to have a meaning contrary to the expreſs words thereof, as this falſe church of Rome doth in many things: and with this the lords ſeemed to be ſatisfied, and made no further replication herein.

Rich. I marvel then why you do deny the expreſs words of Chriſt in the ſacrament, ſaying, "This is my body:" and yet you will not ſtick to ſay it is not his body. Is not God omnipotent? And is not he able as well by his omnipotency to make it his body, as he was to make man fleſh of a piece of clay? Did not he ſay, "This is my body which ſhall be betrayed for you? And was not his very body betrayed for us? Therefore it muſt needs be his body.

Bonner. My lord Rich, you have ſaid wonderful well and learnedly. But you might have begun with him before alſo in the ſixth of John, where Chriſt promiſed to give his body in the ſacrament of the altar, ſaying, "The bread which I will give is my fleſh." How can you anſwer to that?

Philpot. If it pleaſe you to give me leave to anſwer firſt my lord Rich, I will alſo anſwer this objection.

Rich. Anſwer my lord of London firſt, and after come to me.

Philpot. My lord of London may be ſoon anſwered. That ſaying of St. John is, that the humanity of Chriſt, which he took upon for the redemption of man, is the bread of life whereby our ſouls and bodies are ſuſtained to eternal life, of which the ſacramental bread is a lively repreſentation, and an effectual coaptation to all ſuch as believe on his paſſion. And as Chriſt ſaith in the ſame ſixth of John, "I am the bread that came down from heaven:" but yet he is not material, neither natural bread: Likewiſe the bread is his fleſh, not natural or ſubſtantial, but by ſignification, and by grace in the ſacrament.

And now to my lord Rich's argument. I do not deny the expreſs words of Chriſt in the ſacrament, "This is my body: but I deny that they are naturally and corporally to be taken: they muſt be taken ſacramentally and ſpiritually, according to the expreſs declaration of Chriſt, ſaying, that the words of the ſacrament which the Capernaites took carnally, as the Papiſts now do, ought to be taken ſpiritually and not carnally, as they falſly imagine, not weighing what interpretation Chriſt hath made in this behalf, neither following the inſtitution of Chriſt, neither the uſe of the apoſtles and of the primitive church, who never taught, neither declared any ſuch carnal manner of preſence as is now exacted of us violently without any ground of ſcripture or antiquity, who uſed to put out of the church all ſuch as did not receive the ſacrament with the reſt, and alſo to burn that which was left after the receiving, as by the canon of the apoſtles, and by the decree of the council of Antioch may appear.

Bonner. No, that is not ſo; they were only Catechumeni, which went out of the church at the celebration of the communion, and none other.

Philpot. It was not only of ſuch as were novices in faith, but all others that did not receive.

Bonner. What ſay you to the omnipotency of God? is not he able to perform that which he ſpake, as my lord Rich hath very well ſaid? I tell thee, that God by his omnipotency may make himſelf to be this carpet if he will.

Philpot. As concerning the omnipotency of God, I ſay that God is able to do (as the prophet David ſaith), whatſoever he willeth; but he willeth nothing that is not agreeable to his word; as that is blaſphemy which my lord of London hath ſpoken, that God may become a carpet. For, as I have learned of ancient writers, God cannot do that which is contrary to his nature, as it is contrary to the nature of God to be a carpet. A carpet is a creature; and God is the creator; and the creator cannot be the creature: wherefore unleſs you can declare by the word, that Chriſt is otherwiſe preſent with us than ſpiritually and ſacramentally by grace, as he hath taught us, you pretend the omnipotency of God in vain.

Bonner. Why, wilt thou ſay that Chriſt is really preſent in the ſacrament? or do you deny it?

Philpot. I deny not that Chriſt is really preſent in the ſacrament to the receiver thereof according to Chriſt's inſtitution.

Bonner. What mean you by really preſent?

Philpot. I mean by really preſent, preſent indeed.

Bonner. Is God really preſent every where?

Philpot. He is ſo.

Bonner. How prove you that?

Philpot. The prophet Iſaiah ſaith, "That God filleth all places:" and whereſoever there be two or three gathered together in Chriſt's name, there is he in the midſt of them.

Bonner. What, his humanity?

Philpot. No, my lord, I mean the Deity, according to that you demanded.

Rich. My lord of London, I pray you let Mr. Dr. Chedſey reaſon with him, and let us ſee how he can anſwer him, for I tell thee he is a learned man indeed, and one that I do credit before a great many of you, whoſe doctrine the queen's majeſty and the whole realm doth well allow, therefore hear him.

Bonner. My lords, I pray you, will it pleaſe you to drink? you have talked a great while, and much talk is thirſty. I will leave Mr. Doctor and him reaſoning together a-while, with your leave, and will come to you by and by again. He went, as I ſuppoſe, to make room for more drink, after the lords had drank.

My lord Rich ſaid to the lords, I pray you let the poor man drink, for he is thirſty; and with that he called for a cup of drink, and gave it me, and I drank before them all: God requite it him, for I was athirſt indeed. Afterwards Dr. Chedſey began in this wiſe, making a great proceſs, of which this is the effect.

Chedſey. Mr. Philpot finding fault with the convocation-houſe before your lordſhips, that he had lain thus long in priſon, and that he had there a dozen arguments, whereof he could not be ſuffered to proſecute one thoroughly, which is not ſo; for he had leave to ſay what he could, and was anſwered to as much as he was able to bring; and when he had nothing elſe to ſay, he fell to weeping. I was there preſent and can teſtify thereof; albeit there is a book abroad of the report of the diſputation to the contrary, in which there is never a true word. And whereas you require to be ſatisfied of the ſacrament, I will ſhew you the truth thereof, both by the ſcriptures, and by the doctors.

Philpot. It is a ſhrewd likelihood that you will not conclude with any truth, ſince you have begun with ſo many untruths, as to ſay, that I was anſwered while I had any thing to ſay: and that I wept for lack of matter to ſay, and that the book of the report of the diſputation is not true. God be praiſed, there were a good many noblemen, gentleman, and worſhipful men, that heard and ſaw the doings thereof, which can teſtify that you here have made an unjuſt report before theſe honourable lords. And that I wept, was not for lack of matter, as you ſlander me; for I thank God I have more matter than the beſt of you all ſhall be able to anſwer, as little learning as I have: but my weeping was, as Chriſt was upon Jeruſalem, ſeeing the deſtruction that ſhould fall upon her: and I foreſeeing then the deſtruction which you (thro' violence and unrighteouſneſs which you there declared), would work againſt the true church of Chriſt and her faithful members, as this day beareth witneſs, was compelled to weep in remembrance of that which I with many more, have felt and ſhall feel.

All theſe words I did then ſpeak out, being interrupted by my lord Rich, ſaying that I ſhould ſuffer him to proceed out in this matter, and afterwards I ſhould have leiſure to anſwer him in every article. But he promiſed more than he could perform, as the end did well declare, for he had not the conſent of the ſpiritualty to his promiſe, which now rule the roaſt. God ſhorten their cruel days, for his elect's ſake. And therefore I add this, which I had purpoſed to have ſpoken, if then I might have been ſuffered, leſt any that perfectly know not the things done in the convocation-houſe, and now laid to my charge, if they ſhould not be anſwered by me, might reckon Dr. Chedſey's ſaying to be true. And as concerning the book of the report of the diſputations, I wrote the ſame, and it is true in every argument, as Mr. Dean of Rocheſter, and Mr. Cheney archdeacon of Hereford (yet being alive, and within the realm), can teſtify.

Chedſey. You have of ſcriptures the four evangeliſts for the probation of Chriſt's real preſence to be in the ſacrament after the words of conſecration, with St. Paul to the Corinthians; which all ſay, "This is my body." They ſay not, as you would have me believe, This is not the body. But eſpecially the 6th of John proveth the ſame moſt manifeſtly, where Chriſt promiſed to give his body, which he performed in his laſt ſupper, as it appeareth by theſe words, "The bread which I will give is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world."

Philpot. My lord Rich, with your leave I muſt needs interrupt him a little, becauſe he ſpeaketh open blaſphemy againſt the death of Chriſt: for if that promiſe brought in by St. John, was performed by Chriſt in his laſt ſupper, then needed he not to have died after he had given the ſacrament.

Rich. Let Mr. Doctor make an end of his arguments, and afterward object to him what you can.

Ched. You muſt note, that there is twice Dabo in this ſaying of St. John, and the firſt is referred to the ſacrament of the altar; and the ſecond to the ſacrifice upon the croſs; and beſides theſe manifeſt ſcriptures, there be many ancient doctors proving the ſame, as Ignatius, Ireneus, St. Cyprian [whoſe authority he recited at large, which I do omit, becauſe I was not permitted to anſwer the ſame.]

Rich. Now anſwer, and object to him what you can, and you ſhall be heard.

Philpot. My lord, the chief ground whereon he with the reſt of his ſide do ground themſelves againſt us, be theſe words, "This is my body," with a falſe pretence of the omnipotency of God. And before I will come to the particular anſwers of all that he hath alledged, for that your lordſhips may the better underſtand me, what I mean, and whereupon I ſtand, I will firſt require Mr. Doctor to anſwer me one queſtion. But firſt of all I do proteſt to your honours that I think as reverently of the ſacrament, as a chriſtian man ought to do, and that I acknowledge the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, miniſtered after Chriſt's inſtitution, to be one of the greateſt treaſures and comforts that he left us on earth: and contrarywiſe it is moſt diſcomfort and abominable, not being miniſtered as it ought to be, as it is uſed now-a-days.

And now to my queſtion, which is this: whether theſe words only, "This is my body," ſpoken by a prieſt over the bread and wine, may make the body and blood of Chriſt, as you ſuppoſe, or no?

Chedſey ſtaggering what he might ſay, at laſt he ſaid, That theſe words alone, pronounced by the prieſt, be ſufficient to make the bread and the wine the very body and blood of Chriſt really.

Philpot. That is blaſphemy to ſay, and againſt all the ſcriptures and doctors, who affirm, that the form and ſubſtance in conſecration muſt be obſerved which Chriſt uſed and did inſtitute, as St. Cyprian ſaith, "In the ſacrifice which is Chriſt, only Chriſt is to be followed." And by the law it is forbidden to add or to take away from God's word. And St. Peter ſaith, "If any man ſpeak let him ſpeak as the word of God." Wherefore whoſoever ſaith that theſe words only, "This is my body," do make a preſence of Chriſt, without "Bleſs, Take and Eat," which be three as ſubſtantial points of the ſacrament, as, "This is my body," he is highly deceived.

Therefore St. Auguſtine ſaith, "Let the word be joined to the element, and it becometh a ſacrament:" So that if the entire words of Chriſt's inſtitutions be not obſerved in the miniſtration of the ſacrament, it is no ſacrament; as the ſacrifices which the ten tribes did offer at Bethel to God, were not acceptable, becauſe they were not in all points done according to God's word. Wherefore except bleſſing be made after the word (which is a due thankſgiving for our redemption in Chriſt) and alſo a ſhewing forth of the Lord's death in ſuch wiſe as the congregation may be edified: and moreover a taking and eating after Chriſt's commandment: except (I ſay) theſe three parts be firſt performed (which is not done in the maſs) theſe words, "This is my body," which are laſt placed in the inſtitution of the Lord's ſupper, cannot be verified. For Chriſt commanded as well, "Take ye, Eat ye," as "This is my body."

Chedſey. Chriſt ſaid, "Take, Eat, this is my body." and not Take ye, Eat ye.

Philpot. Did he not, Mr. Doctor? be not theſe the words of Chriſt, Accipite, Manducate? And do not theſe words in the plural number ſignify, "Take ye, Eat ye," and not Take thou, Eat thou, as you would ſuppoſe?

Chedſey. I grant it is as you ſay.

Philpot. Likewiſe of conſequence, you (Mr. Doctor) muſt needs deny what you have ſaid, that theſe words, "This is my body," being only ſpoken, be ſufficient to make the body and blood of Chriſt in the ſacrament, as you have untruly ſaid.

Then the biſhop came in again and ſaid, What is it that you would have Mr. Doctor deny?

Philpot. My lord, Mr. Doctor hath affirmed that theſe words, "This is my body," ſpoken by the prieſt only, do make the ſacrament.

Bonner. Indeed if Mr. Bridges ſhould ſpeak theſe words over the bread and wine, they would be of none effect: but if a prieſt ſpeak them after a due manner, they are effectual, and make a real body.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor hath ſaid otherwiſe.

Bonner. I think you miſtake him; for he meaneth of the words duly pronounced.

Philpot. Let him revoke that he hath granted, and then will I begin again with that which before was ſaid, that, "This is my body," hath no place, except, Bleſs, Take, and Eat, duly go before. And therefore becauſe the ſame words do not go before, "This is my body," but prepoſterouſly follow in your ſacrament of the maſs, it is not the ſacrament of Chriſt, neither hath Chriſt in it preſent.

Chedſey. If, "This is my body" only do not make the ſacrament, no more do, "Bleſs, Take, and Eat."

Philpot. I grant that the one without the other cannot make the ſacrament. And it can be no ſacrament unleſs the whole action of Chriſt doth concur together according to the firſt inſtitution.

Chedſey. Why, then you would not have it to be the body of Chriſt, unleſs it be received?

Philpot. No verily, it is not the very body of Chriſt to any other, but ſuch as condignly receive the ſame after his inſtitution.

Bonner. Is not a loaf a loaf, being ſet on the table, though nobody eat thereof.

Philpot. It is not alike my lord? for a loaf is a loaf before it be ſet on the table; but ſo is not the ſacrament before it be duly adminiſtered at the table of the Lord.

Bonner. I pray you, what is it in the mean while, before it is received?

Philpot. It is, my lord, a ſign begun of a holy thing, and yet no perfect ſacrament until it be received. For in the ſacrament there be two things to be conſidered, the ſign, and the thing itſelf, which is Chriſt and his whole paſſion; and it is that to none but to ſuch as worthily receive the holy ſigns of bread and wine, according to Chriſt's inſtitution.

Windſor. There were never any that denied the words of Chriſt as you do. Did not he ſay, "This is my body?"

Philpot. My lord, I pray you be not deceived. We do not deny the words of Chriſt: but we ſay, theſe words be of none effect, being ſpoken otherwiſe than Chriſt did inſtitute them in his laſt ſupper. For example; Chriſt biddeth the church to baptize in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt: If a prieſt ſay theſe words over the water, and there be no child to be baptized, theſe words only pronounced do not make baptiſm. And again, Baptiſm is only baptiſm to ſuch as be baptized, and to none other ſtanding by.

Lord Chamberlain. I pray you, my lord, let me aſk one queſtion. What kind of preſence in the ſacrament (duly adminiſtered according to Chriſt's ordinance) do you allow?

Philpot. If any come worthily to receive, then do I confeſs the preſence of Chriſt wholly to be with all the fruits of his paſſion, unto the ſaid worthy receiver, by the Spirit of God, and that Chriſt is thereby joined to him, and he to Chriſt.

Lord Chamberlain. I am anſwered.

Bonner. My lords, take no heed of him, for he goeth about to deceive you. His ſimilitude that he bringeth in of baptiſm, is nothing like to the ſacrament of the altar. For if I ſhould ſay to Sir John Bridges, being with me at ſupper, and having a fat capon, Take, eat, this is of a capon, although he eat not thereof, is it not a capon ſtill? And likewiſe a piece of beef, or a cup of wine; if I ſay, Drink, this is a cup of wine, is it not ſo, becauſe he drinketh not thereof?

Philpot. My lord, your ſimilitudes are too groſs for ſo high myſteries as we have in hand, as if I were your equal I could more plainly declare; and there is much more diſſimilitude between common meats and drinks, than there is between baptiſm and the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt. Like muſt be compared to like, and ſpiritual things with ſpiritual, and not ſpiritual things wirh corporal things. And meats and drinks be of their own natures good or evil, and your words, commending or diſcommending, do but declare what they are. But the ſacraments be to be conſidered according to the word which Chriſt ſpake of them, of which, "Take ye, and eat ye," be ſome of the chief, concurrent to the making of the ſame, without which there can be no ſacraments: And therefore the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt is called Communion: and likewiſe in the goſpel Chriſt commanded, ſaying, "Divide it among you."

Chedſey. St. Paul called it a Communication.

Philpot. That doth more expreſly ſhew, that there muſt be a participation of the ſacrament together.

Bonner. My lords, I am ſorry I have troubled you ſo long with this obſtinate man, with whom we can do no good; I will trouble you no longer now. And with that the lords roſe up, none of them ſaying any evil word unto me, half amazed, in my judgment, God work it to good.

Thus

Thus ended the ſixth part of this tragedy: the ſeventh look for with joy.

The ſeventh Examination of Mr. John Philpot, on the 19th of November, before the biſhops of London and Rocheſter, the Chancellor of Litchfield, and Dr. Chedſey.

BOnner. Sirrah, come hither. How chance you came no ſooner? Is it well done of you to make Mr. Chancellor and me to tarry for you this hour? By the faith of my body, half an hour before maſs, and half an hour even at maſs, looking for your coming.

Philpot. My lord, it is well known to you that I am a priſoner, and that the doors be ſhut upon me, and I cannot come when I pleaſe: but as ſoon as the doors of my priſon were open, I came immediately.

Bonner. We ſent for thee to the intent thou ſhouldeſt have come to maſs. How ſay you, would you have come to maſs or no, if the doors had ſooner been opened?

Philpot. My lord, that is another manner of queſtion.

Bonner. Lo, Mr. Chancellor, I told you we ſhould have a froward fellow of him; he will anſwer directly to nothing. I have had him both before the ſpiritual lords and temporal, thus he fareth ſtill; yet he reckoneth himſelf better learned than all the realm. Yea, before the temporal lords the other day, he was ſo fooliſh to challenge the beſt; he would make himſelf learned, and is a very ignorant fool indeed.

Philpot. I reckon I anſwered your lordſhip before the lords plain enough.

Bonner. Why anſwereſt thou not directly, whether thou wouldſt have gone to maſs or no, if thou hadſt come in time?

Philpot. Mine anſwer ſhall be thus, that if your lordſhip can prove your maſs, whereunto you would have me to come, to be the true ſervice of God, whereunto a chriſtian ought to come, I will afterward come with a good will.

Bonner. Look, I pray you; the king and queen, and all the nobility of the realm do come to maſs, and yet he will not. By my faith, thou art too well handled: thou ſhalt be worſe handled hereafter, I warrant thee.

Philpot. If to lie in a blind coal-houſe, may be counted good handling, without both fire and candle, then it may be ſaid, I am well handled. Your lordſhip hath power to treat my body as you pleaſe.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, and a very ignorant fool. Mr. Chancellor, in good faith I have handled him and his fellows with as much gentleneſs as they can deſire. I did let their friends come unto them to relieve them. And wot you what? the other day they had gotten themſelves up into the top of the leads with a many apprentices, gazing as though they had been at liberty: but I will cut off your reſort: and as for the apprentices, they were as good not to come to you, if I take them.

Philpot. My lord, we have no ſuch reſort to us as your lordſhip imagineth, and there cometh very few unto us. And of apprentices I know not one, neither have we any leads to walk on over our coal-houſe, that I know of: wherefore your lordſhip hath miſtaken your mark.

Bonner. Nay, now you think (becauſe my lord chancellor is gone) that we will burn no more: yes I warrant thee, I will diſpatch you ſhortly, unleſs you do recant.

Philpot. My lord, I had not thought that I ſhould have been alive now, neither ſo raw as I am, but even well roaſted to aſhes.

Chancellor. Caſt not yourſelf wilfully away, Mr. Philpot. Be content to be ruled by my lord here, and other learned men of this realm, and you may do well enough.

Philpot. My conſcience beareth me record that I ſeek to pleaſe God, and that the love and fear of God cauſeth me to do as I do: and I were of all other creatures moſt miſerable, if for mine own will only I do loſe all the conveniences I might have in this life, and afterwards be caſt into damnation. But I am ſure it is not my will whereon I ſtand, but God's will, who will not ſuffer me to be caſt away, I am ſure.

Chancellor. You are not ſo ſure, but you may be deceived.

Bonner. Well, ſince thou wilt not be conformable by fair means I will proceed againſt thee Ex Officio, and therefore hearken here to ſuch articles as I have here written, and I charge thee to make anſwer to them. And with that he read a libel which he had in his hand of divers articles, and when he had done, he bade me anſwer.

Philpot. Your libel, my lord, containeth in ſum two ſpecial points: The firſt pretendeth, that I ſhould be of your dioceſe, and therefore your lordſhip, upon divers ſuſpects and infamies of hereſy going upon me, is moved to proceed againſt me by your ordinary office; which firſt is not true, for I am not of your lordſhip's dioceſe, as the libel doth pretend. And the ſecond is, that I being baptized in the catholic church, and in the catholic faith, am gone from them, which is not ſo, for I am of that catholic faith and church as I was baptized into.

Bonner. What! art thou not of my dioceſe? where are you now, I pray you?

Philpot. I cannot deny but I am in your coal-houſe, which is your dioceſe: yet I am not of your dioceſe.

Bonner. You were ſent hither unto me by the queen's majeſty's commiſſioners, and thou art now in my dioceſe: wherefore I will proceed againſt thee as thy ordinary.

Philpot. I was brought hither through violence, and therefore my preſent being now in your dioceſe is not enough to abridge me of mine own ordinary's juriſdiction, neither maketh it me willingly ſubject to your juriſdiction, ſince it cometh by force, and by ſuch men as had no authority ſo to do; no more than a ſanctuary man, being by force brought forth of his place of privilege, doth thereby loſe his privilege, but may challenge the ſame whereſoever he be brought.

Chedſey. Hath not the queen's majeſty authority, by her commiſſioners, to remove your body whither ſhe will? and ought you not to obey herein?

Philpot. I grant the queen's majeſty (of her juſt power) may tranſpoſe my body, whither it ſhall pleaſe her grace to command the ſame. But yet by your laws, Spiritual cauſes be not ſubject to the Temporal Power. As for example; you, Mr. Doctor, if the queen's majeſty would appoint two temporal men to be judges over you in ſpiritual matters, might not you alledge the privilege of a clerk, and demand competent ſpiritual judges in your cauſes?

Bonner. Doth not a judge (I pray you) appoint a court at his own diſcretion?

Philpot. My lord, your rule is true in temporal matters, but in ſpiritual cauſes it is not ſo, which be otherwiſe privileged.

Bonner. What ſayſt thou then to the ſecond article, and to the other?

Philpot. My lord, I ſay that I am not bound to anſwer the ſecond, neither the reſt, unleſs the firſt be proved.

Bonner. Well, ſuppoſe the firſt may be proved, as it will be, what will you ſay then to the ſecond, that you are not of the ſame catholic faith, neither of the ſame church now as you were baptized in?

Philpot. I am of the ſame catholic faith and of the catholic church, which is of Chriſt, the pillar and eſtabliſhment of truth.

Bonner. Nay, that you are not.

Philpot. Yes, that I am.

Bonner.

Bonner. Your godfathers and godmothers were of another faith than you be now.

Philpot. I was not baptized either into my godfathers faith or my godmothers, but into the faith and into the church of Chriſt.

Bonner. How know you that?

Philpot. By the word of God, which is the touchſtone of faith, and the limits of the church.

Bonner. How long hath your church ſtood, I pray you?

Philpot. Even from the beginning, from Chriſt and his apoſtles, and from their immediate ſucceſſors.

Chancellor. He will prove his church to be before Chriſt.

Philpot. If I did ſo, I go not amiſs: for there was a church before the coming of Chriſt, which maketh one catholic church.

Chancellor. It is ſo indeed.

Philpot. I will deſire no better rule than the ſame which is oftentimes brought in of your ſide, to prove both my faith and the catholic church; this is, antiquity, univerſality, and unity.

Bonner. Do you not ſee what a fooliſh bragging fellow this is? He would ſeem to be very well ſeen in the doctors, and he is but a fool. By what doctor art thou able to prove thy church? Name him, and thou ſhalt have him.

Philpot. My lord, let me have all your ancient writers, with pen, and ink, and paper, and I will prove both my faith and my church out of every one of them.

Bonner. No, that thou ſhalt not have. You ſhall ſee how he lieth. St. Cyprian ſaith, "There muſt be one high-prieſt, to which the reſidue muſt obey;" and they will allow no head, neither vicar general.

Philpot. St. Cyprian ſaith not, that there ſhould be a vicar general over all. For in his book De ſimplicitate Prælatorum, I am ſure he ſaith the contrary. "There is but one biſhopric, which is wholly poſſeſſed of every biſhop in part."

Bonner. Fetch hither the book, thou ſhalt ſee the manifeſt place againſt thee.

Dr. Chedſey brought the book, and turned to the place in an epiſtle written unto Cornelius then biſhop of Rome, and recited theſe words, in ſum, "That it went not well with the church, where the high-prieſt was not obeyed;" and ſo would have concluded for the confirmation of the biſhop's ſaying.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you miſconſtrue the place of St. Cyprian; for he meaneth not there by the high-prieſt the biſhop of Rome, but every patriarch in his precinct, of whom there were four appointed in his time. And in writing unto Cornelius, he meaneth by the high prieſt, himſelf, who was then biſhop of Africa, whoſe authority the heretics began to deſpiſe. Whereof he complaineth to Cornelius, and ſaith, The church cannot be well ordered, where the chief miniſter by order after the judgment of the ſcriptures, after the agreement of the people, and the conſent of his fellow-biſhops, is not obeyed.

Bonner. Hath not the biſhop of Rome always been ſupreme head of the church, and Chriſt's vicar in earth even from Peter?

Philpot. No, that he was not. For by the word of God he hath no more authority, than the biſhop of London hath.

Bonner. Was not Peter head of the church, and hath not the biſhop of Rome, who is his ſucceſſor, the ſame authority?

Philpot. I grant that the biſhop of Rome, as he is the ſucceſſor of Peter, hath the ſame authority as Peter had: but Peter had no more authority than every one of the apoſtles had.

Chancellor. Yes, that St. Peter had; for Chriſt ſaid ſpecially unto him, "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven;" which he ſpake to none other of his diſciples ſingularly, but to him.

Philpot. St. Auguſtine anſwereth otherwiſe to the objection, and ſaith, "That if in Peter there had not been the figure of the church, the Lord had not ſaid to him, To thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Which if Peter received not, the church hath them not; if the church hath them, then Peter hath them not."

Bonner. What if I can prove and ſhew you out of the civil law, that all Chriſtendom ought to follow the holy catholic church of Rome, as there is a ſpecial title thereof, De catholica fide & ſancta Romana eccleſia?

Philpot. That is nothing material, ſeeing the things of God be not ſubject to man's laws; and the divine matters muſt be ordered by the word of God, and not of man.

A doctor. What will you ſay, if I can prove that Chriſt built his church upon Peter, and that out of St. Cyprian? will you then believe that the biſhop of Rome ought to be ſupreme head of the church?

Philpot. I know what St. Cyprian writeth in that behalf; but he meaneth nothing as you take it.

A doctor. St. Cyprian hath theſe words, That upon Peter was built the church, as upon the firſt beginning of unity.

Philpot. He declareth that in an example, that unity muſt be in the church; he grounded on Peter his church alone, and not upon men. Which he doth more manifeſtly declare in the book De ſimplicitate Prælatorum, ſaying, In the perſon of one man God gave the keys to all, that he in ſignification thereby might declare the unity of all men.

A doctor. What, will you underſtand St. Cyprian ſo? That were good indeed.

Philpot. I think you cannot underſtand St. Cyprian better, than he doth declare himſelf.

Bonner. I will deſire you (Mr. Chancellor) to take ſome pains, with Mr. Doctor Chedſey, about his examination, for I muſt go to the parliament-houſe. And I will deſire you to dine with me.

Philpot. Then the doctor again took his former authority in hand for want of another, and would have made a further circumſtance, digreſſing from his purpoſe. To whom I ſaid, he knew not whereabouts he went, and therewith he laughed. And I ſaid his divinity was nothing but ſcoffing.

A doctor. Yea, then I have done with you, and ſo went away.

Philpot. You are too young in divinity to teach me in the matters of my faith. Though you may be more learned in other things than I, yet in divinity I have been longer practiſed than you, for any thing I can hear of you; therefore be not too haſty to judge what you do not perfectly know.

Chancellor. Peter and his ſucceſſors, from the beginning have been allowed for the ſupreme head of the church, and that by the ſcriptures, for that Chriſt ſaid unto him in St. John thrice, "Feed my ſheep."

Philpot. That is no otherwiſe to be taken, than, "Go ye and preach," which was ſpoken to all the apoſtles as well as unto Peter. And that Chriſt ſaid thrice, "Feed my ſheep," it ſignifieth nothing elſe but the ſtudy that the miniſters of God ought to have in preaching the word. God grant that you of the clergy would weigh your duty in this behalf more than you do. Is this a juſt interpretation of the ſcripture, to take "Feed my ſheep," for to be lord of the whole world?

In this mean while a bachelor of divinity came in, which is a reader of Greek in Oxford, belonging to the biſhop, and he took upon him to help Mr. Chancellor.

Scholar. What will you ſay if I can ſhew you a Greek author called Theophylact, to interpret it ſo? Will you believe his interpretation?

Philpot. Theophylact is a late writer, and one that was a favourer of the biſhop of Rome, and therefore not to be credited, ſince his interpretation is contrary to the manifeſt feſt words of the ſcripture, and contrary to the determination of many general councils.

Scholar. In what general council was it otherwiſe, that the biſhop of Rome was not ſupreme head over all?

Philpot. In the council of Nice I am ſure it was otherwiſe; for Athanaſius was there the chief biſhop and preſident of the council, and not the biſhop of Rome.

Scholar. Nay, that is not ſo.

Philpot. Then I perceive you are better ſeen in words than in knowledge of things: and I will gage with you what you will it is ſo, as you may ſee in the Epitome of the councils.

Scholar. I will fetch Euſebius and ſhew the contrary, and the book of general councils. He went into my lord's cloſet, and brought Euſebius, but the general councils he brought not, ſaying (for ſaving of his honeſty) that he could not come by them, and there he would have defended that it was otherwiſe in Euſebius, but was not able to ſhew the ſame, and ſo ſhrank away confounded.

Chancellor. The church of Rome hath been always taken for the catholic church: therefore I would adviſe you to come into the ſame with us. You ſee all the men of this realm do condemn you. And why will you be ſo ſingular?

Philpot. I have ſaid, and ſtill do ſay, that if you can be able to prove it unto me, that I will be of the ſame. But I am ſure that the church, which you make ſo much of, is a falſe church, and a Synagogue of Satan. And you with the learned men of the realm do perſecute the true church, and condemn ſuch as be more righteous than you.

Chancellor. Do you hear, Mr. Doctor, what he ſaith, that the church of Rome is the devil?

Chedſey. I wiſh you did think more reverently of the church of Rome. What will you ſay if I can ſhew you out of St. Auſtin, in his epiſtle written unto pope Innocent, that the whole general council of Carthage did allow the church of Rome to be chiefeſt over all others?

Philpot. I am ſure you can ſhew no ſuch thing. And with that he fetch'd me the book of St. Auſtin, and turned to the epiſtle, but he could not prove his allegation manifeſtly, but by conjectures in this wiſe.

Chedſey. Here you may ſee, that the council of Carthage writing to Innocent, the biſhop, calleth the ſee of Rome the apoſtolic ſee. And beſides this, they write to him certifying him of things done in the council for the condemnation of the Donatiſts, requiring his approbations in the ſame; which they would not have had done if they had not taken the church of Rome for the ſupreme head of others. Aud moreover you may ſee how St. Auſtin doth prove the church of Rome to be the catholic church, by continual ſucceſſion of the biſhops until his time, which ſucceſſion we can prove until our days: therefore by the ſame reaſon of St Auſtin we ſay now, that the church of Rome is the catholic church.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I have conſidered how you do weigh St. Auſtin; and contrary to his meaning and words, you would infer your falſe concluſion. As concerning that it was called by him the apoſtolical ſee, that is not material to prove the church of Rome now to be the catholic church. I will grant it now that it is the apoſtolic ſee, in reſpect that Paul and Peter did once there preach the goſpel, and abode there for a certain ſeaſon. I would you could prove it to be the apoſtolical ſee of the true religion and ſincerity as the apoſtle left it, and did teach the ſame; which if ye could do, you might boaſt of Rome as of the apoſtolical ſee; otherwiſe it is now of no more force, than if the Turk at Antioch and at Jeruſalem ſhould boaſt of the apoſtolic ſees, becauſe the apoſtles once did there abide, and founded the church of Chriſt.

And whereas the whole council of Carthage did write unto pope Innocen-, certifying him of what was done in the general council, and willing him to ſet his helping hand to the ſuppreſſing of the Donatiſts, as they had done; that fact of the council doth not prove the ſupremacy of the biſhop of Rome, no more than if the whole convocation-houſe now gathered together, and agreeing upon certain articles, might ſend the ſame to ſome biſhop, that upon certain impediments is not preſent, deſiring him to agree thereto, and to ſet them forth in his dioceſe. Which fact doth not make any ſuch biſhop of greater authority than the reſt, becauſe his conſent is brotherly required.

And touching the ſucceſſion of the biſhop of Rome brought in by St. Auguſtine, it maketh nothing now thereby to prove the ſame catholic church, unleſs you can conclude with the ſame reaſon as St. Auguſtine doth. And the rehearſal of the ſucceſſion of the biſhops doth tend to this only, to prove the Donatiſts to be heretics, becauſe they began as well at Rome as in Africa, to found another church of their own ſetting up, than was grounded by Peter and Paul, and by their ſucceſſors, whom he reciteth until his time, which all taught no ſuch doctrine, neither ſuch church as the Donatiſts. And if preſently you be able to prove by the biſhops of Rome (whereof you do glory) that ſuch doctrine hath not been taught by any of the ſucceſſors of Peter's ſee, as is now taught and believed by us, you have good reaſon againſt us: otherwiſe it is of no force, as I am able to declare.

Chancellor. Well, Mr. Doctor, you ſee we can do no good in perſuading of him: let us adminiſter the articles which my lord hath left us, unto him. How ſay you Mr. Philpot to theſe articles? Mr. Johnſon, I pray you write his anſwers.

Philpot. Mr. Chancellor, you have no authority to enquire of me my belief in ſuch articles as you go about, for I am not of my lord of London's dioceſe; and to be brief with you, I will make no further anſwer herein than I have already to the biſhop.

Chancellor. Why then let us go our ways, and let his keeper take him away.

Thus ended the ſeventh part of his tragedy.

A private Conference between Mr. Philpot and Biſhop Bonner.

EARLY the next morning the biſhop ſent one of his men to me, to call me up in his chapel to hear maſs.

Biſhop's man. Mr. Philpot, Where be you?

Philpot. Who is it that calleth me?

Biſhop's man. My lords will is, you ſhould riſe and come to hear maſs: will you come or no?

Philpot. My ſtomach is not very good this morning: you may tell my lord I am ſick. After this the keeper was ſent to bring me to my lord.

The Keeper. Mr Philpot, you muſt riſe and come to my lord.

Philpot. I am at your command, Mr. Keeper, as ſoon as I can: and going out of the priſon, he aſked me, ſaying:

The Keeper. Will ye go to maſs?

Philpot. My ſtomach is too raw to digeſt ſuch raw meats of fleſh, blood, and bone, this morning.

After this my keeper preſented me to the biſhop in his hall.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I charge you to anſwer unto ſuch articles as my chaplain and my regiſter have from me to object againſt you; go and anſwer them.

Philpot. My lord, all judgments ought to be public. Therefore if your lordſhip have any thing to charge me lawfully withal, let me be in judgment lawfully and openly called, and I will anſwer according to my duty; otherwiſe in corners I will not.

Bonner. Thou art a fooliſh knave I ſee well enough, thou ſhalt anſwer whether thou wilt or no; Go thy ways with them, I ſay.

Philpot. I will go with them at your lordſhip's pleaſure; but I will make them no further anſwers than I have ſaid already.

Bonner. No, wilt thou not knave? Have him away, and ſet him in the ſtocks: What, fooliſh knave?

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, you handle me, with others, like fools: and we muſt be content to be made fools at your hands, ſtocks and violence be your biſhop-like alms. You go about by force in corners to oppreſs, and be aſhamed that your doings ſhould come to light; God ſhorten your cruel kingdom for his mercies ſake. And I was put by and by into the ſtocks, into an houſe alone, ſeparate from my fellows: God be praiſed that he hath thought me worthy to ſuffer any thing for his name's ſake. Better it is to ſit in the ſtocks of this world, than to ſit in the ſtocks of a damnable conſcience.

Another Conference between the Biſhop and Mr. Philpot, and other Priſoners.

PHilpot. The next day after, an hour before day, the biſhop ſent for me again by the keeper.

The keeper. Mr. Philpot ariſe, you muſt come to my lord.

Philpot. I wonder what my lord meaneth, that he ſendeth for me thus early, I fear he will uſe ſome violence towards me: wherefore I pray you make him this anſwer, That if he did ſend for me by an order of law, I will come and anſwer; otherwiſe ſince I am not of his dioceſe, neither is he mine ordinary, I will not (without I be violently conſtrained) come unto him.

Keeper. I will go and tell my lord what anſwer you make: and ſo he went away to the biſhop, and immediately returned with two of the biſhop's men, ſaying, that I muſt come whether I would or no.

Philpot. If by violence any of you will enforce me to go, then I muſt go, otherwiſe I will not; and therewith one of them took me with force by the arm, and led me up into the biſhop's gallery.

Bonner. What, thou art a fooliſh knave indeed: thou wilt not come without thou be fetch'd.

Philpot. I am brought indeed (my lord) by violence unto you, and your cruelty is ſuch, that I am afraid to come before you. I would your lordſhip would gently proceed againſt me by the law.

Bonner. I am blamed by the lords the biſhops, for that I have not diſpatched thee ere this. And in faith I made ſute to my lord cardinal, and to all the convocation-houſe, that they would hear thee. And my lord of Lincoln ſtood up, and ſaid, that thou wert a frantic fellow, and a man that will have the laſt word. And they all have much blamed me, becauſe I have brought thee ſo often before the lords openly: and they ſay, it is meat and drink to you to ſpeak in an open audience, you glory ſo of yourſelf. Wherefore I am commanded to take a further order with thee, and in good faith if thou wilt not relent, I will make no further delay. Marry if thou wilt be conformable, I will yet forgive thee all that is paſt, and thou ſhalt have no hurt for any thing that is already ſpoken or done.

Philpot. My lord, I have anſwered you already in this behalf, what I will do. And as for the reporf of Mr. White, biſhop of Lincoln, I paſs not: who is known to be mine enemy, for that I being archdeacon did excommunicate him for preaching naughty doctrine. If Chriſt my maſter was called a mad man, it is no marvel though ye count me frantic, Bonner, Hadſt thou not a pig brought thee the other day with a knife in it? Wherefore was it (pray thee) but to kill thyſelf? or, as it is told me (marry I am counſelled to take heed of thee) to kill me? But I fear thee not. I think I am able to tread thee under my feet; do the beſt thou canſt.

Philpot. My lord, I cannot deny but that there was a knife in the pig's belly that was brought me. But who put it in, or for what purpoſe, I know not, unleſs it were becauſe he that ſent the meat, thought I was without a knife, and ſo put it in. But other things your lordſhip needeth not to fear: for I was never without a knife ſince I came to priſon. And touching your own perſon, you ſhall live long if you ſhould live till I go about to kill you; and I confeſs by violence your lordſhip is able to overcome me.

Bonner. I charge thee to anſwer to mine articles. Hold him a book. Thou ſhalt ſwear to anſwer truly to all ſuch articles, as I ſhall demand of thee.

Philpot. I will firſt know your lordſhip to be mine ordinary, before I ſwear herein.

Bonner. What, we ſhall have an anabaptiſt of thee, which thinketh it not lawful to ſwear before a judge?

Philpot. My lord, I am no anabaptiſt, I think it lawful to ſwear before a competent judge, being lawfully required. But I refuſe to ſwear in theſe cauſes before your lordſhip, becauſe you are not mine ordinary.

Bonner. I am thine ordinary, and here do pronounce by ſentence preremptory, that I am thine ordinary, and that thou art of my dioceſe: and here he ordered others to be called in to bear him witneſs. And I make thee (taking one of his ſervants by the arm) to be my notary. And now hearken to my articles, to which (when he had read them) he moniſhed me to make anſwer, and ſaid to the keeper, Fetch me his fellows, and I ſhall make them to be witneſſes againſt him.

In the mean while came in one of the ſheriffs of London, whom the biſhop (calling for two chairs) placed by him, ſaying, Mr. Sheriff, I would you ſhould underſtand how I do proceed againſt this man. Mr. Sheriff, you ſhall hear what articles this man doth maintain: and ſo read a rabblement of feigned articles: That I ſhould deny baptiſm to be neceſſary to them that were born of chriſtian parents, that I deny'd faſting and prayer, and all other good deeds, and I maintained only bare faith to be ſufficient to ſalvation, whatſoever a man did beſides, and I maintained God to be the author of all ſin and wickedneſs.

Philpot. Ha, my lord, have ye nothing of truth to charge me withal, but ye muſt be fain to imagine theſe blaſphemous lies againſt me? You might as well have ſaid I had killed your father. The ſcriptures ſay, "That God will deſtroy all men that ſpeak lies. And is not your lordſhip aſhamed to ſay before this worſhipful gentleman (who is unknown to me) that I maintain theſe abominable blaſphemies which you have rehearſed? which if I did maintain, I were well worthy to be counted an heretic, and to be burnt an hundred times if it were poſſible.

Bonner. I do object them unto thee, to hear what thou wilt ſay in them, and how thou canſt clear thyſelf of them.

Philpot, Then it was not juſtly ſaid of your lordſhip in the beginning, that I did maintain them, ſince almoſt I hold none of theſe articles you have read, in form as they are written.

Bonner. How ſayſt thou? wilt thou anſwer to them or no?

Philpot. I will firſt know you to be mine ordinary, and that you may lawfully charge me with ſuch things, and then afterward being lawfully called in judgment, I will ſhew my mind fully thereof, and not otherwiſe.

Bonner. Well, then I will make thy fellows to be witneſſes herein againſt thee: Where are they? come.

Keeper. They be here, my lord.

Bonner. Come hither, Sirs [hold them a book] You ſhall ſwear by the contents of that book, that you ſhall (all manner of affections laid apart) ſay the truth of all ſuch articles as you ſhall be demanded of concerning this man here preſent, who is a very naughty man, and take you you heed of him that he doth not deceive you, as I am afraid he doth you much hurt, and ſtrengtheneth you in your errors.

Priſoners. My lord, we will not ſwear, except we know whereto; we can accuſe him of no evil, we have been but a while acquainted with him.

Philpot. I wonder your lordſhip, knowing the law, will go about, contrary to the ſame, to have infamous perſons to be witneſſes, for your lordſhip doth take them to be heretics, and by the law an heretic cannot be a witneſs.

Bonner. Yes, one heretic againſt another may be well enough. And, Mr. Sheriff, I will make one of them to be a witneſs againſt another.

Philpot. You have the law in your hand, and you will do what you liſt.

Priſoners. No, my lord.

Bonner. No, will you not? I will make you ſwear, whether you will or no. I think they be anabaptiſts, Mr. Sheriff, they think it not lawful to ſwear before a judge.

Philpot. We think it lawful to ſwear for a man judicially called, as we are not now, but in a blind corner.

Bonner. Why then, ſeeing you will not anſwer againſt your fellow, you ſhall ſwear for yourſelves, and I do here, in the preſence of Mr. Sheriff, object the ſame articles unto you as I have done unto him, and to require you, under pain of excommunication, to anſwer particularly unto every one of them when ye ſhall be examined, as ye ſhall be by and by examined by my regiſter and ſome of my chaplains.

Priſoners. My lord, we will not accuſe ourſelves. If any man can lay any thing againſt us, we are here ready to anſwer thereto: otherwiſe we pray your lordſhip not to burden us; for ſome of us are here before you, we know no juſt cauſe why.

Bonner. Mr. Sheriff, I will trouble you no longer with theſe froward men. And ſo he roſe up, and was going away, talking with Mr. Sheriff.

Philpot. Mr. Sheriff, I pray you record how my lord proceedeth againſt us in corners, without all order of law, having no juſt cauſe to lay againſt us. And after this, we were all commanded to be put in the ſtocks, where I ſat from morning until night; and the keeper at night, upon favour, let me out.

Another private Conference between the Biſhop and Mr. Philpot in the Coal-houſe.

Philpot. THE Sunday after, the biſhop came into the coal-houſe at night with the keeper, and viewed the houſe, ſaying, that he was never there before: whereby a man may gueſs how he hath kept God's commandment in viſiting the priſoners, ſeeing he was never with them that have been ſo nigh his noſe: and he came not then for any good zeal, but to view the place, and thought it too good for me, and therefore, after ſupper, between eight and nine, he ſent for me, ſaying:

Bonner. Sir, I have great diſpleaſure of the queen and the council for keeping you ſo long, and letting you have ſo much liberty; and beſides that, you be yonder and ſtrengthen the other priſoners in their errors, as I have laid wait for your doings, and am certified of you well enough; I will ſequeſter you therefore from them, and you ſhall hurt no more as you have done, and I will out of hand diſpatch you, as I am commanded, unleſs you will be a conformable man.

Philpot. My lord, you have my body in your cuſtody, may tranſport it whither you pleaſe; I am content. And I wiſh you would make as quick expedition in my judgment, as you ſay; I long for it: and as for conformity, I am ready to yield to all truth, if any can bring better than I.

Bonner. Why, will you believe nothing but yourſelf, whatſoever they ſay?

Philpot. My belief muſt not hang upon men's ſayings, without ſure authority of God's word, which if any can ſhew me, I will be pliant to the ſame; otherwiſe, I cannot go from my certain faith to that which is uncertain.

Bonner. Have you then the truth only?

Philpot. My lord, I will ſpeak my mind freely unto you, and upon no malice I bear to you, before God. You have not the truth, neither are you of the church of God: but you perſecute both the truth and the true church of God, for which you proſper long. You ſee God doth not proſper your doings according to your expectations: he hath of late ſhewed his juſt judgment againſt one of your greateſt doers, who, by report, died miſerably. I envy not your authority you are in. You that have learning ſhould know how beſt to rule. And ſeeing God hath reſtored you to your dignity and living again, uſe the ſame to God's glory, and to the ſetting-forth of his true religion; otherwiſe it will not continue, do what you can. With this ſaying he pauſed, and at length ſaid;

Bonner. That good man was puniſhed for ſuch as thou art. Where is the keeper? Come, let him have him to the place that is provided for him. Go your way before.

Philpot. And he followed me, calling the keeper aſide, commanding to keep all from me, and narrowly to ſearch me (as the ſequel did declare) and brought me to his privy that goeth into the church, and commanded two of his men to accompany the keeper, and ſee me placed.

And afterwards I paſſed through St. Paul's up to Lollards Tower, and after that turned along the weſt-ſide of Paul's through the wall, and paſſing through ſix or ſeven doors, came to my lodging through many ſtraits; where I called to remembrance, that ſtrait is the way to heaven. And it is in a tower right on the other ſide of Lollards Tower, as high almoſt as the battlements of Paul's, eight feet in breadth, and thirteen in length, and almoſt over the priſon where I was before, having a window opening towards the eaſt, by which I may look over the tops of a great many houſes, but ſee no man paſſing into them: and whoſo walketh in the biſhop's outer gallery going to his chapel, may ſee my window, and me ſtanding in the ſame.

And as I came to my place, the keeper plucked off my gown, and ſearched me very narrowly. and took away penner, inkhorn, girdle and knife, but (as God would) I had an inkling a little before I was called, of my removal, and thereupon made an errand to the ſtool, where (full ſore againſt my will) I caſt away many a ſweet and friendly letter: but that which I had written of my laſt examination before, I thruſt into my hoſe, thinking the next day to have an end thereof, and with walking it was fallen down to my leg, which he, by feeling, did ſoon eſpy, and aſked what that was. I ſaid, they were certain letters: and with that he was very buſy to have them out. Let me alone, ſaid I, I will pluck them out: and with that I put in my hand, having two other letters therein, and brought up the ſame writing into my breeches, and there left it, giving him the other two letters that were not of any great importance; which to make a ſhew that they had been weighty, I began to tear as well as I could, 'till they ſnatched them from me, and ſo deluded him (I thank God) of his purpoſe.

Then he went away, and as he was going, one of them that came with him, ſaid, that I did not deliver the writing I had in my hoſe, but two other letters I had in my hand before. Did he not? quoth he; I will go and ſearch him better: which I hearing, conveyed my examination I had written, into another place near my bed, and took all my letters I had in my purſe, and was tearing of them when he came again, and as he came I threw the ſame out of the window, ſaying, That I heard what he ſaid; wherefore I prevented his ſearching again, and I was right glad. God be praiſed that gave me that preſent ſhift to blind their eyes from the knowledge of my writings, which if they had known, it would have been a great occaſion of ſtraiter keeping and looking unto, although they look as narrowly as they may.

The eighth Examination of Mr. Philpot (before the Biſhop of London, the Biſhop of St. David's, Mr. Mordant, and others, in the Biſhop's Chapel.

THE next day after, my keeper came in the morning before day to call me down, and ſo I was brought down into his wardrobe, where with a keeper I was left, and there continued all day. But after dinner I was called down into the chapel before the biſhop of London, the biſhop of St. David's, Mr. Mordant, one of the queen's council, Mr. Archdeacon of London, and before a great many more Baalamites. And the biſhop ſpake unto me in this wiſe.

Bonner. Sir, here I object and lay unto you in the preſence of my lord of St. David's, and of Mr. Mordant, and theſe worſhipful men, theſe articles here in this libel contained; and openly he read them.

To whom when I would particularly have anſwered to ſome of his blaſphemies, he would not permit me; but ſaid, I ſhould have leiſure to ſay what I would when he had ſpoken.

And unto theſe here I add another ſchedule. Alſo I require thee to anſwer to the catechiſm ſet forth in the ſchiſmatical time of king Edward. Alſo I will thee to anſwer to certain concluſions agreed upon both in Oxford and Cambridge. And I here do bring forth theſe witneſſes againſt thee in thine own preſence, namely, my lord of St David's, Mr. Mordant, and Mr. Harpsfield, with as many as were preſent in the diſputation he made in the convocation-houſe: willing you to teſtify, of your oaths taken upon a book, his ſtubborn and irreverent behaviour he did there uſe againſt the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar. Give me a book; and receiving one, he opened the ſame, ſaying, I will teach him here one trick in our law which he knoweth not; that is, my lord of St. David's, becauſe you are a biſhop, you have this privilege, that you may ſwear by looking on the goſpel book, without touching of the ſame. And ſo he opened the book in his ſight, and ſhut it again, and cauſed the others to put their hands on the book, and took their oath, and deſired them to reſort to his regiſter to make their depoſitions when they might be beſt at leiſure: And afterwards he turned to me and ſaid, Now Sir, you ſhall anſwer but two words, whether you will anſwer to theſe articles which I have laid unto you, directly, yea or nay?

Philpot. My lord, You have told a long tale againſt me, containing many lying blaſphemies, which cannot be anſwered in two words: beſides this, you promiſed me at the beginning, that I ſhould ſay what I could for my defence, and now will you not give me leave to ſpeak; What law is this?

Bonner. Speak yea or nay, for you ſhall ſay no more at this time.

The cauſe was, as I gueſs, that he ſaw ſo many there gathered to hear.

Philpot. Then my two words you would have me ſpeak, ſhall be, that I have appealed from you, and take you not for my ſufficient judge.

Bonner. Indeed Mr. Mordant, he hath appealed to the king and to the queen; but I will be ſo bold with her majeſty, to ſtay that appeal in mine own hands.

Philpot. You will do what you pleaſe, my lord, you have the law in your own hands.

Bonner. Wilt thou anſwer or no?

Philpot. I will not anſwer otherwiſe than I have ſaid.

Bonner. Regiſter, note his anſwer that he maketh.

Philpot. Knock me on the head with an hatchet, or ſet up a ſtake and burn me out of hand, without further law: you may as well do ſo, as do what you do, for all is without order of law: ſuch tyranny was never ſeen as you uſe now-a-days: God of his mercy deſtroy your cruel kingdom. And whilſt I ſpake this, the biſhop went away in haſte.

St. David's. Mr. Philpot, I pray you be quiet, and have patience with you.

Philpot. My lord, I thank God I have patience to bear and abide all your cruel intents againſt me: notwithſtanding I ſpeak this earneſtly, being juſtly moved thereto, to notify your unjuſt and cruel dealing with men in corners, without all due order of law.

After this, at night I was conducted again by three or four into the coal-houſe.

The ninth Examination of Mr. Philpot before Biſhop Bonner and his Chaplains.

THE next day, betimes in the morning I was called down by my keeper, and brought again into the wardrobe, where I remained till the biſhop had heard his maſs, and afterward he ſent up for me into his inward parlour, and there he called for a chair to ſet down, and brought his infamous libel of his forged articles in his hand, and ſat down willing me to draw near unto him, and ſaid:

Bonner. I am this day appointed to tarry at home from the parliament-houſe, to examine you and your fellows upon theſe articles, and you ſtand dallying with me, and will neither anſwer to nor fro. I know all your exceptions will not ſerve you. Will it not be a fair honeſty for you, think ye, that when thou comeſt before my lord mayor and the ſheriffs, and other worſhipful audience, when I ſhall ſay before them all, that I have had thee many times before me, and before ſo many learned men, and then thou couldſt ſay nothing for that thou ſtandeſt in, for all thy brags of learning, neither wouldſt anſwer directly to any thing?

Philpot. My lord, I have told you my mind plain enough: but yet I do not intend to loſe that privilege the law giveth me, which is free choice to anſwer where I am not bound, and this privilege will I cleave unto, until I be compelled otherwiſe.

Bonner. Well, I perceive you will play the obſtinate fool. Lay thine appellation when thou comeſt in judgment, and anſwer in the mean while to theſe articles.

Philpot. No, my lord, by your leave I will not anſwer to them, until my lawful appeal be tried.

Bonner. Well, thou ſhalt hear them; and with that he began to read them.

Philpot, I ſhrank back into the window, and looked on a book, and after he had read them over he ſaid unto me;

Bonner. I have read them over, although it hath not pleaſed you to hear me. I marvel, in good faith, what thou meaneſt to be ſo wilful and ſtubborn, ſeeing thou mayeſt do well enough if thou liſt. It is but a ſingularity; doſt thou not ſee all the realm againſt thee?

Philpot. My lord, I ſpeak unto you in the witneſs of God, before whom I ſtand, that I am neither wedded to mine own will, neither ſtand upon mine own ſtubbornneſs or ſingularity, but upon my conſcience inſtructed by God's word: and if your lordſhip can ſhew better evidence than I have for a good faith, I will follow the ſame.

Bonner. What thou wilt not, lo, for all that. Well, all that is paſt ſhall be forgotten; if thou wilt be conformable unto us. I know thou mighteſt find as much favour as thou wouldeſt deſire.

Then I perceiving that he fawned ſo much upon me, thought it good to give him ſome hope of my relenting, to to the intent I might give him and his hypocritical generation openly a further foil, perceiving that they dare reaſon openly with none but ſuch as are unlearned, and for lack of knowledge not able to anſwer, or elſe with ſuch as they have a hope that for fear or love of the world will recant: I ſaid, My lord, it is not unknown to you, that I have openly, in the audience of a great number, ſtood to the maintenance of theſe opinions I am in, and by learning did offer to defend them; therefore, my lord. I would it might openly appear to the world that I am won by learning, or elſe what will they ſay, but that either for fear, or love of the world; I am without any ground turned from the truth? And if I hear any kind of learning openly ſhewed, I ſhall be as conformable as you may require me.

Bonner. Yea, marry, now ye ſpeak ſomewhat like a reaſonable man. You might have had a great deal more favour in my houſe, and liberty than you have had; and you ſhall lack nothing that is within my houſe: call for it and you ſhall have it. And what is it that you would openly, by learning, ſomewhat be ſatisfied in? Tell me.

Philpot. My lord, I have openly ſaid, and do believe it alſo, that your ſacrifice of the maſs is no ſacrament.

Bonner. What, do you deny the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament?

Philpot. No, my lord, I deny not the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, but I have denied the ſacrament of the altar as it is uſed in your maſs, to be the true ſacrament of Chriſt's inſtitution; and firſt it muſt be proved a ſacrament before there can be any preſence granted.

Bonner. Why, do you deny the maſs to be a ſacrament? I pray you what is a ſacrament? is it not a ſign of a holy thing, as St. Auſtin doth define it?

Philpot. Yes verily that it is.

Bonner. Then I make this argument unto you: a ſacrament is a ſign of a holy thing: but the maſs is the ſign of a holy thing: Ergo, it is a ſacrament.

Philpot. You muſt add this to your major, or firſt propoſition, as St. Auguſtine doth mean, that a ſacrament is the ſign of a holy thing inſtituted of God, and commanded; for otherwiſe it can be no ſacrament; for all men cannot make a ſacrament.

Bonner. I grant that; and ſuch a ſign of a holy thing is the maſs of Chriſt's inſtitution.

Philpot. I deny that, my lord.

Bonner. I will prove this by St. Auguſtine by and by. I will go ſhew you the book, and you ſhall have any book I have that you will demand. Ho, who is without there? Call me Dr. Chedſey, Mr. Archdeacon, Mr. Coſins, and other chaplains hither.

Here, my lord: Mr. Doctor Chedſey is gone to Weſtminſter, and Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield was here even now.

Bonner. Mr. Coſins, I pray you examine him upon theſe articles, and write the anſwer he maketh to every one of them. I will go examine his fellows, and ſend you St. Auguſtine by and by. I find this man more conformable than he was before.

Coſins. I truſt, my lord, you ſhall find him at length a good catholic man. Marry, here be a ſight of hereſies? I dare ſay you will hold none of them, nor ſtand in any of them. How ſay you to the firſt?

Philpot. Mr. Coſins, I have told my lord already, that I will anſwer to none of theſe articles he hath objected againſt me; but if you will with learning anſwer to that which is in queſtion between my lord and me, I will gladly hear and commune with you.

Coſins. Will you not? Why, what is that then that is in queſtion between my lord and you?

Philpot. Whether your maſs be a ſacrament or no.

Coſins. What, the maſs to be a ſacrament? who ever doubted thereof?

Philpot. If it be an undoubted truth, you may the ſooner prove it; for I doubt much thereof.

Coſins. Why, I will prove it. It is the ſign of a holy thing; Ergo, it is a ſacrament.

Philpot. I deny your antecedent.

Coſins. What, will you ſo? then there is no reaſoning with you.

Thus Mr. Coſins gave over in the plain field for want of further proof. And then the morrow-maſs chaplain began to ſpeak for his occupation: and with that Mr. Harpsfield came out from my lord with St. Auguſtine's epiſtles, ſaying:

Harpsfield. My lord hath ſent you here St. Auguſtine to look upon, and I pray you look what he ſaith in a certain epiſtle which he writeth; I will read over the whole. Here you may hear the celebration of the maſs, and how it reproveth them that went a hawking and hunting before the celebration of the ſame, on the ſabbath and holidays.

Philpot. I perceive the contents of this epiſtle, and I ſee nothing herein againſt me, neither any thing that maketh for the proof of your ſacrament of the maſs.

Harpsfield. No? doth he not make mention of the maſs, and the celebration thereof? what can be ſpoken more plain?

Philpot. St. Auſtin meaneth of the celebration of the communion, and of the true uſe of the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, and not of your private maſs, which you of late years have erected in the ſtead thereof; for the word Maſs hath been an old term, attributed to the communion even from the primitive church. And I pray you tell me what Miſſa doth ſignify? I think not many that ſay maſs can well tell.

Coſins. No, can they not? that is a marvel.

Philpot. Then tell me, if you can. But Mr. Coſins and my morrow-maſs chaplain were both dumb, looking upon Mr. Harpsfield for help, and at length he ſpake.

Harpsfield. You think it cometh of the Hebrew word Maſſah, as though none were ſeen in the Hebrew but yourſelf.

Philpot. I have not gone ſo long to ſchool, to derive the ſignification of Miſſa, which is a Latin word, out of Hebrew: but I have learned to interpret Greek words by Greek, and Latin by Latin, and Hebrew by Hebrew; I take the communion to be called Miſſa, a mittendo, of ſuch things as at the celebration of the communion were ſent by ſuch as were of ability, to the relief of the poor, where the rich brought according to their devotion and ability, and required the miniſter, in the celebration of the communion, to pray unto God for them, and to accept their common alms, which they at ſuch times did ſend for the help of their poor brethren and ſiſters; and for this cauſe was it called Miſſa, as learned men do witneſs. At which celebration of the maſs, all that were preſent did communicate under both kinds, according to Chriſt's inſtitution, as they did in St. Auguſtine's time. But unleſs you can ſhew that your maſs is uſed as it then was, ye ſhall never, by the name of maſs (which St. Auguſtine attributed to the true uſe of the communion) prove your private maſs to be a ſacrament, unleſs you can prove the ſame now to be in your maſſes as was then, which is clean contrary.

Harpsfield. What, deny you the maſs to be a ſacrament? for ſhame ſpeak it not.

Philpot. I will not be aſhamed to deny it, if you cannot prove it.

Harpsfield, Why, it is a ſacrifice, which is more than a ſacrament.

Philpot. You may make of it as much as you liſt: but you ſhall never make it a ſacrifice, as you imagine thereof, but firſt it muſt be a ſacrament, for of the ſacrament you deduce your ſacrifice.

Harpsfield.

Harpsfield. Why, doth not Chriſt ſay, "This is my body?" and doth not the prieſt pronounce the ſame that Chriſt did?

Philpot. The pronunciation only is not enough, unleſs the words be therewithal applied to the uſe, as Chriſt ſpake them to. For tho' ye ſpeak the words of baptiſm over water never ſo many times, yet there is no baptiſm unleſs there be a chriſtian perſon to be baptized.

Harpsfield. Nay, that is not alike; for, Hoc eſt corpus meum, is an indicative propoſition, ſhewing a working of God in the ſubſtance of bread and wine.

Philpot. It is not only an indicative propoſition, but alſo imperative or commanding. For he that ſaid, Hoc eſt corpus meum, that is, "This is my body," ſaid alſo, Accipite, manducate, that is, Take ye, eat ye. And except the former part of the inſtitution of Chriſt's ſacrament be accompliſhed according to the communion; the latter, "This is my body," can have no verification, take it which way you will, and how you will.

Morrow-maſs chaplain. Why then you will make the ſacrament to ſtand in the receiving, and that receiving maketh it a ſacrament.

Philpot. I do not ſay, that the receiving only maketh it a ſacrament; but I ſay, that a common receiving muſt needs be concurrent with the true ſacrament, as a neceſſary member, without which it cannot be a ſacrament, becauſe Chriſt hath made this a principal part of the ſacrament, "Take ye, eat ye," which you do not in your maſs according to Chriſt's inſtitution; wherefore, it can be no ſacrament; for that it wanteth of Chriſt's inſtitution.

Coſins. We do forbid none to come to it, but as many as liſt may be partakers with us at the maſs if they require it.

Philpot. Nay, that they ſhall not, tho' they require it, you will miniſter but one kind unto them, which is not after Chriſt's inſtitution. Beſides that, you ought before you go to maſs, to exhort all that be preſent, to make a ſacrifice of thankſgiving, for Chriſt's paſſion with you, and exhort them to be partakers with you, according to Chriſt's commandment, ſaying unto all that be preſent, "Take ye, eat ye:" and likewiſe by preaching ſhew forth the Lord's death, which you do not.

Coſins. What if all things be done, even as you would have it, and whilſt the miniſter is about to adminiſter the ſacrament, before any have received it there ariſe a ſudden hurlyburly, that the communicants be compelled to go away; is it not a ſacrament for all that none hath communicated beſides the prieſt?

Philpot. In this caſe, where all things are appointed to be done according to God's word, if incident neceſſity had not hindered, I cannot ſay but it is a ſacrament, and that he who hath received, hath received the true ſacrament. After this, the morrow-maſs prieſt made this apiſh reaſon.

Morrow-maſs prieſt. If the ſacrament of the maſs be no ſacrament, unleſs all do receive it, becauſe Chriſt ſaid, "Take ye, eat ye," then the ſacrament of baptiſm is no ſacrament where there is but one baptized, becauſe Chriſt ſaid to his apoſtles, "Go preach the goſpel to all creatures, baptizing all nations, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt."

Philpot. In that ſaying of Chriſt, "Baptizing all nations," is a commandment to the apoſtles, to baptize all ſorts of men, and to exclude none that believe, be he Gentile or Jew, not meaning all at once, for that were impoſſible. And there are many examples that baptiſm may be ſingularly miniſtered to one perſon, as we have example of Chriſt baptized of John, and in the Eunuch baptized of Philip, with many more ſuch like: but ſo have you not of the ſacrament of the body and blood of Chriſt, but contrariwiſe by the expreſs words of St. Paul, you are commanded to uſe it in a communion and participation of many together; 1 Cor. 11. "As oft as ye come together to eat (meaning the Lord's ſupper), tarry one for another." And alſo the miniſter in the celebration of the ſacrament ſpeaketh unto all that be preſent in Chriſt's behalf, to communicate with him, ſaying, "Take ye, eat ye." Wherefore, as many as be preſent and do not communicate, break God's commandment in not receiving the ſame, and the miniſter is no juſt miniſter that doth not diſtribute the ſacrament as Chriſt did, to all that are preſent; and where God's word is tranſgreſſed, there is not Chriſt preſent, and conſequently it is no ſacrament.

Harpsfield. What, would you have it no ſacrament without it be a communion?

Philpot. I make it not ſo, but God's expreſs word teacheth me ſo, yea, alſo all the ancient writers; as Chryſoſtom writing upon the epiſtle to the Epheſians, ſaith, That the oblation is in vain, where none doth communicate with the prieſt. If by his judgment the action of the prieſt alone is in vain, where is no communion, how can that be a ſacrament, which he calleth a vain oblation, and a vain ſtanding at the altar?

Coſins. Such a fellow I have never heard, you will not have the maſs to be a ſacrament; you are no man for me to reaſon withal. Come, let us go, pointing to the morrow-maſs chaplain: we will leave you (Mr. Archdeacon) and him together; and ſo they went away. Afterward the archdeacon fell into earneſt perſuaſions with me, ſaying:

Harpsfield. Mr. Philpot, you and I have been acquainted theſe many years; we were ſchool-fellows both in Wincheſter and in Oxford. Wherefore I muſt wiſh you as well to do as myſelf, and I pray you ſo think of me.

Philpot. I thank you for your good will towards me. But if you be deceived (as I am ſure you are) I ſhall deſire you not to wiſh me deceived with you. For before God I tell you plainly, you are highly deceived, and maintain falſe religion, and be not thoſe men you take yourſelves for: and if you do not repent, and leave off your perſecuting of Chriſt's truth, you will go to the devil for it. Therefore conſider it in time, I give you warning, for elſe in the day of judgment I ſhall be a witneſs againſt you, that I told you this here talking together.

Harpsfield. Fy, that is but your own ſingular opinion; I perceive you are now ſtill that man you were in Oxford.

Philpot. I truſt you can report no notorious evil that ever you knew by me there.

Harpsfield. I can ſay no evil of your converſation, but I knew you to be a ſtudious man. Marry, if you remember when we met in diſputation in Parvis, you would not lightly give over, and for that cauſe I ſpeak what I have ſaid.

Philpot. Mr. Harpsfield, you know in the ſchools of Oxford, when we were young men, we did ſtrive much upon vain-glory, and upon contention, more than for the truth; but now our years and our riper learning teach us to fall to a truth, which muſt be our portion for ever. And if I was then, in my time of ignorance, earneſt in my own cauſe, I ought now to be earneſt in my maſter Chriſt's cauſe, and his truth. I know now that nothing done upon vain-glory and ſingularity can pleaſe God, have it never ſo godly a ſhew: wherefore I pray you judge not ſo of me now.

Harpsfield. What, will you think yourſelf better learned, than all the learned men in this realm?

Philpot. My faith hangeth not upon the learned of the world, but upon the learned of God's word.

Harpsfield. Well, I will talk with you no more as now, but pray to God to open your heart.

Philpot. I pray God open both our hearts, to do more his will, than we have done in times paſt.

Harpsfield. Ho, keeper, take him away with you.

Philpot. I pray you, Mr. Harpsfield, tell me what this pronoun (Hoc) doth demonſtrate and ſhew, in this indicative indicative propoſition, as you call it, Hoc eſt corpus meum, This is my body?

Harpsfield. It doth demonſtrate the ſubſtance of bread, which by the words ſpoken by the prieſt, and by the omnipotency of God, is turned into the ſubſtance of Chriſt's very body.

Philpot. Is the ſubſtance of bread, as you ſay, turned into Chriſt's body?

Harpsfield. Yea, that it is.

Philpot. Why, then Chriſt's body receiveth daily a great increaſe of many thouſand pieces of bread into his body, and that is his body become now, which was not before, and by this you would ſeem to make, that there is an alteration in Chriſt's glorified body, which is a wicked thing to think.

Harpsfield. Then he fetched about again, and remembering himſelf better, and ſeeing the inconvenience of his firſt aſſertion, of the tranſubſtantiation of bread into Chriſt's body, he ſaid, That the ſubſtance of bread, after the words ſpoken by the prieſt, was evacuated or vaniſhed away by the omnipotency of God.

Philpot. This is another ſong than you ſang firſt: and here you may ſee how contrary you are to yourſelves. For indeed your ſchoolmen do hold, That the very Subſtance of bread is really turned into the very ſubſtance of Chriſt's body. And now you perceiving of late the inconvenience which is objected againſt you in that opinion, you are driven to imagine a new ſhift, and ſay, The ſubſtance of bread is evacuated, contrary to that which your church hath at firſt believed and taught. O what contrariety is there among you, and all to deface the ſincere truth?

Harpsfield. Is not God omnipotent? and cannot he do as he hath ſaid?

Philpot. But his omnipotence will not do as you ſay, contrary to his word and to his honour. It is not God's honour to include him bodily into a piece of bread, and of neceſſity to tie him thereto. It is not God's honour for you to make a piece of bread God and man, which you ſee before your face doth putrify after a certain time. Is not God's omnipotence as able to give his body with the ſacramental bread, as to make ſo many turnings away of the bread, as you do, and that directly againſt the ſcripture, which calleth it bread many times after conſecration? Are you not aſhamed to make ſo many alterations of the Lord's holy inſtitution as you do, and to take away the ſubſtantial parts of the ſacrament, as, "Take ye, eat ye, drink ye all of this: do ye this in remembrance of me:" and to place in their ſtead, Hear ye, gaze ye, knock ye, worſhip ye, offer ye, ſacrifice ye for the quick and the dead? If this be not blaſphemy to God and his ſacraments, to add and to pluck away in this ſort, and that contrary to the mind of all ancient writers, and contrary to the example of Chriſt and his apoſtles, tell me.

Harpsfield. I know you have gathered the ſayings of the doctors together which make for your purpoſe; I will talk no longer with you.

Philpot. I pray God open both our hearts, to do more his will than we have done in times paſt.

Harpsfield. Ho, keeper, take him away with you.

The tenth Examination of Mr. Philpot, before Biſhop Bonner, his Regiſter, and Others.

THE next day after dinner, I was brought into my lord's upper hall, and there he called me before him and his regiſter, and before Dr. Chedſey, in the preſence of two homely gentlemen, and a prieſt which I knew not: at which time the biſhop ſaid;

Bonner. I do lay unto this man in your preſence (requiring you to be a witneſs againſt him, as much as you know in any of them), theſe articles, this book of the catechiſm made in king Edward's days; alſo theſe concluſions agreed upon both in Oxford and Cambridge; alſo I lay unto him, that he hath deſpiſed the cenſures of the church, and hath ſtood accurſed above this twelvemonth, and never required abſolution thereof. How ſay you, wert thou not accurſed by my lord chancellor?

Philpot. I was excommunicated by him wrongfully, and without any juſt cauſe, and without order of law, being never perſonally cited.

Bonner. Didſt thou not tell me the other day when I required thee to come to the maſs, that thou waſt excommunicated, and therefore by the law couldſt not hear maſs? How long haſt thou been thus excommunicated?

Philpot. More than a year and a half.

Bonner. Lo, you may hear what he ſaith: write it.

Philpot. But as you would have written that I have ſaid, I have been thus long excommunicated; ſo alſo let him write, that I did require of my lord chancellor that did excommunicate me, my abſolution, but he would not give it me, ſaying, That I was Excommunicatus ipſo jure, becauſe I was an heretic, as it pleaſed him to call me, therefore accurſed by your law, and ſo commanded me to priſon, where I remain.

Gentleman. Why do you not require abſolution at my lord's hands here now?

Philpot. Becauſe he is not mine ordinary, neither hath by the law any thing to do with me of right.

Bonner. What an obſtinate fool is this? I tell thee I will be thine ordinary whether thou wilt or no.

Philpot. And becauſe of this your unrighteous force towards me, I have appealed from you, and require you, Mr. Regiſter, that my appeal may be entered in writing.

Bonner. Have you heard ſuch a froward fellow as this? He ſeemed yeſterday to be very tractable, and I had a good hope of him. I tell thee that thou art of my dioceſe.

Philpot. I am of Wincheſter dioceſe, and not of London dioceſe.

Bonner. I pray you may not a man be of two dioceſes at once?

Philpot. No, that he cannot.

Bonner. Lo, will you ſee what an ignorant fool this is in the law, in which he would ſeem to be ſeen? I tell thee a man may be of three dioceſes at once: as if thou wert born in London, by reaſon thereof thou ſhouldſt be of my dioceſe; or elſe if thou wert not born, but hadſt a dignity here, alſo thou art to be counted of my dioceſe; or elſe by reaſon of thy habitation in my dioceſe.

Philpot. In none of theſe reſpects am I of your lordſhip's dioceſe. But for all that, this will not follow, that I dwelling at Wincheſter, am at that preſent of London dioceſe.

Bonner. What wilt thou lay thereof? Wilt thou recant if I prove it?

Philpot. But what ſhall I win if you do not?

Bonner. I will give thee my biſhopric, if I prove it not.

Philpot. Yea, but who ſhall deliver it me, if I win?

Bonner. Thou art an arrogant fool, enter their oaths, and take theſe witneſſes depoſitions. I muſt be gone to the parliament-houſe.

After this a prieſt, who was ſtanding by, aſked me, whether I was kin to my lord Rich, or no?

I ſaid, My lord Rich ſaid ſo himſelf to me the other day, but how I know not.

Chedſey. I heard him ſay he was his nigh kinſman.

Baalamite. Why then you and I muſt be of kin, for he is my nigh kinſman. How chance it that you and I be of contrary judgments?

Philpot. It is no marvel, for Chriſt propheſied "That the father ſhall be divided againſt the ſon, and the ſon againſt the father, for my truth ſake."

Baalamite. You do hold, as I underſtand, againſt the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, and againſt the holy maſs.

Philpot.

Philpot. If you can prove it a ſacrament, I will not hold againſt you.

Baalamite. What, prove it a ſacrament, ſaid he? Doth not St. Paul ſay, "That ſuch things as the eye hath not ſeen, neither ear heard, hath God prepared for them that love him?"

Philpot. That ſaying of St. Paul concerneth nothing your ſacrament, but is meant of the heavenly joys that are prepared for all faithful believers.

Baalamite. Why then I perceive you underſtand not St. Paul. By God, you are deceived.

Philpot. You ought not to ſwear, kinſman, if you will that I ſhall ſo call you: and without diſ-worſhip of our kindred, I underſtand St. Paul as well as you, and know what I ſay: and with that ſhewed him a Greek teſtament with Eraſmus's tranſlation, and with the old alſo, demanding him which text he was beſt acquainted withal.

Baalamite. I knew Greek too once, as well as you, I care not which you read.

Philpot. You know them then all alike; you underſtand the one as well as the other. With this my Baalamite kinſman departed in a fury.

The next day after, I was brought down again after dinner to the chapel, and there my Baalamite kinſman (to verify the ſcriptures, that a man's own kinsfolks ſhall be his enemies), came in with the biſhop as a witneſs againſt me: and there the biſhop cauſed another that came to him about other matters, to ſwear alſo to be a witneſs againſt me, who was a prieſt alſo, ſaying:

Bonner. You ſhall ſwear to diſpoſe all the truth of certain articles you ſhall be enquired of concerning this man: and here I (according to the law) do bring them forth in thy preſence.

Philpot. My lord, I do agree to the production of them, but do appeal from all theſe and other your proceedings againſt me; and require you, Mr. Regiſter, that my appeal may be entered, and I will give you for your labour.

Regiſter. Your appeal ſhall be entered at leiſure. Whom do you appeal unto? tell me.

Philpot. I appeal to a higher judge, as to the lieutenant of the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, for I know not who is biſhop thereof at this preſent. With that the biſhop went away, and my Baalamite kinſman looking big upon me, but ſaid never a word.

Thus have I in haſte ſcribbled out all mine examinations hitherto, that the ſame which hath been done unto me in dark might come to light; and that the papiſts unjuſt proceedings, and nakedneſs in their falſe religion, might be known to their confuſion. Jeſus is Emmanuel, that is, God with us, Amen, 1555.

The eleventh Examination of Mr. Philpot, on St. Andrew's Day, before the Biſhops of Durham, Chicheſter, Bath, and London, Mr. Chriſtopherſon, Dr. Chedſey, Mr. Morgan of Oxford, Mr. Huſſey, Dr. Weſton, Dr. Harpsfield Archdeacon, Mr. Coſins, and Mr. Johnſon, Regiſter to the Biſhop of London, in his Palace.

BEING ſent for with my keeper, the biſhop of London met me in his hall-door, and full mannerly he played the gentleman uſher to bring me before the lords, ſaying:

My lords, I ſhall deſire you to take ſome pains with this man, he is a gentleman, and I would he ſhould do well, but he will wilfully caſt away himſelf.

Durham. Come hither, Sir, what is your name?

Philpot. My name is Philpot.

Durham. I have heard of that name to be a worſhipful ſtock, and ſince you are a gentleman, do as you may live worſhipfully among other gentlemen. What is the cauſe of your trouble now?

I told him the cauſe, as in my former examinations is expreſſed.

Durham. Well, all cauſes ſet apart, will you now be a conformable man to the catholic faith, and leave all new-fangled opinions and hereſies: I was in Germany with Luther, at the beginning of theſe opinions, and can tell how they began. Leave them, and follow the catholic church throughout the whole world, as the whole realm now doth.

Philpot. My lord, I am in the catholic faith, and deſire to live and die in the ſame: but it is not unknown to your lordſhip that I with others theſe twenty years have been taught another manner of faith than you now go about to compel us unto; wherefore it is requiſite that we have a time to weigh the ſame, and to hear how it agreeth with God's word. For faith is at a ſudden neither won, neither removed, but as St. Paul ſaith, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word."

Chicheſter. And if you will give me leave, my lord, I will ſhew him how he taketh the ſaying of St. Paul amiſs, as many others now-a-days alledging the ſame do, that they ought not to be compelled to believe, whereas St. Paul meaneth of infidels, and not be of the faithful; and ſo St. Auſtin, writing againſt the Donatiſts ſaith, That the faithful may be compelled to believe.

Philpot. St. Bernard (if it pleaſe your lordſhip), doth take that ſenſe of St. Paul as I do, ſaying, that faith muſt be perſuaded to a man, and not injoined. And St. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of ſuch as were firſt thoroughly perſuaded by manifeſt ſcriptures, and yet would reſiſt of ſtubborn wilfulneſs.

Chicheſter. So Bernard meaneth of infidels alſo.

Philpot. No, my lord, that he doth not, for he writeth not of the infidels, but he writeth of ſuch as were deceived by errors.

Chicheſter. My lord of Durham, I have been ſo bold to interrupt your lordſhip of your tale, I pray you now proceed on.

Durham. Mr. Philpot, will you be of the ſame catholic faith and church with us you were baptized in, and your godfathers promiſed for you, and hold as we do, and then may you be rid out of trouble? I perceive you are learned, and it is pity but you ſhould do well.

Philpot. I am of the ſame catholic faith and catholic church I was baptized unto, and in that will I live and die.

Durham. That is well ſaid; if you hold there you cannot do but well.

Chicheſter. Yea, my lord, but he meaneth otherwiſe than you do. Are you of the ſame faith your godfathers and godmothers were, or no?

Philpot. I cannot tell what faith they were of certainly, but I am of the faith I was baptized unto, which is the faith of Chriſt: for I was not baptized into the faith of my godfathers, but in the faith of Chriſt.

Chicheſter. St. Auſtin ſaith, That infants are baptized in the faith of their godfathers.

Philpot. St. Auguſtine in ſo ſaying, meaneth of the faith of Chriſt, which the godfathers do, or ought to believe, and not otherwiſe.

Durham. How ſay you, will you believe as we do, and all the learned of the realm, or no? and be of one church with us?

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you, that there hath been always two churches.

Chicheſter. Nay, that is not ſo: there is but one catholic church.

Philpot. I ſhall deſire your lordſhips to hear out my tale, and to take my meaning. For I know there is but one true church; but always from the beginning there hath been joined to the ſame true church a falſe church, adverſary to the true: and that was declared at the firſt in in Abel and Cain, who perſecuted and ſlew his brother, in whom (as St. Auguſtine witneſſeth) is repreſented the falſe and true church. And after that, as ſoon as God had choſen his peculiar people, and ſhewed unto them his ſanctuary, holy ſtatutes, and will, anon after roſe the falſe church, and ten of the twelve tribes of Iſrael divided themſelves from the true church of Judah and Benjamin, and made to themſelves at Bethel, and ſet up golden calves, and yet pretended therewith to ſerve God, and abuſed his word. Notwithſtanding, God was diſpleaſed with them, and ceaſed not his wrath, until he had utterly deſtroyed them.

Chicheſter. I will grant you, before the coming of Chriſt there were two churches in the old law; but in the new law ſince Chriſt's coming, you cannot ſhew it to be ſo by the ſcripture.

Philpot. Yes, my lord, that I can, if you give me leave. After Chriſt had choſen his twelve apoſtles, was there not a Judas in the new law, and a Simon Magus? and were not they of the falſe church?

Chicheſter. Yea, but I mean after the goſpel was written, where can you find me two churches after Chriſt had aſcended, and ſent the Holy Ghoſt?

Philpot. The goſpel was within eight years after the aſcenſion written by St. Matthew, and the writing thereof is not material to the declaration of theſe two churches to have been always from time to time, as by example it may be ſhewed: and yet as bad as my memory is, I remember, in the New Teſtament, is mention made of two churches, as it appeareth in the Revelations, and alſo as St. Paul to the Theſſalonians maketh mention, that Antichriſt, with his falſe generation, ſhall ſit in the temple of God. To which Chicheſter replied not.

Durham. The church, in the ſcripture, is likened to a great fiſher's net, which containeth in it both good fiſh and bad fiſh. I truſt you will be of the better ſort, and lean to the truth.

Philpot. My lord, it is my whole deſire now to follow that which is good, whatſoever I have done in times paſt, and to cleave to God's truth.

Durham. Do you ſo, and then ſhall you do well: it is almoſt night, my lord of London, I muſt needs be gone.

Bonner. Nay, my lord of Durham, I muſt deſire your lordſhip, and my lord of Chicheſter, to tarry a little while. And before he had ſo ſaid, the biſhop of Bath went his way without ſaying any word. What, my lord of Bath, will you be gone? I pray you tarry. My lords, I have earneſt matters to charge this man withal, whereof I would your lordſhips to be made privy, and I have them here written in a libel. I pray you ſit down again, or elſe I will. Firſt, I lay to him here, that he hath written in a bible, which I took from him, this erroneous ſaying, Quod Spiritus eſt Vicarius Chriſti in terra; that is, "The Holy Ghoſt is Chriſt's vicar in earth." Wilt thou abide by this ſaying of thine, that the Spirit is Chriſt's vicar on earth?

Philpot. My lord, it is not my ſaying, it is a more learned man's than mine: for I uſe not to write mine own ſayings, but the notable ſayings of other ancient writers, as all others be where ye find the ſame written. And as I remember, it is even the ſaying of St. Bernard, and a ſaying that I need not be aſhamed of, neither you to be offended at, as my lord of Durham, and my lord of Chicheſter, by their learning, can diſcern, and will not reckon it ill ſaid.

Bonner. Will they not? Why, take away the firſt ſyllable, and it ſoundeth Arius.

Philpot. That is far-fetched indeed; if your lordſhip will ſcan men's ſayings in ſuch wiſe, you may find out what you liſt.

Bonner. But to help this, I find moreover with his own hand in another book; In me Johanne Philpotto ubi abundavit peccatum, ſuperabundavit & gratia; that is, "In me, John Philpot, where ſin did abound, grace hath ſuperabounded." I pray you what ſuperabundant grace have you more than other men? So ſaid Arius, That he had the abundance of grace above all others.

Philpot. My lord, you need not be offended with that ſaying more than the other, for it is the ſaying of St. Paul himſelf, and I did apply it to myſelf for my comfort, knowing that though my ſins be huge and great in the ſight of God, yet is his mercy and grace above them all. And concerning Arius and his adherents, I defy them, and it is well known that I have written againſt them.

Bonner. Alſo I lay to thy charge that thou killedſt thy father, and waſt accurſed of thy mother in her death-bed, as I can bring witneſs thereof.

Philpot. O Lord, what blaſphemy is this! Hath your lordſhip nothing of truth to charge me withal, (but as I may ſpeak it with your honour) ſuch blaſphemous lyes? If any of theſe can be proved, I will promiſe here to recant at Paul's Croſs, what you will have me: I am ſo ſure they are as great blaſphemies as may be objected againſt any man. Ha, my lords, I pray you, conſider how my lord of London hath hitherto proceeded againſt me: For indeed he hath none other but ſuch pretenſed ſlanderous lyes.

Chicheſter. They be Parerga; that is, matter beſide the purpoſe.

Durham. My lord, I muſt needs bid you farewel.

Bonner. Nay, my lord, here is a letter which I ſhall deſire you to hear ere you go. This man (being in my keeping) hath taken upon him to write letters out of priſon, and to pervert a young gentleman, called Mr. Green, in my houſe, (call him hither) and hath made a falſe report of his examination, as you ſhall hear, not being content to be evil himſelf, but to make others as bad as himſelf. He tare the letter when he ſaw my man went about to ſearch him, but yet I have pieced it again together, and cauſed a copy to be written thereof: and he read the torn letter, bidding Mr. Chriſtopherſon and Morgan to mark the copy thereof.

The contents of the letter was the examination of Mr. Green before the biſhop of London, in the preſence of Mr. Fecknam dean of Paul's, and of divers others, whoſe ready anſwers in the ſcriptures and in the doctors were wondered at by the dean himſelf, and of many others, as Fecknam did report: and that he was committed to Dr. Chedſey, and to have his meat from the biſhop's own table. How ſay you, my lords, was this well done of him, being my priſoner, to write this? and yet he hath written a ſhameful lye, that he was in Dr. Chedſey's keeping. How ſay you, Mr. Dr. Chedſey, is it not a ſhameful lye?

Chedſey. Yes, my lord, he never was in my keeping.

Bonner. Art thou not aſhamed to write ſuch ſhameful letters? Come hither, Mr. Green, Did not I ſhew you this letter?

Green. Yea forſooth, my lord, you ſhewed it me.

Bonner. How think you, my lords, is not this an honeſt man to belye me?

Philpot. Your lordſhip doth miſtake all things. This letter (as your lordſhip may perceive, and all others that have heard the ſame) was not written by me, but by a friend of mine, certifying me, at my requeſt, how Mr. Green ſped at the biſhop of London's hands: and there is nothing in the letter that either I, or he that wrote it, need to fear, but that might be written as my report.

Bonner. Then tell me who wrote it, if you dare.

Philpot. No, my lord, it is not my duty to accuſe my friend: and eſpecially ſeeing you will take all things at the worſt: neither ſhall you ever know of me who wrote it. Your lordſhip may ſee, in the end of the letter, that my friend did write unto me upon occaſion of my appeal which I have made to the whole parliament-houſe about ſuch matter as I am wrongfully troubled for.

Bonner. I would ſee any ſo hardy to put up thine appeal.

Philpot,

Philpot. My lord, I cannot tell what God will work, I have written it, ſpeed it as it may.

Bonner. My lords, I have uſed him with much gentleneſs ſince he came to me. How ſayeſt thou, have I not?

Philpot. If to lie in the vileſt priſon in this town (being a gentleman and an archdeacon, and in a coal-houſe, for the ſpace of five or ſix weeks already, without fire or candle, may be counted gentleneſs at your hands, I muſt needs ſay I have found gentleneſs. But there were never men ſo cruelly handled as we are at theſe days.

Bonner. Lo, what a varlet is this. Beſides this, my lords, even yeſterday he procured his man to bring a bladder of black powder, I cannot tell for what purpoſe.

Philpot. Your lordſhip needeth not to miſtruſt the matter: it is nothing but to make ink withal for lack of ink, as I had it before in the King's-Bench when my keeper took away my inkhorn.

Bonner. And why ſhouldſt thou go about any ſuch thing unknown to me, being thy keeper? for I am thy keeper in this houſe, I tell thee.

Philpot. My lord, becauſe you have cauſed my pen-caſe and inkhorn to be taken from me, I would yet be glad my friends ſhould know what I lack, not that I intend to write any thing that I would be afraid ſhould come to your ſight.

Bonner. More than this, my lords, he cauſed a pig to be roaſted, and made a knife be put between the ſkin and the fleſh, for what purpoſe, judge you. How ſayſt thou, didſt thou not ſo?

Philpot. I cannot deny but there was half pig ſent me, and under the ſame a knife lying in the ſauce, but for no ill purpoſe that I know; your lordſhip may judge what you will. It was not to kill myſelf, nor any other, as you would have men to believe; for I was never yet without a knife ſince I came to priſon. Therefore all theſe are but falſe ſurmiſes, and not worth rehearſal.

Bonner. I have here to lay to his charge (chiefeſt of all) his book of the report of the diſputation in the convocation-houſe, which is the rankeſt hereſy that may be againſt the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar. How ſay you Mr. Dr. Weſton, did he maintain the ſame there ſtubbornly, or no?

Weſton. Yea, my lord, that he did, and would never be anſwered. And it is pity that the ſame worſhipful congregation ſhould be ſlandered with ſuch untrue reports.

Philpot. You anſwered me indeed, Mr. Doctor (being then prolocutor) goodly, with, Hold thy peace, and, Have him to priſon, and, Put him out of the houſe. I have read the book, and I find the report of every man's argument to be true in all points. And if there be any fault, it is, becauſe he ſetteth forth your doings too favourably, and nothing like to that you did uſe me, being an archdeacon, and not of the worſt in the houſe.

Weſton. Thou art no archdeacon.

Philpot. Indeed, Mr. Doctor, ye have amongſt you un-archdeaconed me as now, (I thank God for it) and that without all order of law.

Bonner. I pray you, my lords, hearken to what he writeth of himſelf, I read it over this morning, and made a note of it. He ſaid that Dr. Weſton called him frantic and mad-man, and ſaid, he ſhould go to Bedlam.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, ſo it pleaſed Dr. Weſton to taunt at me, and ſay his ſhameful pleaſure, but yet I was not one whit the more ſo for all his ſayings, than Chriſt was when the ſcribes and phariſees ſaid likewiſe he was mad, and that he was poſſeſſed of a devil moſt blaſphemouſly.

Durham. My lord of London, I can tarry no longer, I muſt needs bid you farewel. Mr. Philpot, methinketh you have ſaid well that you will abide in the catholic faith, and in the catholic church: I pray you ſo do, and you ſhall do right well. And ſo departed with Dr. Weſton and Mr. Huſſey.

Philpot. I have purpoſed ſo to do, howſoever I ſpeed, by God's grace.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord of Chicheſter, and Mr. Prolocutor, and Mr. Dr. Morgan, to commune with him while I bring my lord of Durham going.

Chriſtopherſon. Mr. Philpot, I was acquainted with you at Rome, if you remember it, but you have forgotten me, and talked ſomewhat with you of theſe matters, and I find you now the ſame man that you were then, I wiſh it were otherwiſe. For God's ſake be conformable to men that be better learned than you, and ſtand not in your own conceit.

Philpot. Whereas you call me in remembrance of acquaintance had at Rome, indeed it was ſo, though it were but very ſtrange on your part to me-ward, being driven to neceſſity.

Chriſtopherſon. You know the world was dangerous at that time.

Philpot. Nothing ſo dangerous as it is now: but let that paſs. Whereas you ſay, you find me to be the ſame man I was then, I praiſe God that you ſee me not like a reed wavering with every wind. And whereas you would have me follow better learned men than myſelf: indeed I acknowledge that you, with a great many others, are far better learned than I, whoſe books, in reſpect of learning, I am not worthy to carry after you: but faith and the wiſdom of God conſiſteth not in learning only, and therefore St. Paul willeth that our faith be not grounded upon the wiſdom of man. If you can ſhew by learning out of God's book, that I ought to be of another faith than I am, I will hear you, and any other man whatſoever he be.

Chriſtopherſon. I marvel why you ſhould diſſent from the catholic church, ſince it hath thus long univerſally been received, except within theſe five or ſix years here in England.

Philpot. I do not diſſent from the true catholic church, I do only diſſent from the biſhop of Rome, which if you can prove to be the catholic church of Chriſt, I will be of the ſame alſo with you.

Chriſtopherſon. Will you believe St. Cyprian, if I can ſhew out of him, That the church of Rome is ſuch a one unto which miſbelief cannot approach?

Philpot. I am ſure you cannot ſhew any ſuch ſaying out of St. Cyprian.

Chriſtopherſon. What will you lay thereon?

Philpot. I will lay as much as I am able to make.

Morgan. Will you promiſe to recant, if I ſhew his ſaying to be true?

Philpot. My faith ſhall not hang upon any doctor's ſaying, further than he ſhall be able to prove the ſame by God's word,

Chriſtopherſon. I will go fetch the book, and ſhew it him by and by; and therewithal he went in the biſhop's ſtudy, and brought Cyprian, and pointed out theſe words in one of his epiſtles, Ad Romanos autem, quorum fides Apoſtolo predicante laudata eſt, non proteſt accedere perfidia: that is, "But unto the Romans, whoſe faith by the teſtimony of the apoſtle is praiſed, miſbelief can have no acceſs."

Philpot. Theſe words of St. Cyprian do nothing prove your pretenced aſſertion, which is, That to the church of Rome there could come no miſbelief.

Chriſtopherſon. Good Lord, doth it not? What can be ſaid more plainly?

Philpot. He ſpeaketh not of the church of Rome abſolutely.

Chriſtopherſon. By God, a child that can but ſay his grammar will not deny that you do, the words be ſo plain.

Philpot. Swear not, Mr. Doctor, but weigh Cyprian's words with me, and I ſhall make you to ſay as I have ſaid.

Chriſtopherſon. I am no doctor, but I perceive it is but labour loſt to reaſon with you.

And with that the biſhop of London came in blowing again and ſaid, What, is my lord of Chicheſter gone away alſo? (for he even a little before departed alſo without any other word, than that he muſt needs be gone.) What (ſays Bonner) is the matter you now ſtand upon?

Morgan. Mr. Chriſtopherſon hath ſhewed Mr. Philpot a notable place of the authority of the church of Rome, and he maketh nothing of it.

Bonner. Where is the place? let me ſee. By my faith here is a place alone. Come hither, Sir, what ſay you to this? Nay, tarry a while, I will help this place with St. Paul's own teſtimony, in the firſt chapter to the Romans, where he ſaith, That their faith is preached throughout the world: How can you be able to anſwer to this?

Philpot. Yes, my lord, it is ſoon anſwered, if you will conſider all the words of Cyprian; for he ſpeaketh of ſuch as in his time were faithful at Rome, and followed the doctrine of St. Paul, as he had taught them, and as it was notified throughout the world, by an epiſtle which he had written in the commendation of their faith. With ſuch as are praiſed by St. Paul at Rome, for following the true faith, miſbelief can have no place. And if you can ſhew, that the faith which the church of Rome holdeth now, is that faith which the apoſtle praiſed and allowed in the Romans in his time, then will I ſay what St. Cyprian then ſaid, and with you, That infidelity can have no place there; but otherwiſe it maketh not abſolutely for the authority of the church of Rome, as you do miſtake it.

Chriſtopherſon. You underſtand Cyprian well indeed; I think you never read him in your life.

Philpot. Yes, Mr. Doctor, that I have, I can ſhew you a book noted with mine own hand: though I have not read ſo much as you, yet I have read ſomewhat. It is a ſhame for you to wreſt and wreath the doctors as you do, to maintain a falſe religion, which be altogether againſt you, if you take them aright: and indeed your falſe packing of doctors together hath given me and others occaſion to look upon them, whereby we find you ſhameful lyars, and miſreporters of the ancient doctors.

Morgan. What, will you be in hand to allow doctors now? they of your ſect do not ſo. I marvel therefore that you will allow them.

Philpot. I do allow them in as much as they do agree with the ſcriptures, and ſo do all they which be of the truth, howſoever you term us, and I praiſe God for that good underſtanding I have received by them.

Chriſtopherſon. What, you underſtand not the doctors, you may be aſhamed to ſay it.

Philpot. I thank God, I underſtand them better than you: for you have Excæcationem cordis, The blindneſs of heart; ſo that you underſtand not truly what you read, no more than the wall here, as your taking of Cyprian doth declare. And before God you are but deceivers of the people, for all the brag you make of learning; neither have ye ſcripture or ancient doctors on your ſide, being truly taken.

Morgan. Why, all the doctors be on our ſide, and againſt you altogether.

Philpot. Yea, ſo you ſay when you be in your pulpits alone, and none to anſwer you. But if you will come to caſt accounts with me hereof, I will venture with you a recantation, that I (as little ſight as I have in the doctors) will bring more authorities of ancient doctors on my ſide than you ſhall be able for yours, and he that can bring moſt, to him let the other ſide yield. Are ye willing ſo to do?

Chriſtopherſon. It is but folly to reaſon with you, you will believe no man but yourſelf.

Philpot. I will believe you or any other learned man, if you can bring any thing worthy to be believed. You cannot win me with vain words from my faith. Before God there is no truth in you.

Morgan. What, no truth? no truth? ha, ha, ha,

Philpot. Except the articles of the Trinity, you are corrupt in all other things, and found in nothing.

Morgan. What ſay you, do we not believe well on the ſacrament?

Philpot. It is the thing which (among all others) you do moſt abuſe.

Morgan. Wherein I pray you? tell us.

Philpot. I have told you before, Mr. Doctor, in the convocation-houſe.

Morgan. Yes, Marry: indeed you told us there very well. For there you fell down upon your knees, and fell to weeping, ha, ha, ha.

Philpot. I did weep indeed, and ſo did Chriſt upon Jeruſalem, and am not to be blamed for it, if you conſider the cauſe of my weeping.

Morgan. What, make you yourſelf Chriſt? ha, ha, ha.

Philpot. No, Sir, I make not myſelf Chriſt; but I am not aſhamed to do as my Maſter and Saviour did, to bebewail and lament your infidelity and idolatry, which I there foreſaw through tyranny you would bring again to this realm, as this day doth declare.

Morgan. That is your argument.

Chriſtopherſon. Wherein do we abuſe the ſacrament? tell us.

Philpot. As I may touch but one of the leaſt abuſes, you adminiſter it not in both kinds as you ought to do, but keep the one half from the people, contrary to Chriſt's inſtitution.

Chriſtopherſon. Why, is not there as much contained in one kind, as in both? And what need is it then to miniſter in both kinds?

Philpot. I believe not ſo: for if it had, Chriſt would have given but one kind only: for he inſtituted nothing ſuperfluous: and therefore you cannot ſay that the whole effect of the ſacrament is as well in one kind as in both, ſince the ſcripture teacheth otherwiſe.

Chriſtopherſon. What if I can prove it by ſcripture, that we may adminiſter it in one kind? The apoſtles did ſo, as it may appear in the Acts of the Apoſtles in one or two places, where it is written, that the apoſtles continued "in prayers and in breaking of bread," which is meant of the ſacrament.

Philpot. Why, Mr. Doctor, do you not know that St. Luke, by making mention of breaking of bread, meaneth the whole uſe of the ſacrament according to Chriſt's inſtitution, by a figure which you have learned in grammar, Synecdoche, where part is mentioned, and the whole underſtood to be done, as Chriſt commanded it?

Chriſtopherſon. Nay, that is not ſo: For I can ſhew you out of Euſebius, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that there was a man of God, whom he named, that ſent the ſacrament in one kind by a boy, to one that was ſick.

Philpot. I have read indeed that they did uſe to give what was left of the communion bread to children, to mariners, and to women, and ſo peradventure the boy might carry a piece of what was left to the ſick man.

Chriſtopherſon. Nay, as a ſacrament it was purpoſely ſent unto him.

Philpot. If it were ſo, yet can you not preciſely ſay, that he had not the cup adminiſtred unto him alſo by ſome other ſent unto him: but though one man did uſe it thus, doth it follow that all men may do the like? St. Cyprian noteth many abuſes of the ſacrament in his time, which roſe upon ſingular mens examples, as uſing of water inſtead of wine; therefore he ſaith, "We muſt not look what any man hath done before us, but what Chriſt firſt of all did and commanded."

Chriſtopherſon. Hath not the church taught us ſo to uſe the ſacrament? And how do we know that Chriſt is Homousios, that is, of one ſubſtance with the Father, but by the determination of the church? How can you prove that otherwiſe by expreſs words of ſcripture, and where find you Homousios in all the ſcripture?

Philpot. Yes that I do in the firſt of the Hebrews, where it is written that Chriſt is the expreſs image of God's own ſubſtance, Ejuſdem ſubſtantiæ.

Chriſtopherſon.

Chriſtopherſon. Nay, that is not ſo. That is, there is no more but Expreſſa imago ſubſtantiæ, The expreſs image of God's ſubſtance, and image is accident.

Philpot. It is in the text, Of his ſubſtance, Subſtantiæ illius, or of his own ſubſtance, as it may be right well interpreted. Beſides this, that which Chriſt ſpake of himſelf in St. John manifeſteth the ſame, ſaying, "I and the Father be one thing, Ego & pater unum ſumus. And whereas you ſay, Imago here is accidence, the ancient fathers uſe this for a ſtrong argument to prove Chriſt to be God, becauſe he is the very image of God.

Chriſtopherſon. Do they? Is this a good argument, becauſe we are the image of God, Ergo, We are God?

Philpot. We are not called the expreſs image of God, as it is written of Chriſt, and we are but the image of God by participation; and as it is written in Geneſis, We are made to the likeneſs and ſimilitude of God. But you ought to know, Mr. Chriſtopherſon, that there is no accident in God, and therefore Chriſt cannot be the image of God, but he muſt be of the ſame ſubſtance with God.

Chriſtopherſon. Tuſh.

Morgan. How ſay you to the preſence of the ſacrament? Will you ſtand here to the judgment of your book, or no? Or will you recant?

Philpot. I know you go about to catch me in words. If you can prove that book to be of my ſetting forth, lay it to my charge when I come to judgment.

Morgan. Speak, be you of the ſame mind as this book is of, or no? Sure I am you were once, unleſs you are become another manner of man than you were.

Philpot. What I was, you know; what I am, I will not tell you now: but this I will ſay to you by the way, that if you can prove the ſacrament of the maſs (as you now uſe it) to be a ſacrament, I will then grant you a preſence; but firſt you muſt prove the ſame a ſacrament, and afterward treat of the preſence.

Morgan. Ho, do you doubt that it is a ſacrament?

Philpot. I am paſt doubting, for I believe you can never be able to prove it a ſacrament.

Chriſtopherſon. Yea, do you? Good Lord, doth not St. Auguſtine call it the ſacrament of the altar? How ſay you to that?

Philpot. That maketh nothing for the probation of your ſacrament. For ſo he with other ancient writers do call the holy communion or ſupper of the Lord, in reſpect that it is the ſacrament of the ſacrifice which Chriſt offered upon the altar of the croſs, which ſacrifice all the altars and ſacrifices done upon the altars, in the old law, did prefigure and ſhadow, which pertaineth nothing to your ſacrament hanging upon your altars of lime and ſtone.

Chriſtopherſon. Doth it not? I pray you what ſignifieth Altar?

Philpot. Not as you falſly take it materially, but for the ſacrifice of the altar of the croſs.

Chriſtopherſon. Where find you it ever ſo taken?

Philpot. Yes that I do in St. Paul to the Hebrews, the thirteenth chapter, where he ſaith, "We have an altar, of which it is not lawful for them to eat that ſerve the tabernacle." Is not altar in this place taken for the ſacrifice of the altar, and not for the altar of lime and ſtone?

Chriſtopherſon. Well, God bleſs me out of your company. You are ſuch an obſtinate heretic, as I have not heard the like.

Philpot. I pray God keep me from ſuch blind doctors, which when they are not able to prove what they ſay, then they fall to reviling (as ye do now) for lack of better proof. In the mean while the biſhop of London was talking with ſome other hard by, and at length came in to ſupply his part, and ſaid:

Bonner. I pray you maſters, hearken what I ſhall ſay to this man. Come hither Mr. Green: And now, Sir, (pointing to me) you cannot think it ſufficient to be naught yourſelf, but muſt go about to procure this young gentleman by your letters to do the like.

Philpot. My lord, he cannot ſay that I ever hitherto wrote unto him concerning any ſuch matter, as he here can teſtify.

Green. No, you never wrote unto me.

Bonner. Why, is not this your letter which you did write concerning him?

Philpot. I have ſhewed your lordſhip my mind concerning that letter already: it was not written to Mr. Green, neither was he privy to the writing thereof.

Bonner. How ſay you then, if a man be in an error, and you know thereof, what are you bound to do in ſuch a caſe?

Philpot. I am bound to do the beſt I can to bring him out of it.

Bonner. If Mr. Green here be in the like, are you not bound to reform him thereof if you can.

Philpot. Yes that I am, and will do the uttermoſt of my power therein.

But the biſhop remembering himſelf, thinking that he would but ſhrewdly after his expectation be holpen at my mouth, but rather confirmed in that which he called an error, ceaſed to go any further in his demand, and called Mr. Green aſide, and before his regiſter read him a letter, I know not the contents thereof: and therewithal he gave Mr. Green the book of my diſputation in the convocation-houſe, and afterwards went aſide, communing with Mr. Chriſtopherſon, leaving of Mr. Morgan, Mr. Harpsfield, and Mr. Coſins, to reaſon with me in the hearing of Mr. Green.

Morgan. Mr. Philpot, I would aſk you how old your religion is?

Philpot. It is older than yours by a thouſand years and more.

Morgan. I pray you where was it fifty years ago?

Philpot. It was in Germany apparent by the teſtimony of Huſs, Jerome of Prague and Wickliff, whom your generation an hundred years ago and more, did burn for preaching the truth unto you; and before their time and ſince hath been, although under perſecution put to ſilence.

Morgan. That is a marvellous ſtrange religion, which no man can tell certainly where to find it.

Philpot. It ought to be no marvel unto you to ſee God's truth through violence oppreſſed; for ſo it hath been from the beginning from time to time, as it appeareth by hiſtory, and as Chriſt's true religion is now to be found here in England, although hypocriſy hath by violence the upper hand. And in the Revelations you may ſee it was propheſied, that the true church ſhould be driven into corners, and into the wilderneſs, and ſuffer great perſecutions.

Morgan. Ah, are you ſeen in the Revelations? there are many ſtrange things.

Philpot. If I tell you the truth which you are not able to refel, believe it, and dally not out ſo earneſt matters: Methinks you are more like a ſcoffer in a play, than a reaſonable doctor to inſtruct a man, you are bare-arſed, and dance naked in a net, and you ſee not your own nakedneſs.

Morgan. What I pray you, be not ſo quick with me, let us talk a little more coldly together.

Philpot. I will talk with you as mildly as you can deſire, if you will ſpeak learnedly and charitably. But if you go about with taunts to delude the truth, I will not hide it from you.

Morgan. Why will not you ſubmit your judgment to the learned men of this realm.

Philpot. Becauſe I ſee they can bring no good ground whereupon I may with a good conſcience ſettle my faith, more ſurely than on that which I am now grounded upon by God's manifeſt word.

Morgan. Can they not? it is marvel that ſo many learned men ſhould be deceived.

Philpot. It is no marvel by St. Paul, for he ſaith, "That not many wiſe, neither many learned after the world be called to the knowledge of the goſpel."

Morgan. Have you then alone the Spirit of God, and not we?

Philpot. I ſay not that I alone have the Spirit of God, but as many as abide in the true faith of Chriſt, have the Spirit of God as well as I.

Morgan. How know you that you have the Spirit of God?

Philpot. By the faith of Chriſt which is in me.

Morgan. Ah, by faith do you ſo? I think it is the ſpirit of the buttery, which your fellows have had that have been burned before you, who were drunk the night before they went to their death, and I believe went drunken unto it.

Philpot. It appeareth by your communication, that you are better acquainted with the ſpirit of the buttery than with the Spirit of God; wherefore I muſt now tell thee, thou painted wall and hypocrite, in the name of the living Lord, whoſe truth I have told thee, that God ſhall rain fire and brimſtone upon ſuch ſcorners of his word and blaſphemers of his people as thou art.

Morgan. What, you rage now.

Philpot. Thy fooliſh blaſphemies have compelled the Spirit of God, which is in me, to ſpeak that which I have ſaid to thee, thou enemy of all righteouſneſs.

Morgan. Why do ye judge me ſo?

Philpot. By thine own wicked words I judge of thee, thou blind and blaſphemous doctor; for as it is written, "By thy words thou ſhalt be juſtified, and by thy words thou ſhalt be condemned." I have ſpoke on God's behalf, and now I have done with thee.

Morgan. Why then I tell thee, Philpot, thou art an heretic, and ſhalt be burned for thine hereſy, and afterwards go to hell-fire.

Philpot. I tell thee, thou hypocrite, that I mind not thy threats of fire and faggots, neither, I thank God my Lord, ſtand in fear of the ſame: my faith in Chriſt ſhall overcome them. But the hell-fire with which thou threatneſt me, is thy portion, and is prepared for thee, (unleſs thou ſpeedily repent), and for ſuch hypocrites as thou art.

Morgan. What, thou ſpeakeſt upon wine, thou haſt tippled well to-day by likelihood.

Philpot. So ſaid the curſed generation to the apoſtles, being repleniſhed with the Holy Ghoſt, and ſpeaking the wondrous works of God, they ſaid they were drunk, when they had nothing elſe to ſay, as thou doſt now.

Morgan. Why, I am of opinion I am able to anſwer thee.

Philpot. So it ſeemeth, with blaſphemies and lyes.

Morgan. Nay, even with learning, ſay what thou canſt.

Philpot. That appeared well at my diſputation in the convocation-houſe, where thou didſt undertake to anſwer thoſe few arguments I was permitted to make, and yet wert not able to anſwer one; but in thine anſwers didſt fumble and ſtammer, that the whole houſe was aſhamed of thee: And the final concluſion of all thine anſwer was, that thou couldſt anſwer me if I were in the ſchools at Oxford.

Morgan. What, did I ſo? thou belyeſt me.

Philpot. I do not bely thee, the book of the report of the diſputation beareth record thereto, and all that were preſent then can tell thou ſaidſt ſo, if they liſt. And I tell thee plain, thou art not able to anſwer that Spirit of truth which ſpeaketh in me for the defence of Chriſt's true religion. I am able by the might thereof to drive thee round about this gallery before me: And if it would pleaſe the queen's majeſty and her council, to hear thee and me, I would make thee for ſhame ſhrink behind the door.

Morgan. Yea, would you ſo?

Philpot. Thou haſt the ſpirit of illuſion and ſophiſtry, which is not able to countervail the Spirit of truth. Thou art but an aſs in the true underſtanding of things appertaining unto God. I call thee aſs, not in reſpect of malice, but in that thou kickeſt againſt the truth, and art void of all godly underſtanding, not able to anſwer to that thou braggeſt in.

Morgan. Why, have I not anſwered thee in all things thou haſt ſaid unto me? I take them to record.

Philpot. Aſk of my fellow whether I be a thief.

Coſins. Hark, he makes us all thieves.

Philpot. You know that phraſe of the proverb, that like will hold with like. And I am ſure you will not judge with me againſt him, ſpeak I never ſo true; and in this ſenſe I ſpeak it. The ſtrongeſt anſwer that he hath made againſt me is, that you will burn me.

Morgan. Why, we do not burn you, it is the temporal men that burn you, and not we.

Philpot. Thus you would (as Pilate did) waſh your hands of all your wicked doings. But I pray you call upon the ſecular power to be executioners of your unrighteous judgments. And have you not a title in your law, De hæreticis comburendis, to burn heretics?

Harpsfield. I have heard you both a good while reaſon together, and I never heard ſo ſtout an heretic as you are, Mr. Philpot.

Coſins. Neither I in all my life.

Philpot. You are not able to prove me an heretic, by one jot of God's word.

Harpsfield. You have the ſpirit of arrogancy, I will reaſon with you no more. And ſo he was departing, and Mr. Coſins alſo. And with that the biſhop and Chriſtopherſon came in again, and ſaid:

Bonner. Mr. Doctor, how doth this man and you agree?

Morgan. My lord, I do aſk him where his church was fifty years ago.

Bonner. Are you not half agreed? as one man ſaid once to two parties, in whom the one was equally diſagreeing from the other.

Chriſtopherſon. My lord, it is but folly to reaſon with him any further, your lordſhip will but loſe time, for he is incurable.

Bonner. Well then, let his keeper have him away. And with that Dr. Chedſey led me a way by which we could not paſs, and therefore came back again through the biſhop's chamber, where all theſe doctors were cluſtered together; and as I was paſſing by, the biſhop took me by the gown, and ſaid, Know you what Mr. Chriſtopherſon telleth me? I pray you Mr. Chriſtopherſon rehearſe the ſentence in Latin; and ſo he did: the contents whereof were, That an heretic would not be won.

Chriſtopherſon. St. Paul ſaith, "Fly an heretic after once or twice warning."

All the doctors. Yea, my lord, it is beſt you do ſo, and trouble your lordſhip no more with him.

Philpot. You muſt prove me juſtly to be an heretic, before you uſe the judgment of St. Paul againſt me: for he ſpeaketh of ſuch as hold opinion againſt the manifeſt word, which you cannot prove by me: and becauſe you want in your proof, and be able to prove nothing againſt me; therefore you go about falſly to ſuppoſe me to be an heretic, for the ſafeguard of your own counterfeit honeſty; but before God you are heretics which ſo ſtoutly and ſtubbornly maintain ſo many things directly againſt God's word, as God in his time will reveal. As I went out of his chamber, the biſhop called me aſide, and ſaid:

Bonner. I pray thee in good ſadneſs, what didſt thou mean by writing in the beginning of thy bible, Spiritus eſt vicarius Chriſti in terris, "The Spirit is the vicar of Chriſt on the earth?" I ſuppoſe you have ſome ſpecial meaning therein.

Philpot. My lord, I have none other meaning than as I have told you already, That Chriſt ſince his aſcenſion worketh all things in us by his Spirit, and by his Spirit doth dwell in us. I pray you, my lord, let me have my bible, with other lawful books and writings you have of mine, whereof many of them be none of mine, but lent to me by my friends.

Bonner. Your bible you ſhall not have; but I will perhaps let you have another, and after I have peruſed the reſt, you ſhall have ſuch as I think good.

Philpot. I pray your lordſhip then, that you would let me have candle-light.

Bonner. To what purpoſe I pray you?

Philpot. The nights be long, and I would fain occupy myſelf about ſomewhat, and not ſpend my time idly.

Bonner. Then you may pray.

Philpot. I cannot well ſay my prayers without light.

Bonner. Can you not ſay your Pater-noſter without a candle? I tell you, Sir, you ſhall have ſome meat and drink of me, but candles you ſhall have none.

Philpot. I had rather have candle than your meat and drink; but ſeeing I ſhall not have my requeſt, the Lord ſhall be my light.

Bonner. Have him down.

Chedſey. I will bring him to his keeper, my lord. Mr. Philpot, I wonder all theſe learned men whom you have talked withal this day can nothing at all perſuade you.

Philpot. Why, Mr. Doctor, would you have me to be perſuaded with nothing? or would you have me build my faith upon ſand? What do you all bring, whereby I ought by any ſufficient authority to be perſuaded to you?

Chedſey. I am ſorry you will ſo wilfully caſt yourſelf away, whereas you might live worſhipfully: do you not think that others have ſouls to ſave as well as you?

Philpot. Every man ſhall receive according to his own doings. Sure I am that you are deceived, and maintain a falſe religion; and as for my caſting away, I wiſh my burning day were to-morrow, for this delay is every day to die, and yet not to be dead.

Chedſey. You are not likely to die yet, I can tell you.

Philpot. I am the more ſorry thereof. But the will of God be done of me to his glory, Amen.

The twelfth Examination of Mr. Philpot, on Wedneſday the fourth of December, before the Biſhop of London, the Biſhop of Worceſter, and the Biſhop of Bangor.

IN the morning I was brought down to the wardrobe adjoining to the chapel, and within a while after came three of the biſhop's chaplains unto me, ſaying:

Chaplains. Mr. Philpot, my lord hath ſent us unto you to deſire you to come to maſs, certifying you that there is a doctor of divinity, a chaplain of my lord's, a notable learned man, called Dr. Chedſey, going to maſs: therefore we alſo pray you, good Mr. Philpot, be content to come, it is hard hereby.

Philpot. I wonder my lord would trouble you in ſending you about this matter, ſeeing he knoweth I am a man (by your law) that cannot hear maſs, becauſe I ſtand excommunicate.

Chaplains. Your excommunication is but upon a contumacy, and my lord will diſpenſe with you if you will come.

Philpot. My lord cannot, for he is not mine ordinary, and I will not ſeek any ſuch thing at his hand. With this anſwer they went their way.

After maſs, the biſhop called me before him into his chapel, and there in the preſence of his regiſter (after he had ſaid his mind, becauſe I would not come to maſs), recited the articles, which he oftentimes before had done in that behalf, with the depoſitions of the witneſſes, of whom ſome were not examined.

Bonner. Sir, what can you now ſay why I ſhould not proceed to give ſentence againſt thee as an heretic?

Philpot. Why, my lord, will you proceed to give ſentence againſt me before your witneſſes be examined? that is plain againſt your own law, as all your doings have been hitherto.

Bonner. See what a fool thou art in the law. I need not to recite the depoſitions of the witneſſes, but if I liſt: for I know them well enough already.

Philpot. It appeareth indeed you may do what you liſt.

Bonner. Tell me, I ſay, whether thou wilt anſwer, or no: and whether if thou wert abſolved of thine excommunication, thou wouldſt come to maſs, or no?

Philpot. I have anſwered as much as I intended to do until I be called to lawful judgment: and as concerning my conſcience, I will not make you God to ſit there as yet; it is God's part only to be ſearcher of my heart.

Bonner. Look how fooliſhly he ſpeaks. Art thou God? and yet doſt thou not ſit in thine own conſcience?

Philpot. I ſit not in mine own conſcience, but I know it; and God there only ought to ſit, and none elſe.

Bonner. Thou art a naughty fellow, and haſt done much hurt, and haſt ſeduced other poor fellows here in priſon with thee, by thy comforting of them in their errors, and haſt made them rejoice and ſing with thee.

Philpot. Yea, my lord, we ſhall ſing, when you, and ſuch others as you are, ſhall cry, Wo, wo, except you repent.

Bonner. What an arrogant fool is this? I will handle thee like an heretic, and that ſhortly.

Philpot. I fear nothing, I thank God, you can do unto me. But God ſhall deſtroy ſuch as thou art, and that ſhortly, as I truſt.

Bonner. Have him away, this is a knave indeed.

And as I was had into the wardrobe again by my keeper, and within an hour after was ſent for to come before him and the biſhops of Worceſter and Bangor.

Bonner. Sir, I have talked with you many times, and have cauſed you to be talked with by many learned men, yea, and honourable, both temporal and ſpiritual, and it availeth nothing with you. I am blamed that I have brought thee before ſo many; for they ſay, thou glorieſt to have many to talk withal. Well, now it lieth upon thee to look to thyſelf, for thy time draweth near to an end, if thou do not become conformable. And at this preſent we are ſent from the ſynod to offer you this grace, that if you will come to the unity of the church of Rome with us, and acknowledge the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar with us, all that is paſt ſhall be forgiven, and you received to favour.

Worceſter. Mr. Philpot, we are ſent (as you here have heard by my lord of London), from the ſynod, to offer you mercy, if you will receive it, and of good-will I bear you, I wiſh you to take it whilſt it is offered, and be not a ſingular man againſt a whole multitude of learned men, which now in faſting and prayer are gathered together to deviſe things to do you good. Many very learned men have talked with you, why ſhould you think yourſelf better learned than them all? Be not of ſuch arrogancy, but have humility, and remember there is no ſalvation but in the church.

Bangor. Methinks my lord hath ſpoken wonderfully well unto you, that you ſhould not think yourſelf ſo well learned, but other men are as well learned as you; neither of ſo good wit, but others be as wiſe as you; neither of ſo good memory, but others have as good memories as you. Therefore miſtruſt your own judgment, and come home to us again. I never liked your religion, becauſe it was ſet forth by violence and tyranny, and that is no true token of true religion. And I was the ſame manner of man then that I am now, and a great many many more. Marry, for fear we held our peace, and bore with that time. Wherefore, Mr. Philpot, I wiſh you well, for I love you; and therefore be content to come home with us again into the catholic church of Rome.

Philpot. Where, my lord, (as I may begin firſt to anſwer you) you ſay, that religion is to be miſliked which is ſet forth by tyranny, I pray God you give not men occaſion to think the ſame by yours at this day, which had no other argument to ſtand by but violence. If you can ſhew me any good ſufficient ground whereby to ground my conſcience, that the church of Rome is the true catholic church, whereunto you call me, I will gladly be of the ſame; otherwiſe I cannot ſo ſoon change the religion I have learned theſe many years.

Bangor. Where was your religion to be found (I pray you) an hundred years ago, that any man knew of it?

Philpot. It was in Germany, and in divers other places apparent.

Worceſter. Jeſus! will you be ſtill ſo ſingular a man? What is Germany to the whole world?

Bonner. My lords, I pray you give me leave to tell you, that I ſent for him to hear maſs this morning. And think you what excuſe he made unto me, forſooth, that he was accurſed, alledging his own ſhame. He playeth as the varlet Latimer did at Cambridge, when the vice-chancellor ſent for him (who intended to have excommunicated him for ſome of his hereſies) and the chancellor was coming to his chamber, he hearing thereof, made anſwer, That he was ſick of the plague, and ſo deluded the chancellor: even ſo this man ſaith, he was accurſed, becauſe he will not come to maſs.

Worceſter. My lord (I am ſure) he doth behave himſelf like a father unto you; therefore be admoniſhed by him, and by us, that come now friendly unto you, and follow your fathers before you.

Philpot. It is forbidden us of God by the prophet Ezekiel, to follow our fathers, or to walk in their commandments.

Worceſter. It is written alſo in another place, Aſk of your fathers.

Philpot. We ought to aſk indeed our fathers that have more experience and knowledge than we of God's will, but no more to allow them, than we perceive they agree with the ſcripture.

Worceſter. You will be a contentious man, I ſee well; and St. Paul ſaith, that neither we nor the church of God have any ſuch cuſtom.

Philpot. I am not contentious but for the verity of my faith, in which I ought to contend with all ſuch as do impugn the ſame without any juſt objection.

Worceſter. Let us ariſe, my lord, for I ſee we ſhall do no good.

Bonner. Nay, I pray you tarry and hear the articles I lay to his charge,. And after he had recited them, they aroſe, and after ſtanding they reaſoned with me a while.

Worceſter. Mr. Philpot, I am very ſorry that you will be ſo ſingular. I never talked with any yet in my dioceſe, but after once communication had with me, they have been contented to revoke their errors and to teach the people how they were deceived, and ſo do much good as you may if you liſt. For as I underſtand you were archdeacon of Wincheſter (which is the eye of the biſhop) and you may do much good in that country if you would forſake your errors, and come to the catholic church.

Philpot. Wherewithal you ſo ſoon perſuaded them to your will, I ſee not. Error, that I know, I hold none; and of the catholic church I am ſure I am.

Worceſter. The catholic church doth acknowledge a real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, and ſo will not you.

Philpot. That is not ſo: for I acknowledge a very eſſential preſence in the duly uſing of the ſacrament.

Worceſter. What, a real preſence.

Philpot. Yea, a real preſence, by the Spirit of God, in the right adminiſtration.

Worceſter. That is well ſaid: and do you agree with the catholic church alſo?

Philpot. I do agree with the true catholic church.

Worceſter. My lord of London, this man ſpeaketh reaſonably now.

Bonner. You do agree in generals, but when it ſhall come to particulars, you will far diſagree.

Worceſter. Well, keep yourſelf here, and you ſhall have other learned biſhops to commune further with you, as my lord of Durham, and my lord of Chicheſter, whom I hear ſay you do like well.

Philpot. I do like them as I do all others that ſpeak the truth. I have once already ſpoken with them, and they found no fault with me.

Worceſter. In the mean ſeaſon pray to God for grace.

Philpot. Prayer is the moſt comfortable exerciſe I feel in my trouble, and my conſcience is quiet, and I have the peace of mind, which cannot be the fruits of hereſy.

Worceſter. We bid you farewel for this time.

After dinner they called for me again, and demanded of me whether I meant as I ſpake before dinner, and would not go from it. To whom I anſwered, That I would not go from what I had ſaid.

Worceſter. You ſaid at my departing from you before dinner, that if we did burn you, we ſhould burn a catholic man: Will you be a catholic man, and ſtand to the catholic church?

Philpot. I will ſtand to the true catholic church.

Worceſter. Will you ſtand to the catholic church of Rome?

Philpot. If you can prove the ſame to be the catholic church, I will be one thereof.

Worceſter. Did not Chriſt ſay unto Peter, and to all his ſucceſſors of Rome, Paſce oves meas, paſce agnos meos; "Feed my ſheep, feed my lambs? Which doth ſignify that he gave him more authority than the reſt.

Philpot. That ſaying pertaineth nothing to the authority of Peter, above others, but declareth what Chriſt requireth of his beloved apoſtles, that they ſhould with all diligence preach to the flock of Chriſt the way of ſalvation, and that doth the iteration of feeding, ſpoken to Peter, only ſignify. But the biſhop of Rome little regardeth the ſpiritual feeding, and therefore he hath imagined an eaſier way to make himſelf lord of the whole world, yea and of God's word too, and doth not feed Chriſt's flock as Peter did.

Worceſter. How can you tell that?

Philpot. Yes, I have been there, and I could not learn of all his countrymen, that ever he preacheth.

Worceſter. Though he preacheth not one way, he preacheth another, by procuring good order for the church to be kept in.

Philpot. I am ſure that it will be his damnation before God, that he leaveth what he is commanded by Chriſt, and ſetteth forth his decrees to deface the goſpel.

Worceſter. It is the evil living that you have ſeen at Rome, that cauſeth you to have this ill judgment of the church of Rome. I cannot now tarry with you to reaſon further of the matter.

How ſay you to the real preſence of the ſacrament, will you ſtand to that?

Philpot. I do acknowledge (as I have ſaid) a real preſence of the ſacrament, in the due adminiſtration thereof, to the worthy receivers by the Spirit of God.

Worceſter.

Worceſter. You add now a great many more words than you did before; and yet you ſay more of the ſacrament, than a great many will do.

Thus they departed, and after them came unto me Dr. Chedſey and Dr. Wright archdeacon of Oxford, with a great many more.

Chedſey. Mr. Philpot, here is Mr. Archdeacon of Oxford come to you to give you good counſel, I pray hear him.

Philpot. I will refuſe to hear none that will counſel me any good; and if any can bring any matter better than I have, I will ſtick thereunto.

Wright. I would wiſh you, Mr. Philpot, to agree with the catholic church, and not to ſtand in your own conceit: you ſee a great many learned men againſt you.

Philpot. I am, Mr. Doctor, of the unfeigned catholic church, and will live and die therein: and if you can prove your church to be the true catholic church, I will be one of the ſame.

Wright. I came not to diſpute with you, but to exhort you. Here be better learned than I, that can inform you better than I.

Chedſey. What proof would you have? I will prove unto you, our church to have its being and foundation by the ſcriptures, by the apoſtles, and by the primitive church, confirmed with the blood of martyrs, and with the teſtimony of all confeſſors.

Philpot. Give me your hand, Mr. Doctor; prove that, and have with you.

Chedſey. If I had my books here I could ſoon prove it, I will go fetch ſome; and with that he went and brought his book of annotations, ſaying, I cannot well bring my books, therefore I have brought my book of annotations, and turned there to a common place of the ſacrament, aſking me whether the catholic church did allow the preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, or no? I hear ſay, you do confeſs a real preſence: but I will be hanged if you abide by it: you will deny it by and by.

Philpot. What I have ſaid I cannot deny, neither intend, whatever you ſay.

Chedſey. If there be a real preſence in the ſacrament, then evil men receive Chriſt, which thing you will not grant, I am ſure.

Philpot. I deny the argument, for I do not grant in the ſacrament, by tranſubſtantiation, any real preſence, as you falſly imagine, but in the due adminiſtration to the worthy receivers.

Chedſey. I will prove that the evil and wicked men eat the body of Chriſt, as well as the good men, by St. Auguſtine here.

Philpot. And in the beginning of his text St. Auguſtine ſeemeth to approve his aſſertion; but I bade him read out to the end, and there St. Auguſtine declareth moſt evidently that it was Quodammodo, after a certain manner the evil men received the body of Chriſt, which is ſacramentally, only in the outward ſign, and not really, or indeed, as the good doth. And thus all the doctors that you ſeem to bring in for your purpoſe, be quite againſt you, if ye did rightly weigh them.

Chedſey. By God you are a ſubtil fellow. See how he would writhe St. Auguſtine's words.

Philpot. See which of us do writhe St. Auguſtine moſt, you or I who take his meaning by his own expreſs words. And ſeeing you charge me with ſubtilty, what ſubtilty is this of you to ſay, that you will prove your matter of the church, even from the beginning, promiſing to ſhew your books therein, and when it cometh to the proof, you are able to ſhew none, and for want thereof ſlip into a by-matter, and yet faint in the proof thereof? Before God you are bare-arſed in your religion.

Chedſey. You ſhall be conſtrained to come to us at length, whether you will or no.

Philpot. Hold that argument faſt; for it is the beſt you have, for you have nothing but violence.

The thirteenth Examination of Mr. Philpot before the Archbiſhop of York, and other Biſhops.

THE Thurſday after, I was called in the morning before the archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Chicheſter, the biſhop of Bath, and the biſhop of London. The biſhop of Chicheſter being firſt come, began to talk with me.

Chicheſter. I am come of good will to talk with you, to inſtruct you what I can, to come to the catholic church, and to exhort you to inſtruct your own judgment, and to learn firſt to have humility, and by the ſame to learn of others that be better learned than you, as they did learn of ſuch as were their betters before them.

Philpot. We muſt all be taught of God, and I will, with all humility, learn of them that will inform me by God's word, what I have to do. I confeſs I have but little learning in reſpect of you, that both of your years and great exerciſe do excel therein: but faith conſiſteth not only in learning, but in ſimplicity of believing that which God's word teacheth. Therefore I ſhall be glad to hear both of your lordſhip, and of any other (that God hath revealed unto by his word) the true doctrine thereof, and to thank you, that it doth pleaſe you to take pains herein.

Chicheſter. You take the firſt alledged amiſs, as though all men ſhould be taught by inſpiration, and not by learning. How do we believe the goſpel, but by the authority of the church, and becauſe the ſame hath allowed it?

Philpot. St. Paul ſaith, "He learned not the goſpel by men, neither of men, but by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt." Which is a plain and ſufficient proof that the goſpel taketh not its authority of man, but of God only.

Chicheſter. St. Paul ſpeaketh but of his own knowledge how he came thereto.

Philpot. Nay, he ſpeaketh of the goſpel generally, "Which cometh not from man, but from God;" and that the church muſt only teach that which cometh from God, and not man's precepts.

Chicheſter. Doth not St. Auguſtine ſay theſe words, "I would not believe the goſpel, if the authority of the church did not move me thereto."

Philpot. I grant, that the authority of the church doth move the unbelievers to believe; but yet the church doth not give the word its authority; for the word hath its authority only from God, and not of men, men be but diſpoſers thereof. For firſt, the word had its being before the church, and the word is the foundation of the church, and firſt is the foundation ſure, before the building thereon can be ſtedfaſt.

Chicheſter. I perceive you miſtake me, I ſpeak of the knowledge of the goſpel, and not of the authority; for by the church we have all knowledge of the goſpel.

Philpot. I confeſs that; for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. And I acknowledge that God appointeth an ordinary means for men to come unto the knowledge now, and not miraculouſly, as he hath done in times paſt; yet we that be taught by men, muſt take heed that we learn nothing elſe but that which was taught in the primitive church by revelation. Here came in the biſhop of York and the biſhop of Bath; and after they had ſaluted one another, and communed a while together, the archbiſhop of York called me unto them, ſaying:

York. Sir, we, hearing that you are out of the way, are come of charity to inform you, and to bring you into the true faith, and to the catholic church again; willing you firſt to have humility, and to be humble and willing to learn of your betters, for elſe we can do no good with you. And God ſaith by his prophet; "On whom ſhall I reſt, but the humble and meek, and ſuch as tremble at my word?" Now if you will ſo be, we ſhall be glad to travel with you.

Philpot.

Philpot. I know that humility is the door whereby we enter unto Chriſt: and, I thank his goodneſs, I have entered in at the ſame unto him, and with all humility will hear whatſoever truth you ſhall ſpeak unto me.

York. What be the matters you ſtand on, and require to be ſatisfied in?

Philpot. My lord, if it ſhall pleaſe your grace, we were entered into a good matter before you came, of the church, and how we ſhould know the truth but by the church.

York. Indeed that is the head we ought to begin at, for the church being truly known, we ſhall ſooner agree in the particular things.

Philpot. If your lordſhips can prove the church of Rome to be the true catholic church, it will do much to perſuade me toward what you would have me incline unto.

York. Why, let us go to the definition of the church. What is it?

Philpot. It is a congregation of people diſperſed through the world, agreeing together in the word of God, uſing the ſacraments and all other things according to the ſame.

York. Your definition is of many words to no purpoſe.

Philpot. I do not preciſely define the church, but declare unto you what I think the church is.

York. Is the church viſible or inviſible?

Philpot. It is both viſible and inviſible. The inviſible church is of the elect of God only; the viſible conſiſts both of good and bad, uſing all things in faith according to God's word.

York. The church is an univerſal congregation of faithful people in Chriſt through the world: which this word Catholic doth well expreſs; for what is catholic elſe? doth it not ſignify univerſal?

Philpot. The church is defined by St. Auguſtine to be called catholic in this wiſe, "The church is called therefore catholic, becauſe it is truly perfect, and halteth in nothing."

York. Nay, it is called catholic, becauſe it is univerſally received of all chriſtian nations for the moſt part.

Philpot. The church was catholic in the apoſtles time, yet was it not univerſally received of the world; but becauſe their doctrine which they had received of Chriſt was perfect, and appointed to be preached and received of the whole world, therefore it is called the catholic faith, and all perſons receiving the ſame, to be counted the catholic church. And St. Auguſtine in another place writeth, that the catholic church is that which believeth aright.

York. If you will learn, I will ſhew you St. Auguſtine, writing againſt the Donatiſts, that he proveth the catholic church by two principal points, which is, univerſality and ſucceſſion of biſhops in one apoſtolical ſee from time to time. Now thus I will make mine argument.

The church of Rome is univerſal, and hath the ſucceſſion of biſhops from time to time.

Ergo, it is the catholic church.

How anſwer you to this argument?

Philpot. I deny the antecedent, that the catholic church is only known by univerſality and ſucceſſion of biſhops.

York. I will prove it; and with that he brought forth a book which he had noted out of the doctors, and turned to his common places therein of the church, and recited one or two out of St. Auguſtine, and eſpecially out of his epiſtle written againſt the Donatiſts, where St. Auguſtine manifeſtly proveth, that the Donatiſts were not the catholic church, becauſe they have no ſucceſſion of biſhops in their opinion, neither univerſality; and the ſame force hath St. Auguſtine's argument againſt you.

Philpot. My lord, I have weighed the force of that argument before now, and perceive it maketh nothing againſt me, neither cometh it to your purpoſe; for I will ſtand to the trial of St. Auguſtine for the approbation of the catholic church whereof I am. For St. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of univerſality joined with verity, and of faithful ſucceſſors of Peter before corruption came into the church. And ſo if you can deduce your argument for the ſee of Rome now, as St. Auguſtine might do in his time, I would ſay it might be of ſome force, otherwiſe not.

York. St. Auguſtine proveth the catholic church principally by ſucceſſion of biſhops, and therefore you underſtand not St. Auguſtine. For what, I pray you, was the opinion of the Donatiſts, againſt whom he wrote, can you tell? What country where they of?

Philpot. They were a certain ſect of men, affirming, among other hereſies, that the dignity of the ſacraments depended upon the worthineſs of the miniſter; ſo that if the miniſter was good, the ſacraments which he miniſtred were available, or elſe not.

Chicheſter. That was their error, and they had none other but that. And he read another authority of St. Auſtin out of a book which he brought, even to the ſame purpoſe that the other was.

Philpot. I challenge St. Auſtin to be with me thoroughly in this point, and will ſtand to his judgment, taking one place with another.

Chicheſter. If you will not have the church to be certain, I pray you by whom will you be judged in matters of controverſy?

Philpot. I do not deny the church to be certain; but I deny that it is neceſſarily tied to any place, longer than it abideth in the word; and for all controverſies the word ought to be judge.

Chicheſter. But what if I take it one way and you another, how then?

Philpot. St. Auſtin ſheweth a remedy for that, and willeth, "That one place of the ſcripture ought to be underſtood by the more."

York. How anſwer you to this argument?

Rome hath known ſucceſſion of biſhops, which your church hath not.

Ergo, That is the catholic church, and yours is not, becauſe there is no ſuch ſucceſſion can be proved in your church.

Philpot. I deny, my lord, that ſucceſſion of biſhops is an infallible point to know the church by: for there may be a ſucceſſion of biſhops known in a place, and yet there be no church, as at Antioch and Jeruſalem, and in other places, where the apoſtles abode as well as at Rome. But if you put to the ſucceſſion of biſhops, ſucceſſion of doctrine withal, as St. Auſtin doth, I will grant it to be a good proof for the catholic church; but local ſucceſſion only is nothing available.

York. You will have no church then I ſee well.

Philpot. Yes, my lords, I acknowledge the catholic church, as I am bound by my creed; but I cannot acknowledge a falſe church for the true.

Chicheſter. Why, is there two catholic churches then?

Philpot. No, I know there is but one catholic church, but there have been, and be at this preſent that take upon them the name of Chriſt and of his church, which be not ſo indeed, as it is written, "There be they that call themſelves apoſtles, and be not ſo indeed, but the ſynagogue of Satan and lyars." And now it is with us as it was with the two women in Solomon's time, which lay together, and the one overlaid her child, and afterward went about to challenge the true mother's child.

Chicheſter. What a babbling is here with you now? I ſee you lack humility. You will go about to teach, and not to learn.

Philpot. My lords, I muſt deſire you to bear with my haſty ſpeech: it is my infirmity of nature. All that I ſpeak is to learn by; I wiſh you did underſtand all my mind, that I might be ſatisfied by you through better authority.

Chicheſter. My lord, if it pleaſe your grace, turn the argument upon him which you have made, and let him ſhew the ſucceſſion of the biſhops of his church, as we can do. How ſay you, can you ſhew the ſucceſſion of biſhops in your church from time to time? I tell you, this argument troubled Dr. Ridley ſo ſore, that he could never anſwer it; yet he was a man well learned, I dare ſay you will ſay ſo.

Philpot. He was a man ſo learned, that I was not worthy to carry his books for learning.

Chicheſter. I promiſe you he was never able to anſwer that. He was a man that I loved well, and he me; for he came unto me divers times being in priſon, and conferred with me.

Philpot. I wonder, my lord, you ſhould make this argument which you would turn upon me, for the trial of my church whereof I am, or that you would make biſhop Ridley ſo ignorant that he was not able to anſwer it, ſince it is of no force. For behold, firſt I denied you that local ſucceſſion of biſhops in one place is a neceſſary point alone to prove the catholic church by, and that which I have denied you cannot prove: and is it then reaſon that you ſhould put me to the trial of that, which by you is unproved, and of no force to conclude againſt me?

Chicheſter. I ſee, my lords, we do but loſe our labours to reaſon with him, he thinketh himſelf better learned than we.

Philpot. I take upon me the name of no learning, I boaſt of no knowledge but of faith and of Chriſt, and that I am bound undoubtedly to know, as I am ſure I do.

Chicheſter. Theſe heretics take upon them to be ſure of all things they ſtand in. You ſhould ſay rather with humility, I truſt I know Chriſt, than that you be ſure thereof.

Philpot. Let him doubt of his faith that liſteth; God giveth me always grace to believe that I am ſure of true faith and favour in Chriſt.

Bath. How will you be able to anſwer heretics, but by the determination of the known catholic church?

Philpot. I am able to anſwer all heretics by the word of God, and convince them by the ſame.

Chicheſter. How arrogantly is that ſpoken! I dare not ſay ſo.

Philpot. My lords, I pray you bear with me; for I am bold on the truth's ſide, and I ſpeak ſomewhat by experience that I have had with heretics, and I know the Arians, be the ſubtileſt that ever were, and yet I have manifeſt ſcriptures to beat them down withal.

Chicheſter. I perceive now you are the ſame manner of man I have heard of, which will not be ſatisfied by learning.

Philpot. Alas, my lord, why do you ſay ſo? I do moſt humbly deſire to be taught, if there be any better way that I ſhould learn, and hitherto you have ſhewed me no better, therefore I pray your lordſhip not to miſ-judge without a cauſe.

Bath. If you be the true catholic church, then will you hold with the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, which the true church hath ever maintained.

Philpot. And I my lord with the true church do hold the ſame in the due adminiſtration of the ſacrament: but I deſire you my lord, there may be made a better concluſion in our firſt matter, before we enter into any other; for if the church be proved, we ſhall ſoon agree in the reſt. In the mean while my lord of York was turning his book for more places to help forth his cauſe.

York. I have found at length a very notable place, which I have looked for all this while, of St. Auſtin, De ſimplicitate credendi.

Chicheſter. It is but folly, my lord, for your grace to read any more places to him, for he eſteemeth them not.

Philpot. I eſteem them, inaſmuch as they be of force, as your lordſhip doth hear me deny no doctors you bring, but only require the true application of them, according to the writer's meaning, and as by his own words may be proved.

York. I will read him the place, and ſo make an end.

After he had read the ſentence he ſaid, that by four ſpecial points here St. Auguſtine proveth the catholic church. The firſt is by the conſent of all nations: the ſecond, by the apoſtolic ſee; the third, by univerſality; and the fourth, by this word Catholic.

Chicheſter. That is a notable place indeed, if it pleaſe your grace.

Philpot. I pray you, my lord, of what church doth St. Auguſtine write the ſame of Rome or not?

York. Yea, he writeth it of the church of Rome.

Philpot. I will lay with your lordſhip as much as I can make, that it is not ſo: and let the book be ſeen.

Bath. What art thou able to lay, thou haſt nothing?

York. Doth he not make mention here of the apoſtolic ſee, whereby he meaneth Rome?

Philpot. That is very ſtraightly interpreted, my lord, as though the apoſtolic ſee had been no where elſe but at Rome. But let it be Rome, and yet you ſhall never verify the ſame, unleſs all the other conditions do go therewith, as St. Auguſtine doth proceed withal, whereof none, except the apoſtolic ſee can now be verified of the church of Rome. For the faith which that ſee now maintaineth hath not the conſent of all nations, neither hath had. Beſides that, it cannot have the name of catholic, becauſe it differeth from the catholic churches which the apoſtles planted, almoſt in all things.

York. Nay, he goeth about here to prove the catholic church by univerſality; and how can you ſhew your church to be univerſal fifty or an hundred years ago?

Philpot. That is not material, neither any thing againſt St. Auguſtine: for my church (whereof I am) were to be accounted univerſal, though it were but in ten perſons, becauſe it agreeth with the ſame that the apoſtles did univerſally plant.

York. I perceive you are an obſtinate man in your own opinion, and will not be taught; wherefore it is but loſt labour to talk with you any longer, you are a member to be cut off.

Chicheſter. I have heard of you before, how you troubled the good biſhop of Wincheſter, and now I ſee in you what I have heard.

Philpot. I truſt you ſee no evil in me by this; I deſire of you a ſure ground to build my faith on, and if you ſhew me none, I pray you ſpeak not ill of him that maintain well.

Chicheſter. Thou art as impudent a fellow as any I have talked with.

Philpot. That is ſpoken uncharitably, my lord, to blaſpheme him whom you cannot juſtly reprove.

Chicheſter. Why, thou art not a God: blaſphemy is counted a rebuke to God-ward, and not to man.

Philpot. Yes, it may be as well verified of an infamy laid to man, ſpeaking in God's cauſe, as you do now lay unto me, for ſpeaking freely the truth before God, to maintain your vain religion. You are void of all good ground. I perceive you are blind guides, and leaders of the blind: and therefore (as I am bound to tell you) very hypocrites, tyrannouſly perſecuting the truth, which otherwiſe by juſt order you are by no means able to convince. Your own doctors and teſtimonies which you bring, be evidently againſt you, and yet you will not ſee the truth.

Chicheſter. Have we theſe thanks for our good will, in coming to inſtruct thee?

Philpot. My lords, you muſt bear with me, ſince I ſpeak in Chriſt's cauſe; and becauſe his glory is defaced, and his people cruelly and wrongfully ſlain by you, becauſe they will not conſent to the diſhonour of God, and to hypocriſy with you; if I told you not your fault, it would be required at my hands in the day of judgment. Therefore know you, ye hypocrites indeed, that it is the Spirit of of God that telleth you your ſin, and not I; I thank God, I value not all your cruelty. God forgive you, and give you grace to repent. And ſo they departed.

Another Conference the ſame Day.

THE ſame day at night before ſupper, the biſhop ſent for me into his chapel, in the preſence of archdeacon Harpsfield, Dr. Chedſey, and his other chaplains, and ſervants. And then he ſaid:

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I have by ſundry means gone about to do you good, and I marvel you do ſo little conſider it. By my truth, I cannot tell what to ſay to you: Tell me directly whether you will be a conformable man, or no; and whereupon you chiefly ſtand.

Philpot. I have told your lordſhip oftentimes plain enough, whereon I chiefly ſtand, requiring a ſure probation of the church whereunto you call me.

Harpsfield. St. Auguſtine writing againſt the Donatiſts, declareth four ſpecial notes to know the church by; the conſent of many nations, the faith of the ſacraments confirmed by antiquity, ſucceſſion of biſhops, and univerſality.

Bonner. I pray you, Mr. Archdeacon, fetch the book hither; it is a notable place, let him ſee it. And the book was brought, and the biſhop read it, demanding how I could anſwer the ſame.

Philpot. My lord, I like St. Auguſtine's four points for the trial of the catholic church, whereof I am: for it can abide every point thereof together, which yours cannot do.

Harpsfield. Have not we ſucceſſion of biſhops in the ſee and church of Rome? Wherefore then do you deny our church to be the catholic church?

Philpot. St. Auguſtine doth not put ſucceſſion of biſhops only to be ſufficient, but he addeth the uſe of the ſacraments according to antiquity, and doctrine univerſally taught and received by moſt nations from the beginning of the primitive church, which your church is far from. But my church can avouch all theſe better than yours: therefore by St. Auguſtine's judgment which you here bring, mine is the catholic church, and not yours.

Harpsfield and Chedſey. It is but folly, my lord, for you to reaſon with him, for he is irrecoverable.

Philpot. That is a good ſhift for you to run unto, when you be confounded in your own ſayings, and have nothing elſe to ſay; you are evidently deceived, and yet will not ſee it when it is laid to your face.

Thus have I at large ſet forth as many of the ſaid John Philpot his examinations and privy conferences as are yet come to light, being faithfully written with his own hand. And altho' he was examined after this ſeveral other times, both openly in the conſiſtory at St. Paul's, and alſo ſecretly in the biſhop's houſe; yet what was there ſaid is not yet ſufficiently known, either becauſe Mr. Philpot was not himſelf ſuffered to write, or elſe becauſe his writings are by ſome kept cloſe, and not brought forth, otherwiſe than as the biſhop's regiſter hath noted, whoſe handling of ſuch matters, becauſe it is (either for fear or favour of his lord and maſter), very ſlender, little light of any true meaning can be gathered, eſpecially in the behalf of the anſwerer; howbeit, ſuch as it is, ſuch thought I good to put forth; requiring the reader to judge hereof according to his anſwers in his former examinations.

The laſt Examinations of Mr. Philpot in open Judgment, with his final Condemnation by Biſhop Bonner, in the Conſiſtory at St. Paul's.

THE biſhop having ſufficiently taken his pleaſure with Mr. Philpot in his private talk, and ſeeing his zealous, learned, and immutable conſtancy, thought it now high time to rid his hands of him, and therefore on the thirteenth and fourteenth days of December, ſitting judicially in the conſiſtory at St. Paul's, he cauſed him to be brought thither before him and others, as it ſeemeth, more for order ſake, than for any good affection to juſtice and right judgment. The effect as well of which their two ſundry proceedings, as alſo of one other had the eleventh day of the ſame month in his chapel, appear in a manner to be all one. The biſhop therefore firſt ſpeaking to Mr. Philpot, ſaid;

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, amongſt other things that were laid and objected unto you, theſe three things ye were eſpecially charged and burdened withal.

The firſt is, That you being fallen from the unity of Chriſt's catholic church, do refuſe and will not come to be reconciled thereunto.

The ſecond is, That you have blaſphemouſly ſpoken againſt the ſacrifice of the maſs, calling it idolatry.

And the third is, That you have ſpoken againſt the ſacrament of the altar, denying the real preſence of Chriſt's body and blood to be in the ſame.

And according to the will and pleaſure of the ſynod legative, ye have been often by me invited and required to go from your ſaid errors and hereſies, and to return to the unity of the catholic church, which if ye will now willingly do, ye ſhall be mercifully and gladly received, charitably uſed, and have all the favour I can ſhew you. And now to tell you true, it is aſſigned and appointed me to give ſentence againſt you, if you ſtand herein, and will not return. Wherefore if ye ſo refuſe, I do aſk of you, whether you have any cauſe that you can ſhew, why I ſhould not now give ſentence againſt you?

Philpot. Under proteſtation, not to go from my appeal that I have made, and alſo not to conſent to you as my competent judge, I ſay, touching your firſt objection concerning the catholic church, I neither was nor am out of the ſame. And as touching the ſacrifice of the maſs, and ſacrament of the altar, I never ſpake againſt the ſame. And as concerning the pleaſure of the ſynod, I ſay, that theſe twenty years I have been brought up in the faith of the true catholic church, which is contrary to your church, whereunto you would have me to come: and in that time I have been many times ſworn both in the reign of king Henry the eighth, and good king Edward his ſon, againſt the uſurped power of the biſhop of Rome, which oath I think that I am bound in my conſcience to keep. Becauſe I muſt perform unto the Lord mine oath. But if you, or any of the ſynod, can by God's word perſuade me that my ſaid oath was unlawful, and that I am bound by God's law to come to your church, faith, and religion, whereof you be now, I will gladly yield, agree, and be conformable unto you, otherwiſe not.

Bonner then not able with all his learned doctors, to accompliſh this his offered condition, fell to perſuading of him, both by his accuſtomed vain promiſes and threatnings, to return to their church: To which he anſwered;

Philpot. You, and all other of your ſort, are hypocrites, and I wiſh all the world knew your hypocriſy, your tyranny, ignorance, and idolatry.

Upon theſe words the biſhop did for that time diſmiſs him, commanding that on Monday, the 16th day of the ſame month, between the hours of one and three in the afternoon, he ſhould again be brought thither, there to have the definitive ſentence of condemnation pronounced againſt him, if he remained then in his former conſtancy.

At which day and time, Mr. Philpot being there preſented before the biſhops of London, Bath, Worceſter, and Litchfield, Bonner biſhop of London began to talk in this manner.

Bonner,

Bonner. My lords, Stokeſley, my predeceſſor, when he went to give ſentence againſt an heretic, uſed to make this prayer:

Deus qui errantibus, ut in viam poſſint redire, juſtitiæ veritatiſq; tuæ lumen oſtendis, da cunctis qui chriſtiana profeſſione cenſentur, & illa reſpuere quæ huic inimica ſint nomini, & ea quæ ſint apta ſectari, per Chriſtum Dominum noſtrum, Amen. Which I will follow. And ſo he read it with a loud voice in Latin. To which Mr. Philpot ſaid:

I wiſh ye would ſpeak in Engliſh, that all men might hear and underſtand you; for St. Paul willeth, that all things ſpoken in the congregation to edify, ſhould be ſpoken in a tongue that all men might underſtand.

Whereupon the biſhop did read it in Engliſh: "O God, who ſheweth the light of thy truth and righteouſneſs to thoſe that ſtray, that they may return into thy way, give to all who profeſs themſelves chriſtians, to refuſe thoſe things which are foes to thy name, and to follow thoſe things which are fit, by Chriſt our Lord, Amen." And when he came to theſe words, "To refuſe thoſe things which are foes to thy name;" Mr. Philpot ſaid,

Then they all muſt turn away from you; for you are enemies to that name (meaning Chriſt's name), and God ſave us from ſuch hypocrites as would have things in a tongue that men cannot underſtand.

Bonner. Whom do you mean?

Philpot. You, and all others that be of your generation and ſect. And I am ſorry to ſee you ſit in the place that you now ſit in, pretending to execute juſtice, and to do nothing leſs but deceive all men in this realm.

And then turning himſelf unto the people, he further ſaid, O all you gentlemen, beware of theſe men (meaning the biſhops) and all their doings, which be contrary to the primitive church. And I would know of you, my lord, by what authority you proceed againſt me.

Bonner. Becauſe I am biſhop of London.

Philpot. Well, then ye are not my biſhop, nor have I offended in your dioceſe: and moreover, I have appealed from you, and therefore by your own law you ought not to proceed againſt me, eſpecially being brought hither from another place by violence.

Bonner. Why, who ſent you hither to me?

Philpot. Dr. Story and Dr. Cook, with other commiſſioners of the king and queen: and, my lord, is it not enough for you to worry your own ſheep, but ye muſt alſo meddle with other men's ſheep?

Then the biſhop delivered two books to Mr. Philpot, one of the civil, the other of the canon law, out of which he would have proved that he had authority to proceed againſt him in ſuch manner as he did. Mr. Philpot then peruſing the ſame, and ſeeing the ſmall and ſlender proof that was there alledged, ſaid to the biſhop:

Philpot. I perceive your law and divinity is all one; for you have knowledge in neither of them; and I wiſh ye did know your own ignorance: but ye dance in a net, and think that no man doth ſee you. Hereupon they had much talk, but what it was it is not yet known. At laſt Bonner ſaid unto him:

Philpot, as concerning your objections againſt my juriſdiction, ye ſhall underſtand that both the civil and canon laws make againſt you; and as for your appeal, it is not allowed in this caſe: for it is written in the law, There is no appeal from a judge executing the ſentence of the law.

Philpot. My lord, it appeareth by your interpretation of the law, that ye have no knowledge therein, and that ye do not underſtand the law; for if ye did, ye would not bring in that text.

Hereupon the biſhop recited a law of the Romans, That it was not lawful for a Jew to keep a chriſtian man in captivity, and to uſe him as a ſlave, laying then to the ſaid Philpot's charge, that he did not underſtand the law, but did like a Jew. Whereunto Mr. Philpot anſwered,

No, I am no Jew, but you, my lord, are a Jew. For you profeſs Chriſt, and maintain Antichriſt; you profeſs the goſpel, and maintain ſuperſtition; and ye are able to charge me with nothing.

Bonner and another biſhop. With what can you charge us?

Philpot. You are enemies to all truth, and all your doings be naught, full of idolatry, ſaving the article of the Trinity.

Whilſt they were thus debating the matter, there came thither Sir William Garret, knight, then mayor of London, Sir Martin Bowes, knight, and Thomas Leigh, then ſheriff of the ſame city, and ſat down with the ſaid biſhops in the ſaid conſiſtory, where biſhop Bonner ſpake theſe words in effect as followeth.

Bonner. Philpot, before the coming of my lord mayor, becauſe I would not enter with you into the matter wherewith I have heretofore, and now intend to charge you withal until his coming, I did rehearſe a prayer unto you both in Engliſh and in Latin, which biſhop Stokeſley, my predeceſſor, uſed when he intended to proceed to give ſentence againſt an heretic.

And here he did again read the ſaid prayer both in Engliſh and in Latin: which being ended he ſpake again unto him, and ſaid:

Bonner. Philpot, amongſt others I have to charge you eſpecially with three things:

1. Firſt, Where you have fallen from the unity of Chriſt's catholic church, you have thereupon been invited and required, not only by me, but alſo by many and divers other catholic biſhops, and other learned men, to return and come again to the ſame: and alſo you have been offered by me, that if you would ſo return, and confeſs your errors and hereſies, you ſhould be mercifully received, and have ſo much favour as I could ſhew unto you.

2. The ſecond is, That you have blaſphemouſly ſpoken againſt the ſacrifice of the maſs, calling it idolatry and abomination.

3. And thirdly, That you have ſpoken and held againſt the ſacrament of the altar, denying the real preſence of Chriſt's body and blood to be in the ſame.

This being ſpoken, the biſhop recited unto him a certain exhortation in Engliſh the tenor and form whereof is this:

Biſhop Bonner's Exhortation.

MR. Philpot, this is to be told you, that if you, not being yet reconciled to the unity of the catholic church, from whence ye did fall in the time of the late ſchiſm here in this realm of England, againſt the ſee apoſtolic of Rome, will now heartily and obediently be reconciled to the unity of the ſame catholic church, profeſſing and promiſing to obſerve and keep, to the beſt of your power, the faith and chriſtian religion obſerved and kept by all faithful people of the ſame; and moreover, if ye which heretofore, eſpecially in the year of our Lord 1553, 1554, 1555, or in one of them have offended and treſpaſſed grievouſly againſt the ſacrifice of the maſs, calling it idolatry and abominable; and likewiſe have offended and treſpaſſed againſt the ſacrament of the altar, denying the real preſence of Chriſt's body and blood to be there in the ſacrament of the altar; affirming alſo withal, material bread and material wine to be in the ſacrament of the altar, and not the ſubſtance of the body and blood of Chriſt: if ye, I ſay, will be reconciled as is aforeſaid, and will forſake your hereſies and errors before touched, being heretical and damnable; and will alſo allow the ſacrament of the maſs, ye ſhall be mercifully received, and charitably uſed with as much favour as as may be; if not, ye ſhall be reputed, taken, and judged for an heretic (as ye be indeed.) Now do ye chuſe what ye will do; you are counſelled herein friendly and favourably.

Ita eſt quod Edm. Bonner Epiſc. Lond.

The biſhop's exhortation thus ended, Mr. Philpot turned himſelf to the lord mayor, and ſaid;

Philpot. To you my lord mayor bearing the ſword, I am glad that it is my chance now to ſtand before that authority that hath defended the goſpel, and the truth of God's word; but I am ſorry to ſee that that authority, which repreſenteth the king and queen's perſons, ſhould now be changed, and be at the commandment of Antichriſt; and ye (ſpeaking to the biſhops) pretend to be the followers of the apoſtles of Chriſt, and yet be the very Antichriſts and deceivers of the people; and I am glad that God hath given me power to ſtand here this day and to declare and defend my faith, which is founded on Chriſt.

Therefore, as touching your firſt objection, I ſay, that I am of the catholic church, whereof I was never out, and that your church (which ye pretend to be the catholic church), is the church of Rome, and ſo the Babylonical, and not the catholic church; of that church I am not.

As touching your ſecond objection, which is, that I ſhould ſpeak againſt the ſacrifice of the maſs; I do ſay, that I have not ſpoken againſt the true ſacrifice, but I have ſpoken againſt your private maſſes that you uſe in corners, which is blaſphemy to the true ſacrifice; for your ſacrifice daily reiterated is blaſphemy againſt Chriſt's death, and it is a lye of your own invention: and that abominable ſacrifice which ye ſet upon the altar, and uſe in your private maſſes, inſtead of the living ſacrifice, is idolatry, and ye ſhall never prove it by God's word; therefore ye have deceived the people with that your ſacrifice of the maſs, which ye make a maſquing.

Thirdly, where you lay to my charge, that I deny the body and blood of Chriſt to be in the ſacrament of the altar, I cannot tell what altar you mean, whether it be the altar of the croſs, or the altar of ſtone: and if ye call it the ſacrament of the altar in reſpect of the altar of ſtone, then I defy your Chriſt; for it is a rotten Chriſt.

And as touching your tranſubſtantiation, I utterly deny it; for it was firſt brought up by a pope. Now as concerning your offer made from the ſynod, which is gathered together in Antichriſt's name; prove me that to be of the catholic church (which ye can never do), and I will follow you, and do as ye would have me to do. But ye are idolaters, and daily do commit idolatry. Ye be alſo traitors; for in your pulpits ye rail againſt good kings, as king Henry, and king Edward his ſon, who have ſtood againſt the uſurped power of the biſhop of Rome; againſt whom I have alſo taken an oath, which if ye can ſhew me by God's law that I have taken unjuſtly, I will then yield unto you: but I pray God turn the king and queen's heart from your ſynagogue and church, for you do abuſe that good queen.

Here the biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield began to ſhew where the true church was, ſaying;

Coventry. The true catholic church is ſet upon an high hill.

Philpot. Yea, at Rome, which is the Babylonical church.

Coventry. No, in our true catholic church are the apoſtles, evangeliſts, and martyrs; but before Martin Luther there was no apoſtle, evangeliſt or martyr of your church.

Philpot. Will ye know the cauſe why? Chriſt did propheſy, that in the latter days there ſhould come falſe prophets and hypocrites, as you be.

Coventry. Your church of Geneva, which ye call the catholic church, is that which Chriſt propheſied of.

Philpot. I allow the church of Geneva; and the doctrine of the ſame, for it is One, Catholic, and Apoſtolic; and doth follow the doctrine that the apoſtles did preach; and the doctrine taught and preached in king Edward's days, was alſo according to the ſame. And are ye not aſhamed to perſecute me and others for your church's ſake, which is Babylonical, and contrary to the true catholic church?

And after this they had great conference together, as well out of the ſcriptures as alſo out of the doctors. But when Bonner ſaw that by learning they were not able to confute Mr. Philpot, he then endeavoured by his defamations to bring him out of credit; and therefore turning himſelf to the lord mayor of London, he brought forth a knife, and a bladder full of powder, and ſaid:

Bonner. My lord, this man had a roaſted pig brought unto him, and this knife was put ſecretly between the ſkin and the fleſh thereof, and ſo it was ſent unto him, being in priſon. And alſo this powder was ſent unto him, under pretence that it was good and comfortable for him to eat and drink; which powder was only to make ink to write withal. For when his keeper did perceive it, he took it and brought it unto me; which when I did ſee, I thought it had been gunpowder, and thereupon I put fire to it, but it would not burn. Then I took it for poiſon, and ſo gave it to a dog, but it was not ſo. Then I took a little water, and it made as fair ink as ever I did write withal. Therefore, my lord, you may underſtand what a naughty fellow this is.

Philpot. Ah, my lord, have you nothing elſe to charge me withal but theſe trifles, ſeeing I ſtand upon life and death? Doth the knife in the pig prove the church of Rome to be the catholic church? &c.

Then the biſhop brought forth a certain inſtrument, containing articles and queſtions, agreed upon both in Oxford and Cambridge. Alſo he exhibited two books in print; the one was the catechiſm made in king Edward's days, in the year 1552, the other, concerning the true report of the diſputation in the convocation-houſe, mention whereof is above expreſſed.

Moreover he brought forth two letters, and laid them to Mr. Philpot's charge; the one touching Bartlet Green, the other, containing godly exhortations and comforts; which were both written to him by ſome of his godly friends; the tenor whereof we thought proper here to exhibit.

A Letter produced by Bonner, written by ſome Friend of Mr. Philpot's, and ſent to him, concerning the Uſage of Mr. Green, in Bonner's Houſe at London.

YOU ſhall underſtand that Mr. Green came unto the biſhop of London on Sunday laſt, where he was courteouſly received; for what policy the ſequel declareth. His entertainment for one day or two was to dine at my lord's own table, or elſe to have his meat from thence. During thoſe days he lay in Dr. Chedſey's chamber, and was examined. Albeit in very deed the biſhop earneſtly and faithfully promiſed many right worſhipful men (who were ſuters for him, but to him unknown), that he in no caſe ſhould be examined; before which Mr. Fecknam would have had him in his friendly cuſtody, if he would have deſired to have conferred with him, which he utterly refuſed. And in that the biſhop objected againſt his ſingularity and obſtinacy; his anſwer thereunto was thus, To avoid all ſuſpicion thereof, although I myſelf am young and utterly unlearned in reſpect of the learned, (and yet I underſtand, I thank my Lord), yet let me have ſuch books as I ſhall require, and if I, by God's Spirit, do not thereby anſwer all your books and objections contrary thereto, I will aſſent to you. Whereunto the biſhop and his aſſented, permitting him at the firſt to have ſuch books. Who at ſundry times have reaſoned with him, and have found him ſo ſtrong and rife in the ſcripture and godly fathers, that ſince they have not only taken from him ſuch liberty of books, but all other books, not leaving him ſo much as the New Teſtament. Since, they have baited and uſed him moſt cruelly. This Mr. Fecknam reported; ſaying farther, that he never heard the like young man, and ſo perfect. What ſhall become farther of him, God knoweth; but death I think, for he ramaineth more and more willing to die, as I underſtand. Concern ng your bill, I ſhall confer with others therein, knowing that the ſaid court is able to redreſs the ſame: and yet I think it will not be reformed, for that I know few or none that dare or will ſpeak therein, or prefer the ſame, becauſe it concerneth ſpiritual things. Notwithſtanding, I will aſcertain you thereof; committing you to the Holy Ghoſt, who keeps you and us all, as his.

Your own, &c.

The Copy of another Letter written by the Lady Vane to Mr. Philpot, exhibited likewiſe by Biſhop Bonner.

HEARTY thanks rendered unto you, my well-beloved in Chriſt, for the book ye ſent me, wherein I find great conſolations, and according to the doctrine thereof do prepare my cheeks to the ſtrikers, and my womaniſh back to the burdens of reproof, and ſo in the ſtrength of my God I truſt to leap over the wall; for his ſweetneſs overcometh me daily, and maketh all theſe apothecary drugs of the world, even medicinal-like in my mouth. For the continuance whereof, I beſeech thee (my dear fellow-ſoldier) make thy faithful prayer for me, that I may with a ſtrong and gladſome conſcience finiſh my courſe, and obtain the reward, though it be no whit due to my work. I am not content that you ſo often gratify me with thanks for that which is none worthy, but duty on my part, and ſmall relief to you. But if you would love me ſo much, that I might ſupply your lacks, then would I think ye believed my offers to be ſuch as agreed with my heart. And for the ſhort charges ye ſpeak of, the means are not ſo pleaſant, if God (whom my truſt is in) will otherwiſe prepare; but Solomon ſaith, "All things have here their time;" you to-day, and I to-morrow, and ſo the end of Adam's line is ſoon run out. The mighty God give us his grace, that during this time his glory be not defaced through our weakneſs. Becauſe you deſire to ſhew yourſelf a worthy ſoldier, if need ſo require, I will ſupply your requeſt for the ſcarf ye wrote of, that ye may preſent my handy-work before your captain, that I be not forgotten in the odours of incenſe, which our beloved Chriſt offered for his own; to whom I bequeath both our bodies and ſouls.

Your own in the Lord, F. E.

Beſides theſe letters, the biſhops did alſo bring forth a ſupplication, made by Mr. Philpot unto the high-court of parliament, whereof mention is made in the firſt of the two letters laſt mentioned; the copy whereof here follows.

To the King and Queen's Majeſties Highneſs, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons of this preſent Parliament aſſembled.

IN moſt humble wiſe complaineth unto this honourable court of parliament, John Philpot, clerk, that where there was, by the queen's highneſs, a parliament called in the firſt year of her gracious reign, and, after the old cuſtom, a convocation of the clergy, your ſuppliant then being one of the ſaid convocation-houſe, and matters there ariſing upon the uſing of the ſacraments, did diſpute in the ſame, knowing that there all men had and have free ſpeech, and ought not to be after-troubled for any thing there ſpoken, and yet that notwithſtanding, not long after the ſaid parliament, your ſaid ſuppliant (without any act or matter) was commanded to priſon to the King's-Bench by the late lord chancellor, where he hath remained ever ſince, until now of late that my lord the biſhop of London hath ſent for your ſaid ſuppliant, to examine him (being none of his dioceſe) upon certain matters, wherein they would have found your orator to declare his conſcience, which the ſaid biſhop ſaith he hath authority to do, by reaſon of an act of parliament made in the firſt and ſecond years of the king and queen's majeſties reign, for the reviving of three ſtatutes made againſt them that hold any opinion againſt the catholic faith: whereby he affirmeth, that every ordinary may, Ex officio, examine every man's conſcience. And for that your ſaid orator hath and doth refuſe, that the ſaid biſhop of London hath any authority over your ſaid orator, becauſe he is neither his dioceſan, nor hath publiſhed, preached, or held any opinion againſt the catholic faith (notwithſtanding the ſaid biſhop of London detaineth him in the coal-houſe in the ſtocks, without a bed, or any other thing to lie upon but ſtraw) and for that your ſaid orator cannot appeal for his relief, from the ſame biſhop to any other judge, but the ſame biſhop may refuſe the ſame by their law, and therefore hath no ſuccour and help but by this high court of parliament, for the explanation of the ſaid act; therefore may it pleaſe you, that it may be enacted by the king and queen's majeſties, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons of this preſent parliament aſſembled, and by the authority of the ſame, that no biſhop or ordinary ſhall commit or detain in priſon any ſuſpected perſon or perſons for the catholic faith, except he or they have ſpoken, written, or done ſome manifeſt act againſt the catholic faith; and the ſame to be lawfully proved againſt every ſuch perſon or perſons, by the teſtimony of two lawful witneſſes, to be brought before the ſaid perſon or perſons ſo accuſed, before he or they ſhall either be committed to priſon, or convicted for any ſuch offence or offences; the ſaid former ſtatute, made in the ſaid firſt and ſecond year of our ſaid ſovereign lord and lady notwithſtanding: whereby your ſaid orator ſhall not only be ſet at liberty, and divers other more remaining in priſon, but alſo the blood of divers of the queen's majeſties true and faithful ſubjects preſerved.

The Condemnation of the worthy Martyr of God John Philpot.

THESE books, letters, ſupplications, and other matters being thus read, the biſhop demanded of him, if the book intituled, "The true report of the diſputation, &c." were of his penning, or not? Whereunto Philpot anſwered, That it was a good and true book, and of his own penning and ſetting forth.

The biſhops growing weary, and not being able by any ſufficient ground, either of God's word, or of the true ancient catholic fathers, to convince and overcome him, fell by fair and flattering ſpeech to perſuade with him; promiſing, that if he would revoke his opinions, and come again to the Romiſh and Babylonical church, he ſhould not only be pardoned that which was paſt, but alſo they would with all favour and chearfulneſs of heart, receive him again as a true member thereof. Which words when Bonner ſaw would take no place, he demanded of Mr. Philpot (and that with a charitable affection, I warrant you) whether he had any juſt cauſe to alledge why he ſhould not condemn him as an heretic. Well, quoth Mr. Philpot, your idolatrous ſacrament, which you have found out, ye would fain defend; but yet cannot, nor ever ſhall.

In the end the biſhop, ſeeing his unmoveable ſtedfaſtneſs in the truth, did openly pronounce the ſentence of condemnation againſt him. In the reading whereof, when he came to theſe words, And you an obſtinate, pernicious and impenitent heretic, &c. Mr. Philpot ſaid, I thank God that I am an heretic out of your curſed church; I am no heretic before God. But God bleſs you, and give oyu you once grace to repent your wicked doings, and let all men beware of your bloody church.

Moreover, whilſt Bonner was about the midſt of the ſentence, the biſhop of Bath pulled him by the ſleeve, and ſaid, My lord, my lord, know of him firſt whether he will recant, or no. Then Bonner ſaid (full like himſelf) O let him alone; and ſo read forth the ſentence.

And when he had done, he delivered him to the ſheriffs; and ſo two officers brought him through the biſhop's houſe into Pater-noſter-row, and there his ſervant met him; and when he ſaw him, he ſaid, Ah, dear maſter.

Then Mr. Philpot ſaid to his man, Content thyſelf, I ſhall do well enough; for thou ſhalt ſee me again.

And ſo the officers thruſt him away, and took him to Newgate; and as he went, he ſaid to the people, Ah, good people, bleſſed be God for this day; and ſo the officers delivered him to the keeper. Then his man thruſt to go in after his maſter, and one of the officers ſaid unto him, Hence, fellow, what wouldſt thou have? And he ſaid, I would go to ſpeak with my maſter. Mr. Philpot then turned him about, and ſaid to him, To-morrow thou ſhalt ſpeak with me.

Then the under keeper ſaid to Mr. Philpot, Is this your man? and he ſaid, Yea. So he gave his man leave to go in with him. And Mr. Philpot and his man were turned into a little chamber on the right-hand, and there remained a ſhort time, until Alexander the chief keeper came unto him; who, at his entering, greeted him in theſe words, Ah, ſaid he, haſt not thou done well to bring thyſelf hither? Well, ſaid Mr. Philpot, I muſt be content, for it is God's appointment; and I ſhall deſire you to let me have your gentle favour, for you and I have been of old acquaintance. Well, ſaid Alexander, I will ſhew thee gentleneſs and favour, ſo thou wilt be ruled by me. Then ſaid Mr. Philpot, I pray you ſhew me what you would have me to do.

He ſaid, If you would recant, I will ſhew you any pleaſure I can. Nay, ſaid Mr. Philpot, I will never recant, whilſt I have my life, that which I have ſpoken; for it is moſt certain truth, and in witneſs hereof I will ſeal it with my blood. Then Alexander ſaid, This is the ſaying of the whole pack of you heretics. Whereupon he commanded him to be ſet upon the block, and as many irons upon his legs as he could bear, becauſe he would not follow his wicked mind.

Then the clerk told Alexander in his ear, that Mr. Philpot had given his man money. And Alexander ſaid to his man, What money hath thy maſter given thee? He anſwered, My maſter hath given me none. No! ſaid Alexander, hath he given thee none? That will I know, for I will ſearch thee.

Do with me what you liſt, and ſearch me all that you can, quoth his ſervant; he hath given me a token or two to ſend to his friends, as to his brother and ſiſters. Ah, ſaid Alexander unto Mr. Philpot, thou art a maintaining of heretics; thy man ſhould have gone to ſome of thine affinity, but he ſhall be known well enough. Nay, ſaid Mr. Philpot, I do ſend it to my friends; there he is, let him make anſwer to it. But, good Mr. Alexander, be ſo much my friend, that theſe irons may be taken off. Well, ſaid Alexander, give me my fees, and I will take them off; if not, thou ſhalt wear them ſtill.

Then ſaid Mr. Philpot, Sir, what is your fee? He ſaid, Four pounds was his fee. Ah, ſaid Mr. Philpot, I have not ſo much; I am but a poor man, and I have been long in priſon. What wilt thou give me then, ſaid Alexander? Sir, ſaid he, I will give you twenty ſhillings, and that I will ſend my man for, or elſe I will lay my gown to gage; for the time is not long I am ſure, that I ſhall be with you; for the biſhop ſaid unto me, that I ſhould be ſoon diſpatched.

Then Alexander ſaid unto him, What is that to me? And with that he departed from him, and commanded him to be laid into Limbo, and ſo his commandment was fulfilled; but before he could be taken from the block, the clerk would have a groat.

Then one Witterence, ſteward of the houſe, took him on his back, and carried him down, his man knew not whither. Wherefore Mr. Philpot ſaid to his man, Go to Mr. Sheriff, and ſhew him how I am uſed, and deſire Mr. Sheriff to be good unto me; and ſo his ſervant went ſtraitway, and took an honeſt man with him.

And when they came to Mr. Sheriff (which was Mr. Macham) and ſhewed him how Mr. Philpot was handled in Newgate; the ſheriff hearing this, took his ring off from his finger, and delivered it unto that honeſt man which came with Mr. Philpot's man, and bade him go unto Alexander the keeper, and commanded him to take off his irons, and to handle him more gently, and to give his man again that which he had taken from him.

And when they came again to the ſaid Alexander, and delivered their meſſage from the ſheriff, Alexander took the ring, and ſaid, Ah, I perceive that Mr. Sheriff is a bearer with him, and all ſuch heretics as he is, therefore to-morrow I will ſhew it to his betters: yet at ten of the clock he went in to Mr. Philpot, where he lay, and took off his irons, and gave him ſuch things as he had taken before from his ſervant.

Upon Tueſday at ſupper, being the ſeventeenth day of December, there came a meſſenger from the ſheriffs, and bade Mr. Philpot make him ready, for the next day he ſhould ſuffer, and be burned at a ſtake with fire. Mr. Philpot anſwered and ſaid, I am ready; God grant me ſtrength, and a joyful reſurrection. And ſo he went into his chamber, and poured out his ſpirit unto the Lord God, giving him moſt hearty thanks, that he of his mercy had made him worthy to ſuffer for his truth.

In the morning the ſheriffs came according to the order, about eight of the clock, and called for him, and he moſt joyfully came down unto them. And there his man met him, and ſaid, Ah, dear maſter, farewel. His maſter ſaid unto him, Serve God, and he will help thee. And ſo he went with the ſheriffs to the place of execution; and when he was entering into Smithfield, the way was foul, and two officers took him up to bear him to the ſtake. Then he ſaid, merrily, What! will ye make me a pope? I am content to go to my journey's end on foot. But firſt coming into Smithfield, he kneeled down there, ſaying theſe words, "I will pay my vows in thee, O Smithfield."

And when he was come to the place of ſuffering, he kiſſed the ſtake, and ſaid, Shall I diſdain to ſuffer at this ſtake, ſeeing my Redeemer did not refuſe to ſuffer moſt vile death upon the croſs for me? And then with an obedient heart full meekly he ſaid the 106, 107 and 108th Pſalms: and when he had made an end of all his prayers, he ſaid to the officers, What have you done for me? and every one of them declared what they had done; and he gave money to them.

Then they bound him to the ſtake, and ſet fire to that conſtant martyr; who the eighteenth day of December, in the midſt of the fiery flames, yielded his ſoul into the hands of Almighty God, and, like a lamb, gave up his breath, his body being conſumed into aſhes.

Thus haſt thou, gentle reader, the life and actions of this learned and worthy ſoldier of the Lord, John Philpot; with all his examinations that came to our hands: firſt penned and written with his own hand, being marvellouſly preſerved from the ſight and hand of his enemies; who by all manner of means ſought not only to ſtop him from all writing, but alſo to ſpoil and deprive him of that which he had written. For which cauſe he was many times ſtripped and ſearched in the priſon by his keeper: but yet ſo happily theſe his writings were conveyed and hid in places about him, or elſe his keeper's eyes ſo blinded, that notwithſtanding all this malicious purpoſe of the biſhops they are yet remaining and come to light.

A Prayer

A Prayer to be ſaid at the Stake, of all them that God ſhall account worthy to ſuffer for his Sake.

MErciful God and Father, to whom our Saviour Chriſt approached in his fear and need, by reaſon of death, and found comfort; gracious God and moſt bounteous Chriſt, on whom Stephen called in his extreme need, and received ſtrength: moſt benign Aoly Spirit, which in the midſt of all croſſes of death didſt comfort the apoſtle St. Paul with more conſolations in Chriſt, than he felt ſorrows and terrors, have mercy upon me a miſerable, vile, and wretched ſinner, which now draws near the gates of death, deſerved both in ſoul and body eternally, by reaſon of manifold, horrible, old and new tranſgreſſions, which to thine eyes, O Lord, are open and known: O be merciful unto me for the bitter death and blood ſhedding of thine own only Son Jeſus Chriſt. And though thy juſtice doth require (in reſpect of my ſins) that now thou ſhouldeſt not hear me, meaſuring me in the ſame meaſure I have meaſured thy Majeſty, contemning thy daily calls; yet let thy mercy which is above all thy works, and wherewith the earth is filled, let thy mercy, I ſay, prevail towards me, through and for the mediation of Chriſt our Saviour. And for whoſe ſake in that it hath pleaſed thee to bring me forth now as one of his witneſſes, and a record-bearer of thy verity and truth taught by him, to give my life therefore (to which dignity I do acknowledge, dear God, that there was never any ſo unworthy and ſo unmeet, no not the thief that hanged with him on the croſs:) I moſt humbly therefore pray thee that thou wouldſt accordingly aid, help, and aſſiſt me with thy ſtrength and heavenly grace, that with Chriſt thy Son I may find comfort, with Stephen I may ſee thy preſence, and gracious power, with Paul, and all others, who for thy name's ſake have ſuffered afflictions and death, I may find ſo preſent with me thy gracious conſolations, that I may by my death glorify thy holy name, propagate and ratify thy verity, comfort the hearts of the heavy, confirm thy church in thy truth, convert ſome that are to be converted, and ſo depart forth of this miſerable world, where I do daily heap ſin upon ſin, and ſo enter into the fruition of thy bleſſed mercy; whereof now give and increaſe in me a lively truſt, ſenſe and feeling, where through the terrors of death, the torments of fire, the pangs of ſin, the darts of Satan, and the dolours of hell may never depreſs me, but may be driven away through the working of that moſt gracious Spirit; which now plenteouſly endue me withal, that through the ſame Spirit I may offer (as I now deſire to do in Chriſt by him) myſelf wholly, ſoul and body, to be a lively ſacrifice, holy and acceptable in thy ſight. Dear Father, whoſe I am, and always have been, even from my mother's womb, yea even before the world was made, to whom I commend myſelf, ſoul and body, family and friends, country and all the whole church, yea even my very enemies, according to thy good pleaſure; beſeeching thee intirely to give once more to this realm of England the bleſſing of thy word again, with godly peace, to the teaching and ſetting forth of the ſame. O dear Father, now give me grace to come unto thee. Purge and ſo purify me by this fire in Chriſt's death and paſſion through thy Spirit, that I may be a burnt-offering of a ſweet ſmell in thy ſight, who liveſt and reigneſt with the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, now and for evermore, world without end, Amen.

Mr. Philpot's Letter to a Chriſtian Congregation, exhorting them to refrain from Idolatry, and to ſerve God after his Word.

IT is a lamentable thing to behold at this preſent in England the faithleſs departing both of men and women, from the true knowledge and uſe of Chriſt's ſincere religion which ſo plentifully they have been taught, and do know, their own conſciences bearing witneſs to the verity thereof. If that earth be curſed of God, which ſoon receiving moiſture and pleaſant dews from heaven, doth not bring forth fruit accordingly; how much more grievous judgment ſhall ſuch perſons receive, who having received from the Father of heaven the perfect knowledge of his word by the miniſtry thereof, do not ſhew forth God's worſhip after the ſame? If the Lord will require in the day of judgment a godly uſury of all manner of talents which he lendeth unto men and women, how much more will he require the ſame of his pure religion revealed unto us (which is of all other talents the chief, and moſt pertaining to our exerciſe in this life) if we hide the ſame in a napkin, and ſet it not forth to the uſury of God's glory, and edifying of his church by true confeſſion? God hath kindled the bright light of his goſpel, which in times paſt was ſuppreſſed, and hid under the vile aſhes of man's traditions, and hath cauſed the brightneſs thereof to ſhine in our hearts, to the end that the ſame might ſhine before men, to the honour of his name. It is not only given us to believe, but alſo to confeſs and declare what we believe in our outward converſation. For, as St. Paul writeth to the Romans, "The belief of the heart juſtifieth, and to acknowledge with the mouth maketh a man ſafe." It is all one before God, not to believe at all, and not to ſhew forth the lively works of our belief. For Chriſt ſaith, "Either make the tree good and his fruits good; or elſe make the tree evil and the fruits evil; becauſe a good tree bringeth forth good fruits, and an evil tree bringeth forth evil fruits." So that the perſon who knoweth his maſter's will, and doth it not, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes. And not all they who ſay, Lord, Lord, ſhall enter into the kingdom of God, but he that doth the the will of the Father. And, "Whoſoever, in the time of trial, is aſhamed of me (ſaith Chriſt) and of my words, of him the Son of man will be aſhamed before his Father." And after that we have built ourſelves into the true church of God, it hath pleaſed him, by giving us over into the hands of the wicked ſynagogues, to prove our building, and to have it known as well to the world as to ourſelves, that we have been wiſe builders into the true church of God upon the rock, and not on the ſand, and therefore now the tempeſt is riſen, and the ſtorms do mightily blow againſt us, that we might notwithſtanding ſtand upright, and be firm in the Lord, to his honour and glory, and to our eternal felicity. There is now no new thing happened unto us, for with ſuch tempeſts and dangerous weathers the church of God hath continually been exerciſed. Now once again, as the prophet Haggai tells us, "The Lord ſhaketh the earth, that thoſe might abide for ever, which be not overcome.

Therefore my dearly beloved, be ſtable and immoveable in the word of God, and in the faithful obſervation thereof, and let no man deceive you with vain words, ſaying, that you may keep your faith to yourſelves, and diſſemble with Antichriſt, and to live at reſt and quietneſs in the world, as moſt men do, yielding to neceſſity. This is the wiſdom of the fleſh; but the wiſdom of the fleſh is death and enmity to God, as our Saviour for example, aptly did declare in Peter, who exhorteth Chriſt not to go to Jeruſalem to celebrate the paſſover, and there to be ſlain, but counſelled him to look better to himſelf.

Likewiſe the world would not have us to forſake it, neither to aſſociate ourſelves to the true church, which is the body of Chriſt, whereof we are lively members, and to uſe the ſacraments after God's word with the danger of our lives. But we muſt learn to anſwer the world as Chriſt did Peter, and ſay, "Go behind me, Satan, thou ſavoureſt not the things of God. Shall I not drink of the cup which the Father giveth me?" For it is better to be afflicted and to be ſlain in the church of God than be counted the ſon of the king in the ſynagogue of falſe religion. Death for righteouſneſs is not to be abhorred, but but rather to be desired, which assuredly bringeth with it the crown of everlasting glory. These bloody executioners do not persecute Christ's martyrs, but crown them with everlasting felicity: we were born into this world to be witnesses unto the truth, both learned and unlearned.

Now since the time is come that we must shew our faith, and declare whether we will be God's servants in righteousness and holiness, as we have been taught, and are bound to follow, or else with hypocrisy to serve unrighteousness: let us take good heed that we be found faithful in the Lord's covenant, and true members of his church, in which through knowledge we are ingrafted; from which if we fall by transgression with the common sort of people, it will more straightly be required of us, than many yet do make account thereof. We cannot serve two masters; we may not halt on both sides, and think to please God: we must be fervent in God's cause, or else he will cast us out from him. For by the first commandment we are commanded to love God with all our heart, with all our mind, with all our power and strength: But they are manifest transgressors of this commandment, which with their heart, mind, or bodily power, do communicate with a strange religion, contrary to the word of God, in the papistical synagogue, which calleth itself the church, and is not. As greatly do they offend God now which so do, as the Israelites did in times past by forsaking Jerusalem, the true church of God, and by going to Bethel to serve God in a congregation of their own setting up, and after their own imaginations and traditions: for which doing God utterly destroyed all Israel, as all the prophets almost do testify. This happened unto them for our ensample, that we might beware to have any fellowship with any like congregation to our destruction.

God hath one catholic church dispersed throughout the world, and therefore we are taught in our creed to believe one catholic church, and to have communion therewith: which catholic church is grounded upon the foundation of the prophets and of the apostles, and upon none other, as St. Paul witnesseth to the Ephesians. Therefore wheresoever we perceive any people to worship God truly after his word, there we may be certain the church of Christ to be; unto which we ought to associate ourselves, and to desire with the prophet David, to praise God in the midst of his church. But if we behold, through the iniquity of the time, segregations to be made with counterfeit religion, otherwise than the word of God doth teach, we ought then, if we be required, to be companions thereof, to say again with David, "I have hated the synagogue of the malignant, and will not sit with the wicked." In the Revelations the church of Ephesus is highly commended, because she tried such as said they were apostles, and were not indeed, and therefore would not abide the company of them. Further, God commanded his people, that they should not seek Bethel, neither enter into Gilgal where idolatry was used, by the mouth of his prophet Amos; Also we must consider, that our bodies be the temple of God, and whosoever (as St. Paul teacheth) doth prophane the temple of God, him the Lord will destroy. May we then take the temple of Christ, and make it the member of an harlot? All strange religion and idolatry is accounted whoredom with the prophets, and more detestable in the sight of God than the adventurous abuse of the body.

Therefore the princes of the earth, in the Revelations of St. John, are said to go a whoring, when they are in love with false religion, and follow the same. How then by any means may a Christian man think it tolerable to be present at the popish private mass (which is the very prophanation of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ) and at other idolatrous worshippings and rites, which be not after the word of God, but rather to the derogation thereof, in setting man's traditions above God's precepts, since God by his word judgeth all strange religion, which is not according to his institution, for whoredom and adultery?

Some fondly think that the presence of the body is not material, so that the heart do not consent to their wicked doings. But such persons little consider what St. Paul writeth to the Corinthians, commanding them to glorify God as well in body as in soul.

Moreover, we can do no greater injury to the true church of Christ, than to seem to have forsaken her, and disallow her by cleaving of her adversary: whereby it appeareth to others which be weak, that we allow the same; and so contrary to the word, do give a great offence to the church of God, and do outwardly slander, as much as men may, the truth of Christ. But wo be unto him by whom any such offence cometh. Better it were for him to have a mill-stone tied about his neck, and to be cast into the sea. Such be traitors to the truth, like unto Judas, who with a kiss betrayed Christ. Our God is a jealous God, and cannot be content that we should be of any other than of that unspotted church, whereof he is the head only, and wherein he hath planted us by baptism. This jealousy which God hath towards us, will cry for vengeance in the day of vengeance, against all such as now have so large consciences to do that which is contrary to God's glory, and the sincerity of his word, except they do in time repent, and cleave inseparably to the gospel of Christ, how much soever at this present both men and women otherwise in their own corrupt judgment do flatter themselves. God willeth us to judge uprightly and to allow and follow that which is holy and acceptable in his sight, and to abstain from all manner of evil, and therefore Christ commandeth us in the gospel to beware of the leaven of the pharisees, which is hypocrisy.

St. Paul to the Hebrews saith, "If any man withdraw himself from the faith, his soul shall have no pleasure in him: therefore he saith also, "That we are none such as do withdraw ourselves unto perdition, but we belong unto faith, for the attainment of life." St. John in the Revelations telleth us plainly, that none of those who are written in the book of life, do receive the mark of the beast, which is of the papistical synagogue, either in their foreheads, or else in their hands, that is, apparently or obediently.

St. Paul to the Philippians affirmeth, that we may not have any fellowship with the works of darkness, but in the midst of this wicked and froward generation we ought to shine like lights upholding the word of truth. Further he saith, that we may not touch any unclean thing; which signifieth, that our outward conversation in foreign things ought to be pure and undefiled as well as the inward, that with a clean spirit and rectified body we might serve God justly in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life.

Finally, in the 18th of the Revelations, God bideth us plainly to depart from the Babalonical synagogue, and not to be partakers of her trespass. St. Paul to the Thessalonians commandeth us, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to withdraw ourselves from every brother that walketh inordinately, and not according to the institution which he hath received of him.

Ponder ye therefore well, good brethren and sisters, these scriptures which be written for your erudition and reformation, whereof one jot is not written in vain: which be utterly against all counterfeit illusion to be used by us with the papists in their fantastical religion, and be adversaries to all them that have so light consciences in so doing: And if they do not agree with this adversary (I mean the word of God) which is contrary to their attempts, he will (as is signified in the gospel) deliver them to the judge, which is Christ; and the judge will deliver them to the Executioner, that is the devil: and the devil shall commit them to the horrible prison of hell-fire (where is the portion of all hypocrites) with sulphur and brimſtone, with wailing and gnaſhing of teeth, world without end. But yet many will ſay for their vain excuſe, God is merciful, and his mercy is over all. But the ſcripture teacheth us, That curſed is he that ſinneth upon hope of forgiveneſs. Truth it is, that the mercy of God is above all his works, and yet but upon ſuch as fear him: for it is written in the Pſalms, "The mercy of God is on them that fear him." Where we may learn, that they only put their truſt in God, that ſerve him; and to fear God, is to turn from evil and do that is good. So that ſuch as do look to be partakers in God's mercy, may not abide in that which is known to be manifeſt evil and deteſtable in the ſight of God.

Another ſort of perſons do make them a cloak for the rain under the pretence of obedience to the magiſtrates, whom we ought to obey although they be wicked. But ſuch muſt learn of Chriſt to give to Cæſar that is Cæſar's, and to God that is due to God, and with St. Peter to obey the higher powers in the Lord, although they be evil, if they command nothing contrary to God's word, otherwiſe we ought not to obey their commandments, although we ſhould ſuffer death for it, as we have the apoſtles for our example herein to follow, who anſwered the magiſtrates as we ought to do in this caſe, not obeying their wicked precepts, ſaying, "Judge you whether it be more righteous that we ſhould obey man rather than God."

Alſo Daniel choſe rather to be caſt into the den of lions to be devoured, than to obey the king's wicked commandments. If the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch. There is no excuſe for the tranſgreſſion of God's word, whether a man doth it voluntary or at commandment, although great damnation is to them, by whom the offence cometh. Some others there be that for an extreme refuge in their evil-doings, do run to God's predeſtination and election, ſaying, that if I be elected of God to ſalvation, I ſhall be ſaved whatſoever I do. But ſuch be great tempters of God, and abominable blaſphemers of God's holy election, and caſt themſelves down from the pinnacle of the temple in preſumption, that God may preſerve them by his angels through predeſtination. Such verily may reckon themſelves to be none of God's elect children, that will do evil that good may enſue; whoſe damnation is juſt, as St. Paul ſaith. God's predeſtination and election ought to be with a ſimple eye conſidered, to make us more warily to walk in good and godly converſation according to God's word, and not to ſet cock in the hoop, and put all on God's back to do wickedly at large: for the elect children of God muſt walk in righteouſneſs and holineſs after they be once called to the true knowledge. For ſo ſaith St. Paul to the Epheſians, "That God hath choſen us before the foundations of the world were laid, that we ſhould be holy and blameleſs in his ſight."

Therefore St. Peter willeth us through good works to make our vocation and election certain to ourſelves, which we know not but by the good working of God's Spirit in us, according to the rule of the goſpel; and he that conformeth not himſelf to the ſame in godly converſation, may juſtly tremble, and doubt that he is none of the elect children of God, but of the viperous generation, and a child of darkneſs. For the children of light will walk in the works of light and not of darkneſs, though they fall, they do not lie ſtill.

Let all vain excuſes be ſet apart, and whilſt ye have light, as Chriſt commandeth, believe the light and abide in the ſame, leſt eternal darkneſs overtake you unawares. The light is come into the world, but (alas) men love darkneſs more than light. God give us his pure eye-ſalve to heal our blindneſs in this behalf. O that men and women would be healed, and not ſeek to be wilfully blinded. The Lord open their eyes, that they may ſee how dangerous a thing it is to decline from the knowledge of truth, contrary to their conſcience.

But what ſaid I, conſcience? Many affirm their conſcience will bear them well enough to do all that they do, and to go to the idolatrous church to ſervice; whoſe conſcience is very large to ſatisfy man more than God. And although their conſcience can bear them ſo to do, yet I am ſure that a good conſcience will not permit them ſo to do; which cannot be good, unleſs it be directed after the knowledge of God's word; and therefore in Latin this feeling mind is called Conſcientia, which ſoundeth by interpretation, as much as with knowledge.

And therefore if our conſcience be led of herſelf, and not after true knowledge, yet we are not ſo to be excuſed, as St. Paul beareth witneſs, ſaying, "Although my conſcience accuſeth me not, yet in this I am not juſtified." And he joineth a good conſcience with theſe three ſiſters, charity, a pure heart, and unfeigned faith. Charity keepeth God's commandments, a pure heart loveth and feareth God above all, and unfeigned faith is never aſhamed of the profeſſion of the goſpel, whatſoever damage he ſhall ſuffer in body thereby. The Lord who hath revealed his holy will unto us by his word, grant us never to be aſhamed of it, and give us grace ſo earneſtly to cleave to his word, and the true church, that for no manner of worldly reſpect we become partakers of the works of hypocriſy, which God doth abhor: ſo that we may be found faithful in the Lord's teſtament to the end, both in heart, word and deed, to the glory of God and our everlaſting ſalvation, Amen.

John Philpot, priſoner in the King's Bench, for the teſtimony of the truth. 1555.

Mr. Philpot's Letter to Mr. John Careleſs, Priſoner in the King's Bench.

MY dearly beloved brother Careleſs, I have received your loving letters full of love and compaſſion, inſomuch that they made my hard heart to weep, to ſee you ſo careful for one that hath been ſo unprofitable a member as I have been, and am in Chriſt's church. God make me worthy of that I am called unto, and I pray you ceaſe not to pray for me, but ceaſe to weep for him, who hath not deſerved ſuch gentle tears: and praiſe God with me, for that I now approach to the company of them, whoſe want you may worthily lament; God give your pitiful heart his inward conſolation. Indeed my dear Careleſs, I am in this world in hell, and in the ſhadow of death; but he that hath brought me for my deſerts down into hell, ſhall ſhortly lift me up to heaven, where I ſhall look continually for your coming, and other my faithful brethren in the King's-Bench. And though I tell you that I am in hell in the judgment of this world, yet aſſuredly I feel in the ſame the conſolation of heaven, I praiſe God: and this loathſome and horrible priſon is as pleaſant to me, as the walk in the garden of the King's Bench.

You know, brother Careleſs, that the way to heaven out of this life is very narrow, and we muſt ſtrive to enter in at a narrow gate. If God do mitigate the uglineſs of mine impriſonment, what will he do in the rage of fire whereunto I am appointed? And this hath happened unto me, that I might be hereafter an enſample of comfort, if the like happen unto you, or to any other of my dear brethren with you in theſe cruel days, in which the devil ſo rageth at the faithful flock of Chriſt, but in vain (I truſt) againſt any of us, who be perſuaded that neither life, neither death is able to ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt's goſpel, which is God's high treaſure committed to our brittle veſſels to glorify us by the ſame. God of his mercy make us faithful ſtewards to the end, and give us grace to fear nothing whatſoever in his good pleaſure we ſhall ſuffer for the ſame. That I have not written unto you ere this, the cauſe is our ſtrait keeping and the want of of light by night; for the day ſerveth us but a while in our dark cloſet. This is the firſt letter that I have written ſince I came to priſon, beſides the report of mine examinations; and I am fain to ſcribble it out in haſte.

Commend me to all our faithful brethren, and bid them with a good courage look for their redemption, and frame themſelves to be hearty ſoldiers in Chriſt. They have taken his preſt money a great while, and now let them ſhew themſelves ready to ſerve him faithfully, and not to fly out of the Lord's camp into the world, as many do. Let them remember, that in the revelations, the fearful be excluded the kingdom. Let us be of good cheer, for our Lord overcame the world, that we ſhould do the like. Bleſſed is the ſervant, whom when the Lord cometh, he findeth watching. O let us watch and pray earneſtly one for another, that we be not led into temptation. Be joyful under the croſs, and praiſe the Lord continually, for this is the whole burnt-ſacrifice which the Lord delighteth in. Commend me to my father Hunt, and deſire him to love and continue in the unity of Chriſt's true church, which he hath begun, and then will he make me more and more to joy under my croſs with him. Tell my brother Clements that he hath comforted me much by his loving token in ſignification of an unfeigned unity with us; let him increaſe my joy unto the end perfectly. The Lord of peace be with you all. Salute my loving friends, Mr. Mering, Mr. Crooch, with the reſt, and eſpecially Mr. Marſhal, and his wife, with great thanks for his kindneſs ſhewed unto me. Farewell my dear Careleſs. I have dallied with the devil a while, but I am over the ſhoes: God ſend me well out.

Out of the Coal-houſe, by your brother,
John Philpot.

Another Letter to Mr. John Careleſs, profitable to be read by all thoſe who mourn for, and repent of their Sins.

THE God of all comfort, and the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ſend unto thee, my dear brother Careleſs, the inward conſolation of the Holy Spirit, in all the malicious aſſaults and troublous temptations of our common adverſary the devil, Amen.

That God giveth you ſo contrite a heart for your ſins, I cannot but rejoice to behold the lively mark of the children of God, whoſe property is to think more lowly and meanly of themſelves than of any other, and oftentimes do ſet their ſins before them, that they might the more be ſtirred to bring forth the fruits of repentance, and learn to mourn in this world, that in another they might be glad and rejoice. Such a broken heart is a pleaſant ſacrifice unto God: O that I had the like contrite heart. God mollify my ſtony heart, which lamenteth not in ſuch wiſe my former deteſtable iniquities. Praiſed be God that he hath given you this ſorrowful heart in reſpect of righteouſneſs, and I pray you let me be partaker of theſe godly ſorrows for ſin, which be the teſtimony of the preſence of the Holy Ghoſt. Did not the ſword of ſorrow pierce the heart of the elect and bleſſed mother of our Lord? Did not Peter weep bitterly for his ſins, which was ſo beloved of Chriſt? Did not Mary Magdalen waſh the feet of our Saviour with her tears, and received therewithal remiſſion of her ſevenfold ſins?

Be of good comfort therefore, mine own dear heart, in this thy ſorrow, for it is the earneſt penny of eternal conſolation. In thy ſorrow laugh, for the Spirit of God is with thee. Bleſſed be they (ſaith Chriſt) that mourn, for they ſhall be comforted. They went forth and wept, ſaith the prophet, ſuch ſhall come again having their gripes full of gladneſs. And altho' a ſorrowful heart, in conſideration of his ſins, be an acceptable ſacrifice before God, whereby we are ſtirred up to more thankfulneſs unto God, knowing that much is forgiven us that we might love the more, yet the man of God muſt keep a meaſure in the ſame, leſt he be ſwallowed up by much ſorrow. St. Paul would not that the Theſſalonians ſhould be ſorry as other men without hope: ſuch a ſorrow is not commendable, but worketh damnation, and is far from the children of God, who are continually ſorrowful in God when they look upon their own unworthineſs, with hope of forgiveneſs. For God to this end by his Spirit ſetteth the ſins of his elect ſtill before them, that where they perceive ſin to abound, there they might be aſſured that grace ſhall ſuper-abound; and bring down unto hell, that he might lift them up with greater joy unto heaven. Wherefore, mine own bowels in Chriſt, as long as you are not void altogether of hope; be not diſmayed thro' your penſive heart for your ſins, how huge ſoever they have been, for God is able to forgive more than you are able to ſin: yea, and he will forgive him who with hope is ſorry for his ſins.

But know, brother, that as oft as we do go about, by the help of God's Spirit to do that is good, the evil ſpirit Satan layeth hard wait to turn the good unto evil, and goeth about to dung the deteſtable weeds of deſperation with the godly ſorrow of a pure penitent heart. You be not ignorant of his malicious ſubtilty, and how that continually he aſſaulted that good which the grace of God planteth. I ſee the battle betwixt you and him, but the victory is yours, yea, and that daily: for you have laid hold upon the anchor of ſalvation, which is hope in Chriſt, which will not ſuffer you to be made aſhamed.

Be not diſcontented that you have this conflict: but be glad that God hath given you the ſame to try your faith, and that you might appear daily worthy of the kingdom of God, for which you ſtrive. God beholdeth your ſtriving faith againſt Satan, and is pleaſed with your mighty reſiſtance. The Spirit which is in you, is mightier than all the adverſary's power. Tempt he may, and lying in wait at your heels, give you a fall unawares; but overcome he ſhall not; yea, he cannot, for you are ſealed up already with a lively faith to be the child of God for ever: and whom God hath once ſealed for his own, him he never utterly forſaketh.

The juſt falleth ſeven times, but he riſeth again. It is man's frailty to fall, but it is the property of the devil's child to lie ſtill.

This ſtrife againſt ſin is a ſufficient teſtimony that you are the child of God: for if you were not, you would feel no ſuch malice as he now troubleth you withal. When this ſtrong Goliah hath the hold, all things are in peace which he poſſeſſeth: and becauſe he hath you not, he will not ſuffer you unaſſaulted. But ſtand faſt, and hold out the buckler of faith, and with the ſword of God's promiſes ſmite him on the ſcalp; that he may receive a deadly wound, and never be able to ſtand againſt you any more. St. James telleth you he is but a coward, ſaying, "Reſiſt the devil, and he will flee from thee." It is the will of God that he ſhould thus long tempt you, and not go away as yet; or elſe he had done with you long ere this. He knoweth already that he ſhall receive the foil at your hands, and increaſe the crown of your glory: for he that overcometh ſhall be crowned. Therefore glory in your temptations, ſince they ſhall turn to your felicity. Be not afraid of your continual aſſaults, which be occaſions of your daily victory. The word of God abideth for ever. In what hour ſoever a ſinner repenteth him of his ſins, they be forgiven. Who can lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Do you not perceive the manifeſt tokens of your election? Firſt, your vocation to the goſpel, and after your vocation, the manifeſt gifts of the Spirit of God given unto you above many other of your condition, with godlineſs which believeth and yieldeth to the authority of the ſcriptures, and is zealous for the ſame? Seeing you are God's own darlings, who can hurt you? Be not of a dejected mind for theſe temptations, neither make your unfeigned friends to be more ſorrowful for you than need doth require.

Since God hath willed you at your baptiſm in Chriſt to be careleſs, why do you make yourſelf careful? Caſt all your care on him. Set the Lord before your eyes always, for he is on your right ſide, that you ſhould not be then moved. Behold the goodneſs of God towards me. I am careleſs, being faſt incloſed in a pair of ſtocks, which pinch me for very ſtraitneſs; and will you be careful? I would not have that unſeemly addition to your name. Be as your name pretendeth, for doubtleſs you have no other cauſe but ſo to be. Pray, I beſeech you, that I may be ſtill careleſs in my careful eſtate, as you have cauſe to be careleſs in your eaſier condition. Be thankful, and put away all care, and then I ſhall be joyful in my ſtrait preſent care. Commend me to all our brethren, and deſire them to pray for me, that I may overcome my temptations: for the devil rageth againſt me. I am put in the ſtocks in a place alone, becauſe I would not anſwer to ſuch articles as they would charge me withal in a corner at the biſhop's appointment, and becauſe I did not come to maſs when the biſhop ſent for me. By God's grace, I will lie all the days of my life in the ſtocks, rather than I will conſent to the wicked generation. Praiſe God, and be joyful, that it hath pleaſed him to make us worthy to ſuffer ſomewhat for his name's ſake. The devil muſt rage for ten days. Commend me to Mr. F—, and thank him for his law-books: but neither law nor equity will take any place among theſe blood-thirſty. I wiſh for your ſake the unjuſt dealing were noted unto the parliament-houſe, if it might avail. God ſhorten theſe evil days. I have anſwered the biſhop meetly plain already; and I ſaid unto him, If he will call me in open judgment, I will anſwer him as plainly as he ſhall require; otherwiſe I have refuſed, becauſe I fear they will condemn me in hugger-mugger. The peace of God be with you, my dear brother. I can write no more for lack of light, and that which I have written I cannot read myſelf, and God knoweth it is written very uneaſily. I pray God you may pick out ſome underſtanding of my mind towards you. Written in a coal-houſe of darkneſs, out of a pair of painful ſtocks, by thine own in Chriſt.

John Philpot.

Another Letter of Mr. Philpot, to certain godly Women, who forſook their own Country for the Goſpel, full of fruitful Precepts.

THE Spirit of truth, revealed unto you my dearly beloved by the goſpel of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, be continually abiding with you, and augmented into a perfect building of you into the lively temple of God, through the mighty operation of his holy power, Amen.

I read in the Evangeliſts, of certain godly women, that miniſtered unto Chriſt, following him in the days of his paſſion, and never forſook him, but being dead in his grave, brought oil to anoint him, until he had ſhewed himſelf unto them after his reſurrection, and bidding them ſhew unto his diſciples, which at his paſſion were diſperſed, and tell them that he was riſen, and that they ſhould ſee him in Galilee. To whom I may juſtly compare you (my loving ſiſters in Chriſt), who of late have ſeen him ſuffer in his members, and have miniſtred to their neceſſity, anointing them with the comfortable oil of your charitable aſſiſtance, even to the death: and now ſince ye have ſeen Chriſt to live in the aſhes of them whom the tyrants have ſlain, he willed you to go away upon juſt occaſion offered you, and to declare to our diſperſed brethren and ſiſters that he is riſen, and liveth in his elect members in England, and by death doth overcome infidelity, and that they ſhall ſee him in Galilee, which is by forſaking this world, and by a faithful deſire to paſs out of this world by thoſe ways, which he with his holy martyrs hath gone on before.

God therefore (intire ſiſters) direct your way, as he did Abraham and Tobias unto a ſtrange land. God give you health both of body and ſoul, that ye may go from virtue to virtue, and go from ſtrength to ſtrength, until ye may ſee face to face the God of Sion in his holy hill, with the innumerable company of his bleſſed martyrs and ſaints. Let there be no decreaſe of any virtue, which is already planted in you. Be as the light of the juſt, ſuch as Solomon ſaith, increaſeth to the perfect day of the Lord. Let the ſtrength of God be commended in your weak veſſels, as it is. Be examples of faith and ſobriety to all that ye ſhall come in company withal. Let your godly converſation ſpeak where your tongue may not, in the congregation. Be ſwift to hear, and ſlow to ſpeak, after the counſel of St. James. Be not curious about other men's doings, but be occupied in prayer, and continual meditation, with reverent talking of the word of God, without contentions among the ſaints. Let your faith ſhine in a ſtrange country, as it hath done in your own, that your Father which is in heaven may be glorified by you to the end.

This farewel I ſend you, not as a thing needful (which know already what your duty is, and be deſirous to perform the ſame), but as one that would have you underſtand that he is mindful of your godly converſation, whereof he hath had good experience, and therefore written this to be a perpetual memorial betwixt you and him, until our meeting together before God, where we ſhall joy that we have here lovingly put one another in memory of our duty to perform it.

Farewel again mine own bowels in Chriſt, and take me with you whereſoever you go, and leave yourſelves with me, that in ſpirit we may be preſent one with another. Commend me to the whole congregation of Chriſt, willing them not to leave their country without witneſs of the goſpel, after that we all are ſlain which already be ſtalled up and appointed to the ſlaughter; and in the mean ſeaſon to pray earneſtly for our conſtancy, that Chriſt may be glorified in us and in them, both by life and death. Farewel in the Lord.

Yours for ever, John Philpot.

An Exhortation to his own Siſter, conſtantly to ſtick to the Truth, which ſhe had fruitfully profeſſed.

GOD the eternal Father, who hath juſtified you by the blood of his Son Jeſus Chriſt, and called you to hallow his name thro' a good converſation and profeſſion of faith, ſanctify you with daily increaſe of virtue and faith by his Holy Spirit, that you may appear a veſſel of ſanctification, in the midſt of this wicked and perverſe generation, to the laud and praiſe of the goſpel, Amen.

I have occaſion (my own dear ſiſter) to praiſe God in you for two cauſes: the one, that to your ability you are ready to ſhew yourſelf a natural loving ſiſter to me your poor afflicted brother, as by your gentle tokens you have often teſtified being abſent, and alſo preſently viſiting me; which well declareth that you be a very natural ſiſter indeed, and to be praiſed in this behalf. But in the other, that you be alſo a ſiſter to me in faith after Chriſt's goſpel, I am occaſioned to thank God ſo much the more, how much the one excelleth the other, and the ſpiritual conſanguinity is more perdurable than that which is of fleſh and blood, and is a worker of that which is by nature: for commonly ſuch as be ungodly, be unnatural, and only lovers of themſelves, as daily experience teacheth us. The living Lord, which through the incorruptible ſeed of his word hath begotten you to be my liege ſiſter, give you grace ſo to grow in that generation, that you may increaſe to a perfect age in the Lord, to be my ſiſter in Chriſt for ever.

Look

Look therefore that you continue a faithful ſiſter as you are called and godly entered, not only to me, but to all the church of Chriſt, yea, to Chriſt himſelf, who vouchſafeth you in this your unfeigned faith, worthy to be his ſiſter. Conſider this dignity to ſurmount all the vain dignities of the world, and let it accordingly prevail more with you than all earthly delights: for thereby you are called to an equal proportion of the everlaſting inheritance of Chriſt, if now in no wiſe you do ſhew yourſelf an unnatural ſiſter to him in forſaking him in trouble, which I truſt you will never for any kind of worldly reſpect do. You are under dangerous temptations to be turned from that natural love you owe unto Chriſt, and you ſhall be tried with God's people, through a ſieve of great affliction: for ſo Satan deſireth us to be ſifted, that through fear of ſharp troubles we might fall from the ſtableneſs of our faith, and ſo be deprived of that honour, joy, and reward, which is prepared for ſuch as continue faithful brothers and ſiſters in the Lord's covenant to the end. Therefore the wiſe man in the book of Eccleſiaſticus, biddeth them that come to the ſervice of the Lord, "To prepare themſelves to ſuffer temptations."

Since then that for the glory of God and our faith, we are called now to abide the brunt of them, and that when our adverſary hath done all that he can, yet we may be ſtable and ſtand; this Chriſt, our firſt-begotten brother, looketh for at our hands, and all our brethren and ſiſters in heaven deſire to ſee our faith through afflictions to be perfect that we might fulfil their number: and the univerſal church here militant rejoiceth at our conſtancy, all whom by the contrary we ſhould make ſorry, to the danger of the loſs both of body and ſoul. Fear not, therefore, whatſoever may be threatened of the wicked world; prepare your back, and ſee it be ready to carry Chriſt's croſs. And if you ſee any unwillingneſs in you (as the fleſh is continually repugnant to the will of God) aſk with faithful prayer, that the good Spirit of God may lead your ſinful fleſh whither it would not: for if we will dwell in the fleſh, and follow the counſel thereof, we ſhall never do the will of God, neither work that which tendeth to our ſalvation.

You are at this preſent in the confines and borders of Babylon, where you are in danger to drink of the whore's cup, unleſs you be vigilant in prayer. Take heed the ſerpent ſeduce you not from the ſimplicity of your faith, as he did our firſt mother Eve. Let not worldly fellowſhip make you partaker of iniquity. He that toucheth tar, cannot but be defiled thereby. With ſuch as be perverſe, a man ſhall ſoon be perverted; with the holy you ſhall be holy. Therefore ſay continually with the prophet David, Pſalm 35. "Unto the ſaints that be on the earth, all my will is on them." You have been ſanctified and made pure through the truth; take heed you be not unholied and defiled, leſt the laſt be worſe than the firſt. I write not this becauſe I ſtand in any doubt of your ſincere continuance, of which I have had ſo good experience. But becauſe the days be evil, and in the ſame it is the duty of every of us to exhort and ſtir op one another; I am bold to put you (my good ſiſter) in remembrance of that which doth not a little comfort me to remember, in my troubles and daily temptations. Wherefore I doubt not but you will take that in good part which cometh from your brother both in ſpirit and body, who tendereth your ſalvation as earneſtly as his own, that we might joy together eternally with ſuch joy as the world ſhall never be able to take from us. Thanks be unto God, you have begun to run a good and a great time well in the ways of the Lord: run out the race to the end, which you have begun, and then ſhall you receive the crown of glory. None ſhall be crowned, but ſuch as lawfully ſtrive. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good, and the Lord will make you one of thoſe faithful virgins, that ſhall follow the Lamb whereſoever he goeth; which Chriſt grant both to you and me, Amen.

No. 36.

Commend me to all them that love me in the Lord unfeignedly. God increaſe our faith, and give us never to be aſhamed of his goſpel. The ſame requeſt which I have made to my brother Thomas, I make alſo to you, deſiring you by all means you can to accompliſh my requeſt, that my ſureties might be ſatisfied with that is mine own, to the contentation of my mind, which cannot be quiet until they be diſcharged: therefore I pray you help to purchaſe quietneſs, that I might depart out of this world in peace. My diſſolution I look for daily, but the Lord knoweth how unworthy I am of ſo high an honour, as to die for the teſtimony of his truth. Pray that God would vouchſafe to make me worthy, as he hath done, of long impriſonment, for which his name be praiſed for ever. Pray, and look for the coming of the Lord, whoſe wrath is great over us, and I will pray for you as long as I live. The 9th of July in the King's-Bench.

Your loving brother, as well in faith as in body,
John Philpot.

Another Letter of Mr. Philpot to certain godly Brethren.

THE grace of God the Father, and the peace of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, his eternal Son, and the conſolation of the Holy Ghoſt, our Comforter, ſtrengthen your hearts, and comfort your minds, that you may rejoice, and live in the truth of Chriſt's goſpel to the end, Amen.

I do much rejoice, dearly beloved in the Lord, to hear of your conſtant faith in the word of God, which you have ſo purely received: which do not with the worldlings decline from the purity thereof, albeit you ſuffer grief and trouble thereby; for which I praiſe God moſt heartily: and the Lord of all ſtrength, who hath begun this good work in you, make it perfect to the end, as I doubt not but he will, for the faithful zeal ye have to his truth, and to his afflicted church. Therefore that ye may the better ſtand and bear the brunt of many temptations, which you are like to be aſſaulted withal in theſe wicked and ſtormy days: I thought it good, as it is the duty of one chriſtian man to exhort another in the time of trouble, to put you in remembrance thereof, and to will you with the wiſe man to prepare yourſelves to temptations; and to beware that ye, which yet do ſtand by the goodneſs of God, may not fall from your lively knowledge and hope. It is an eaſy thing to begin to do well, but to continue out in well-doing, is the only property of the children of God, and ſuch as aſſuredly ſhall be ſaved. For ſo ſaith our Saviour in his goſpel, "Bleſſed are they that perſevere to the end."

Let not therefore this certainty of your ſalvation, which is continuance in the ſincerity of faith, ſlide from you. Eſteem it more than all the riches and pleaſures of this world, for it is the moſt acceptable treaſure of eternal life. This is that precious ſtone, for which the wiſe merchantman, after the goſpel, doth ſell all that he hath, and buyeth the ſame. God, in the third of the Revelations, doth ſignify to the church, that there ſhall come a time of temptation upon the whole world, to try the dwellers on the earth. From the danger of which temptation all ſuch ſhall be delivered as obſerve his word: which word there is called the word of patience: to give us to underſtand, that we muſt be ready to ſuffer all kinds of injuries and ſlanders for the profeſſion thereof,

Therefore God commandeth us there to hold it faſt, that no man might bereave us of our crown of glory, and St. Peter telleth us now we are afflicted with divers trials, as it is need it ſhould be ſo, That the trial of our faith being much more precious than gold that periſheth, and yet is tried by fire, might redound to the laud, glory and honour of Jeſus Chriſt. St. Paul to the Hebrews ſheweth us, that Chriſt our Saviour was in his humanity made perfect by afflictions, that we being called to perfection in him, might more willingly ſuſtain the troubles of the world, by which God giveth all them that be exercised in the ſame for his ſake, his holineſs. And in the the twelfth chapter of the ſaid epiſtle is written, My ſon, refuſe not the correction of the Lord, nor ſhrink when thou art rebuked of him: for the Lord doth chaſtiſe every ſon whom he receiveth, &c. Chriſt, in the goſpel of St. John, biddeth his diſciples to look for afflictions, ſaying, In the world ye ſhall have trouble, but in me ye ſhall have joy. And therefore, in the midſt of their trouble, in the twenty-firſt of Luke he biddeth them look up, and lift up their heads, For your redemption, ſaith he, is at hand. And in the twenty-ſecond he ſaith, to all ſuch as be afflicted for him, You are thoſe that have continued with me in my temptations, and therefore I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed for me, to eat and drink upon my table in my kingdom.

Oh how glorious be the croſſes of Chriſt, which bring the bearers of them unto ſo bleſſed an end! Shall we not be glad to be partakers of ſuch ſhame as may bring us to ſo high a dignity? God open our eyes to ſee all things as they be, and to judge uprightly. Then doubtleſs we would think, with Moſes, that it is better to be afflicted with the people of God, than to be counted the king of Egypt's ſon. Then ſhould we joyfully ſay with David, in all our adverſities and troubles, It is good, O Lord, thou haſt brought me low, to the end I might learn thy righteouſneſs. Therefore St. Paul would not glory in any other thing of the world, but in the croſs of Chriſt, and in other his infirmities. We have the commandment of Chriſt, daily to take up his croſs and follow him. We have the godly enſamples of all his apoſtles and holy martyrs, which with great joy and exultation have ſuffered the loſs of all lands, goods, and life, for the hope of a better reward; which is laid up for all thoſe in heaven, that unfeignedly cleave to the goſpel, and never be aſhamed thereof.

Great is the felicity of the world to the outward man, and very pleaſant are the tranſitory delights thereof: but the reward of the righteous after the word of God, doth incomparably excell them all, inſomuch that St. Paul to the Romans doth plainly affirm, that all the tribulations of this world cannot deſerve that glory which ſhall be ſhewed unto us.

Let us therefore (good brethren and ſiſters) be merry and glad in theſe troubleſome days, which be ſent of God to declare our faith, and to bring us to the end and fruition of that which we hope for. If we would enter into the Lord's ſanctuary, and behold what is prepared for us, we could not but deſire the Lord to haſten the day of our death, in which we might ſet forth, by true confeſſion, his glory. Neither ſhould we be afraid to meet our adverſaries, who ſo earneſtly ſeek our ſpoil and death, as Chriſt did Judas and that wicked rout, which came to apprehend him, ſaying, I am he whom you ſeek. It is commanded us by the goſpel, not to fear them that can kill the body, but to fear God, who can caſt both body and ſoul into hell-fire. So much we are bound to obſerve this commandment, as any other which God hath given us. The Lord increaſe our faith, that we fear God more than man. The Lord give us ſuch love towards him and his truth, that we may be content to forſake all and follow him. Now will it appear what we love beſt; for to what we love we ſhall ſtick. There is none worthy to be counted a chriſtian, except he can find in his heart for Chriſt's ſake, if the confeſſion of his truth doth require it, to renounce all that he hath and follow him; and in ſo doing he gaineth an hundred fold more in this life (as our Saviour ſaid to Peter) and hereafter is aſſured of eternal life. Behold, I pray you, what he loſeth, who in this life receiveth an hundred for one, with aſſurance of eternal life. O happy exchange! Perchance your outward man will ſay; If I were ſure of this great recompence here, I would be glad to forſake all; but where is this hundred fold in this life to be found? Yes, truly; for inſtead of the worldly riches which thou doſt forſake, which be but temporal, thou haſt found the everlaſting riches of heaven, which be glory, honour, and praiſe, both before God, angels, and men; and for an earthly habitation, haſt an eternal manſion with Chriſt in heaven; for even now thou art of the city and houſhold of the ſaints with God, as it is verified in the fourth to the Philippians. For worldly peace, which can laſt but for a while, thou doſt poſſeſs the peace of God, which paſſeth all underſtanding; and for the loſs of a few friends, thou art made a fellow of the innumerable company of heaven, and a perpetual friend of all thoſe that have died in the Lord, from the beginning of the world. Is not this more than an hundred fold? Is not the peace of God, which we in this world have through faithful imitation of Chriſt (which the world cannot take from us) ten thouſand fold more, than thoſe things that moſt highly be eſteemed in the world, without the peace of God? All the peace of the world is no peace, but a mere anguiſh, and a gnawing fury of hell. As of late God hath ſet example before our eyes, to teach us how horrible an evil it is to forſake the peace of Chriſt's truth, which breedeth a worm in conſcience that ſhall never reſt.

O that we would weigh this with indifferent ballances. Then ſhould we not be diſmayed at this troubleſome time, neither ſorrow after a worldly manner, for the loſs which we are now like to ſuſtain, as the weak faithleſs perſons do, which love their goods more than God, and the things viſible above thoſe which be inviſible; but rather would heartily rejoice and be thankful, that it pleaſed God to call us to be ſoldiers in his cauſe againſt the works of hypocriſy, and to make us like unto our Saviour Chriſt in ſuffering, whereby we may aſſure ourſelves of his eternal glory: for bleſſed are they, ſaith Chriſt, that ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake. And St. Paul witneſſeth to Timothy, If we die with Chriſt, we ſhall live with Chriſt; and if we deny him, he will deny us.

O that we would enter into the vail of God's promiſes. Then ſhould we, with St. Paul to the Philippians, reject all, and count all things but for droſs, ſo that we may gain Chriſt. God, which is the enlightner of all darkneſs, and putter away of blindneſs, anoint our eyes with the true eye-ſalve, that we might behold his glory, and our eternal felicity, which is hidden with Chriſt, and prepared for us that do abide in his teſtament: for bleſſed is that ſervant, whom the maſter, when he cometh (as Chriſt ſaid) doth find faithful. Let us therefore watch and pray one for another, that we yield not in any point of our religion to the antichriſtian ſynagogue, and that we be not overthrown by theſe temptations. Stand therefore, and be no cowards in the cauſe of your ſalvation; for his Spirit that is in us, is ſtronger than he which is in the world, doth now rage againſt us. Let us not put out the Spirit of God from us, by whoſe might we ſhall overcome our enemies, and then death ſhall be as great a gain to us as it was to the bleſſed apoſtle St. Paul. Why then do ye mourn? why do ye weep? why be ye ſo careful, as though God had forſaken you? He is never more preſent with us, than when we be in trouble, if we do not forſake him. We are in his hands, and nobody can do us any injury or wrong, without his good will and pleaſure. He hath commanded his angels to keep us, that we ſtumble not at a ſtone, without his divine providence. The devil cannot hurt any of us, and much leſs any of his miniſters, without the good will of our eternal Father.

Therefore let us be of good comfort, and continually give thanks unto God for our eſtate, whatſoever it be; for if we murmur againſt the ſame, we murmur againſt God, who ſendeth the ſame: which, if we do we kick but againſt the pricks, and provoke more the wrath of God againſt us; which, by patient ſuffering, otherwiſe would ſooner be turned into our favour through faithful prayer.

I beſeech you, with St. Paul, to give your bodies pure and holy ſacrifices unto God. He hath given us bodies to beſtow unto his glory, and not after our own concu-piſcence. If many years God hath ſuffered us to uſe our bodies, which be his temples, after the luſt of the fleſh, in vain delights, not according to his glory; is it not our duty, in the latter end of our life, the more willingly to yield unto God's glory our bodies, with all that we have, in demonſtration of true repentance of that we have evil ſpent before? Cannot the example of the bleſſed man, Job, horribly afflicted, cauſe us to ſay, "The Lord hath given it, the Lord hath taken it; bleſſed be the name of the Lord: even as it hath pleaſed the Lord, ſo is it come to paſs." If we caſt our whole care likewiſe upon God, he will turn our miſery to felicity, as well as he did to Job. God tempteth us now as he did our father Abraham, commanding him to ſlay his ſon Iſaac in ſacrifice to him; which Iſaac, by interpretation, doth ſignify mirth and joy. Who, by his obedience, preſerved Iſaac unto long life, and offered in his ſtead a ram that was tied by the horns in the brambles. So likewiſe we are all commanded to ſacrifice unto God our Iſaac, which is our joy and conſolation; which, if we be ready to do, as Abraham was, our joy ſhall not periſh, but live and be increaſed, although our ram be ſacrificed for our Iſaac: which doth ſignify, that the pride and concupiſcence of our fleſh intangled through ſin, with the cares of this ſtinking world, muſt be mortified for the preſervation and perfect augmentation of our mirth and joy, which is ſealed up for us in Chriſt.

And to withſtand theſe preſent temptations, wherewithal we are now encumbered, ye cannot have a better remedy than to ſet before your eyes how our Saviour Chriſt overcome them in the deſert, and to follow his example? That if the devil himſelf, or any other by him, willeth you to make ſtones bread, that is, to take ſuch a worldly-wiſe way, that you may have your fair houſes, lands and goods, to live on ſtill; ye muſt ſay, that man liveth not by bread, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

Again, if the devil counſelleth you to caſt yourſelves down to the earth, as to revoke your ſincere belief and godly converſation, and to be conformable to the learned men of the world, pretending that God will be well enough content therewith; ye muſt anſwer, that it is written, that a man ſhall not tempt his Lord God.

Further, if the devil offer you large promiſes of honour, dignity, and poſſeſſions, ſo that ye will worſhip idols in his ſynagogue, ye muſt ſay, Go behind me, Satan, for it is otherwiſe written, that a man muſt worſhip his Lord God, and ſerve him only.

Finally, if your mother, brother, ſiſter, wife, child, kinſman, or friend, do require you to do otherwiſe than the word of God hath taught you, ye muſt ſay, with Chriſt, that they are your mothers, brothers, ſiſters, wives, children, kinſmen, which do the will of God the Father. To which will, the Lord for his mercy conform us all unfeignedly to the end, Amen.

Your loving and faithful brother in Chriſt, in captivity,

John Philpot.

Mr. Philpot's Letter to Mr. Robert Harrington.

GEntle Mr. Harrington, I cannot tell what condign thanks I may give unto God for you, in reſpect of the great gentleneſs and pains which you have taken for the relief of me, and of our other afflicted brethren in Chriſt. God be praiſed for his mercy, whoſe loving providence we have ſeen towards us by ſuch faithful ſtewards as you have been towards a great many. Bleſſed be you of God for the loving care which you have taken for his poor flock. God hath reſerved your reward of thanks in heaven, and therefore I go not about to render you any, leſt I might ſeem to judge that you looked for that here, which is reſerved to a better place. I thank God for that which I have found by your faithful and diligent induſtry, and God forgive me my unworthineſs of ſo great benefits. God give me grace to ſerve him faithfully, and to run out my race with joy. Glorious is the courſe of the martyrs of Chriſt at this day. Never had the elect of God a better time for their glory than this is. Now may they be aſſured under the croſs, that they are Chriſt's diſciples for ever.

Methinks I ſee you deſiring to be under the ſame. The fleſh draweth back, but the ſpirit ſaith, it muſt be brought whither it would not. Here is the victory of the world: Here is true faith, and everlaſting glory. Who is he which deſireth not to be found faithful to his maſter? And now is the time that every faithful ſervant of Chriſt hath juſt opportunity to ſhew himſelf a glorious ſoldier in the Lord's ſight. Now do the Amalekites invade the true Iſraelites, that the Iſraelites might with ſpeed be glorified. I need not, for want of underſtanding, to admoniſh you hereof, but as a willing ſoldier in Chriſt, to exhort you ſo to run as you may get the victory, and that ſpeedily with us. A man that is invited to a glorious feaſt, deſireth his friend may go with him, and be partaker thereof. God doth call me moſt unworthy, among others, to drink of the bride-cup of his Son, whereby we ſhall be made worthy (as many of our brethren have been before us) to ſit at the right-hand and at the left-hand of Chriſt. O what unſpeakable condition is that! May any worldly thing hinder us from the deſire thereof? Since we ſeek the kingdom of God, why do we not apprehend it, being ſo near offered unto us?

Let us approach near unto God, and God will draw near unto us. God draw us after him, that we all may run after the ſavour of his ſweet ointments. Chriſt anoint us, that we may be ſupplied in theſe evil days to run lightly unto the glory of the Lord. Shame, impriſonment, loſs of goods, and ſhedding of our blood, be the juſt price which we muſt willingly beſtow for the ſame. Wherefore (dearly beloved in the Lord) let not the great charges keep you back from buying this glory: for the reward is ten thouſand fold greater than the price.

That you have married a wife, whom God bleſs, I cannot excuſe you from this mart, but you muſt bring your wife for an uſury to the Lord, whoſe pleaſure is in godly yoke-fellows. I wiſh you to be as I am, except theſe horrible bands, but yet moſt comfortable to the ſpirit, aſſuring you, that we are made worthy, through Chriſt, of the kingdom for which we ſuffer. Praiſed be the Lord for the affliction which we ſuffer, and he give us ſtrength to continue to the end.

Commend me to Mr. Heath, and tell him that I would wiſh him with me, to prove how apt he is to carry the croſs of Chriſt. I pray for his continuance in Chriſt, as for mine own. Commend me to his wife, and to Mrs. Hall, certifying them that I am brought to the gates of hell, that I might never enter into the ſame, but be raiſed up from hell to heaven, through the word that ſanctifieth us. Commend me to Mr. Elſing and his wife, and thank them that they remembered to provide for me ſome eaſe in priſon, and tell them, that though my lord's coal-houſe be but very black, yet it is more to be deſired by the faithful than the queen's palace. God make her a joyful mother, and preſerve them both to the comfort of God's people. Thus for this time farewel, dear brother. Written in poſt-haſte, becauſe of ſtrait keeping.

This day I expect to be called before the commiſſioners again. Pray, dear brother, for the Spirit of wiſdom to remain with me. Commend me to your wife, and I thank you both for your tokens. Your token I have ſent to your wife; and my token unto you, is my faithful heart with this letter. Commend me to all my friends, and tell them I am chearful in Chriſt, wiſhing them to fear God more than man, and to learn to deſpiſe earneſtly the vanities of this world; deſiring you all to pray for me, that I may end my journey with fidelity, Amen.

John Philpot.

Abſtract

Abſtract of a Letter written by Mr. Philpot to the Lady Vane.

THE principal Spirit of God the Father, given unto us by Chriſt our merciful Saviour, confirm, ſtrengthen and ſtabliſh you in the true knowledge of the goſpel, that your faithful heart (worſhipful and dear ſiſter in the Lord) may attain and taſte, with all the ſaints, what is the height, the depth, the length, and the breadth of the ſweet croſs of Chriſt, Amen, &c.

Oh how happy are you amongſt all other women, that have found this precious ſtone which is hidden in the goſpel; for which we ought to ſell all other things, and to purchaſe the ſame. Oh happy woman, whoſe heart God hath moved and enlarged to be in the profeſſion thereof. Others ſeek worldly goods, honours, and delights; but you ſeek, with a good underſtanding, to ſerve God in ſpirit and in truth. This is the gate that leadeth to heaven, this is your portion for ever. By this you ſhall ſee God face to face (which ſight is unſpeakable joy) and by this ſhall you ſee a full ſight of all the beautiful heavenly powers, and of all the celeſtial paradiſe. By this ſhall you know them that you never knew, and be glad and joyful with thoſe which you have known here in God, world without end, &c.

Ah I lament the infidelity of England, that after ſo great light, is ſtept into ſo huge darkneſs again. The ſervant that knoweth his maſter's will, and doth it not, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes. Ah, great be the plagues that hang over England, yea, though the goſpel ſhould be reſtored again. Happy ſhall that perſon be whom the Lord ſhall take out of this world, not to ſee them. Ah, the great perjury which men have run into ſo wilfully againſt God, by receiving Antichriſt again, and his wicked laws; which do threaten a great ruin unto England. O that the Lord would turn his juſt judgments upon the authors of the truce-breaking between God and us, that they might be brought low (as Nebuchadonoſor was) that his people might be delivered, and his glory exalted. God grant that that good luck which you hope ſhortly to come upon the houſe of God, be a true prophecy, and not a well-wiſhing only. Ah, Lord, take away thy heavy hand from us, and ſtretch it out upon thine enemies, thoſe hypocrites, as thou haſt begun, that they may be confounded. O let not the weak periſh for want of knowledge through our ſin. Although thou kill us, yet we will put our truſt in thee.

Thus (dear heart) you teach me to pray with you in writing. God hear your prayers, and give us the ſpirit of effectual prayer, to pour out our hearts continually together before God, that we may find mercy both for ourſelves, and for our afflicted brethren and ſiſters. I cannot but praiſe God in you, for that pitiful heart that taketh other folk's calamities to heart, as your own. Bleſſed be they that mourn, for ſuch ſhall be comforted. God wipe away all tears from your pitiful eyes, and ſorrow from your merciful heart, that you may (as doubtleſs you ſhall do ſhortly) rejoice with his elect for ever. You have ſo armed me to the Lord's battle, both inwardly and outwardly, that except I be a very coward, I cannot faint, but overcome by death. You have appointed me ſo good and gracious a general of the field, to ſo victorious a captain, and to ſo favourable a marſhal, that if I ſhould not go on luſtily, there were no ſpectacle of heavenly manhood in me. I will preſent your coat armour before my captain, and in the ſame, I truſt, by him to overcome. The ſcarf I deſire as an outward ſign to ſhew our enemies, who ſee not our glorious end, neither what God worketh inwardly in us, through the blindneſs of their hearts, that they perſecute Chriſt's croſs in us, whereby he hath ſealed up the truth of his goſpel by his death unto us, that we by our death (if need be) might confirm the ſame, and never be aſhamed, whatſoever torment we do ſuffer for his name's ſake; and our weak brethren, ſeeing the ſame, might be more encouraged to take up Chriſt's croſs, and to follow him. God give us grace to do all things to his glory, Amen, &c.

The world wondereth how we can be merry in ſuch extreme miſery, but our God is omnipotent, who turneth miſery into felicity. Believe me (dear ſiſter) there is no ſuch joy in the world as the people of Chriſt have under the croſs. I ſpeak by experience; therefore believe me, and fear nothing that the world can do unto you. For when they impriſon our bodies, they ſet our ſouls at liberty with God. When they caſt us down, they lift us up; yea, when they kill us, then do they bring us to everlaſting life. And what greater glory can there be, than to be in conformity with Chriſt? which afflictions do work in us.

God open our eyes to ſee more and more his glory in the croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, and make us worthy partakers of the ſame. Let us rejoice, with St. Paul, in the croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, by whom the world is crucified unto us, and we to the world. The croſs of Chriſt be our ſtandard to fight under for ever. While I am talking with you of our common conſolation, I forget how I trouble you with my rude and inordinate tediouſneſs: but you muſt impute it to love, which cannot quickly depart from them whom he loveth, but deſireth to pour himſelf into their boſoms.

Therefore, though your fleſh ſhould be offended (as it might juſtly be) at ſuch rudeneſs, yet your ſpirit will ſay nay, which taketh all things in good part that cometh of love. And now I am departing, yet will I take my leave ere I go, and would fain ſpeak ſomewhat that might declare my ſincere love to you for ever. Farewel, O elect veſſel of the Lord, to the comfort of his afflicted flock, farewel on earth, whom in heaven I am ſure I ſhall not forget. Farewel under the croſs moſt joyfully, and until we meet, always remember what Chriſt ſaith, "Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world, &c."

God pour his Spirit abundantly upon you, mine own dear bowels in Chriſt, until you may come to ſee the God of all gods, with his elect, in the everlaſting Sion. I ſend to you the kiſs of peace, with which I do moſt entirely take my leave of you at this preſent. It is neceſſary we depart hence, or elſe we could not be glorified. Your heart is heavy, becauſe I ſay I muſt depart from you. It is the calling of the merciful Father, wherewithal you are content, and ſo am I. Be of good comfort, hold out your buckler of faith; for by the ſtrength thereof we ſhall ſhortly meet in eternal glory: to which Chriſt bring us both, Amen, Amen. The 10th of December 1555.

Death, why ſhould I fear thee? ſince thou canſt not hurt me, but rid me from miſery unto eternal glory.

Dead to the world, and living to Chriſt, your own brother, ſealed up in the verity of the goſpel for ever.

John Philpot.

Another Letter of Mr. Philpot, written to the ſame Lady, being a great Supporter of him.

I Cannot but moſt heartily give God thanks for theſe his gifts in you, whoſe brightneſs many beholding that are weak, are much encouraged to ſee God likewiſe, and to cleave to him, having the example of ſo faithful and conſtant a gentlewoman before their eyes. If the queen of the South ſhall riſe with the men of Chriſt's generation, and condemn them, for that ſhe came from the end of the world to hear the wiſdom of Solomon; then ſhall your ſincere and godly converſation, thus ſhining in this dangerous time of the trial of Chriſt's people, (being a woman of a worſhipful eſtate and wealthy condition) condemn in the latter day a great many of theſe faint-hearted goſpellers, which ſo ſoon be gone back and turned from the truth, at the voice of a handmaiden; ſeeing that neither the fear of impriſonment, neither the poſſeſſion of the world, world, (wherewithal you are ſufficiently indued above a great many), can ſeparate you from the love of the truth, which God hath revealed unto you; whereby it appeareth that the ſeed of God's word which was ſown in you, fell neither in the high way, nor among the thorns, nor upon the ſtones, but upon good ground, which is bleſſed of God, and bringeth forth fruit with great affliction, an hundred fold to the glory of God, and the increaſe of his church, &c.

In conſideration whereof St. James biddeth us highly to rejoice, whenſoever we fall into many temptations, knowing that it is but the trial of our faith, that we might bring forth that excellent virtue patience, by which we are made like to our Redeemer Chriſt, with whom we here being like in ſuffering, aſſuredly ſhall hereafter be partakers of his eternal glory. Therefore St. Paul ſaith, "God forbid that I ſhould glory in any thing but in the croſs of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt." I that am under the croſs with you (thanks be given to God therefore), have felt in the ſame more true joy and conſolation, than ever I did by any benefit that God hath given me in my life before. For the more the world doth hate us, the nigher God is unto us, and there is no perfect joy but in God. Wherefore Chriſt ſaid; "In me ye ſhall have joy, but in the world affliction." Bleſſed be God which ſendeth us this affliction, that we might perfectly joy in him. For this cauſe in the ripeſt time of iniquity, and in the moſt fervent ſeaſon of perſecution of the true church, which Chriſt in the 21ſt of Luke propheſied to come, he willeth us to be of good cheer, and to lift up our heads, for our redemption is at hand.

O that the Lord would come and deliver us from this world, which is a vale of miſery, unto his own kingdom, where floweth perpetual joy and conſolation. And verily that is the true and only joy which is conceived, not of the creature, but of the Creator, which when we do poſſeſs, nobody can take it away from us. To which joy all other joys being compared, are but mournings, all delights ſorrow, all ſweetneſs ſour, all beauty filth, and finally all others things that be counted pleaſant, are tediouſneſs. Your ownſelf is better witneſs of than I: Aſk yourſelf with whom you are beſt acquainted. Doth not the Holy Ghoſt ſpeak the ſame in your heart? Have you not perſuaded yourſelf this to be true, before I wrote thereof? For how ſhould you, being a woman, and a young gentlewoman, beautiful, and at your own liberty, have overcome this your frail kind and age, and deſpiſed your excellent beauty and eſtate, unleſs all thoſe things which be ſubject to the ſenſes, had been counted of you vile, and little to be eſteemed in compariſon of things which inwardly do comfort you to overcome the fleſh, the world, and the devil?

God increaſe your joy in all ſpiritual things, and eſtabliſh your hope to the day of eternal reſt. You have forſaken darkneſs, and are entered into light, God grant the ſame may ſhine ſtill in you, until the perfect day come of the Lord, in which is all our conſolation. Here we muſt be darkened, that there we may appear as bright as the ſun in the face of the whole world, and of all them that now condemn us for our well-doing; whoſe judges then we ſhall be, to their horrible grief, though now wrongfully they judge us. Pray heartily, and that often, that God once again for his Chriſt's ſake would be merciful to his afflicted church in England. Faithful prayer is the only remedy that we have againſt the fiery darts of the devil, that are kindled againſt us. By prayer the Amalekites ſhall be overcome, and the roarings of the lion, which ſeeketh ſtill to devour us, ſhall be ſtopped and put to ſilence. The Lord ſtop Leviathan's mouth, that he ſwallow not up God's ſilly people, according to his expectation.

Praiſe the Lord for the faithful teſtimony and ſacrifice which two of our brethren of late have through fire rendered to the truth of the goſpel, which now triumpheth by the death of godly martyrs. The Lord is at hand, therefore watch and pray. The laſt of May 1555. Captive in the King's-Bench.

Yours with heart in Chriſt.
John Philpot.

Another Letter of Mr. Philpot to the Lady Vane.

GOD the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt increaſe in your godly heart the faith of the goſpel, which is your eternal inheritance, and the Holy Ghoſt comfort your Spirit with all ſpiritual conſolation to the day of the Lord, Amen.

I cannot but praiſe God moſt highly and earneſtly (my dear and faithful lady), for the great and unfeigned love which you bear unto me in Chriſt, declared oftentimes, as well now as of late, by manifeſt and liberal tokens. Bleſſed be God, that hath made you ſo worthy a member in his kingdom. For it cannot be but ſuch ſhall reap with abundance in time of reward, that here do ſow ſo plenteouſly in well-doing; albeit I am moſt unworthy to receive any ſuch benefit at your hands, as in reſpect of a pillar of Chriſt's church, which am ſcarce a ſhadow thereof. But the zeal of Chriſt's church in you wiſhed me to be ſuch an one as the time doth require. God fulfil your deſire of me, that I may be found conſtant, and no wandering ſtar. I am not worthy of the name of a prophet, or of a miniſter of God's word, for that I have (being hindered by the inquity of the time), little or nothing laboured therein. I am a friend of our common ſpouſe Jeſus, and do rejoice in the verity of his word; for which (praiſed be his name) he hath counted me worthy to ſuffer: and indeed whoſoever giveth a draught of water in the name of a diſciple (as Chriſt promiſed), ſhall not loſe his reward. Therefore that your gentleneſs doth in the name of him, which I am not, the Lord recompence unto you in all his bleſſings, which he is accuſtomed to pour on them who love his flock unfeignedly.

Good lady, you have to joy that the kingdom of God is thus continually before your eyes, and that you are not aſhamed of the bands of Chriſt, which you with his people in part do ſuffer. They may be aſſured of the glory everlaſting, who here are not aſhamed to take up the croſs of Chriſt, and to follow him. Here we muſt weep and lament, while the world laugheth and triumpeth over us; but our tears ſhall ſhortly be turned to unſpeakable joy, and we ſhall eternally be merry together, when the world ſhall lament their infidelity without end, &c.

I would I were able to do any thing that might ſhew condign thanks for that ſincere love you bear unto me in Chriſt: you adjure me (as it were) by your gentle letters to be bold on you in all my needs. I thank God who ceaſeth not to provide for his, I lack nothing at preſent, but only ability to thank your faithful heart for your goodneſs towards me. I love you and not yours, as it is meet for chriſtians to love one another in God; and your faith which I behold in you, is more worth unto me than all your poſſeſſions. And I think I ſhall not need long to be chargeable unto you, for that this week I look for ſome commiſſioners to ſit on me, and my fellow-priſoners in priſon, leſt the ſpirit of our breath might blow further abroad. The will of God be done. We are not ſo good as John the Baptiſt who was beheaded in priſon. Darkneſs cannot abide the light. Therefore their doings muſt declare what they are. We are as ſheep appointed for a ſacrifice to the Lord. We muſt not fear the fire, for our Lord is a conſuming fire, who will put out the fierceneſs of raging torments from us. Be not afraid of them that can kill the body, but fear him that can caſt both body and ſoul into hell-fire. God forbid that we ſhould rejoice otherwiſe than in the croſs of Chriſt, and pray that he would make us worthy to ſuffer for his ſake. God will have our faith tried and known; and therefore let us willingly humble ourſelves under the mighty hand of God, that he may gloriouſly lift us up in his good time. There is none perfectly faithful indeed, till he can ſay with St. Paul, "I am perſuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities or powers, nor things preſent nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature is able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord." This faith God plant both in you and me unmoveably. In this faith we have to rejoice, and in none other.

All the tribulations of the world are not worthy of the eternal weight of glory which is prepared for them, that here do with patience abide the croſs. Wherefore let us be ſtrong with the ſtrength in him, that is able to make us ſtrong, and lament the weakneſs, I might ſay, the infidelity of our faint-hearted goſpellers. Chriſt whom we would pretend to have put upon us, is the ſtrength of God, and how then can they be weak where Chriſt is? We have more to be glad, touching ourſelves, of this time, than we have had of any time before, in which we have ſo ready a way to go unto God, and ſo good occaſion to ſhew our duty in glorifying his holy name. For if we be impriſoned in his cauſe, we are bleſſed. If we loſe all that we have, we are bleſſed an hundred fold. If we die, we are bleſſed eternally; ſo that in ſuffering perſecutions, all is full of bleſſings. Be bleſſed therefore (O elect lady) of God, with the bleſſed of God, and flee (as you do) the concupiſcence of the world. Embrace that which is perfect, and joyfully look for the coming and croſs of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c. Thus deſiring God to preſerve you to his true peace, and to give you victory of that temptation which now is come to try our faith; Chriſt be with you, and bleſs you both in body and ſoul; and my prayer ſhall follow you whereſoever you go, as I deſire that yours may be with me. The laſt week I ſent your beneficence to Oxford; I could not have a convenient meſſenger before. As ſoon as I have word, you ſhall be ſatisfied of your requeſt. Love me as you do, and the God of love be with you. The 20th day of Auguſt.

By yours, with all his power in the Lord.

John Philpot.

Another Letter to the ſame Lady.

THE mercy of God the Father, and the conſolation of the Holy Ghoſt through Jeſus Chriſt, be with you, and ſtrengthen you, my dear mother and ſiſter in the Lord, in theſe dangerous days, to the crown of eternal glory, which is now offered to all faithful ſoldiers in the goſpel, Amen.

As your good ladyſhip doth deſire to hear from me, ſo am I deſirous to write, as your gentleneſs and daily goodneſs bindeth me. But Satan of late hath hindered me, who envying all good exerciſes which I have had and received by mine eaſy impriſonment in times paſt, hath brought me out of the King's-Bench into the biſhop of London's coal-houſe, a dark and an ugly priſon as any is about London, (but my dark body of ſin hath well deſerved the ſame, and the Lord now hath brought me into outward darkneſs, that I might the more be enlightened by him, as he is moſt preſent with his children in the midſt of darkneſs), where I cannot be ſuffered to have any candle-light, neither ink nor paper, but by ſtealth. Wherefore I cannot write to you as I would, neither as my duty is. As Chriſt, my maſter, was ſent from Annas to Caiaphas, ſo am I ſent from Wincheſter dioceſe to London, I truſt to make a ſpeedy end of my courſe; God give me grace and patience to be a faithful follower of my maſter. I have been already a week in this coal-houſe, and have of late been four times called to mine anſwer, but hitherto not called to judgment, which I do daily look for; but I fear they will prolong me, and try me by ſtrait impriſonment a while, in which God's will be done.

Pray (dear lady) that my faith faint not, which I praiſe God is preſently more lively with me than it hath been in times paſt. I taſte and feel the faithfulneſs of God in his promiſe, who hath promiſed to be with his in their trouble, and to deliver them. I thank the Lord, I am not alone, but have ſix other faithful companions; who in our darkneſs do chearfully ſing hymns and praiſes unto God for his great goodneſs. We are ſo joyful, that I wiſh you part of my joy. For you that are ſo careful of my bodily relief, how can I but wiſh your ſpiritual conſolation, and that abundantly? Let not (dear heart) my ſtrait impriſonment any thing moleſt you: for it hath added, and daily doth add unto my joy; but rather be glad and thankful unto God with me, that it hath pleaſed him to make me, moſt wretched ſinner, worthy to ſuffer any thing for his ſake. Hitherto we have not reſiſted unto blood. God make us never to count our blood more precious in our eyes than his truth.

Ah, my dear ſiſter, I thank you again for the laſt letter you ſent me; it is a ſingular comfort unto me, as oft as I read the ſame. I have it in my boſom, and will carry the ſame even to the ſtake with me, in witneſs that Chriſt hath ſo conſtant and faithful a lady in England. God ſuccour and keep that ſpirit in you; for it is the very ſpirit of adoption of the child of God. Such chearful and holy ſpirits under the croſs be acceptable ſacrifices in the ſight of God; for Chriſt came to caſt fire into the earth, and looketh that it ſhould be kindled. Be you fervent in ſpirit in our Chriſt's cauſe, as you have begun, for that is the principal ſpirit wherewithal David deſired to be confirmed. O, how do I rejoice, your ladyſhip to go arm in arm with me unto Chriſt, or rather before me? I cannot but joy of ſuch a worſhipful fellow. Methinks I ſee you mourn, and deſire to be looſed out of the earthly and frail habitacle of this body. O, how amiable and pleaſant is it to dwell in God's tabernacle? Our Chriſt and his heavenly company look for us; let us haſte and run thereto, for behold the Lord is ready to embrace us. Mine own bowels in the Lord, be merry in the Lord with your afflicted brother, who daily offereth your merciful alms, which moſt unworthily I do receive ſtill of you, unto the Lord. But now (dear mother) you need not burden yourſelf ſo much (as my laſt letters did ſignify), for that my chargeable impriſonment is cut off, and a little now ſerveth me; wherefore I pray you ſend no more until I ſend to you, for I have ſufficient, and do abound. God's peace be with you for ever. Out of my lord of London's coal-houſe, the laſt of October.

Your own, John Philpot.

Another Letter of Mr. Philpot to the ſaid Lady, wherein partly he complaineth of the Diſſimulation and Perjury of Engliſhmen falling again to the Pope, and partly he expreſſeth his joy in his Afflictions.

I Cannot but joy with you (my heartily beloved in Chriſt), of the fall of Sennacherib: [he meaneth the death of the biſhop of Wincheſter] ſince it is to the glory of God, and to the conſolation of his church, to ſee the fall of their enemies before their face, according as it is written, "The juſt ſhall rejoice, when he ſeeth the vengeance of the wicked." God make this your joy perfect; for as concerning myſelf I count not to ſee thoſe good days whereof you have a glimmering in this life. For although the cockatrice be dead, yet his peſtilent chickens, with the whore of Babylon, ſtill liveth. But a great hope there is of their ſhort confuſion, becauſe God doth not proſper their doings according to their expectation. Moſt happy ſhall he be, whom the Lord ſhall ſhall ſooneſt take out of this life, that he may not ſee the plagues which the manifeſt perjury, and the manifold idolatry and deteſtable diſſimulation, and that of ſuch as do know the truth, do threaten to come.

The Lord is juſt, and all unrighteouſneſs diſpleaſeth him, and either here or elſe in another world he will puniſh this groſs infidelity of the world: but his elect, and ſuch as he loveth, will he puniſh here, that they ſhould not be condemned hereafter with the world eternally. We have nothing ſo much to rejoice in, as in the croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, and in that we are partakers of his afflictions, which are the earneſt-penny of that eternal kingdom which he upon the croſs for us hath purchaſed. For as Paul his faithful witneſs ſaith, "If we ſuffer with him, we ſhall reign with him. If we die with him, we ſhall live with him."

Wherefore (mine own dear bowels), praiſe God with me moſt entirely, that it hath pleaſed him now mercifully to viſit the ſins of my youth, and my huge unthankfulneſs, and by the ſame doth give me much conſolation, that he aſſureth me of his great goodneſs and mercy, and turneth his fatherly chaſtiſement into my crown of glory. O good God, what am I, on whom he ſhould ſhew this great mercy? To him that is immortal, inviſible, and only wiſe, be all honour, praiſe and glory therefore, Amen.

This is the day which the Lord hath made, let us rejoice and be glad in the ſame. This is the way, though it be narrow, which is full of the peace of God, and leadeth to eternal bliſs. O how my heart leapeth for joy, that I am ſo near the apprehenſion thereof; God forgive me mine unthankfulneſs and unworthineſs of ſo great glory. The ſwords which pierced Mary's heart in the paſſion of our Saviour, which daily alſo go through your faithful heart, be more glorious and to be deſired than the golden ſcepters of this world. O bleſſed be they that mourn in this world to God-ward, for they ſhall eternally be comforted: God make my ſtony heart to mourn more than it doth. I have ſo much joy of the reward that is prepared for me, moſt wretched ſinner, that though I be in place of darkneſs night and morning, yet I cannot lament, but both night and day am ſo joyful, as though I were under no croſs at all: yea, in all the days of my life I was never ſo merry, the name of the Lord be praiſed therefore for ever and ever, and he pardon mine unthankfulneſs. Our enemies do fret, fume, and gnaſh their teeth, to ſee and hear that we, under this grievous affliction in the world, can be ſo merry. We are by them counted as deſperate perſons, for the certain hope and feeling which we have of our everlaſting ſalvation: and it is no marvel, for the worldly men cannot perceive the things of God, it is mere fooliſhneſs and abomination to them.

Be thankful unto our God, (mine own dear helper) for his wondrous working in his choſen people. Pray inſtantly that this joy be never taken from us, for it paſſeth all the delights of this world. This is the peace of God which ſurmounteth all underſtanding: this peace, the more his choſen be afflicted, the more they feel, and therefore cannot faint, neither for fire, neither for water. Let us pray for our weak brethren and ſiſters ſake, that it may pleaſe God to alleviate the grievous and intolerable burden of theſe cruel days. But touching ourſelves, let us heartily beſeech our Saviour to vouchſafe to give us this glorious gift to ſuffer for his goſpel ſake, and that we may think the ſhame of the world to be our glory, as it is indeed. God increaſe our faith, and open our eyes to behold what is prepared for us. I lack nothing, praiſe be to God. I truſt my marriage garment is ready. I will ſend you my examinations as ſoon as I can get them written, if you be deſirous of them.

God of his mercy fill your merciful heart with all joy and conſolation of the hope to come. Out of the coal-houſe the 19th of November.

John Philpot.

A Letter of Mr. Philpot to a friend of his, Priſoner the ſame Time in Newgate, wherein is debated and diſcuſſed the Matter or Queſtion of Infants to be baptized.

THE God of all light and underſtanding enlighten your heart with all true knowledge of his word, and make you perfect to the day of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, whereunto you are now called, through the mighty operation of his Holy Spirit, Amen.

I received yeſternight from you (dear brother, ſaint, and fellow-priſoner for the truth of Chriſt's goſpel) a letter, wherein you gently require my judgment concerning the baptiſm of infants, which is the effect thereof. And before I do ſhew you what I have learned out of God's word, and of his true and infallible church touching the ſame, I think it not out of the matter firſt to declare what viſion I had the ſame night; while muſing on your letter I fell aſleep, knowing that God doth not without cauſe reveal to his people, who have their minds fixed on him, ſpecial and ſpiritual revelations to their comfort as a taſte of their joy and kingdom to come, which fleſh and blood cannot comprehend.

Being in the midſt of my ſweet reſt, it ſeemed me to ſee a great beautiful city, all of the colour of azure and white, four-ſquare in a marvellous beautiful compoſition, in the midſt of the ſky, the ſight whereof ſo inwardly comforted me, that I am not able to expreſs the conſolation I had thereof, yea the remembrance thereof cauſeth as yet my heart to leap for joy: And as charity is no churl, but would others to be partakers of his delight, ſo methought I called to others (I cannot tell whom) and while they came and we together beheld the ſame, by and by, to my great grief, it faded away.

This dream I think not to have come of the illuſion of the ſenſes, becauſe it brought with it ſo much ſpiritual joy, and I take it to be of the working of God's Spirit for the contentation of your requeſt, as he wrought in Peter to ſatisfy Cornelius. Therefore I interpret this beautiful city to be the glorious church of Chriſt, and the appearance of it in the ſky, ſignifieth the heavenly ſtate thereof, whoſe converſation is in heaven; and that according to the primitive church which is now in heaven, men ought to meaſure and judge the church of Chriſt now in earth: for as the prophet David ſaith, "The foundations thereof be in the holy hills, and glorious things be ſpoken of the city of God." And the marvellous quadrature of the ſame, I take to ſignify the univerſal agreement in the ſame, and that all the church here militant ought to conſent to the primitive church throughout the four parts of the world; as the prophet affirmeth, ſaying, "God maketh us to dwell after one manner in one houſe." And that I conceived ſo wonderful joy at the contemplation thereof, I underſtand the unſpeakable joy which they have that be at unity with Chriſt's primitive church: for there is joy in the Holy Ghoſt, and peace, which paſſeth all underſtanding: as it is written in the Pſalms, as of joyful perſons is the dwelling of all them that be in thee. And that I called others to the fruition of this viſion, and to behold this wonderful city, I conſtrue it by the will of God this viſion to have come upon me muſing on your letter, to the end that under this figure I might have occaſion to move you with many others, to behold the primitive church in all your opinions concerning faith, and to conform yourſelf in all points to the ſame, which is the pillar and eſtabliſhment of truth, and teacheth the true uſe of the ſacraments, and having with a greater fulneſs than we have now, the firſt fruits of the Holy Ghoſt, did declare the true interpretation of the ſcriptures according to all verity, even as our Saviour promiſed to ſend them another Comforter, which ſhould teach them all truth.

And ſince all truth was taught and revealed to the primitive church, which is our mother, let us all that be obedient obedient children of God, ſubmit ourſelves to the judgment of the church, for the better underſtanding of the articles of our faith, and of the doubtful ſentences of the ſcripture. Let us not go about to ſhew in us (by following any private man's interpretation upon the word) another ſpirit than they of the primitive church had, leſt we deceive ourſelves. For there is but one faith and one Spirit, which is not contrary to himſelf, neither otherwiſe now teacheth us than he did them. Therefore let us believe as they have taught us of the ſcriptures, and be at peace with them, according as the true catholic church is at this day: and the God of peace aſſuredly will be with us, and deliver us out of all our worldly troubles and miſeries, and make us partakers of their joy and bliſs, through our obedience to faith with them.

Therefore God commandeth us in Job, to aſk of the elder generation, and to ſearch diligently the memory of the fathers. For we are but yeſterday's children, and be ignorant, and our days are like a ſhadow, and they ſhall teach thee, ſaith the Lord, and ſpeak to thee, and ſhall utter words from their hearts. And by Solomon we are commanded, not to reject the direction of our mother. The Lord grant you to direct your ſteps in all things after her, and to abhor contention with her. For as St. Paul writeth, If any man be contentious, neither we, neither the church of God hath any ſuch cuſtom."

Hitherto I have ſhewed you (good brother) my judgment generally of that you ſtand in doubt and diſſent from others, to which I wiſh you as mine own heart to be conformable, and then doubtleſs you cannot err, but boldly may be glad in your troubles, and triumph at the hour of your death, that you ſhall die in the church of God a faithful martyr, and receive the crown of eternal glory. And thus much have I written upon the occaſion of a viſion before God unfeigned. But that you may not think that I go about to ſatisfy you with uncertain viſion only, and not after God's word, I will take the ground of your letter, and eſpecially anſwer to the ſame by the ſcriptures, and by infallible reaſons deduced out of the ſame, and prove the baptiſm of infants to be lawful commendable, and neceſſary, whereof you ſeem to ſtand in doubt.

Indeed if you look upon the papiſtical ſynagogue only, which had corrupted God's word by falſe interpretations, and hath perverted the true uſe of Chriſt's ſacraments, you might ſeem to have good handfaſt of your opinion againſt the baptiſm of infants. But foraſmuch as it is of more antiquity, and hath its beginning from God's word, and from the uſe of the primitive church, it muſt not in reſpect of the abuſe in the popiſh church be neglected, or thought not expedient to be uſed in Chriſt's church. Auxentius, one of the Arian ſect, with his adherents, was one of the firſt that denied the baptiſm of children, the next after him Pelagius the heretic, and ſome others there were in St. Bernard's time, as it doth appear by his writings, and in our days the Anabaptiſts, an inordinate kind of men ſtirred up by the devil, to the deſtruction of the goſpel. But the catholic truth delivered unto us by the ſcriptures, plainly determineth, that all ſuch are to be baptized, as whom God acknowledgeth for his people, and voucheth them worthy of ſanctification or remiſſion of their ſins. Therefore ſince that infants be in the number or ſcroll of God's people, and be partakers of the promiſe by their purification in Chriſt, it muſt needs follow thereby, that they ought to be baptized as well as thoſe that can profeſs their faith. For we judge the people of God as well by the free and liberal promiſe of God, as by the confeſſion of faith. For to whomſoever God promiſeth himſelf to be their God, and whom he acknowledgeth for his, thoſe no man without great impiety may exclude from the number of the faithful.

But God promiſeth that he will not only be the God of ſuch as do profeſs him, but alſo of infants, promiſing them his grace and remiſſion of ſins, as it appeareth by the words of the covenant made unto Abraham. "I will ſet my covenant between thee and me, ſaith the Lord, and between thy ſeed after thee in their generations, with an everlaſting covenant, to be thy God, and the God of thy ſeed after thee." To which covenant circumciſion was added, to be a ſign of ſanctification as well in children as in men; and no man may think that this promiſe is abrogated with circumciſion and other ceremonial laws. For Chriſt came to fulfil the promiſes, and not to diſſolve them. Therefore in the goſpel he ſaith of infants, that is, of ſuch as yet believed not: "Let the little ones come unto me, and forbid them not, for of ſuch is the kingdom of heaven. Again, It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that any of theſe little ones do periſh. Alſo, He that receiveth me. Take heed therefore that ye deſpiſe not one of theſe babes, for I tell you their angels do continually ſee in heaven my Father's face." And what may be ſaid more plain than this? It is not the will of the heavenly Father that the infants ſhould periſh; whereby we may gather, that he receiveth them freely unto his grace, although as yet they confeſs not their faith. Since then that the word of the promiſes, which is contained in baptiſm, pertaineth as well to children as to men, why ſhould the ſign of the promiſe, which is baptiſm in water, be withdrawn from children, when Chriſt himſelf commandeth them to be received of us, and promiſeth the reward of a prophet to thoſe that receive ſuch a little infant, as he for an example did put before his diſciples?

Now will I prove with manifeſt arguments that children ought to be baptized, and that the apoſtles of Chriſt did baptize children. The Lord commanded his apoſtles to baptize all nations; therefore alſo children ought to be baptized, for they are comprehended under this word, All Nations.

Further, whom God doth account among the faithful, they are faithful, for it was ſaid to Peter, "That thing which God hath purified, thou ſhalt not ſay to be common or unclean:" But God doth repute children among the faithful: Ergo, they be faithful, except we had rather to reſiſt God, and ſeem ſtronger and wiſer than he.

And without all doubt the apoſtles baptized thoſe which Chriſt commanded: But he commanded the faithful to be baptized, among which infants be reckoned: The apoſtles then baptized infants.

The goſpel is more than baptiſm, for Paul ſaid, "The Lord ſent me to preach the goſpel, and not to baptize:" not that he denied abſolutely that he was ſent to baptize, but that he preferred doctrine before baptiſm, for the Lord commanded both to the apoſtles: But children be received by the doctrine of the goſpel of God, and not refuſed: therefore what perſon being of reaſon, may deny them baptiſm, which is a thing leſs than the goſpel? For in the ſacraments be two things to be conſidered, the thing ſignified, and the ſign, and the thing ſignified is greater than the ſign; and from the thing ſignified in baptiſm, children are not excluded; who therefore may deny them the ſign which is baptiſm in water?

St. Peter could not deny them to be baptized in water, to whom he ſaw the Holy Ghoſt given, which is the certain ſign of God's people: for he ſaith in the Acts, "May any body forbid them to be baptized in water who have received the Holy Ghoſt as well as we?" Therefore St. Peter denied not baptiſm to infants, for he knew certainly both by the doctrine of Chriſt, and by the covenant which is everlaſting, that the kingdom of heaven pertaineth to infants.

None be received into the kingdom of heaven but ſuch as God loveth, and which are indued with the Spirit: for whoſo hath not the Spirit of God, he is none of his. But infants be beloved of God, and therefore want not the Spirit of God: wherefore if they have the Spirit of God as well as men, if they be numbered among the people of God as well as we that be of age, who (I pray you) may well withſtand children to be baptized with water, in the name of the Lord?

The apoſtles in times paſt, being yet not ſufficiently inſtructed, did murmur againſt thoſe which brought their children unto the Lord, but the Lord rebuked them, and ſaid, "Let the babes come unto me." Why then do not theſe rebellious anabaptiſts obey the commandment of the Lord? For what do they now-a days elſe that bring their children to baptiſm, than that they did in times paſt which brought their children to the Lord, and our Lord received them, and putting his hands on them, bleſſed them, and both by words and gentle behaviour towards them, declared manifeſtly, that children be the people of God, and entirely beloved by him. But ſome will ſay, Why then did not Chriſt baptize them? becauſe it is written, Jeſus himſelf baptized not, but his diſciples.

Moreover, circumciſion in the old law was adminiſtered to infants: therefore baptiſm ought to be adminiſtered in the new law unto children. For baptiſm is come in the ſtead of circumciſion, as St. Paul witneſſeth, ſaying to the Coloſſians, "By Chriſt ye are circumciſed with a circumciſion which is without hands, when ye put off the body of ſin of the fleſh, by the circumciſion of Chriſt, being buried together with him through baptiſm." Behold, Paul calleth baptiſm the circumciſion of a chriſtian man, which is done without hands, but that with hands no man any longer ought to be circumciſed, albeit the myſtery of circumciſion do ſtill remain in faithful people.

To this I may add, that the ſervants of God were always ready to adminiſter the ſacraments to them, for whom they were inſtituted. As for an example, we may behold Joſhua, who moſt diligently procured the people of Iſrael to be circumciſed before they entered into the land of promiſe; but ſince the apoſtles were the preachers of the word, and the very faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, who may hereafter doubt that they baptized infants, ſince baptiſm is in place of circumciſion?

Item, The apoſtles did attemperate all their doings to the ſhadows and figures of the Old Teſtament, therefore it is certain that they attemperate baptiſm accordingly to circumciſion, and baptized children becauſe they were under the figure of baptiſm; for the people of Iſrael paſſed through the Red-Sea, and the bottom of the water of Jordan, with their children. And although the children be not always expreſſed, neither the women in the holy ſcriptures, yet they are comprehended and underſtood in the ſame.

Alſo the ſcripture evidently telleth us, that the apoſtles baptized whole families or houſholds: But the children are comprehended in a family or houſhold, as the chiefeſt and deareſt part thereof: Therefore we may conclude, that the apoſtles did baptize infants or children, and not only men of lawful age. And that the houſe or houſhold is taken for man, woman and child, it is manifeſt in the ſeventeenth of Geneſis; and alſo in that Joſeph doth call Jacob, with all his houſe, to come out of the land of Canaan into Egypt.

Finally, I can declare out of ancient writers, that the baptiſm of infants hath continued from the apoſtles time unto ours, neither was it inſtituted by any councils, neither of the pope, nor of other men, but commanded from the ſcripture by the apoſtles themſelves. Origen, upon the declaration of St. Paul's epiſtle to the Romans, expounding the ſixth chapter, ſaith, "That the church of Chriſt received the baptiſm of infants from the very apoſtles." St. Jerome maketh mention of the baptiſm of infants in the third book againſt the Pelagians, and in his epiſtle to Leta. St. Auguſtine reciteth for this purpoſe a place out of John biſhop of Conſtantinople, in his firſt book againſt Julian, chap. 2. and he again writing to St. Jerome, epiſt. 28. ſaith, "That St. Cyprian, not making any new decree, but firmly obſerving the faith of the church, judged with his fellow-biſhops, that as ſoon as one was born, he might be lawfully baptized." The place of Cyprian is to be ſeen in his epiſtle to Fidus.

Alſo St. Auguſtine, in writing againſt the Donatiſts in the fourth book, chap. 23 and 24. ſaith, That the baptiſm of infants was not derived from the authority of man, neither of councils, but from the tradition or doctrine of the apoſtles.

Cyril upon Leviticus, chap. 8. approveth the baptiſm of children, and condemneth the iteration of baptiſm. Theſe authorities of men I do alledge, not to tie the baptiſm of children unto the teſtimonies of men, but to ſhew how men's teſtimonies do agree with God's word, and that the verity of antiquity is on our ſide, and that the Anabaptiſts have nothing but lyes for them, and new imaginations, which feign the baptiſm of children to be the pope's commandment.

After this will I anſwer the ſum of your arguments for the contrary. The firſt, which includeth all the reſt, is, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the glad tidings to all creatures. He that believeth and is baptized, ſhall be ſaved: but he that believeth not, ſhall be damned, &c."

To this I anſwer, That nothing is added to God's word by baptiſm of children, as you pretend, but that is done which the ſame word doth require, for that children are accounted of Chriſt, in the goſpel, among the number of ſuch as believe, as it appeareth by theſe words, "He that offendeth one of theſe little babes, which believe in me, it were better for him to have a mill-ſtone tied about his neck, and to be caſt into the bottom of the ſea." Where plainly Chriſt calleth ſuch as be not able to confeſs their faith, Believers, becauſe of his mere grace he reputeth them for believers. And this is no wonder ſo to be taken, ſince God imputeth faith for righteouſneſs unto men that be of riper age: for both in men and children, righteouſneſs, acceptation, ſanctification, is of mere grace, and by imputation, that the glory of God's grace might be praiſed.

And that the children of faithful parents are ſanctified, and among ſuch as do believe, is apparent in the ſeventh chapter of the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians. And whereas you do gather, by the order of the words in the ſaid commandment of Chriſt, that children ought to be taught before they be baptized, and to this end you alledge many places out of the Acts, proving that ſuch as confeſſed their faith firſt, were baptized: I anſwer, that if the order of words might weigh any thing in this cauſe, we have the ſcripture that maketh as well for us. For in St. Mark we read that John did baptize in the deſart, preaching the baptiſm of repentance. In which place we ſee baptizing go before, and preaching to follow after.

And alſo I will declare this place of Matthew, exactly conſidered, to make for the uſe of baptiſm in children: for St. Matthew hath it written in this wiſe, "All power is given me (ſaith the Lord) in heaven and in earth," therefore going forth MATHETEUSATE, that is, Diſciple ye, (as I may expreſs the ſignification of the word) that is, Make or gather to me diſciples of all nations. And following, he declareth the way how they ſhould gather to him diſciples out of all nations, "Baptizing them and teaching;" by baptizing and teaching, ye ſhall procure a church to me. And both theſe aptly and briefly ſeverally he ſetteth forth, ſaying, "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you." Now then baptiſm goeth before doctrine.

But hereby I do not gather, that the Gentiles, who never heard any thing before of God, and of the Son of God, and of the Holy Ghoſt, ought to be baptized, neither would they permit themſelves to be baptized before they knew to what end. But this I have declared, to ſhew you upon how feeble foundation the Anabaptiſts be grounded. And plainly it is not true which they imagine of this text, that the Lord did only command ſuch to be baptized whom the apoſtles had firſt of all taught. Neither here verily is ſignified who only be to be baptized, but he ſpeaketh of ſuch as be at perfect age, and of the firſt foundations of faith, and of the church to be planted among the Gentiles, which were as yet rude and ignorant of religion.

Such as be of age may hear, believe and confeſs that which is preached and taught, but ſo cannot infants; therefore we may juſtly collect, that he ſpeaketh here nothing of infants or children. But for all this they ought not to be excluded from baptiſm.

It is a general rule, "He that doth not labour, muſt not eat." But who is ſo barbarous that might think hereby, that children ſhould be famiſhed?

The Lord ſent his apoſtles, at the beginning of his ſetting up of his true religion, unto all nations, unto ſuch as were both ignorant of God, and were out of the covenant of God; and truly ſuch perſons it behoved not firſt to be baptized, and afterward taught; but firſt to be taught, and after baptized. If at this day we ſhould go to the Turks, to convert them to the faith of Chriſt, verily firſt we ought to teach them, and afterwards baptize ſuch as would yield to be the ſervants of Chriſt. Likewiſe the Lord himſelf in time paſt did, when firſt he renewed the covenant with Abraham, and ordained circumciſion to be a ſeal of the covenant after that Abraham was circumciſed. But he, when he perceived the infants alſo to pertain to the covenant, and that circumciſion was the ſealing up of the covenant, did not only circumciſe Iſhmael his ſon, that was thirteen years of age, but all other infants that were born in his houſe, among whom we reckon Iſaac.

Even ſo faithful people, who were converted from heathen idolatry by the preaching of the goſpel, and confeſſing the faith, were baptized: when they underſtood their children to be counted among the people of God, and that baptiſm was the token of the people of God, they procured alſo their children to be baptized. Therefore, as it is written, "Abraham circumciſed all the male children of his houſe." In like manner we read in the Acts and writings of the apoſtles, that after the maſter of the houſe was turned to the faith, all the whole houſe was baptized. And as concerning thoſe which of old time were compelled to confeſs their faith before they received baptiſm, which were called Catechumeni, they were ſuch as with our fore-fathers came from the Gentiles into the church, who being yet rude of faith, they did inſtruct in the principels of their belief, and afterward they did badtize them; but the ſame ancient fathers, notwithſtanding, did baptize the children of faithful men, as I have already partly declared.

And becauſe you do require a haſty anſwer of your letter of one that is but a dull writer, I am here enforced to ceaſe particularly to go through your letter in anſwering thereto, knowing that I have fully anſwered every part thereof, in that I have already written, although not in ſuch order as it had been meet, and as I purpoſed. But foraſmuch as I underſtand that you will be no contentious man, neither in this matter, neither in any other, contrary to the judgment of Chriſt's primitive church, which is the body and fulneſs of Chriſt, I deſire you in the entire love of him, or rather Chriſt deſireth you by me (that your joy may be perfect, whereto you are now called) to ſubmit your judgment to that church, and to be at peace and unity in the ſame; that the coat of Chriſt, which ought to be without ſeam, but now, alas, moſt miſerably is torn in pieces by many dangerous ſects and damnable opinions, may appear by you in no part to have been rent, neither that any giddy head in theſe dog-days, might take an enſample by you to diſſent from Chriſt's true church. I beſeech thee, dear brother in the goſpel, follow the ſteps of the faith of the glorious martyrs in the primitive church, and of ſuch as at this day follow the ſame: decline from them neither to the right hand nor to the left. Then ſhall death, be it never ſo bitter, be more ſweet than this life; then ſhall Chriſt, with all the heavenly Jeruſalem, triumphantly embrace your ſpirit with unſpeakable gladneſs and exultation, who in this earth was content to join your ſpirit with their ſpirits, according as it is commanded by the word, that the ſpirit of the prophets ſhould be ſubject to the prophets. One thing aſk, with David, ere you depart, and require the ſame, that you may dwell with a full accord in his houſe, for there is glory and worſhip: and ſo, with Simeon in the temple embracing Chriſt, depart in peace: to which peace Chriſt bring both you and me, and all our loving brethren that love God in the unity of faith, by ſuch ways as ſhall pleaſe him, to his glory. Let the bitter paſſion of Chriſt, which he ſuffered for your ſake, and the horrible torments which the godly martyrs of Chriſt hath endured before us, and alſo the ineſtimable reward of your life to come, which is hidden yet a little while from you with Chriſt, ſtrengthen, comfort, and encourage you to the end of that glorious race which you are in, Amen.

Your yoke-fellow in captivity for the verity of Chriſt's goſpel, to live and die with you in the unity of faith.

John Philpot.

Other letters were written by Mr. Philpot to divers perſons, but theſe, as moſt principal, I have inſerted. Amongſt which I thought here not much impertinent to the place, to adjoin another certain letter of a godly and zealous goſpeller (whoſe name in her writing doth not appear) who in defending and commending the quarrel of Mr. John Philpot, the famous and worthy martyr of Chriſt, was therefore troubled and brought before biſhop Bonner. And therefore being appointed by the ſaid biſhop to appear upon a certain day to anſwer for herſelf, indeed kept not her day with the biſhop, but inſtead of her appearance, ſent him this letter here following.

"Wo be unto the idolatrous ſhepherds of England, that feed themſelves. Should not the ſhepherds feed the flock? but ye have eaten the fat, ye have cloathed you with the wool; the beſt fed have ye ſlain, but the flock have ye not nouriſhed, the weak have ye not holden up, the ſick have you not healed, the broken have you not bound together, the out-caſts have ye not brought again, the loſt have ye not ſought, but churliſhly and cruelly have ye ruled them." Ezek. 34.

FOraſmuch (my lord) as my buſineſs is ſuch that I cannot come to your lordſhip, according to my promiſe, I have been ſo bold to write theſe few words unto you, partly to excuſe mine abſence, and partly to anſwer your lordſhip's demands at my laſt moſt happy departure from you. As touching the breach of my promiſe with you in not coming again at the hour appointed, your lordſhip ſhall underſtand that I take the counſel of the angel, which warned the wiſe men not to come again to Herod according to their promiſe, but to return home again another way. Now, my lord, I perceiving your lordſhip to be a more cruel tyrant than ever was Herod, and more deſirous to deſtroy Chriſt in his poor members than ever he was, who, to deſtroy Chriſt, killed his own ſon, I thought good to take the angel's counſel, and to come no more at you; for I ſee that you are ſet all in a rage like a ravening wolf againſt the poor lambs of Chriſt, appointed to the ſlaughter for the teſtimony of the truth. Indeed you are called the common cut-throat, and general ſlaughter-ſlave to all the biſhops in England; and therefore it is wiſdom for me, and all other ſimple ſheep of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's ſtall as long as we can: eſpecially ſeeing that you have ſuch ſtore already, that you are not able to drink all their blood, leſt you ſhould break your belly; and therefore let them lie ſtill and die for hunger. Therefore (my lord) I thought it good to tarry a time until your lordſhip's ſtomach were come to you a little better; for I do perceive by your great fat cheeks, that you lack no lamb's fleſh yet, and belike you are almoſt glutted with ſupping ſo much blood, and therefore you will let ſome of the leaneſt die in priſon, which will then be meat good enough for your barking beagles, Harpsfield and his fellows; but yet, my lord, it were a great deal more for your lordſhip's honour, if your chaplains might have the meat roaſted in Smithfield at the fire of the ſtake, yea, and when it is ſomething fat and fair liking; for now they have nothing but ſkin and bones, and if the dogs come haſtily to it, they may chance ſhortly to be choaked and then your hunting will be greatly hindered, if it be not altogether marred.

I hear ſay, my lord, that ſome of the butcherly curs came of late to my houſe to ſeek their prey, and that they go round about (as David ſaith) grinning and grudging that they have not meat enough; therefore belike they have killed my poor brethren and ſiſters that have lain ſo long upon the butcherly ſtall, and eaten them up: for I hear ſay their friends could not be ſuffered to ſee them theſe three days and more; therefore I perceive now, that if I had come again according to my promiſe, your lordſhip, like a ravening wolf, or elſe ſome of your hell-hounds, would quickly have worried me: but I ſee well my appointed time is not yet come, therefore I will yet live and thank him for my deliverance, with continual ſongs of laud and praiſe. Thus have I been bold to trouble your lordſhip with telling you the truth, and the very cauſe that I came not to you again according to my unpurpoſed promiſe. I truſt your lordſhip will take this in good part, and accept it as a lawful excuſe, and not doubting but your lordſhip would have done the like if you had been in my caſe.

Now as concerning the ſecond part that cauſed me to write unto your lordſhip, which is to anſwer unto your ſubtle or rather cruel demand of my judgment of the death of that bleſſed martyr of Jeſus Chriſt, good Mr. Philpot, I will anſwer your lordſhip ſimply and plainly, what peril ſoever ſhall come thereof. Truly, my lord, I do not only think, but I am alſo moſt certain and ſure, that he as a very man of God, died a true martyr, and conſtant confeſſor of his dear Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, to whom he did moſt faithfully commit his ſweet ſoul, who will ſurely keep the ſame with him in joy for evermore. Alſo, my lord, I do verily believe and know, that your lordſhip hath committed a horrible and moſt cruel murder in the unjuſt condemning and killing of him, and that you ſhall make as heavy an account of his blood, which ſhortly ſhall be required at your hand, as ever your great grandfather cruel Cain did or ſhall do for his innocent brother Abel. Moreover, becauſe I am credibly informed, that your lordſhip doth believe, and have in ſecret ſaid, that there is no hell, I certify you, that your lordſhip never did any thing in all your life that did ſo much redound to your lordſhip's diſhonour, and perpetual ſhame and infamy, as your killing the body of this bleſſed prophet doth; eſpecially ſeeing that he was none of your dioceſe, nor had offended any of your lordſhip's deviliſh and cruel laws. Verily I hear almoſt every body ſay in all places where I come, that your lordſhip is made the common ſlaughter-ſlave to all your fellows, bite-ſheep biſhops I would ſay; yea, the very papiſts themſelves begin now to abhor your blood-thirſtineſs, and ſpeak ſhame of your tyranny. Like tyranny, believe me, my lord, every child that can any whit ſpeak, can call upon by your name and ſay, Bloody Bonner is biſhop of London; and every man hath it as perfectly upon his fingers ends as his Pater noſter, how many you for your part have burned with fire, and famiſhed in priſon; they ſay the whole ſum amounteth to forty perſons within this three quarters of a year. Therefore, my lord, tho' your lordſhip believeth that there is neither heaven nor hell, nor God nor devil; yet if your lordſhip love your own honeſty, which was loſt long ago, you were beſt to ceaſe from this cruel burning of true chriſtian men; and alſo from murdering of ſome in priſon: for that indeed offendeth men's minds moſt: yea, even your old friends the rankeſt papiſts that be. For, ſay they, Felix that heathen ruler did not forbid Paul's friends to viſit him in priſon, and to bring him neceſſary relief; and therefore it is a very great ſhame and ſin, to ſee a biſhop that beareth the name of a chriſtian, to be more cruel upon his poor brethren, than an heathen, turk, or infidel.

Theſe are men's ſayings in every place, not only of this realm, but alſo of the moſt part of the world, and the common talk they have of your lordſhip; therefore I thought to be ſo bold with your lordſhip, as to tell you of it, tho' perchance you will give me but ſmall thanks for my labour. Well, as for that, I put it to your lordſhip's choice, for I have as much already as I look for. Finally, my lord, I will give you to underſtand, that the death of this conſtant martyr and valiant ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt, hath given a greater ſhake towards the overthrowing of your papiſtical kingdom, than you ſhall ever be able to recover again theſe ſeven years, do the beſt you can, and ſet as many crafty dawbers to patch it up with untempered clay as you will; yea, tho' prating Pendleton, that wicked apoſtate, apply all his wily wits to help them. Verily, my lord, by all men's reports, his bleſſed life could never have done the like ſorrow to Satan's ſynagogue, whereof ſome ſay your lordſhip is a mighty member, as his happy death hath done. You have broken a pot indeed, but the precious word contained therein is ſo notably therewithal ſhed abroad, that the ſweet ſavour thereof hath wonderfully well refreſhed all the true houſhold, or congregation of Chriſt, that they cannot abide any more the ſtinking ſavour of your filthy ware that came from the dunghil of Rome, tho' your lordſhip's Judaſſes do ſet them to ſale every where to fill your bags. I put your lordſhip out of doubt, that if you do break any more ſuch pots, you will marr your own market altogether: for I promiſe you, moſt men begin to diſlike your deviliſh doings, and wonderfully to loath your popiſh pedlary wares.

Thus have I (according to your lordſhip's command), ſhewed you ſimply what I think of that good man's death, whoſe blood crieth for vengeance againſt your lordſhip's butcherly bloody proceedings in the ears of the Lord of Hoſts, who will ſhortly revenge the ſame upon your pilled pate, and upon the reſt of all your poll-ſhorn brethren, the very marked cattle of the great Antichriſt of Rome. The meaſure of his iniquity is filled up to the brim, therefore will God ſhortly pour in double unto your deſerved deſtruction. And then your new made proſelytes will be glad to cover their crowns with a cowturd (ſaving your lordſhip's reverence I ſhould have ſaid firſt.) Well, I rather deſire their converſion than confuſion, the Lord ſend one of them ſhortly, as may be moſt to his glory, Amen.

I ſignify alſo unto your lordſhip, that the railing words which your lying preacher ſhewed forth of his filthy fountain upon Sunday, againſt the dear ſervant of God, good Mr. Philpot, do greatly redound to your lordſhip's diſhoneſty, and much deface your ſpiritual honour. Verily I ſee that the great wrath of God hath ſo blinded your eyes, that you ſee not what is with you, nor what is againſt you, but ſtill you vomit out your own ſhame, and make all the world wonder upon you. Was it not enough for you to condemn him moſt unjuſtly; yea, contrary to your own laws, and to kill his innocent body moſt tyrannouſly, but you muſt alſo ſet a lying limb of the devil to blaſpheme, ſlander, and belye him now he is dead? O viperous generation, ſeed of the ſerpent, and right children of the devil: full well do you counterfeit your father's ſteps, whom Chriſt calleth a murderer, and a lyar from the beginning; which two things be the only weapons of your war, wherewith you maintain all your miſchief, that is to ſay, lying and murder; for thoſe whom ye cannot overcome with your lying perſuaſions, them you kill moſt cruelly, and then blaſpheme and belye them with railing ſentences when they are dead. But all this will not blind the people ple of God, nor yet make them any whit the leſs believe the truth, nor abate their love from the true preachers thereof; yea, it is a true ſign and a token that they are the very diſciples of Chriſt; for he hath ſaid, "Bleſſed are ye when men revile you, and ſay all manner of evil ſayings againſt you for my name's ſake. Rejoice, and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven." And doubtleſs great is the good man's reward in heaven by this time, as your lordſhip's damnation ſhall be great in hell, except you repent and ſurceaſe from ſhedding innocent blood. But it is to be feared your heart is hardened as Pharaoh's was, ſeeing that with Judas ye have ſold and betrayed your Maſter. Take heed, my lord, leſt you come to the ſame end, or a worſe than he did: for verily I cannot perceive how you ſhould eſcape it long; therefore ſay not but that a woman gave you warning, if you liſt to take it. And as for the obtaining of your popiſh purpoſe in ſuppreſſing the truth, I put you out of doubt, you ſhall not obtain it ſo long as you got his way to work as ye do; for verily I believe that you have loſt the hearts of twenty thouſand that were rank papiſts within theſe twelve months.

It is found very true that one holy doctor ſaith, The blood of the martyrs is the ſeed of the goſpel; when one is put to death, a thouſand doth riſe for him. And that this is true, you may well perceive by the hearty love that the people ſhewed unto good Mr. Philpot at his going to his death. They went not about to make an idol of him, as your adder's brood would have men imagine; but they worſhipped God who gave ſuch ſtrength to his dear child, to die ſo conſtantly for the teſtimony of his truth, unto the utter deſtruction of that deteſtable idolatry which your lordſhip doth moſt deviliſhly maintain with the force of fire, faggots, and ſword: yea, and rather than fail, to famiſh men in priſon again, as ye have done already. It is reported by your own tormentors, that the ſix priſoners, which you have in your priſon, be put in ſix ſeveral places all the day, and every night brought together, and ſet in the ſtocks. Forſooth, my lord, this doth get you a foul name all about the country, and yet all will not help your lordſhip's peſtilent purpoſe, but every way hinder the ſame. For Zorababel will be found no lyar, who ſaid, The truth ſhall have victory. You do but ſtrive againſt the ſtream, and kick againſt the pricks; the Lord doth laugh your doings to ſcorn, and will bring all your councils and devices to naught (as knoweth the Lord God), who of his great mercy ſhortly convert your lordſhip, or utterly confound you, and get his name a glory over you, Amen.

Your lordſhip's orator, who prayeth daily to God that he may reward you according to your deeds. Anno 1556.

Anno 1556.

The Hiſtory of ſeven Martyrs ſuffering together at London, for the Teſtimony of Chriſt's Goſpel.

THE catholic prelates of the Pope's band being as yet not ſatisfied with this their one year's murdering of the reverend, learned, and principal members of Chriſt's church (whereof now there were but very few, who either were not cruelly conſumed by fire, or elſe, to avoid their popiſh rage, compelled to flee their natural country), continued ſtill this next year alſo, which was Anno 1556, in no leſs cruelty towards the poor, ſimple, and inferior ſort of people (I mean in degree, tho' God be praiſed, not in ſtedfaſtneſs), having yet ſometimes amongſt them ſuch as were both learned and of good eſtimation, as in continuance of this ſtory ſhall appear.

Wherefore (as the firſt fruits thereof), to begin this year withal, about the 27th day of January were burned in Smithfield, at London, theſe ſeven perſons hereafter following, to wit:

Thomas Whittle, prieſt. Bartlet Green, gentleman. John Tudſon, artificer. John Went, artificer. Thomas Browne. Iſabel Foſter, wife. Joan Warne, alias Laſhford, maid.

All which ſeven, as they were burned together in one fire, ſo were they likewiſe all upon one ſort and form of articles condemned in one day. Howbeit, foraſmuch as the gifts of God in them were diverſe (ſome more abounding in knowledge than others, their dealings withal were alſo diverſe, as ſhall be more plainly perceived in the diſcourſing of their ſeveral proceſſes hereafter following. And therefore for the better underſtanding hereof, I will firſt (by the leave of the Lord) paſſing over their private articles and examinations had at ſundry times in the biſhop's houſe, ſet forth their general examinations in the public conſiſtory, upon the biſhop's articles there adminiſtered unto them, with their anſwers alſo to the ſame, according as they all agreed after one manner and ſort together, as here by the words both of the articles and their anſwers underwritten, may appear.

The Form and Words of Biſhop Bonner's Articles adminiſtered to the ſeven Perſons above-mentioned in the Conſiſtory.

AND firſt to behold the manner of ſpeech in theſe biſhops, ſitting in their majeſty to terrify the ears of the ſimple withal, let us hear the pontifical phraſe of this biſhop, beginning in this ſort.

The within written Articles, and every of them, and every Part and Parcel of them, we Edmund, by the Permiſſion of God, Biſhop of London, do object and adminiſter to thee Thomas Whittle, &c. of our mere Office, for thy Soul's Health, and for the Reformation of thine Offences and Miſdemeanours, admoniſhing thee in the virtue of Obedience, and under the Pains of both Cenſures of the Church, and alſo of other Pains of the Law, to Anſwer fully, plainly, and truly to all the ſame.

FIRST, that thou N. haſt firmly, ſtedfaſtly, and conſtantly believed in times paſt, and ſo doſt now believe at this preſent, that there is here in earth a catholic church, in which catholic church the faith and religion of Chriſt is trully profeſſed, allowed, received, kept and retained by all faithful and true chriſtian people.

2. Item, That thou the ſaid N. in times paſt haſt alſo believed, and ſo doſt believe at this preſent, that there are in the catholic church ſeven ſacraments, inſtituted and ordained by God, and by the conſent of the holy church allowed, approved, kept, and retained.

3. Item, That thou the ſaid N. waſt in times paſt baptized in the faith of the ſaid catholic church, profeſſing by thy godfathers and godmothers, the faith and religion of Chriſt and the obſervation thereof, renouncing there the devil and all his pomps and works, and waſt by the ſaid ſacrament of baptiſm incorporated to the catholic church, and made a faithful member thereof.

4. Item, That thou the ſaid N. coming to the age of fourteen years, and ſo to the age of diſcretion, didſt not depart from the ſaid profeſſion and faith, nor didſt miſlike any part of the ſame faith or doings, but didſt like a faithful chriſtian perſon abide and continue in all the ſame by the ſpace of certain years, ratifying and confirming all the ſame.

5. Item, That thou the ſaid N. notwithſtanding the premiſes, haſt of late, that is to ſay within theſe two years laſt paſt, within the city and dioceſe of London, ſwerved at the leaſt way from ſome part of the ſaid catholic faith and religion; and amongſt other things thou haſt miſliked misliked and earnestly spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the unity of the church, railing and maligning the authority of the see of Rome, and the faith observed in the same.

6. Item, That thou the said N. hast heretofore refused, and dost refuse at this present to be reconciled again to the unity of the church, not acknowledging and confessing the authority of the said see of Rome to be lawful.

7. Item, That thou the said N. misliking the sacrifice of the mass, and the sacrament of the altar, hast refused to come to thy parish-church to hear mass, and to receive the said sacrament, and hast also expressly said, that in the said sacrament of the altar there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ really, substantially and truly, but hast affirmed expressly, that the mass is idolatry and abomination; and in that the sacrament of the altar there is none other substance but only material bread and material wine, which are tokens of Christ's body and blood only, and that the substance of Christ's body and blood is in no wise in the said sacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That thou the said N. being convented before certain judges or commissioners, for thy disorder herein, and being found obstinate, wilful and heady, wast by their commandment sent unto me and my prison, to be examined by me, and process to be made against thee for thy offence herein.

9. Item, That all and singular the premises have been, and be true and manifest, and thyself not only infamed and suspected thereof, but also culpable therein; and by reason of the same, thou wast and art of the jurisdiction of me Edmund bishop of London, and before me, according to the order of the ecclesiastical laws, are to be convented, and also by me to be punished and reformed.

Their Answers to the foregoing Articles.

TO the first article they altogether agreed, affirming the same to be true: John Tudson, and Thomas Browne further adding, that the church of England, as it was at that present used, was no part of the true catholic church.

To the second article they answered, that they acknowledged but only two sacraments in Christ's catholic church, that is to say, baptism, and the supper of the Lord; John Went, and Tudson affirmed, that the sacrament of the altar, as it was then used, was an idol, and no sacrament at all.

To the third article they all agreed, and confessed it to be true, that they were baptized in the faith of Christ, and the church then taught; and afterwards during the time of king Edward the sixth, they hearing the gospel preached, and the truth opened, followed the order of the religion and doctrine then used and set forth in the reign of the said king Edward.

To the fourth article they also agreed: but John Went added, that about seven years past, he then being about twenty years of age, began to mislike certain things used in the church of England, as the administration of the sacrament of the altar; likewise all the ceremonies of the said church, and did likewise at that present time mislike the same as they were used, although his godfathers and godmothers promised for him the contrary.

John Tudson also said, that when he came to the years of discretion, that is, about nine years past, being about eighteen years of age, he did mislike the doctrine and religion then taught and set forth in the church of England, except in the time of king Edward, in whose reign the gospel was truly set forth: and he further said, that the doctrine set forth in the queen's reign was not agreeable to God's word, nor yet to the true catholic church that Christ speaketh of, &c.

Isabel Foster, with others granted, adding likewise, and saying, to the said four articles, that she continued in the same faith and religion which she was baptized in, after she came to the years of discretion as other common people did; howbeit, blindly and without knowledge, till the reign of king Edward the sixth: at which time she, hearing the gospel truly preached and opened to the people, received thereupon the faith and religion then taught and set forth, &c.

To the fifth articles, they answered and agreed the same to be true, according to the contents thereof: Thomas Whittle adding moreover, that he had swerved and gone away, and not in whole but in part, not from the whole catholic church, but from the church of Rome, in speaking against the mass, the sacrifice thereof, and the see of Rome.

Joan Lashford, alias Joan Warne, granted with the other the said article, added moreover, that she never hitherto swerved or went away, nor yet doth, from any part of Christ's catholic faith and religion; but said, that from the time she was eleven years of age, she had misliked the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the authority of the see of Rome, with the doctrine thereof, because they be against Christ's catholic church, and the right faith of the same.

Bartlet Green answering to this article, said, that he swerved not from the catholic faith, but only from the church of Rome, &c.

To the sixth article they answered, and confessed the same to be true, rendering the cause thereof, because (say they) the same church and doctrine therein set forth and taught, disagreeth from the true unity of Christ's word, and the true catholic faith, &c.

Whereunto Bartlet Green answered, that he was contented to be reconciled to the unity of Christ's catholic church, but not of the church of Rome.

In like manner added also John Went.

To the seventh article they answered, and confessed the contents thereof to be true, giving withal the reasons and cause of this their so doing, for that the mass with the sacrament thereof, as it was then used and set forth in the church of England, was dissonant to the word and teaching of the people, &c.

John Went furthermore said, as concerning the mass, that he believed no less, but the mass which he calleth the supper of the Lord, as it is now used in the realm of England, is naught, full of idolatry, and against God's word so far as he seeth it: howbeit, he saith that since the queen's coronation by chance he hath been present where the mass hath been said, whereof he is sorry.

Isabel Foster also answering to the said article, with the other before, confessed moreover, that since queen Mary's reign she had not heard mass, nor received the sacrament, but had refused to be in the place where it was administered: for she knew no such sacrament to be. And being demanded of her belief in the same, she said, that there was but one only material bread, and material wine, and not the real substance of the body of Christ in the same sacrament: for so she had been taught to believe by the preachers in the time of king Edward, whom she believed to have preached the truth in that behalf.

To the eighth article they grant the same, and the contents thereof to be so.

Thomas Whittle adding and affirming, that the lord chancellor that then was, sent him up to the bishop there present.

Bartlet Green added, that he was sent up to the said bishop, but for no offence herein articulate.

John Went said, that Dr. Story, queen Mary's commissioner, examined him upon the sacrament, and because he denied the real presence, he presented this examinate to the bishop.

John Tudson likewise examined by Mr. Cholmley and Dr. Story upon the same matters, and for not coming to the church, and accuſed by the ſame, becauſe he would not agree to them, was ſent to the biſhop.

Thomas Browne alſo ſaid, that he for not coming to the church of St. Bride's, was brought by the conſtable to the biſhop, &c.

Joan Warne confeſſed, that ſhe was ſent by Dr. Story to the biſhop of London, about twelve weeks ago, ſince which time ſhe hath continued with the ſaid biſhop.

To the ninth article they confeſs and ſay, that as they believe the premiſes before by them confeſſed to be true, ſo they deny not the ſame to be manifeſt, and that they be of the juriſdiction of London.

And thus having expreſſed their articles with their anſwers jointly made unto the ſame, it remaineth further more fully to diſcourſe the ſtories, and handling of all the ſeven aforeſaid martyrs ſeverally and particularly by themſelves, firſt beginning with Thomas Whittle.

1. Thomas Whittle, Martyr.

MEntion was made before in Mr. Philpot's ſtory, (p. 444.) of a married prieſt, whom he found in biſhop Bonner's coal-houſe at his firſt coming thither, in heavineſs of mind of great ſorrow, for recanting the doctrine which he had taught in king Edward's days, whoſe name was Thomas Whittle of Eſſex; and thus lieth his ſtory. This Thomas Whittle, after he had been expulſed from the place in Eſſex where he ſerved, went abroad where he might, now here and there, as occaſion offered, preaching and ſowing the goſpel of Chriſt. At length being apprehended by one Edmund Alablaſter, in hope of reward and promotion, which he miſerably gaped after, he was brought firſt as priſoner before the biſhop of Wincheſter, who then was lately fallen ſick of his diſeaſe, whereof not long after he died moſt ſtrangely. But the apprehender for his proffered ſervice was highly checked by the biſhop, aſking if there were no man unto whom he might bring ſuch raſcals, but to him. Hence (quoth he) out of my ſight, thou varlet, what doſt thou trouble me with ſuch matters? The greedy cormorant being thus defeated of his deſired prey, yet thinking to ſeek and hunt further, carried his priſoner to the biſhop of London, with whom what ill uſage this Whittle had, and how he was by the biſhop beaten and buffeted about the face, by this his own narration in a letter ſent to his friend, manifeſtly may appear.

Upon Thurſday, which was the tenth of January, the biſhop of London ſent for me Thomas Whittle, miniſter, out of the porter's lodge, where I had been all night, lying upon the earth, on a little low bed, where I had as painful a night of ſickneſs as ever I had. And when I came before him, he talked with me many things of the ſacrament ſo groſly, as is not worthy to be rehearſed. And amongſt other things, he aſked me if I would have come to maſs that morning if he had ſent for me? Whereunto I anſwered, that I would have come to him at his commandment, but to your maſs (ſaid I) I have ſmall affection. At which anſwer he was ſore diſpleaſed, and ſaid, I ſhould be fed with bread and water. And as I followed him through the great hall, he turned back, and beat me with his fiſt, firſt on the one cheek, and then on the other, as the ſign of my beating did many days appear. And then he led me into a little ſalt-houſe, where I had neither ſtraw nor bed, but lay two nights on a table, and ſlept ſoundly, I thank God.

Then, upon the Friday next after, I was brought to my lord, and he then gave me many fair words, and ſaid he would be good to me. And ſo he going to Fulham committed me to Dr. Harpsfield, that he and I in that afternoon ſhould commune together, and draw out certain articles, whereunto if I would ſubſcribe, I ſhould be diſmiſſed. But Dr. Harpsfield ſent not for me till night, and then perſuaded me very much to forſake my opinions. I anſwered, I held nothing but the truth, and therefore I could not ſo lightly turn therefrom. So I thought I ſhould at that time have had no more ado: but he had made a certain bill, which the regiſter pulled out of his boſom, and read it. The bill indeed was very eaſily made, and therefore more dangerous: for the effect thereof was, to deteſt all errors and hereſies againſt the ſacrament of the altar, and other ſacraments, and to believe the faith of the catholic church, and live accordingly.

The copy of this bill here mentioned, if it pleaſe the gentle reader to peruſe, ſo as it came to our hands, we have hereunto adjoined, written in their own words, as followeth.

The Bill of Submiſſion, offered to Thomas Whittle to ſubſcribe.

I Thomas Whittle, prieſt, of the dioceſe of London, acknowledge and confeſs with my mouth, agreeing with my heart before you, reverend father in God, Edmund biſhop of London, my ordinary, that I do deteſt and abhor all manner of hereſies and errors againſt the ſacrament of the altar, or any of the ſacraments of the church, which hereſies and errors have heretofore been condemned in any wiſe by the catholic church: and I do proteſt and declare by theſe preſents, that I do both now hold, and alſo intend by God's grace always hereafter to hold, obſerve and keep, in all points, the catholic faith and belief of Chriſt's church, according as this church of England, being a member of the ſaid catholic church, doth now profeſs and keep, and in no wiſe to ſwerve, decline, or go from the ſaid faith, during my natural life, ſubmitting myſelf fully and wholly to you, reverend father, my ſaid ordinary, in all things concerning my reformation and amendment at all times. In witneſs whereof I the ſaid Thomas Whittle, prieſt, have hereunto ſubſcribed my name, written, &c.

To this bill I did indeed ſet my hand, being much deſired and counſelled ſo to do; and the fleſh being always deſirous to have liberty, I conſidered not thoroughly the inconvenience that might come thereupon; and reſpite I deſired to have had, but earneſtly they deſired me to ſubſcribe. Now when I had ſo done, I had little joy thereof. For by and by my mind and conſcience told me by God's word that I had done evil, by ſuch a ſlight means to ſhake off the ſweet croſs of Chriſt: and yet it was not my ſeeking, as God he knoweth, but altogether came of them. O the crafty ſubtilty of Satan in his members! Let every man, that God ſhall deliver into their hands, take good heed, and cleave faſt to Chriſt: for they will leave no corner of his conſcience unſought, but will attempt all guileful and ſubtil means to corrupt him, to fall both from God and his truth. But yet let no man deſpair of God's help, for Peter did fall and riſe again. And David ſaith, "A righteous man though he fall, he ſhall not be caſt away: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand." For I for my part have felt my infirmities, and yet have I found God's preſent help and comfort in time of need, I thank him therefore.

The night after I had ſubſcribed I was ſore grieved, and for ſorrow of conſcience could not ſleep. For in the deliverance of my body out of bonds, which I might have had, I could find no joy nor comfort, but ſtill was in my conſcience tormented more and more, being aſſured by God's Spirit and his word, that I through evil counſel and advice had done amiſs. And both with diſquietneſs of mind, and with my other cruel handling, I was ſickly, lying upon the ground when the keeper came: and ſo I deſired him to pray Dr. Harpsfield to come to me, and ſo he did.

And

And when he came and the regiſter with him, I told him that I was not well at eaſe, but eſpecially I told him I was grieved very much in my conſcience and mind becauſe I had ſubſcribed. And I ſaid, that my conſcience had ſo accuſed me, through the juſt judgment of God and his word, that I had felt hell in my conſcience, and Satan ready to devour me: and therefore I pray you Mr. Harpsfield (ſaid I) let me have the bill again, for I will not ſtand to it. So he gently commanded it to be fetched, and gave it me, and ſuffered me to put out my name, whereof I was right glad when I had ſo done, although death ſhould follow. And hereby I had experience of God's providence and mercy towards me, who trieth his people, and ſuffereth them to fall, but not to be loſt: for in the midſt of this temptation and trouble, he gave me warning of my deed, and alſo delivered me, his name be praiſed for evermore, Amen.

Neither devil nor cruel tyrant can pluck any of Chriſt's ſheep out of his hand. Of which flock of Chriſt's ſheep I truſt undoubtedly I am one, by means of his death and blood-ſhedding, which ſhall at the laſt day ſtand at his right hand, and receive with others his bleſſed benediction. And now being condemned to die, my conſcience and mind I praiſe God is quiet in Chriſt, and I by his grace am very willing and content to give over this body to the death, for the teſtimony of his truth and pure religion, againſt Antichriſt and all his falſe religion and doctrine. They that report otherwiſe of me, ſpeak not truly. And as for Fountain I ſaw him not all this while.

By me Thomas Whittle, Miniſter.

Concerning the troubled mind of this good man, and tearing his name out of the bill, here followeth the report of the ſame, written in the letters both of the ſaid Mr. Harpsfield, and alſo of Johnſon the regiſter, being then preſent thereat, and reporters of the ſame unto the biſhop, as in their letters hereto annexed is to be ſeen.

Mr. Harpsfield's Letter to Bonner biſhop of London, concerning Mr. Whittle.

PLeaſeth your good lordſhip to underſtand, that yeſterday I dined with my lord of Exeter, who ſoon after my firſt coming to him, aſked me what news? I anwered, none but good that I had heard. No, ſaid he; why, it is a rumour in the city, that to-morrow the queen's grace will take her journey towards the king. I anſwered, that I thought it not to be any whit true, but an invention of heretics: Yea, and further, ſaid he, there is a report made abroad of my lord your maſter, that he is in diſcomfort, and therefore will ſuffer no man to come unto him. When I heard thus much, I began to laugh, and to declare how untrue this report was: ſo that my lord (who before was very ſad) afterward knowing the truth, rejoiced much to hear that all was well with your lordſhip, and deſired me to have his hearty commendations to your lordſhip.

One of my lord of Pembroke's retinue, a very handſome man, and as far as I can yet learn, a catholic, is a ſuter to your lordſhip to have licence to erect a ſchool: and the order which he intendeth to uſe, is contained in this printed paper which I ſend here incloſed to your lordſhip. I would be glad for my lord of Pembroke's ſake, that he underſtood, that upon my motion your lordſhip were content he ſhould teach as he intendeth. Mr. Johnſon and I have travailed with the prieſt, and he hath ſubſcribed his name to this draught which is here incloſed, and hath promited he will ſtand to the ſame before your lordſhip.

When I had written thus much, ſuddenly came tidings to me, that he was turned the other ſide of Jordan. Cluney coming to the prieſt, found him lying proſtrate, and groaning as though he ſhould have died forthwith. Then Cluney took him up, and ſet him up upon a ſtool, and came to me, and told me of this revel. It happened that Mr. Johnſon was with me, and he went to this fond heretic, and found him lying all along, holding his hands up, and looking hypocritically towards heaven. I cauſed Thomas More and Cluney to ſet him on the ſtool, and with much ado, at length he told me, that Satan had been with him in the night, and told him that he was damned; and weeping, he prayed Mr. Johnſon and me to ſee the bill whereunto he ſubſcribed; and when he ſaw it, he tore out his name, to wit, out of the book of the living. Me thinketh he will needs burn a faggot, neither is there any other likelihood of the young woman [J. Warne.] I have enquired of the two perſons who ſue to have a licence to eat fleſh. And the woman of Chriſt-church is indeed very much diſeaſed, and hath been long diſeaſed, and ſhe and her huſband both catholic. Of the other yet I can learn nothing. Thus Jeſus evermore preſerve your good lordſhip, and my miſtreſs, your lordſhip's ſiſter, with all yours. This preſent Sunday.

Your lordſhip's moſt bounden ſervant,
Nicholas Harpsfield.

Another Letter of Robert Johnſon, Regiſter, touching Thomas Whittle, written to Bonner Biſhop of London.

MY bounden duty premiſed, pleaſeth your lordſhip to underſtand, that this laſt Friday in the afternoon, Mr. Archdeacon of London did diligently travail with Sir Thomas Whittle, prieſt. I being preſent, and perceiving his conformity, as outwardly appeared, deviſed this ſubmiſſion, and he being content therewith did ſubſcribe the ſame. But now this Saturday morning Mr. Archdeacon and I, upon Cluney's report, declaring that he feigned himſelf to be deſtracted of his ſenſes, went unto him, to whom he declared, that Satan in the nighttime appeared unto him, and ſaid that he was damned, for that he had done againſt his conſcience in ſubſcribing to the ſaid ſubmiſſion, with other like-words. And then Mr. Archdeacon at his earneſt requeſt, delivered unto him the ſubmiſſion. And thereupon the ſaid Whittle did tear out his ſubſcription, made in the foot of the ſame, as your lordſhip ſhall perceive by the ſubmiſſion ſent now unto your lordſhip by Mr. Archdeacon; wherewith the ſaid Whittle was ſomewhat quieted.

And as touching Joan Laſhford, Mr. Archdeacon did likewiſe travail with her, and ſhewing her Sir Thomas Whittle's ſubmiſſion, which I read unto her twice, demanded if ſhe could not be content to make the like ſubmiſſion, and ſhe deſired reſpite until this morning. And being now immediately demanded, in like wiſe ſaith, that ſhe will not make any thing in writing, nor put any ſign thereunto. Mr. Archdeacon and I intended this afternoon to examine the ſaid Sir Thomas upon articles: for as yet there doth appear nothing in writing againſt him, as knoweth Almighty God, who preſerve your good lordſhip in proſperity with honour long to endure.

From London this Saturday.

By your lordſhip's daily beadſman, and bounden ſervant,
Robert Johnſon.

The Condemnation and Martyrdom of Mr. Thomas Whittle.

AT his laſt examination before the biſhop, upon the 14th day of January, 1556, biſhop Bonner with others ſitting in his conſiſtory in the afternoon, firſt called forth Thomas Whittle, with whom he began in effect as followeth: Becauſe ye be a prieſt (ſaith he) as I and other biſhops here be, and did receive the order of prieſthood after the rite and form of the catholic church, ye ſhall not think but I will adminiſter juſtice as well unto you you as unto others. And then the ſaid Bonner, in further communication, did charge him, that where in times paſt he had ſaid maſs, according to the order then uſed, the ſame Whittle now of late had ſpoken and railed againſt the ſame, ſaying, that it was idolatry and abomination. Whereunto Thomas Whittle, anſwering again, ſaid, That at ſuch a time as he ſo ſaid maſs, he was then ignorant, &c. adding moreover, that the elevation of the ſacrament at the maſs, giveth occaſion of idolatry to them that be ignorant and unlearned.

After this the biſhop, making haſte to the articles (which in all his examinations he ever harped upon) came to this article, that thou waſt in times paſt baptized in the faith of the catholic church.

To this the ſaid Whittle inferred again, I was baptized in the faith of the catholic church, although I did forſake the church of Rome. And ye, my lord, do call theſe hereſies that be no hereſies, and do charge me therewith as hereſies, and ye ground yourſelf upon that religion which is not agreeable to God's word, &c.

Then the ſaid Thomas Whittle was again admoniſhed, and with perſuaſions intreated by the biſhop; who becauſe he would not agree unto the ſame, the biſhop forthwith proceeded firſt to his degradation. The order and manner of which their popiſh and moſt vain degradation may be ſeen before in the ſtory of biſhop Hooper. (p. 120)

Then Whittle, in the midſt of the ceremonies, when he ſaw them ſo buſy in degrading him, after their father the pope's pontifical faſhion, ſaid unto them, Paul and Titus had not ſo much to do with their prieſts and biſhops. And farther, ſpeaking to the biſhop, he ſaid unto him, My lord, your religion ſtandeth moſt with the church of Rome, and not with the catholic church of Chriſt.

The biſhop after this, according to his accuſtomed formal proceedings, tried him yet again with words rather than with ſubſtantial arguments, to conform him to his religion. Who then denying ſo to do, ſaid, As for your religion, I cannot be perſuaded that it is according to God's word.

The biſhop then aſked, what fault he found in the adminiſtration of the ſacrament of the altar.

Whittle anſwered and ſaid, It is not uſed according to Chriſt's inſtitution, in that it is privately and not openly done. And alſo becauſe it is adminiſtered but in one kind to the lay people, which is againſt Chriſt's ordinance. Farther, Chriſt commanded it not to be elevated nor adored; for the adoration and elevation cannot be approved by ſcripture.

Well, quoth Bonner, my lords here, and other learned men, have ſhewed great learning for thy converſion, wherefore, if thou wilt yet return to the faith and religion of the catholic church, I will receive thee thereunto, and not commit thee to the ſecular power, &c. To make ſhort, Whittle, ſtrengthened with the grace of the Lord, ſtood ſtrong and unmoveable in what he had affirmed. Wherefore the ſentence being read, the next day following he was committed to the ſecular power; and ſo in a few days after brought to the fire, with the other ſix above named, ſealing up the teſtimony of his doctrine with his blood, which he willingly and chearfully gave for the witneſs of the truth.

A Letter of Thomas Whittle to John Careleſs, Priſoner in the King's-Bench.

THE peace of God in Chriſt be with you continually, dearly beloved brother in Chriſt, with the aſſiſtance of God's grace and Holy Spirit, to the working and performing of thoſe things which may comfort and edify his church (as ye daily do) to the glory of his name, and the increaſe of your joy and ſolace of ſoul in this life, and alſo your reward in heaven with Chriſt our captain, whoſe faithful ſoldier ye are, in the life to come, Amen.

I have greatly rejoiced (my dear heart) with thanks to God for you, ſince I have heard of your faith and love which you bear towards God and his ſaints, with a moſt godly ardent zeal to the virtue of Chriſt's doctrine and religion, which I have heard by the report of many, but eſpecially by the declaring of that valiant captain in Chriſt's church, that ſtout champion in God's cauſe, that ſpectacle to the world, I mean our good brother Philpot, who lieth now under the altar, and ſweetly enjoyeth the promiſed reward. And eſpecially I, and my condemned fellows, give thanks to God for your loving and comfortable letter in the deepneſs of our trouble (after the fleſh) ſent unto us to the conſolation of us all, but eſpecially to me moſt ſinful miſer on mine own behalf, but happy, I hope, through God's loving kindneſs in Chriſt ſhewed unto me; who ſuffered me to faint and fail thro' human infirmity, by the working of the arch-enemy in his ſworn ſoldiers the biſhops and prieſts. In whom ſo lively appeareth the very viſage and ſhape of Satan, that a man (if it were not prejudice to God's word) might well affirm them to be devils incarnate, as I by experience do ſpeak. Wherefore, who ſo ſhall for conſcience matters come in their hands, had need of the wiſeneſs of the ſerpent to ſave his head, though it be with the wounding of his body, and to take diligent heed how he conſenteth to their wicked writings, or ſetteth his hand to their conveyances.

So did they aſſault me and craftily tempt me to their wicked ways, or at leaſt to a denial of my faith and true opinions, though it were but by colour and diſſimulation. And, alas, ſomething they did prevail. Not that I did any thing at all like their opinions and falſe papiſtical religion, or elſe doubted of the truth wherein I ſtand, but only the infirmity of the fleſh beguiled me, deſiring liberty by an unlawful means; God lay it not to my charge at that day, and ſo I heartily deſire you to pray. Howbeit, uncertain I am whether more profit came thereby: profit to me, in that God ſuffered Satan to buffet me by his aforeſaid miniſter of miſchief, ſhewing me mine infirmity that I ſhould not boaſt nor rejoice in myſelf, but only in the Lord, who when he had led me to hell in my conſcience through the reſpect of his fearful judgments againſt me for my fearfulneſs, miſtruſt, and crafty cloaking in ſuch ſpiritual and weighty matters, yet he brought me from thence again to the magnifying of his name, ſuſpecting of fleſh and blood, and conſolation of mine own ſoul, or elſe that I might feel diſprofit in offending the congregation of God, which peradventure will rather adjudge my fall to come of doubtfulneſs in doctrine and religion, than of human imbecility.

Well, of the importune burthen of a troubled conſcience for denying or diſſembling the known verity, I, by experience, could ſay very much more, which perhaps I may declare by writing, to the warning of others, if God grant time; for now am I and my fellows ready to go hence even for Chriſt's cauſe; God's name be praiſed who hath hereto called us. Pray, I pray you, that we may end our courſe with joy, and at your appointed time you ſhall come after. But as the Lord hath kept you, ſo will he preſerve your life ſtill, to the intent you ſhould labour (as you do) to appeaſe and convince theſe ungodly contentions and controverſies, which now do too much reign, brawling about terms to no edification. God is diſhonoured, the church diſquieted, and occaſion to ſpeak evil of the goſpel miniſtered to our adverſaries. But ſuch is the ſubtilty of Satan, that whom he cannot win with groſs idolatry, in open religion, them he ſeeketh to corrupt and deceive in opinions, in a private profeſſion. But here I will abruptly leave, leſt with my rude and ſimple vein I ſhall be tedious unto you, deſiring you (my loving brother) if it ſhall not ſeem grievous unto you, to write unto me and my fellows yet once again, if you have leiſure, and we time to the ſame.

Provide me Mr. Philpot's nine examinations for a friend of mine, and I ſhall pay you therefore, by the leave of Almighty Almighty God our heavenly Father, who correcteth all his dear children in this world, that they ſhould not be damned with the world; and trieth the faith of his ſaints through many tribulations, that being found conſtant to the end, he may crown his own gifts in them, and in heaven highly reward them; whither I truſt I go before, looking for you to follow (my faithful friend) that we ſing perpetual praiſe to our loving Lord God for victory over Satan and ſin, won for us by Jeſus Chriſt, God and man, our only and ſufficient Saviour and advocate, Amen.

Farewel, and pray in faith.

Yours, Thomas Whittle, miniſter, and now condemned to die for the goſpel's ſake, Jan. 21. 1556.

All my fellows ſalute you. Salute all our faithful brethren with you.

To my dear Friend and Brother, John Went, and other his Fellow-Priſoners in Lollard's-Tower.

HE that preſerved Joſeph priſoner in Egypt, fed Daniel in the lion's den, and delivered Paul, Peter, and the apoſtles out of priſon, vouchſafe of his goodneſs to keep, feed, and deliver you my good brother Went, with the other our fellow-ſoldiers your priſon-fellows, as may be moſt to his glory, to your conſolation, and the edification of his church.

I cannot but praiſe God moſt earneſtly, when I hear of your conſtancy in the faith, and joy in the croſs of Chriſt, which you now bear and ſuffer together, with many other good members of Chriſt, which is a token that by Chriſt you are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, as St. Paul ſaith. And though the world counteth the yoke and croſs of Chriſt as a moſt pernicious and hurtful thing, yet we which have taſted how friendly the Lord is, cannot but rejoice in this perſecution as touching ourſelves; inaſmuch as the cauſe for which we ſuffer is the Lord's cauſe, and not ours, at whoſe hand, if we endure to the end, we ſhall receive, through his liberal promiſe in Chriſt, not only a great reward in heaven, but alſo the kingdom of heaven itſelf; and alſo in the mean ſeaſon be ſure to be defended and cared for, ſo that we ſhall lack no neceſſary things, neither a hair of our heads ſhall periſh without his knowledge. O what is he that would miſtruſt, or not gladly ſerve ſo loving a Father? O how unhappy are they that forſake him and put their truſt in man but how bleſſed are they that for his love and for his holy word's ſake, in theſe troubleſome days do commit their ſouls and bodies into his hands with well-doing, counting it greater happineſs and riches to ſuffer rebuke with Chriſt and his church, than to enjoy the pleaſures of this life for a little ſhort ſeaſon? This croſs that we now bear hath been common to all the faithful from Abel hitherto, and ſhall be to the end, becauſe the devil having great wrath againſt God and his Chriſt, cannot abide that he ſhould for his manifold mercies be lauded and magnified, and Chriſt to be taken and believed upon for our only ſufficient Redeemer, Saviour, and Advocate: and therefore becauſe we will not deny Chriſt, nor diſſemble with our faith, but openly proteſt and profeſs the ſame before the world, he ſeeketh by all means to ſtir up his wicked members to perſecute and kill the bodies of the true chriſtians; as St. John ſaith, "The devil ſhall caſt ſome of you into priſon." And David ſaith, "I believed, and therefore have I ſpoken, but I was ſore troubled." This notwithſtanding, go forward, dear brethren, as ye have begun, to fight the Lord's battle, conſidering Chriſt the captain of your war, who will both fight for you, give you victory, and alſo highly reward your pains. Conſider to your comfort the notable and chief ſhepherds and ſoldiers of Chriſt, which are gone before us in theſe days, I mean thoſe learned and godly biſhops, doctors and other miniſters of God's word; whoſe faith and examples we that be inferiors ought to follow; as St. Paul ſaith, Remember them that have declared unto you the word of God, the end of whoſe converſation ſee that ye look upon and follow their faith. The grace and bleſſing of God, with the miniſtry of his holy angels be with you for ever, Amen. All my priſon-fellows greet you. From the coal-houſe this 4th of December.

By your poor brother, Thomas Whittle, an unworthy miniſter of Chriſt, now his priſoner for the goſpel-ſake, Amen.

To all the true Profeſſors and Lovers of God's Holy Goſpel within the City of London.

THE ſame faith for which Abraham was counted righteous, and Mary bleſſed, the Lord God increaſe and make ſtable in your hearts, my dear and faithful brethren and ſiſters of London, for ever and ever, Amen.

Dearly beloved, be not troubled in this heat which is now come amongſt you to try you, as tho' ſome ſtrange thing had happened unto you, but rejoice, inaſmuch as ye are partakers of Chriſt's paſſions, that when his glory appeareth, ye may be merry and glad, &c. Out of theſe words of St. Peter I gather moſt eſpecially theſe four notes. Firſt, that perſecution happeneth to Chriſt's church for their trial, that is, for the probation and proof of their faith. Which faith, like as it is known with God in the depth of our hearts, ſo will he have it made manifeſt to the whole world through perſecution, that ſo it may evidently appear that he hath ſuch a church and people upon earth, which ſo truſteth in him and feareth his holy name, that no kind of perſecution, pains, nor death ſhall be able to ſeparate them from the love of him. And thus was Abraham tried, and Job tempted, that their faith, which before lay hid almoſt in their hearts, might be made known to the whole world to be ſo ſtedfaſt and ſtrong, that neither the devil, natural love, nor any other enemy, could be able to bereave them thereof. Whereby alſo God was to be magnified, who hath tried his people by many tribulations, and alſo ſtandeth by them in the midſt of their troubles, to deliver them by life or death as he ſeeth beſt: like as he aſſiſted Lot, and delivered him out of his enemies hands; Joſeph out of the hands of his brethren, and out of priſon; Paul from his enemies in Damaſcus, and the apoſtles out of the ſtocks and priſon.

Theſe with many more he delivered to life; and alſo he delivered Abel, Eleazar, Stephen, and John Baptiſt, with many others by death, and hath alſo by the trial of their faith made them good precedents, and examples to us and all that come after, to ſuffer affliction in the like cauſe: as St. James ſaith, Take, my brethren (ſaith he) the prophets for an enſample of ſuffering adverſity and of long patience, which ſpake unto you in the name of the Lord: behold we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have known what end the Lord made with him, for the Lord is very pitiful and merciful. Alſo the Lord trieth us, to let us ſee our own hearts and thoughts, that no hypocriſy or ambition deceive us, and that the ſtrong in Chriſt may pray that he fall not, but endure to the end; and that thoſe that fall through fearful infirmity, might ſpeedily repent and riſe again with Peter, and alſo that the weak ones might bewail their weakneſs, and cry with David, Pſal. 6. "Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak; O Lord heal me, for all my bones are vexed.

Of this opening of the heart by perſecution ſpake holy Simeon to Mary Chriſt's mother, when he ſaid, The ſword, that is, the croſs of perſecution, ſhall pierce thy ſoul, that the thoughts of many hearts may be opened. For like as a king that ſhould go to battle, is compelled to look in his coffers what treaſures he hath, and alſo what number and puiſſance of men and weapons he hath, ſo that if he himſelf be unready and unarmed to bicker with his enemy, he ceaſeth, and taketh truce for a time: even ſo we by perſecutions have our hearts opened, that we may look therein to ſee what faith in Chriſt we have, and what ſtrength to withſtand the enemies, and to bear the croſs that if we be rich in theſe treaſures, we might rejoice, and valiantly go to battle; or if we want thoſe things, we might with all ſpeed call and cry upon him who giveth all good gifts to thoſe that aſk them. Item, The croſs trieth the good people from the bad, the faithful from the worldlings and hypocrites, and alſo cleanſeth and ſcoureth the faithful hearts from all corruption and filthineſs both of the fleſh and the ſpirit. And even as iron, except it be often ſcoured, will ſoon wax ruſty: ſo except our ſinful hearts and fleſh be often ſcoured with the whetſtone of the croſs, they will ſoon corrupt and overgrow with the ruſt of filthineſs and ſin. And therefore it is meet and good for us (as the wiſe man ſaith, Syrach 2.) that as gold and ſilver is tried in the fire, ſo ſhould the hearts of acceptable men be tried in the furnace of adverſity. Abide the trial (dear friends) that ye may obtain the crown of life. Fight manfully in this the Lord's cauſe, that ye may obtain a glorious victory here, and receive a great reward in heaven hereafter.

As ye are called chriſtians, and would be angry to be called Jews or Turks, ſo declare your chriſtianity by following the ſteps of Chriſt, whoſe name ye bear; ſuffer with him, and for his goſpel's ſake, rather than to deny him, or to defile your faith and conſcience with falſe worſhipping of Romiſh religion.

Take up your croſs (my dear hearts), now when it is offered you, and go up with Chriſt to Jeruſalem amongſt the biſhops, prieſts, and rulers, if God call you thereto, and they will anon ſend you to Calvary: from whence (dying in the cauſe of the goſpel, wherein our good preachers and brethren have given their lives), your ſouls (I warrant you) through Chriſt Jeſus ſhall aſcend to God that gave them, and that body ſhall come after at the laſt day, and ſo ſhall ye dwell with the Lord for ever in unſpeakable joy and bliſs. O bleſſed are they that ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake, as Chriſt's people in this Jewiſh England now doth; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. O my beloved, ſet your minds on this kingdom where Chriſt our head and king is; conſidering that as the brute beaſt looketh downwards with the face towards the earth; ſo man is made contrariwiſe with his face looking upwards towards the heavens, becauſe his converſation ſhould be in heaven and heavenly things, and not upon the earth and earthly things, as St. Paul ſaith, Col. 3. Set your mind on things that are above, where Chriſt is. And again he ſaith, Phil. 3. Our converſation is in heaven, from whence we look for our Saviour, who will change our vile bodies, and make them like to his glorious body. O the glorious eſtate that we be called unto! The Lord preſerve us harmleſs unto his eternal kingdom through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

The ſecond thing that I note in the aforeſaid words of Peter, is, that he calleth perſecution no ſtrange thing. And truth it is: for which of the prophets were not perſecuted, with Chriſt and his apoſtles, and ſome of them in the end cruelly killed for the truth's ſake? Cain killed Abel, Iſaac was perſecuted of Iſhmael, Jacob was hated of Eſau, Joſeph was impriſoned and ſet in the ſtocks, the prophet Iſaiah was cut in two with a ſaw, Jeremiah was ſtoned, Micaiah was buffeted and fed with bread and water, Elias was ſore perſecuted, Eleazar, and the woman with her ſeven ſons were cruelly killed. What Chriſt and the apoſtles ſuffered is well known. So that by many tribulations (as Paul ſaith, Acts 14.) we muſt enter into the kingdom of heaven. All the holy prophets, Chriſt and his apoſtles ſuffered ſuch afflictions, not for evil doing, but for preaching God's word, for rebuking of the world of ſin, and for their faith in Jeſus Chriſt.

This is the ordinance of God (my friends), this is the high way to heaven, by corporal death to eternal life; as Chriſt ſaith, John 5. He that heareth my words, and believeth in him that ſent me, hath eternal life, and ſhall not come into judgment, but is eſcaped from death to life. Let us never fear death which is killed by Chriſt, but believe in him, and live for ever, as St. Paul ſaith, Rom. 8. There is no damnation to them that are in Chriſt Jeſus, which walk not after the fleſh, but after the ſpirit. And again, Paul ſaith, 1 Cor. 15. Death, where is thy ſting? Hell, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, which hath given us the victory through Jeſus Chriſt.

Beſides this, ye have ſeen, and daily do ſee, the blood of your good preachers and brethern, which hath been ſhed in the goſpel's cauſe in this ſinful Sodom, this bloody Jeruſalem, this unhappy city of London. Let not their blood be forgotten, nor the blood of your good biſhop Ridley, who like a ſhepherd, to your comfort and example, hath given his life for his ſheep. Good St. Paul ſaith, Heb. 13. Remember them that have ſpoken to you the word of God, and look upon the end of their converſation, and follow their faith.

The devil ever ſtirreth up falſe teachers, as he hath done now over all England, as Peter, Paul, and Jude propheſied it ſhould be, to poiſon and kill our ſouls with their falſe doctrine. And where he faileth of his purpoſe that way, then moveth he his members to perſecute the ſilly carcaſſes of the ſaints, becauſe they will not deny nor diſſemble their pure faith in our living Chriſt, and confeſs a dead bready Chriſt, and honour the ſame as CHRIST God and man, contrary to God's commandment, Exodus 20.

This is the working of Satan, who knowing his own juſt damnation, would all mankind to be partakers with him of the ſame; ſuch a mortal hatred beareth he againſt God and his people. And therefore when this wicked tempter could not kill Chriſt, with ſubtil temptation to fall down and worſhip him, then he ſtirred up his ſervants the biſhops and phariſees to kill his body, whereby notwithſtanding the devil loſt his title and intereſt which he had to man's ſoul, and man by his precious paſſion and death was ranſomed from the devil, death and hell, to immortality and life everlaſting: and ſo when Satan thought to have won all in killing of Chriſt, he loſt all: and ſo ſhall he do in us if we abide conſtant and ſtrong in the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt unto the end. God grant it for his mercy's ſake in Chriſt. Bleſſed are all they that put their truſt in him, Amen.

Wherefore (my hearty beloved brethren and ſiſters), be of good comfort through Jeſus Chriſt, for he that is in us is ſtronger than he that is in the world. Therefore draw ye near to God, and he will draw near to you. Reſiſt the devil, and he will (as St. James ſaith) flee from you. Beware of the leaven of the phariſees. Touch not pitch leſt you be defiled therewith. Eat no ſwines fleſh, for it is againſt the law; I mean, defile not yourſelves either inwardly or outwardly with this falſe and wicked religion of Antichriſt: for it is nothing elſe but pitch and ſwines fleſh. Beware of the beaſt's mark, leſt ye drink of the cup of God's wrath. If God hath given you knowledge and faith, diſſemble not therewith. Deny not the known verity before men, leſt Chriſt deny you before his Father. Come away from Babylon, as St. John biddeth you, Rev. 18. and touch no unclean thing, but ſeparate yourſelves from the company of the ungodly, as St. Paul commandeth you. Whatſoever you have done amiſs heretofore, now repent ye and amend: for with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption.

The third thing and note which I gather out of the aforeſaid words of Peter, is this, that he ſaith, Rejoice becauſe ye are partakers of Chriſt's paſſion. Our ſufferings (my well beloved) are Chriſt's ſufferings, and that injury that is done to us for his ſake, he reckoneth it to be done to himſelf, as he ſaid to St. Paul, Saul, Saul, why perſecuteſt thou me? Therefore we ought to rejoice in our ſufferings, as St. Paul writeth, which we ſuffer with Chriſt, and one with another, as St. Peter ſaith, and ſo to fulfil that which is behind of the paſſions of Chriſt in our fleſh; which Chriſt hath, by his paſſion, fully redeemed and ſaved us in his own perſon: howbeit, his elect muſt ſuffer with him and for him unto the world's end, that he may be glorified in them, and they thereby corrected and cleanſed from ſin in this world, and be made more meet temples for the Holy Ghoſt, and alſo obtain a great reward in heaven for their ſuffering for righteouſneſs ſake, according to his promiſe. And therefore I ſay (my brethren) rejoice in the Lord always, and again I ſay rejoice. Let us rejoice in the croſs of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, whereby the world is crucified to us, and we to the world.

And why ſhould we ſo greatly rejoice in the croſs of Chriſt, which we do now ſuffer? Becauſe (ſaith St. Peter) when his glory appeareth, we may be merry and glad. And this is the fourth note that I gather out of his words above written. Wherein is ſet out the reward of ſuffering, not to be had in this world; but at his coming to judgment when we ſhall be raiſed again: and then ſhall they that have ſown in tears reap in joy, as Chriſt ſaith, Bleſſed are they that weep here, for they ſhall laugh. Bleſſed are ye when men hate you, and thruſt you out of their company, railing on you, and abhorring your name as an evil thing for the Son of man's ſake: rejoice in that day and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven.

Wherefore (my dearly beloved) through the hope of this heavenly joy and reward, which he that cannot lie hath promiſed (which joy is ſo great that no ear hath heard, no eye hath ſeen, nor the heart can think, where we ſhall dwell for ever in the heavenly city, the celeſtial Jeruſalem, in the preſence of God the Father, and Jeſus Chriſt our Mediator, as Paul ſaith, and in the company of innumerable angels, and with the ſpirits and ſouls of all faithful and juſt men), rejoice and be glad: and ſeeing ye be called to ſo great glory, ſee that you make your election and vocation ſure by good works, and eſpecially by ſuffering adverſity for the goſpel's ſake: for it is given us of God, ſaith St. Paul, not only to believe in Chriſt, but alſo to ſuffer for his ſake. Continue in prayer, and pray for me, that I may end my courſe with joy. Have brotherly love amongſt yourſelves, which is a token that ye be Chriſt's diſciples. Edify and comfort one another in the word of the Lord, and the God of peace and love be with you always, Amen.

For your liberality and kindneſs ſhewed upon the priſoners and afflicted people of God in the time of perſecution, the Lord will reward you when he cometh to reward every man according to their deeds, and will not leave a cup of cold water beſtowed upon his faithful people unrewarded. God make you rich in all grace, that ye always having ſufficient, may be rich unto all manner of good works.

The grace of our Lord Jeſus-Chriſt, the love of God, and the fellowſhip of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you always, Amen.

Your brother now in bonds for the goſpel,
Thomas Whittle.

To my loving and faithful Brother J. Careleſs, Priſoner in the King's-Bench.

THE ſame faith for which Abraham was accounted juſt, and Mary bleſſed, whereby alſo all juſt men live, the Lord God our loving Father increaſe and eſtabliſh in you and me, to the obtaining of eternal life in our alone and ſweet Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

I cannot worthily and ſufficiently praiſe God (my heartily beloved brother), for the conſolation and joy that I have received, by reaſon of your loving letters, repenting me much that I being ſo long ſo near you, did not enterprize to ſtir up familiarity and communication between us by writing, to mutual conſolation in Chriſt. For what is there upon earth wherein to rejoice (where all things are tranſitory and vain, yea, man himſelf reſpecting this life), but (as David ſaith, Pſalm 16.) The ſaints that dwell upon the earth, and ſuch as excel in virtue? But here now I conſider, that if the fellowſhip, love, and joy of faithful men and children of God being as we now be, in double bondage, the body within clay walls, and the ſoul within theſe frail earthly bodies, be ſo great and comfortable; how unſpeakable will theſe joys be, when we ſhall be delivered from all corruption into the glorious liberty of the ſons of God? where we ſhall be preſent together continually in our glorified bodies beholding the face of our Father preſently (whom now we ſee but in the glaſs of faith), with his dear Son Chriſt our Redeemer and brother, and the bleſſed company of angels, and all faithful ſaved ſouls.

Oh the incomparable good things, and heavenly treaſures laid up for us in heaven by Jeſus Chriſt! for the obtaining whereof, we ought to ſet light by all temporal grief and tranſitory afflictions, ſo much the more, in that our good God is faithful, and will not ſuffer us to be tempted above our ſtrength, and that namely in the end of our life, when the tree where it falleth lieth ſtill, as the preacher ſaith, Eccleſ. 11. for elſe before the end he ſuffereth his ſometimes to fall, but not finally to periſh: as Peter ſinketh upon the ſea, but yet was not drowned; and ſinned grievouſly upon the land through infirmity denying his maſter, but yet found mercy: for the righteous falleth oftentimes. And Chriſt's holy apoſtles are taught to ſay, Forgive us our treſpaſſes. Yea, though the righteous fall, ſaith David, he ſhall not be caſt away, for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand. O the bottomleſs mercy of God towards us miſerable ſinners! He vouchſafe to plant in my heart true repentance and faith, to the obtaining of the remiſſion of all my ſins in the mercies of God, and merits of Chriſt his Son, and thereto I pray you ſay, Amen.

O my dearly beloved, it grieveth me to ſee the ſpoil and havock that Saul maketh with the congregation of Chriſt: but what remedy? This is God's will and ordinance, that his people ſhall here both be puniſhed in the fleſh, and tried in their faith: as it is written, "Many are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all;" for by a ſtrait path and narrow door muſt we enter. Whither? Into the joyful kingdom of heaven. Therefore bleſſed are you and others that ſuffer perſecution for Chriſt's ſake, for the profeſſion of the ſame. Pray for me and my fellows, good brother, that we may fight a good fight, that we may keep the faith, and end our courſe with joyful gladneſs, for now the time of our deliverance is at hand. The Lord guide, defend, and keep us and you, and all his people in our journey, that we may ſafely through a ſhort death, paſs to that long laſting life.

Farewel my dear and loving brother and fellow-ſoldier in Chriſt; farewel, I ſay, in him: who receive our ſouls in peace when they ſhall depart from theſe tabernacles, and he grant us a joyful reſurrection, and a merry meeting at the laſt day, and continual dwelling together in his eternal heavenly kingdom, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

Yours with my poor prayer; other pleaſure can I do you none,
Thomas Whittle, Miniſter.

To my dear Brethren Mr. Filles and Cutbert.

MY dear and well beloved brethren in Chriſt, Mr. Filles and Cutbert, I wiſh you all welfare of ſoul and body. Welfare to the ſoul is repentance of ſin, faithful affiance in Chriſt Jeſus, and a godly life. Welfare to the body is the health of the ſame, with all neceſſary things for this life. The ſoul of man is immortal, tal, and therefore ought to be well kept, leſt immortality to joy ſhould turn to immortality of ſorrow. As for the body, be it never ſo well kept and much made of, yet ſhortly by nature will it periſh and decay: But thoſe that are ingrafted and incorporated into Chriſt by true faith, feeling the motion of God's Holy Spirit as a pledge of their election and inheritance, exciting and ſtirring them not only to ſeek heavenly things, but alſo to hate vice, and embrace virtue, will not only do theſe things, but alſo if need require, will gladly take up their croſs and follow their captain, their king and their Saviour Jeſus Chriſt (as his poor afflicted church of England now doth) againſt that falſe and antichriſtian doctrine and religion now uſed, and eſpecially that blaſphemous maſs, wherein Chriſt's ſupper and holy ordinance is altogether perverted and abuſed, contrary to his inſtitution and to Paul's proceedings: ſo that that which they have in their maſs, is neither ſacrament of Chriſt, nor yet ſacrifice for ſin, as the prieſts falſly pretend. It is a ſacrament, that is, as St. Auguſtine ſaith, a viſible ſign of inviſible grace, when it is adminiſtered to the communicants according to Chriſt's example, and as it was of late years in this realm. And as for ſacrifice, there is none to be made now for ſin: "For Chriſt with one ſacrifice hath perfected for ever thoſe that are ſanctified."

Beware of falſe religion, and men's vain traditions, and ſerve God with reverence and godly fear, according to the doctrine of his goſpel, whereto cleave ye that ye may be bleſſed though of wicked men ye are hated and accurſed. Rather drink of the cup of Chriſt with his church, than of the cup of that roſe-coloured whore of Babylon, which is full of abominations. Rather ſtrive ye to go to heaven by the path which is ſtrait to fleſh and blood, with the little flock, than to go in the wide way, following the enticements of the world and the fleſh, which leadeth to damnation.

Like as Chriſt ſuffered in the fleſh, ſaith St. Peter, ſo arm ye yourſelves with the ſame mind: for Chriſt ſuffered for us, leaving us example to follow his footſteps. Bleſſed are they that ſuffer for his ſake, great is their reward in heaven. He that overcometh (ſaith St. John, Rev. 2. 3.) ſhall eat of the tree of life; he ſhall have a crown of life, and not be hurt of the ſecond death: he ſhall be cloathed with white array, and not be put out of the book of life; yea, I will confeſs his name, ſaith Chriſt, before my Father and before his angels, and he ſhall be a pillar in the houſe of God, and ſit with me on my ſeat. And thus I bid you farewel mine own brethren and dear fellows in Chriſt; whoſe grace and peace be always with you, Amen.

This world I do forſake.
To Chriſt I me take,
And for his goſpel's ſake,
Patiently death I take.
My body to the duſt,
Now to return it muſt:
My ſoul I know full well.
With my God it ſhall dwell.

Thomas Whittle.

Another Letter of Mr. Thomas Whittle to a godly Woman.

O My dear and loving ſiſter in Chriſt, be not diſmayed in this ſtorm of perſecution: for Paul calleth the goſpel the word of the croſs, becauſe it is never truly taught, but the croſs and cruel perſecution immediately and neceſſarily doth follow the ſame, and therefore it is a manifeſt token of God's truth, and hath been here and is ſtill abroad, and that is the cauſe of the rage and cruelty of Satan againſt Chriſt and his members, which muſt be corrected for their ſins in this world; their faith muſt be tried, that after trial and patient ſuffering the faithful may receive the crown of glory, Fear not therefore, my well-beloved, but proceed in the knowledge and fear of God, and he will keep you from all evil. Call upon his holy name, and he will ſtrengthen you and aſſiſt you in all your ways; and if it pleaſe him to lay his croſs upon you for his goſpel ſake, refuſe it not, neither ſhake it off by unlawful means, leſt you ſhould (as God forbid) find a more grievous croſs and torment of conſcience, if you ſhould diſſemble and deny the known verity, than is any perſecution or death of body. O how happy are they that ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake? their reward is great in heaven. The momentary afflictions of this life are not worthy of the glory that ſhall be ſhewed upon us. O remember the godly women of the Old Teſtament and New, who lived in God's ſervice and fear, and therefore are now in bliſs and commended for ever: and namely, Judith, Eſther, Abigail, the mother of the ſeven ſons Mary, Elizabeth, Suſanna, Lidia, Phebe, and others. Set their examples before your eyes and fear nothing, for Satan is conquered by our Saviour Chriſt: ſin is put to flight, and the gate of immortality and eternal life is ſet wide open; God grant we may enter therein through the door Jeſus Chriſt, Amen.

Thomas Whittle.

The Hiſtory of Mr. Bartlet Green.

AFTER the martyrdom of Mr. Whittle, next followeth in order to ſpeak of Bartlet Green, who the next day after the aforeſaid Whittle, was likewiſe condemned. Mr. Green was of a good houſe, and had ſuch parents, as both favoured learning, and were alſo willing to bring up this their child in the ſame. Who after ſome entrance in other inferior ſchools, was by them ſent unto the univerſity of Oxford: where through exerciſe and diligent ſtudy he ſo profited, that within ſhort time he attained, as well to the knowledge of ſundry profane ſciences, as alſo now in his laſt years unto the godly underſtanding of divinity. Whereunto through ignorance (in which he was trained up from his youth) he was at the firſt an utter enemy, until ſuch time as God of his mercy had opened his eyes, by his often repairing unto the common lectures of Peter Martyr, reader of the divinity-lecture in the ſame univerſity, ſo that thereby (as by God's inſtrument) he ſaw the true light of Chriſt's goſpel.

Whereof when he had once taſted, it became unto him as the fountain of living water that our Saviour Chriſt ſpake of to the woman of Samaria, ſo as he never thirſted any more, but had a well ſpringing unto everlaſting life. Inſomuch as when he was called by his friends from the univerſity, and was placed in the Temple at London, there to attain to the knowledge of the common laws of the realm, he yet continued ſtill in his former ſtudy and earneſt profeſſion of the goſpel, wherein alſo he greatly profited. Howbeit (ſuch is the frailty of our corrupt nature, without the ſpecial aſſiſtance of God's Holy Spirit) through the continual accompanying, and fellowſhip of ſuch worldly (I will not ſay too much youthful) young gentlemen, as are commonly in that and the like houſes, he became by little and little a compartner of their fond follies and youthful vanities, as well in his apparel as alſo in banquettings, and other ſuperfluous exceſſes: which he afterward (being again called by God's merciful correction, did ſore lament and bewail, as appeareth by his own teſtimony, notified and left in a book belonging to Mr. Bartram Calthrop, one of his friends, written with his own hand a little before his death, in manner as followeth:

"Two things have very much troubled me whilſt I was in the Temple, pride and gluttony; which under the colour of glory and good fellowſhip, drew me almoſt from God. Againſt both there is one remedy, by earneſt prayer, and without ceaſing. And foraſmuch as as vain-glory is ſo ſubtle an adverſary, that almoſt it woundeth deadly, ere ever a man can perceive himſelf to be ſmitten, therefore we ought ſo much the rather by continual prayer, to labour for humbleneſs of mind. Truly gluttony beginneth under a charitable pretence of mutual love and ſociety, and hath in it moſt uncharitableneſs. When we ſeek to refreſh our bodies, that they may be the more apt to ſerve God, and perform our duties towards our neighbours, then ſtealeth it in as a privy thief, and murdereth both body and ſoul, that now it is not apt to pray, or ſerve God, apt to ſtudy, or labour for our neighbour. Let us therefore watch and be ſober: for our adverſary the devil walketh about like a roaring lion, ſeeking whom he may devour. And remember what Solomon ſaith, A patient man is better than a ſtrong warrior, and he that conquereth his own ſtomach is better than he that conquereth towns and cities.

Bartlet Green."

"Agreement of minds joining in unity of faith, and growing up in charity, is true and ſtedfaſt amity. Farewel (my Bartram) and remember me, that ever we may be like together. Farewel. At Newgate, January. 20. 1556.

Set ſober love againſt haſty wrath.

Bartlet Green."

Thus we ſee the fatherly kindneſs of our moſt gracious and merciful God, who never ſuffereth his elect children ſo to fall, that they lie ſtill in ſecurity of ſin, but oftentimes quickeneth them up by ſome ſuch means, as perhaps they think leaſt of, as he did here this his ſtrayed ſheep. And now therefore to return to our hiſtory: For the better maintenance of himſelf in theſe his ſtudies, and other his affairs, he had a large exhibition of his grandfather, Mr. Doctor Bartlet, who during the time of Green's impriſonment made unto him large offers of great livings if he would recant, and (forſaking the truth and the goſpel of Chriſt) come home again to the church and ſynagogue of Rome. But thoſe his perſuaſions (the Lord be therefore praiſed) took ſmall effect in his faithful heart, as the ſequel did declare. He was a man beloved of all men (except the papiſts, who love none that love the truth) and ſo he well deſerved: for he was of a meek, humble diſcreet, and moſt gentle behaviour to all. Injurious he was to none, beneficial to many, eſpecially to thoſe who were of the houſhold of faith, as appeareth, amongſt others, by his friendly dealing with Mr. Chriſtopher Goodman, being at that preſent a poor exile beyond the ſeas. With whom this Bartlet Green (as well for his toward learning, as alſo for his ſober and godly behaviour) had often ſociety in Oxford, in the days of good king Edward: who now, notwithſtanding his friend's miſery and baniſhment, he did not lightly forget; and that turned, as it happened (not without the providence of Almighty God) to the great grief of both; the one of heart, for the loſs of his friend, and the other of body, in ſuffering the cruel and murdering rage of papiſts.

The cauſe hereof was a letter which Green wrote unto the ſaid Goodman, containing as well the report of certain demands or queſtions, which were caſt abroad in London (as appeareth hereafter in a letter of his own penning, which he intended to have ſent to Mr. Philpot, wherein he fully declareth his uſage before the biſhop of London, and others) as alſo an anſwer to a queſtion made by the ſaid Chriſtopher Goodman, in a letter written unto him, in which he required to have the certainty of the report which was ſpread amongſt them on the other ſide of the ſeas, that the queen was dead. Whereunto Mr. Green ſimply anſwered, and as the truth then was, that ſhe was not dead.

Theſe letters, with many others, written to divers of the godly exiles, by their friends here in England, being delivered to a meſſenger to carry over, came by the apprehenſion of the ſaid bearer, unto the hands of the king and queen's council. Who at their convenient leiſure (which in thoſe days by ſome of them was quickly found out for ſuch matters) peruſed the whole number of the ſaid letters, and amongſt them eſpied this letter of Mr. Green's, written to his friend Chriſtopher Goodman; in the contents whereof (amongſt other news and private matters) they found theſe words, The queen is not yet dead. Which words were only written as an anſwer, to certify Mr. Goodman of the truth of his former demand. Howbeit (to ſome of the council) they ſeemed very heinous words, yea treaſon they would have made them, if the law would have ſuffered. Which when they could not do (and being yet very loth to let any ſuch depart freely, whom they ſuſpected to be favourers of the goſpel) they then examined him upon his faith in religion, but upon what points it is not certainly known.

Nevertheleſs (as it ſeemeth) his anſwers were ſuch, as little pleaſed them (eſpecially the anointed ſort) and therefore after they had detained him in priſon, as well in the Tower of London as elſewhere, they ſent him at laſt to Bonner biſhop of London, to be ordered according to his eccleſiaſtical law; as appeareth by their letters ſent to the biſhop, with the ſaid priſoner alſo: wherein it may appear that Sir John Bourne (then ſecretary to the queen) was a chief ſtirrer in ſuch caſes, yea, and an enticer of others of the council; who otherwiſe (if for fear they durſt) would have been content to have let ſuch matters alone. The Lord forgive them their weakneſs, if it be his good pleaſure, and give them true repentance, Amen.

A Letter ſent to Bonner Biſhop of London, by the Queen's Council, dated the 11th Day of November, 1555. but not to be delivered until the 15th Day of the ſame Month.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordſhip, we ſend to the ſame herewith the body of Bartlet Green, who hath of good time remained in the Tower for his obſtinate ſtanding in matters againſt the catholic religion, whom the king and queen's majeſties pleaſures are (becauſe he is of your lordſhip's dioceſe) ye ſhall cauſe to be ordered according to the laws in ſuch caſes provided. And thus we bid your lordſhip heartily farewel. From St. James's the 11th of November, 1555.

Your lordſhip's loving friends.

Wincheſter,	William Haward,
Pembroke,	John Bourne,
Tho. Ely,	Thomas Wharton.

Poſtſcript. I, Sir John Bourne, will wait upon your lordſhip, and ſignify further the king and queen's majeſties pleaſure herein.

That ye may the better underſtand the certainty of the ill uſage he met with in Bonner's cuſtody, I have thought it good to put forth his own letter, containing at large the diſcourſe of the ſame. Which letter he wrote, intending to have ſent it to Mr. Philpot, but, either by Mr. Philpot's death, or (more probably) by the watchfulneſs of his keeper, he was prevented: for it came (by what means I know not) to the biſhop's hands, and being delivered to his regiſter, was found in one of his books of record. The copy whereof here followeth.

A Letter of Bartlet Green, written to John Philpot, containing, beſides other particular Matters betwixt him and Mr. Philpot, a brief rehearſal of his Conferences with Biſhop Bonner and others, at his firſt coming before them.

THAT which was wanting in talk (through my default) at your being here, I have ſupplied by writing in your abſence, now at length getting ſome opportunity and leiſure. The 17th day of November, being brought hither by two of the clock in the afternoon, I was preſented before my lord of London, and other two biſhops, Mr. Deane, Mr. Roper, Mr. Welch, Dr. Harpſfield archdeacon of London, and two or three others, all ſitting at one table. There were alſo preſent Dr. Dale, Mr. George Mordant, Mr. Dee. Then after the biſhop of London had read unto himſelf the letter that came from the council, he ſpake with more words, but (as I remember) to this effect; that the cauſe of their aſſembly was, to hear mine examination, whereunto he had authority by the council, and had provided Mr. Welch, and another, whoſe name I know not (but well I remember, though he obtained it not, yet deſired he, my lord, that I might hear the council's letters) to be there if any matters of the common law ſhould ariſe, to diſcuſs them, he intreated my lord to determine all controverſies of ſcriptures: and as for the civil law, he and Dr. Dale ſhould take on them.

Wherefore he demanded of me the cauſe of mine impriſonment: I ſaid, that the occaſion of my apprehenſion was a letter which I wrote to one Chriſtopher Goodman, wherein (certifying him of ſuch news as happened here) among the reſt, I wrote that there were certain printed papers of queſtions ſcattered abroad. Whereupon, being ſuſpected to be privy to the deviſing or publiſhing of the ſame, I was committed to the Fleet: but after the commiſſioners had received my ſubmiſſion I heard nothing thereof. The ſum whereof was, that as I was ſure there neither could be true witneſſes, nor probable conjecture againſt me in that behalf; ſo refuſed I no puniſhment, if they of their conſciences would judge me privy to the deviſing, printing, or publiſhing of thoſe queſtions. But my lord affirming that there was another cauſe of mine impriſonment, demanded if I had not after, ſince I was committed to the Fleet, ſpoken or written ſomewhat againſt the natural preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar.

Then I deſired his lordſhip to be good unto me, truſting that he would not put me to anſwer to new matters, except I were firſt diſcharged of the old. And when I ſtood long in that, Mr. Welch anſwered, that it was procured that I ſhould ſo do, right well. For albeit I were impriſoned for treaſon, if during the time of my confinement I had maintained hereſy, that were no ſufficient allegation againſt the ordinary; neither whether I were before him acquitted or condemned, ſhould it take away the former fault. Then my lord affirming that I was not brought before him but for hereſy, and the other gentleman ſaying, that doubtleſs I was diſcharged of my former matter; my deſire was, that I might be charged according to the order of the law, to hear my accuſers.

Then Dr. Chedſey was ſent for, who reported, that in the preſence of Mr. Moſley, and the lieutenant of the Tower, I ſpake againſt the real preſence and the ſacrifice of the maſs, and that I affirmed that their church was the church of Antichriſt.

Is not this true, ſaid my lord? I ſaid, Yea. Will you continue therein, ſaid he? Yea, ſaid I. Wilt thou then maintain it by learning, ſaid he? Therein, quoth I, I ſhould ſhew myſelf to have little wit, knowing mine own youth and ignorance, if I would take on me to maintain any controverſy againſt ſo many grave and learned men. But my conſcience was ſatisfied in the truth, which was ſufficient to my ſalvation.

Conſcience, ſaid Mr. Roper; ſo ſhall every Jew and Turk be ſaved.

We had hereafter much talk to no purpoſe, and eſpecially on my part, who felt in myſelf, through cold and open air, much dullneſs of wit and memory. At length I was aſked what conſcience was: And I ſaid, the certifying of the truth.

With that Mr. Welch roſe up, deſiring leave to talk with me alone. So he taking me aſide into another chamber, ſaid that he was ſorry for my trouble, and would gladly ſee me at liberty: he marvelled that I being a young man, would ſtand againſt all the learned men of the realm, yea and contrary to the whole determination of the catholic church from Chriſt's time, in a matter wherein I could have no great learning; I muſt not think mine own wit better than all mens, but ſhould believe them that were learned. I promiſe you (quoth he) I have read all Peter Martyr's book, and Cranmer's, and all the reſt of them, and have conferred them with the contrary, as the biſhop of Wincheſter, &c. and could not perceive but that there was one continual truth, which from the beginning had been maintained; and thoſe that at any time ſevered from this unity, were anſwered and anſwered again. This was the ſum of his tale, which lacked neither wit nor eloquence.

Mr. Green. Then ſpake I: Foraſmuch as it pleaſeth your maſterſhip to uſe me ſo familiarly (for ſo he behaved himſelf towards me, as though I had been his equal), I ſhall open my mind freely unto you, deſiring you to take it in good part. I conſider my youth, lack of wit and learning, which would God it were but a little under the opinion that ſome men have of me. But God is not bound to time, wit or knowledge, but rather chooſeth the weak of the world that they may confound the ſtrong; neither can men appoint bounds to God's mercy: For, I will have compaſſion, ſaith he, on whom I will ſhew mercy. There is no reſpect of perſons with God, whether it be old or young, rich or poor, wiſe or fooliſh, fiſher or baſket-maker. God giveth knowledge of his truth, through his free grace, to whom he liſt, James 1. Neither do I think myſelf only to have the truth, but ſtedfaſtly believe that Chriſt hath his ſpouſe, the catholic and univerſal church, diſperſed in many realms where it pleaſeth him, the Spirit bloweth where it liſteth: no more is he addicted to any one place, than to the perſon and quality of one man. Of this church I nothing doubt myſelf to be a member, truſting to be ſaved by the faith that is taught in the ſame. But how this church is known, is in a manner the end of all controverſy. And the true marks of Chriſt's church is the true preaching of his word, and adminiſtering of his ſacraments. Theſe marks were ſealed by the apoſtles, and confirmed by the ancient fathers, till at length they were, through the wickedneſs of men and the devil, ſore worn, and almoſt utterly taken away. But God be praiſed that he hath renewed the print, that his truth may be known in many places. For myſelf, I call God to witneſs, I have none hope in mine own wit and learning, which is very ſmall: but I am perſuaded thereto by him, as by an inſtrument [he meaneth Peter Martyr] that is excellent in all good learning and living. And God is my record, that chiefly I ſought it of him by continual prayer with tears.

Furthermore, what I have done herein, it is not needful for me to ſpeak: but one thing, I ſay, I wiſh of God with all my heart, that all men which are of contrary judgment, would ſeek the truth in like manner. Now I am brought hither before a great many biſhops and learned men, to be made a fool and a laughing ſtock, but I weigh it not a ruſh; for God knoweth that my whole ſtudy is to pleaſe him. Beſides that, I care not for man's pleaſure or diſpleaſure.

Mr. Welch. No, Mr. Green, ſaid he, think not ſo uncharitably of any man, but judge rather that men labour for for your ſoul's health, as for their own. But, alas, how will you condemn all our fore-fathers? or how can you think yourſelf to be of the catholic church, without any continuance, and contrary to the judgment of all learned men?

Green. Sir, I have no authority to judge any man: nevertheleſs, I doubt not but that I am of the true catholic church, however our learned men here judge of me.

Welch. Why then do you ſuppoſe your own wit and learning better than all theirs? If you do not give credit only to them, other learned men ſhall reſort unto you, that ſhall perſuade you by the ſcriptures and doctors.

Green. Sir, God knoweth that I refuſe not to learn of any child, but I would embrace the truth from the mouth of a natural fool, in any thing wherein I am ignorant, and that in all things, ſaving my faith: but concerning the truth, wherein I am thoroughly perſuaded, I cannot ſubmit myſelf to learn, unleſs it be, as your maſterſhip ſaid, that I peruſed books on both ſides. For ſo might I make myſelf an indifferent judge; otherwiſe I may be ſeduced.

And here we had a long diſcourſe of the church, wherein his learning and wit was much above mine: but in the end I told him I was perſuaded, and that he did but loſe his labour.

Welch. Why, then, what ſhall I report to my lord?

Green. Even as pleaſeth you, or elſe you may ſay that I would be glad to learn, if I had books on both ſides.

So he going in, the biſhops (being riſen and ready to depart) aſked how he liked me? He anſwered, In faith, my lord, he will be glad to learn. Which words when they were taken, leſt they ſhould miſtake his meaning and mine, I ſaid, Yea, my lord, ſo that I may have books on both ſides, as Calvin, and my lord of Canterbury's books, and ſuch others. Well, ſaid my lord, I will ſatisfy thy mind therein alſo; and they were all in great hopes, that ſhortly I ſhould become a good catholic, as they call it.

Then I was brought into my lord's inner chamber (where you were) [Mr. Philpot, to whom he wrote this letter] and there was put in a chamber with Mr. Dee, who treated me very friendly. That night I ſupped at my lord's table, and lay with Mr. Dee in the chamber you did ſee. On the morrow I was ſerved at dinner from my lord's table, and at night did eat in the hall with his gentlemen; where I have been placed ever ſince, and fared wonderful well. Yea, to ſay the truth, I had my liberty within the bounds of his lordſhip's houſe: for my lodging and fare, ſcarce have I been at any time abroad in better caſe ſo long together, and have found ſo much gentleneſs of my lord and his chaplains, and others ſervants, that I ſhould eaſily have forgotton that I was in priſon, were it not that this good chear was often powdered with unſavoury ſauces of examinations, exhortations, poſings and diſputations.

For ſhortly after ſupper, the firſt Monday at night, I was had into my lord's bed-chamber, and there he would know of me how I came firſt into theſe hereſies. I ſaid I was perſuaded thereto by the ſcriptures, and authorities of the doctors, alledged by Peter Martyr in his lectures upon the 11th Chap. of the 1ſt Epiſt. to the Corinthians, while he treated there on the place of the Lord's ſupper for a month together. But then my lord enforced the plainneſs of Chriſt's words, and his almighty power, demanding of me, what reaſon ſhould move me from the literal ſenſe of the words: but I having no luſt to thoſe matters, would have alledged that there were books ſufficient of that matter, as Peter Martyr, Cranmer, and Oecolampadius: nevertheleſs, when this ſhift would not ſerve, but I was conſtrained to ſay ſomewhat, I ſaid I was moved from the literal ſenſe by the manner of ſpeaking, by the circumſtance, and by the conference of other places of the ſcriptures. It is evident that Chriſt took bread, and that he ſhewed them (they ſeeing it) bread, which he affirmed to be his body.

Chriſt affirmed that bread was his body.

But that affirmation taken literally, can by no means be true.

Ergo, the words, if they be taken according to the letter, cannot be true.

For this predication, Panis eſt corpus Chriſti, or, Corpus Chriſti eſt panis, is neither Identica nor Accidentalis, nor Eſſentialis prædicatio. Wherefore of neceſſity I muſt ſay it was ſpoken in the ſame ſenſe, as Chriſt was a door, a vine, and a way. Neither can it ſerve to ſay, that it was not of bread that he affirmed to be his body, and that for two cauſes.

For whatſoever he ſhewed, that was bread, for naught elſe was ſeen.

But that which he ſhewed he affirmed to be his body.

Ergo, he affirmed of bread that it was his body.

The ſecond reaſon is, For that it was not changed before, ſeeing Benedixit, is Gratias egit, or elſe Chriſt affirmed no true propoſition, and you are without authority.

In the end of this letter there were noted theſe ſentences following, collected for confirmation of his former aſſertions, viz.

Eadem locutio poculi, that is, The phraſe is uſed and ſpoken upon the cup.

Dicitur poſtea panis. It is called bread in the ſame place afterwards.

Eadem ratione rejecero corpus, qua tu panem, that is, By the ſame reaſon as it may be denied to be bread, it may be denied to be the body.

Aſcendit in cœlum, that is, His body aſcended into heaven.

Corpore nobis factus eſt ſimilis in omnibus poſt nativitatem. At noſtrum corpus non poteſt eſſe in duobus locis. Ergo, &c. In body he was like to us in all things after his nativity (ſin excepted). Seeing then our body cannot be in two places at once: Ergo, neither his.

Diſcipuli non ſtupebant, &c. His diſciples took it as no miracle nor wonder.

The laſt Examination and Condemnation of Mr. Green.

THUS, as it ſeemeth, for this time they left off. But not long after the biſhop perceiving Green's learning and conſtancy to be ſuch, as neither he, nor any of his doctors and chaplains could by the ſcriptures refel, began then to object and put in practice his chief and ſtrongeſt argument againſt him; which was the rigour of the law, and cruelty of execution: an argument, I aſſure you, which without the ſpecial grace of our God to fleſh is inſupportable. And therefore uſing law as a cloak of his tyranny, the 28th day of November, the ſaid biſhop examined him upon certain points of chriſtian religion. Whereunto when he had anſwered, the biſhop appointed the regiſter (as their moſt common manner is), to draw thereout an order of confeſſion: which being afterwards read to Mr. Green, was alſo ſubſcribed by him, as a confirmation of his former aſſertions: the tenor whereof here enſueth.

The Confeſſion of Bartlet Green.

BArtlet Green, born in the city of London, in the pariſh of Baſſinghall, in the dioceſe of London, and of the age of 25 years, being examined in the biſhop's palace the 27th day of November, Anno 1555, upon certain articles, anſwered as followeth, viz. That neither in the time of king Edward, after the maſs by him was put down, neither in the time of queen Mary, after the mass was restored again, he hath heard any mass at all; but he saith that in the reign of the said queen's majesty, he, the said Bartlet, two times, to wit, at two Easter-tides or days, in the chamber of John Pulline, one of the preachers in king Edward's time, within the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, of the diocese of London, did receive the communion with the said Pulline, and Christopher Goodman, sometimes reader of the divinity lecture, in Oxford, now gone beyond the sea; and the second time with the said Pulline, and with one Rimneger, master of arts, of Magdalen college, in Oxford: and this examinate also saith, that at both the said communions, he and the other before named, did take and receive bread and wine, which bread and wine he called sacramental bread, and sacramental wine, which he saith were used there by them, Pulline only reading the words of the institution, expressed in the book of Communion.

In which receiving and using, this examinate saith, that the others aforenamed did receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that they received material bread and material wine, no substance thereof changed, and so no real presence of the body and blood of Christ there being, but only grace added thereto.

And further, this examinate saith, that he had heretofore, during the reign of the queen's majesty aforesaid, refused, and so now doth refuse to come and hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, as they are now used and administered in the church of England, because he saith that concerning the mass, he cannot be persuaded in his conscience, that the sacrifice pretended to be in the same, is agreeable to God's word, or maintainable by the same: And that without deadly offence he cannot worship the body and blood of Christ that is pretended to be there. And as concerning the sacrament of the altar, this examinate saith, that he heretofore during the said reign, hath refused, and now doth refuse to receive the same, as it is now used in this church of England, because it is not used according to the institution of Christ, but both in a strange tongue, and also not ministered in both kinds; and besides that, contrary to God's word it is there taught, that the thing there administered is to be adored, as the real and true body of Christ.

And furthermore this examinate saith, that during the said reign he hath not been confessed to the priest, nor received absolution at his hands, because he is not bound by God's word to make auricular confession.

Bartlet Green.

Many other conferences and examinations they brought him unto. But in the end (seeing his stedfastness of faith to be such, as against which neither their threatnings, nor yet their flattering promises could prevail), the 19th day of January the bishop caused him, with the rest above named, to be brought into the consistory in St. Paul's; where being set in his judgment-seat, accompanied with Mr. Fecknam, then dean of the same church, and other his chaplains, after he had condemned the other six, he then calling for Bartlet Green, began with these, or the like words:

Honourable audience, I think it best to open unto you the conversation of this man, called Bartlet Green. And because you shall not charge me, that I go about to seek any man's blood, here you shall hear the council's letters, which they sent with him unto me. The effect whereof is; that whereas he had been of long time in the Tower of London for heresy, they have now sent him unto me to be ordered, according to the laws therefore provided. And now to thee, Bartlet Green, I propose these nine articles. Then he read the articles above-mentioned, which were generally objected to all these seven prisoners, to wit, Thomas Whittle, John Tudson, John Went, Thomas Brown, Isabel Foster, Joan Lashford, Bartlet Green.

But when Mr. Green would have answered them particularly, he was put to silence, with promise that he should have time to answer sufficiently, and therefore the bishop proceeding, said, that when Green came first to his house, he desired to have the books of the ancient doctors of the church to read, which he said he granted him.

Whereunto Green answered and said, That if the doctors were with indifferent judgment weighed, they made more a great deal with him, than they did with them.

Upon which words, Dr. Fecknam, dean of Paul's, stood up, and marvelling why he said so, asked him if he would be content to stand to the judgment of the doctors.

Green then said, that he was content to stand to the doctors judgment.

I will then propound unto you (said Fecknam), the doctors, and interpret them yourself. So he alledged a place of Chrysostom, Ad popul. Antioch. which was this: Elias ascendens melotem suum post se reliquit; Christus vero ascendens carnem suam assumpsit, & eandem post se reliquit. "Elias going up, left his cloak behind him: but Christ ascending up took his flesh, and also left it behind him." And he demanded Green, how he understood the place.

Then Green desired him that he would confer the doctors sayings together, and therefore alledged the same doctor again, writing upon 1 Cor. 10. "Is not the bread which we bless the communication of the Lord's body?" Whereby he proved that this doctor called this sacrament but a sign of the Lord's body. Many other words of probation and trial were betwixt them.

At last Fecknam demanded of him, how long he had been of this opinion. For Mr. Green, said he, you confessed once to me, that when you were at Oxford at school, you were called the rankest papist in that house, and being compelled to go to the lecture of Peter Martyr, you were converted from your old doctrine.

And Green confessed the same.

Then Fecknam said, that Green told him the said Peter Martyr was a papist at his first coming to Oxford. Whereupon he made an exclamation, and prayed the people to consider how vain his doctrine was that he professed, which was grounded upon one man, and that upon so inconstant a man as Peter Martyr, who perceiving the wicked intent of the council, was content to please them, and forsake the true and catholic faith.

Green said, that he grounded not his faith upon Peter Martyr nor any other, nor did believe so because Peter Martyr believed the same; but because that he had heard the scriptures, and the doctors of the church truly and wholesomely expounded by him; neither had he any regard of the man, but of the word which he spake. And further he said, that he heard the said Peter Martyr say often, that he had not as yet while he was a papist, read Chrysostom upon the tenth to the Corinthians, nor any other places of the doctors: but when he had read them, and well considered them, he was content to yield to the doctors, having first humbled himself in prayer, desiring God to illuminate him, and bring him to the true understanding of the scripture. Which thing (said Green), if you my lord would do, I do not doubt but God would open your eyes, and shew you his truth, no more than I do doubt his words to be true that saith; "Ask and it shall be given to you; knock and it shall be opened unto you, &c."

Then Fecknam asked him what he thought of this article, The holy catholic church.

And Green answered, that he did believe one holy and universal church throughout all the world.

Then Fecknam said, that he would fain have a sure mark and token, whereby he might know this church: and therefore he prayed Green to define unto him this church.

Green

Green anſwered, that this church did agree in verity of the true doctrine of Chriſt, and was known by the true adminiſtration of his ſacraments.

Whereupon Fecknam ſaid, that he would prove the church whereof he was to be never agreeing in doctrine, but always to have been in controverſy in their religion. For, ſaid he, Luther and Zuinglius could never agree in their writings, or ſayings, Oecolampadius with Caroloſtadius, nor Caroloſtadius with either Zuinglius or Luther, &c. for Luther, writing upon the ſacrament of the altar, ſaid, that in this bread, or under this bread we receive the body of the Lord. Zuinglius controlling him, ſaid, Under the ſign of the bread we receive the body of the Lord. And the other controlled him in like caſe.

Then Mr. Green proved their opinions of the ſacrament to be one in effect, being rightly weighed: and though their words did not ſound all one, yet they meant one thing: and their opinions were all one, as he proved by divers other examples.

Then Fecknam deſired him that he would not ſo wilfully caſt himſelf away, but to be rather conformable to reaſon, and that my lord biſhop there preſent would be good unto him, and would grant him reſpite (if he would demand it) for a fortnight or three weeks, and that he ſhould chooſe any learned man whom he would, and ſhould go with him home to his houſe; and that he whom he would chooſe would willingly take the pains to read and confer the doctors with him, and open the doctors' minds and meanings unto him.

Then biſhop Bonner ſaid, that he was proud, and an obſtinate boy; and therefore he bade Fecknam to hold his peace, and to call him no more Mr. Green; for, ſaid he, you ought not to call an heretic, maſter.

After this, Dr. Pendleton alledged to him this text out of the 22d of Luke, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." Here, ſaid he, you muſt confeſs your own opinion to be falſe, elſe you muſt ſay that Chriſt was a lyar: for Chriſt ſaid, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." If Chriſt did eat no more of the bread when he ſpake theſe words, then muſt you ſay that he was a lyar: for he did eat bread after with his diſciples, before he aſcended. But if you ſay he did eat his body then, and after but bread, it will not agree with the ſcriptures, nor with good reaſon.

Then Green anſwered and ſaid, that this was ſpoken by an anticipation, as one of their own biſhops (who is now dead) did ſay. [Suppoſed to be the biſhop of Wincheſter].

Then Dr. Pendleton ſaid, that that was no ſufficient diſcharge, nor a ſufficient anſwer for him in this caſe; for, ſaid he, it is well known that the biſhop was of a contrary opinion to you, and that he died a good chriſtian man.

To which words Green ſaid, I do not call him to witneſs in this caſe, as though he were a ſufficient man to prove my ſaying to be true in this matter: but I do alledge him againſt you, as Paul did the ſcripture, which he found graven in the altar of the Athenians, againſt themſelves, To the unknown God.

Theſe with many other words were between them, which I do overpaſs, becauſe it were too long to ſtand upon recital of every thing. Laſt of all the biſhop aſked him if he would recant, He ſaid, nay, he would not. But, my lord, ſaid he, in old time there were no men put to death for their conſcience, until ſuch times as biſhops found the means to make it death to believe contrary to them; but excommunication, my lord, was the greateſt penalty which men had for their conſcience: yea, inſomuch that St. Auguſtine wrote, and commanded that no man ſhould be put to death for his opinion.

Then Bonner ſaid, that when St. Auguſtine ſaw what inconveniences followed of that commandment, he wrote again to the temporal rulers, commanding them to puniſh their bodies alſo.

But, ſaid Green, he bade not to put them to death.

He bade puniſh them, quoth Bonner.

Yea, ſaid Green, but not put them to death.

That they ſhould be puniſhed, quoth Bonner again.

This talk ended, he aſked Green if he would recant, and return to their Romiſh mother. Which when he denied, the biſhop pronounced the ſentence difinitive againſt him, and ſo commanded him to the ſheriffs of London, who cauſed him to be carried to Newgate.

And as he was going thither, there met with him two gentlemen, being both his ſpecial friends, minding belike to comfort this their perſecuted brother: but at their meeting their loving and friendly hearts (not able any longer to hide themſelves) were manifeſted by the abundance of their pitiful tears. To whom when Green ſaw them, he ſaid in theſe or like words, Ah, my dear friends, is this your comfort you are come to give me, in this my occaſion of heavineſs? muſt I, who needed to have comfort miniſtered to me, become now a comforter of you? And thus declaring his moſt quiet and peaceable mind and conſcience, he chearfully ſpake to them and others, until he came unto the priſon door, into which he joyfully entered, and there remained always either in prayer (whereunto he much gave himſelf) or elſe in ſome other godly meditations and exerciſes, until the 27th day of January, when he with his other above-mentioned brethren, went moſt chearfully to the place of their torments, often repeating, both by the way, and at the ſtake, theſe Latin verſes.

Chriſte Deus, ſine te ſpes eſt mihi nulla ſalutis:
Te duce vera ſequor, te duce falſa nego.

In Engliſh thus,

O Chriſt, my God, ſure hope of health,
Beſides thee have I none:
The truth I love and falſhood hate,
By thee my guide alone.

During the time of his impriſonment in Newgate, divers of his friends had acceſs unto him, to whom he gave ſundry godly exhortations, wherewith they were not only well contented, but for better remembrance of his inſtructions, as well as of his good and pious perſon, they deſired him to write ſomewhat in their books, which he readily did.

Theſe verſes he wrote in a book of Mr. Huſſey of the Temple.

Behold thyſelf by me,
Such one was I, as thou:
And thou in time ſhalt be Even duſt as I am now.

Bartlet Green.

The following verſes were wrote in a book of Mr. William Fleetwood, of the ſame houſe.

My reſting-road is found,
Vain hope and hap adieu;
Love whom you liſt with change,
Death ſhall rid me from you.

Bartlet Green.

Amongſt other divers and ſingular good virtues of this good man, eſpecially in him was to be noted ſuch a modeſt nature, ſo humbly thinking of himſelf, as in few men is to be found, ever dejecting himſelf under that was in him, and ever ſeeming to be leſs than he was, ſo that nothing leſs could he abide, than to hear of his praiſe or commendation, as well declareth not only his letter written to Mr. Philpot, wherein he doth earneſtly expoſtulate with him, for ſlandering him with praiſe of his wit and learning, and other manifold virtues of great excellency; but alſo by his own ſpeech and anſwers in his examination, wherein he caſteth from him all knowledge of learning and cunning, when notwithſtanding he had more in him, than to any man's eyes did appear.

So great and admirable was this gift of modeſty grafted in the nature of him, ſo far abhorring all pride and arrogancy, that as he could not abide any thing that was ſpoken to his advancement or praiſe; ſo neither did there appear in him any ſhew or brag in thoſe things wherein he might juſtly glory, which were his puniſhments and ſufferings for the cauſe and quarrel of Chriſt. For when he was beaten and ſcourged with rods by biſhop Bonner (which ſcarce any man would believe, nor I neither, but that I heard it of him, who heard it out of his own mouth) and he greatly rejoiced in the ſame, yet his modeſty was ſuch, that he would never mention it, leſt he ſhould ſeem to glory too much in himſelf, except only to one Mr. Cotton, an intimate friend, a little before his death.

To his admirable modeſty may be added his excellent and univerſal compaſſion to mankind; which, however ſlighted by ſome, yet there is nothing in nature that doth more truly reſemble the image of the high Majeſty of Almighty God. As, in reſpect of humanity, man only excelleth a beaſt, ſo this man by his merciful tenderneſs did not only ſeem to be, but really was ſuperior to moſt of his own ſpecies. It was his cuſtom to viſit the poor priſoners (thoſe that were with him in priſon) both with bodily relief and ſpiritual comfort: and finding many of them (I mean ſuch as were there for theft and other naughty facts) very penitent and ſorry for their wicked lives, in hope of their amendment, did not only by word of mouth, but alſo by his letters require, yea, as it were of duty in love, charged his friends to do their utmoſt endeavour to obtain their liberty: ſuch was the pious and charitable diſpoſition of this true member of Chriſt's church, whoſe imitation of divine benignity appeareth in the following letter:

Another Letter of Mr. Green in behalf of poor Priſoners.

To my very loving Friends and Maſters, Mr. Goring, Mr. Fernham, Mr. Fleetwood, Mr. Ruſſwel, Mr. Huſſey, Mr. Calthorp. Mr. Bowyer, and other my Maſters of the Temple, Bartlet Green wiſheth health of body and ſoul.

VERY friends are they who are knit together with the knot of charity; charity doth not decay, but increaſe in them that die faithfully: whereof it followeth, that though we be abſent in body, yet are we preſent in the ſpirit, coupled together with the unity of faith in the bond of peace, which is love. How is he worthy the name of a friend, that meaſureth his friendſhip with the diſtance of a place, or parting of perſons? If thy friend be out of ſight, is thy friendſhip ended? if he be gone into the country, wilt thou ceaſe to love him? if he be paſſed the ſeas, will you forſake him? if he be carried into heaven, is charity hindered thereby?

On the one ſide we have the uſe of the fathers of the primitive church, who gave thanks for their friends that died in the faith, to prove that charity died not with death. On the other ſide, ſaith Horace, They change their country, not their minds, who ſail beyond ſea.

What ſpeak I of Horace; Saith not St. Paul the ſame thing? For we are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his blood, yea, we are members one of another. Is the hand or arm, foot or leg a member, when it is diſſevered from the body? How can we be members, except we be joined together? What is the line that coupleth us, but love? When all things ſhall fail, love never faileth. Hope hath its end, when we have got that which we hoped for. Faith is finiſhed in heaven; love endureth for ever: Love, I ſay, that proceedeth of charity; for carnal love, when that which he loveth is loſt, doth periſh with the fleſh. Neither was that ever but fleſhly love, which by diſtance of place, or ſevering of bodies is parted aſunder. If love be the end or ſum of the law; if heaven and earth ſhall periſh, yet one jot of God's word ſhall not decay, why ſhould we think that love laſteth not for ever?

I need not write much to you, my friends, neither have I leiſure now the keepers are riſen: but this I ſay, if we keep Chriſt's commandment in loving each other, as he loved us, then ſhould our love be everlaſting. This friendſhip St. Paul felt when it moved him to ſay, That neither length nor breadth (meaning no diſtance of place) neither height nor depth ſhould ſever him from the love of Chriſt. Weigh this place well, and mete it with St. Paul's meaſures; ſo ſhall we find that if our love be untainted, it can never be ended. Now may you ſay, Why writeſt thou this? certainly to the end that if our friendſhip be ſtable, you may accompliſh this the laſt requeſt of your friend, and perform after my death the friendſhip we began in our life, that amity may increaſe until God make it perfect at our next meeting together.

Mr. Fleetwood, I beſeech you remember Wittrance and Cook, two ſingular men amongſt common priſoners. Mr. Fernham and Mr. Bell, with Mr. Huſſey, as I hope, will diſpatch Palmer and Richardſon with his companions. I pray you, Mr. Palmer, think on John Grove, an honeſt poor man, Traiford and Rice Apprice his accomplices; my couſin Thomas Witten (a ſcrivener in Lombard-ſtreet) hath promiſed to further their delivery; at leaſt, he can inſtruct you which way to work, I doubt not but Mr. Bowyer will labour for the good wife Cooper (for ſhe is worthy to be holpen) and Berard the Frenchman. There be alſo other well-diſpoſed men, whoſe deliverance if ye will not labour for, yet I humbly beſeech you to ſeek their relief, as you ſhall ſee cauſe: namely of Henry Apprice, Lancelot, Hobbes, Lother, Homes, Carre, and Bockingham, a young man of goodly gifts in wit and learning, and (ſaving that he is ſomewhat wild) likely to do well hereafter. There be alſo two women, Coningham and Alice Alexander that may prove honeſt. For theſe and all other poor priſoners here I make my humble ſute and prayer to you all my maſters, and eſpecially good friends, beſeeching you of all bonds of amity, for the precious blood of Jeſus Chriſt, in the bowels of mercy, to tender the cauſes of miſerable captives; help to cloath Chriſt, viſit the afflicted, comfort the ſorrowful, and relieve the needy. The very God of peace guide your hearts to have mercy on the poor, and love faithfully together, Amen. This preſent Monday, when I look to die, and live for ever.

Yours as ever.

Bartlet Green.

Another Letter of Mr. Green to Mrs. Elizabeth Clark.

WOULD God, if it were his pleaſure, that with this letter I might ſend you my heart and mind, and whatſoever there is in me elſe, that pertaineth to God. So ſhould I think it the beſt meſſage, and happieſt letter that ever I could write. But though I obtain not my deſire, yet ſhall I not ceaſe with continual prayer to labour for you, deſiring Almighty God to increaſe that which he hath long ſince begun in you, of ſober life, and earneſt zeal towards religion. In faith (as ſaith St. Paul) ſhe that is a true widow and friendleſs putteth her truſt in God, continuing day and night in ſupplication and prayer; but ſhe that liveth in pleaſure is dead while ſhe liveth. And verily a true widow is ſhe that hath married Chriſt, forſaking the vanities of the world, and luſt of the fleſh. For as the married woman careth how to love, pleaſe, and ſerve her huſband; ſo ought the widow to give give all her heart and ſoul, thoughts and words, ſtudies and labours, faithfully to love God, virtuouſly to bring up her children and houſhold, and diligently to provide for the poor and oppreſſed.

Therefore St. Paul firſt inſtructeth a widow how to behave to herſelf, that is, Not to live in pleaſure; then to watch unto prayer, is the only means to obtain all our deſires, ſtedfaſtly laying up all our truſt in God, as David right well ſaith, Firſt eſchew evil, then do good. Of Anna, the praiſe was written, that ſhe never went out of the temple, but ſerved God with faſting and prayer night and day; ſo well had ſhe eſpouſed Chriſt. Judith wore a ſmock of hair, continuing in faſting, and had good report of all men.

The next care that belongeth to a widow, is, that ſhe bring up her children and houſhold godly, in the nurture and information of the Lord. Whereof St. Paul ſaith, If any have children or nephews, let them learn firſt to rule their own houſe godly, and to recompence their elders. The incontinency and covetouſneſs of Phineas and Hophni, corrected by Eli their father, provoked God's vengeance upon him and all his kindred. The over tender love of Abſalom expelled David from his kingdom. The unrebuked ſins of Amnon encouraged Abſalom to ſlay his brother; moſt manifeſt examples againſt the parents, for the offences of their children.

Contrariwiſe, how greatly might Hannah rejoice over Samuel her ſon, whom ſhe had brought up in the houſe of the Lord? What thanks might Tobias's wife give for her ſon Toby? How happy was Solomon to be taught by the prophet Nathan? But above all widows, thrice bleſſed was the happy mother of the ſeven ſons, that ſo had inſtructed them by the fear of God, that by no torments they would ſhrink from the love of his truth?

Of the laſt part St. Paul ſheweth that a widow ſhould be choſen, if ſhe have nouriſhed her children, if ſhe have been liberal to ſtrangers, if ſhe have waſhed the ſaints' feet, and if ſhe have miniſtered to them in adverſity. Herein it is evident how earneſtly St. Paul would have widows bent towards the poor; for that (as though they only had been therefore meet) he appointed only widows to miniſter to the ſaints, and to gather for the poor. Which uſe alſo continued almoſt throughout the primitive church, that widows had the charge and gathering for the poor men and ſtrangers.

Of your neighbours I need not put you in remembrance, ſeeing you daily feed them with good hoſpitality, by which means alſo many foreigners are by you relieved: but of the poor alms-houſes, and miſerable priſoners here in London, many lacking their liberty without cauſe, ſome under colour of religion, ſome only kept for fees, and ſome on private men's diſpleaſure. Alas! that Chriſt ſo hungereth, and no man feed him; is ſore oppreſſed with thirſt, and no man will give him drink; deſtitute of all lodging, and not relieved; naked, and not cloathed; ſick, and not viſited; impriſoned, and not ſeen.

In times paſt men could beſtow large ſums of money on copes, veſtments, and ornaments of the church. Why rather follow we not the example of St. Ambroſe, who ſold the ſame for the relief of the poor; or the commandment of Chryſoſtom, who willed firſt to deck and garniſh the living temple of God? But, alas, ſuch is the wickedneſs of theſe our laſt days, that nothing moveth us; neither the pure doctrine, the godlineſs of life, nor good examples of ancient fathers. If in any thing they have erred, if they have written any thing that ſerveth for ſects and diſſention, that will their charitable children embrace, publiſh, and maintain with ſword, faggot and fire: But all in vain; they ſtrive againſt the ſtream. For though in deſpite of the truth, by force of the cares of crafty perſuaſion, they may bring themſelves into the haven of hell: yet they cannot make all men believe that the banks move whilſt the ſhip faileth, nor ever ſhall be able to turn the direct courſe of the ſtream of God's truth. Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt ſtrengthen you in all pure doctrine and upright living, and give you grace virtuouſly to bring up your children and family, and carefully to provide for the poor and oppreſſed, Amen. At Newgate the 20th of January, 1556.

Your aſſured,
Bartlet Green.

Another certain Writing of Mr. Bartlet Green.

BETTER is the day of death, ſaith Solomon, than the day of birth. Man that is born of a woman liveth but a ſhort time, and is repleniſhed with many miſeries; but happy are the dead that die in the Lord. Man of woman is born in travel, to live in miſery; man, through Chriſt, doth die in joy, and live in felicity. He is born to die, and dieth to live. Straight as he cometh into the world, with cries he uttereth his miſerable eſtate; ſtraight as he departeth, with ſongs he praiſeth God for ever. Scarce yet in his cradle, three deadly enemies aſſault him; after death no adverſary can annoy him. Whilſt he is here, he diſpleaſeth God; when he is dead, he fulfilleth his will. In this life here he dieth through ſin; in the life to come he liveth in righteouſneſs. Through many tribulations on earth he is purged; with joy unſpeakable in heaven he is made pure for ever. Here he dieth every hour; there he liveth continually. Here is ſin; there is righteouſneſs. Here is time; there is eternity. Here is hatred; there is love. Here is pain; there is pleaſure. Here is miſery; there is felicity. Here is corruption; there is immortality. Here we ſee vanity; there we ſhall behold the majeſty of God with triumphant and unſpeakable joy in glory everlaſting. Seek therefore the things that are above, where Chriſt ſitteth at the right hand of God the Father; unto whom, with the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour and glory, world without end, Amen.

Yours in Chriſt,
Bartlet Green.

There were divers other letters and matters wrote by this ſervant of God, as namely certain notes and extracts in Latin, out of the doctors and others, for his memory, whereby is declared how ſtudious he was in the ſearching and knowledge of the law of God, although his profeſſion was the temporal law. Where I would to God he were not among the lawyers ſuch a phœnix, that he had very few or no fellows to fly with him, or to follow his ſteps. But God is to be praiſed, that although we read of few or none among that ſort that died as he did, yet good witneſſes do daily ſpring up of the ſame profeſſion, to ſuch towardneſs and godly zeal, that ſome hope already appeareth ſhortly to come to paſs, that this godly phœnix ſhall not fly alone. Theſe aforeſaid notes and gatherings of his out of the doctors, were taken from him by biſhop Bonner, being found about him, which was to him no little grief. He among the reſt was firſt apprehended, but laſt of them condemned, which was the fifteenth day of January, and afterward burned with the other martyrs the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month.

3. Thomas Brown, Martyr.

THomas Brown, born in the pariſh of Hiſton, within the dioceſe of Ely, came afterwards to London, where he dwelt in the pariſh of St. Bride's in Fleet-ſtreet, a married man, of the age of thirty-ſeven years, who becauſe he came not to his pariſh-church, was preſented by the conſtable of the pariſh to biſhop Bonner. The articles on which he was examined, with his anſwers alſo annexed to the ſame, hath been already mentioned in the general proceſs againſt him and his fellow-ſufferers. This Thomas Brown, being had to Fulham with others there to be examined, was required to come into the chapel to hear maſs, maſs, which refuſing to do, went into the warren, and there kneeled among the trees. For this he was greatly charged by the biſhop as for an heinous matter, becauſe he ſaid it was done in deſpite and contempt of their maſs; which ſeemed to the biſhop and his chaplains no ſmall offence. At length being produced to his laſt examination before the ſaid biſhop, the fifteenth day of January, there to hear the definitive ſentence againſt him; firſt he was required, with many fair words and gloſſing promiſes to revoke his doctrine, to whom the aforeſaid biſhop ſpeaking theſe words, ſaid, Brown, ye have been before me many times and oft, and I have endeavoured to win thee from thine errors; yet thou, and ſuch like, haſt and do report that I go about to ſeek thy blood, &c.

To whom the ſaid Thomas Brown anſwered again, Yea, my lord (ſaid he) indeed ye be a bloodſucker, and I wiſh I had as much blood as is water in the ſea, for you to ſuck.

Bonner then proceeding to the articles, when he had read them unto him again, as he had done divers times before, aſked him whether he was content and willing to relinquiſh thoſe hereſies and erroneous opinions (as he called them) and return again unto the unity of the catholic faith. Whereunto he made anſwer again, ſaying, If they were hereſies, he would forſake them. They be hereſies, ſaid the biſhop. How will you prove it, ſaid Brown? for I will not go from mine anſwer, except you can prove them to be hereſies, which ye ſhall never do. For that which you call hereſy is no hereſy. With that biſhop Bonner, not able, or elſe not diſpoſed to ſupply the part of a ſufficient teacher, in proving that which the other had denied by good authority and doctrine of the ſcripture, went about with words and promiſe of pardon to allure him to renounce thoſe his hereſies, as he called them, and to return unto the unity of his mother the catholic church, &c.

To whom the ſaid Brown inferred again as followeth; Prove it (ſaid he) to be hereſy, that I do hold and maintain, and I will turn to you. But you condemn me, becauſe I will not confeſs and believe the bread in the ſacrament of the altar (as you call it) to be the body of Chriſt, and therefore ye ſpill mine and ſuch like innocents blood, being the queen's true ſubjects, for which you ſhall anſwer, and that ſhortly.

After this being ſpoken, Bonner (as he had done to the others before) read in writing the ſentence definitive againſt him. The copy and form of which ſentence wherewith the papiſts were wont to condemn theſe innocents, is before expreſſed. And this being done, he was committed to the ſheriffs to be had away, and burned the twenty-ſeventh day of the ſaid month of January, conſtantly abiding with the others the cruel torments for the true confeſſion of his chriſtian faith.

4. John Tudſon, Martyr.

ON the ſame day that the aforeſaid Thomas Brown with his fellows were condemned (as is above related) being the fifteenth day of January, John Tudſon was alſo brought forth, with the reſt of the ſaid company, unto the like condemnation. This John Tudſon was born in Ipſwich in the county of Suffolk, after that apprentice in London, dwelling with one George Goodyear of the pariſh of St. Mary Botolph, within the dioceſe of London, who being complained of to Sir Richard Cholmley and Dr. Story, was by them ſent unto Bonner biſhop of London, and was divers times before him in examination.

The articles and interrogatories miniſtered unto him as unto the reſt, are before ſpecified, with his anſwers alſo to the ſame annexed, &c. After this he was brought into the open conſiſtory, where the ſaid John Tudſon appearing before the ſaid biſhop and his accomplices, was moved with ſundry perſuaſions (as their manner is) to go from his opinion (which they named hereſy) and to perſiſt in the unity of the church which they were of; but he, conſtantly perſiſting in that which he received by the preachers in king Edward's time, refuſed ſo to do, ſaying, there was no hereſy in his anſwers. For I, ſaid he, defy all hereſy. The biſhop yet ſtill uſed his old accuſtomed perſuaſions to remove him, promiſing moreover all his offences and errors (as he called them) to be forgiven him, if he would return, &c. Then ſaid Tudſon, Tell me wherein I have offended, and I will return. Then ſaid the biſhop, In your anſwers. No, ſaid Tudſon again, I have not therein offended; and ye, my lord, pretend charity, but nothing thereof appeareth in your works. Thus after a few words, the biſhop did likewiſe pronounce againſt him ſentence of condemnation; which being read, the godly martyr was committed to the ſecular power, and ſo with much patience finiſhed this life with the others before named, the twenty-ſeventh day of January.

5. John Went, Martyr.

JOhn Went, born in Langham in Eſſex, within the dioceſe of London, of the age of twenty-ſeven, and a ſheerman by occupation, was firſt examined (as is partly mentioned before) by Dr. Story upon the ſacrament of the altar; and becauſe the poor man did not accord with him thoroughly in the real preſence of the body and blood of Chriſt, the ſaid Dr. Story ſent him up to Bonner biſhop of London. Who likewiſe, after divers examinations upon the articles aforeſaid in the conſiſtory, attempted the like manner of perſuaſions with him as he did to the others, to recant and return. To whom in few words, the ſaid Went anſwered again, He would not; but that by the leave of God, he would ſtand firm and conſtant in that he had ſaid. And when the biſhop yet notwithſtanding did ſtill urge and call upon him with words and fair gloſſes, to give over himſelf to their opinion, he could have no other anſwer of him but this, No, I ſay as I have ſaid, &c. Wherupon, being condemned by the biſhop's ſentence, he was committed unto the ſheriffs (whom that ſhameleſs ſhaveling at that time abuſed for his ſervile butchers) and ſo brought to his martyrdom, which he with no leſs conſtancy ſuffered to the end, with the reſt of that bleſſed ſociety of martyrs above named.

6. Iſabel Foſter, Martyr.

WITH theſe five perſons above recited and condemned, were alſo two women in the ſaid company condemned the ſame time, and likewiſe burned for the ſame cauſe; the one a wife, called Iſabel Foſter, the other a maid, named Joan Warne, or otherwiſe, Laſhford.

This aforeſaid Iſabel was born in Grafeſtock in the dioceſe of Carliſle, and was afterwards married to one John Foſter, cutler, of the pariſh of St. Bride's in Fleet-ſtreet, being of the age of fifty-five years. She likewiſe, for not coming to their church, was ſent to biſhop Bonner, who put her in priſon, and examined her ſundry times, but ſhe would never be overcome nor removed from the conſtant confeſſion of Chriſt's goſpel.

At length, coming unto her final examination before the biſhop in the conſiſtory the fifteenth day of the ſaid month of January, ſhe was moved again, whether ſhe would yet go from her former anſwers? Whereunto ſhe gave a reſolute anſwer in a few words; I will not, ſaith ſhe, go from them, by God's grace; and therunto did adhere, neither being caſt down by the menacing threats of the biſhop, nor yet yielding through his alluring enticements, promiſing both life and liberty, if ſhe would aſſociate herſelf in the unity of the catholic church. Whereunto ſhe ſaid again in this wiſe, That ſhe truſted ſhe was never never out of the catholic church, &c. and ſo perſiſting in the ſame, continued conſtant till the ſentence definitive was pronounced, and then ſhe was committed by the commandment of the biſhop to the ſecular power, and ſo brought a few days after to the ſtake, the 27th day of the aforeſaid month; where ſhe like a faithful witneſs of the Lord's truth (with the other five aforeſaid), ended her troubles here, to find a better reſt in the kingdom of Chriſt our Saviour.

7. Joan Laſhford, alias Joan Warne, Martyr.

IN this volume mention hath been made of one Elizabeth Warne, who with her huſband John Warne (as is aforeſaid) in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, was apprehended in Bow-church-yard for being there at a communion; and both ſuffered for the ſame, firſt the man in the month of May, then the wife in July after; and now the daughter, in the month of January, followed her parents in the ſame martyrdom. Furthermore, in the ſame place following mention was made alſo of Dr. Story, who there (we ſaid) was ſomewhat near unto the ſaid parties, either in kindred or alliance; however, as I have heard ſince, there was no kindred between them, but only that ſhe was his ſervant. Yet notwithſtanding, the ſaid Dr. Story (as it is above ſpecified), before he was commiſſioner, made interceſſion for the parties to Dr. Martin, then commiſſioner: but afterwards being placed in commiſſion himſelf, he ſo far forgot himſelf, and his old ſervant, that he became no ſmall procurer of their deaths. I will not here expoſtulate with the hard heart of that man, nor with his inconſtancy: who yet notwithſtanding, after he had brought them to death, was arreſted himſelf for threeſcore pounds, charged with debt in their behalf; which if it be true, it may thereby appear that he was in ſome manner allied to them. But leaving that perſon to the good pleaſure of God, let us return to what we have in hand.

This Joan Laſhford, born in the pariſh of Little Alhallows, in Thames-ſtreet, was the daughter of one Robert Laſhford, cutler, and of the aforeſaid Elizabeth, who afterwards was married to John Warne, upholſter, who (as is before ſaid) was perſecuted for the goſpel of God to the burning fire; and after him his wife; and after her, this Joan Laſhford her daughter; who, about the age of twenty years, miniſtering to her father and mother in priſon, ſuſpected and known to be of the ſame doctrine and religion, was ſent to Bonner biſhop of London, by Dr. Story (as is above in the anſwers to the articles declared), and ſo committed to the Poultry Comptor, where ſhe remained about five weeks, and from thence conveyed to Newgate, where ſhe continued ſome months.

After that, remaining priſoner in the cuſtody of Bonner, and being examined, her confeſſion was, that for above a twelvemoth before, ſhe came not to the popiſh maſs ſervice in the church, neither would, either to receive the ſacrament of the altar, or to be confeſſed, becauſe her conſcience would not ſuffer her ſo to do; confeſſing and proteſting, that in the ſacrament of the altar, there is not the real preſence of Chriſt's body and blood; nor that auricular confeſſion or abſolution, after the popiſh ſort, was neceſſary, nor the maſs to be good, or according to the ſcripture, but ſaid, that both the ſaid ſacrament, confeſſion, abſolution, and the maſs, with all their other ſuperfluous ſacraments, ceremonies, and divine ſervice, as then uſed in this realm of England, were moſt vile, and contrary to Chriſt's word and inſtitution; ſo that neither they were at the beginning, nor ſhall be at the latter end. This godly damſel, feeble and tender of age, yet ſtrong by grace, in this her confeſſion and faith ſtood ſo firm, that neither the flattering promiſes, nor the violent threats of the biſhops could turn her, but being moved and exhorted by the biſhop to return to the catholic unity of the church, boldly ſaid to him again; If ye will leave off your abomination, ſo I will return, and otherwiſe I will not.

Whereupon the biſhop yet again promiſed her pardon of all her errors (as he called them), if ſhe would be conformed. To this ſhe anſwered again, ſaying to the biſhop, Do as it pleaſeth you, and I pray God that you may do that which may pleaſe God.

And thus ſhe conſtantly perſevering in the Lord's holy truth, was by the ſentence definitive condemned and committed to the ſheriffs, by whom the aforeſaid 27th day of January ſhe with the reſt being brought unto the ſtake, there waſhed her cloaths in the blood of the Lamb, dying moſt conſtantly for his word and truth, to whom moſt lovingly ſhe eſpouſed herſelf.

And thus much concerning the life, ſtory, and condemnation of theſe ſeven martyrs, before ſpecified.

The Hiſtory of five Martyrs, who were burned at Canterbury, at two Stakes in one Fire.

THESE five martyrs ſuffered for the truth of the goſpel at Canterbury, on the 31ſt day of January, being one man and four women, whoſe names be theſe;

John Lomas, a young man, Anne Albright, Joan Catmer, Agnes Snoth, widow, Joan Sole, wife.

1. John Lomas, Martyr.

JOHN Lomas, of the pariſh of Tenderden, detected and preſented of that religion which the papiſts call hereſy, and cited upon the ſame to appear at Canterbury, examined there of the firſt article, whether he believed the catholic church or no, anſwered thus; that he believed ſo much as is contained in God's book, and no more.

Then being aſſigned to appear again under the pain of the law the next Wedneſday ſeven-night after, which was the 17th day of January, the ſaid Lomas examined whether he would be confeſſed by a prieſt or no, anſwered and ſaid, that he found it not written that he ſhould be confeſſed to any prieſt in God's book, neither would be confeſſed, unleſs he were accuſed by ſome man of ſin. Again, examined whether he believed the body of Chriſt to be in the ſacrament of the alter really under the forms of bread and wine after the conſecration, or no; he anſwered, that he believed no reality of Chriſt's body to be in the ſacrament; neither found he written, that he is there under form or treſsle, but he believed ſo much as is written. Being then demanded, whether he believed that there is a catholic church or no, and whether he would be content to be a member of the ſame, he anſwered thereto, that he believed ſo much as was written in God's book, and other anſwer than this he refuſed to give, &c. Whereupon the ſentence was given and read againſt him the 18th day of January, and ſo being committed to the ſecular power, he conſtantly ſuffered for the conſcience of a true faith, with the four women here following.

2. Agnes Snoth, Martyr.

AGNES Snoth, widow, of the pariſh of Smarden, likewiſe accuſed and cited for the true profeſſion of Chriſt's religion, was divers times examined before the phariſaical fathers. Who, there compelled to anſwer to ſuch articles and interrogatories as ſhould be adminiſtered unto her, firſt denied to be confeſſed to a prieſt; notwithſtanding ſhe denied not to confeſs her offences as one to another, but not auricularly to any prieſt. And as touching the ſacrament of the alter, ſhe proteſted that if ſhe or any other did receive the ſacrament ſo as Chriſt and his apoſtles after him did deliver it, then ſhe and they did receive it to their comfort: but as it is now uſed in the church, ſhe ſaid that no man could otherwiſe receive it than to his damnation, as ſhe thought. Afterwards being examined again concerning penance, whether it were a ſacrament or no, ſhe plainly denied the ſame, and that the popiſh manner of their abſolution was not conſonant to the word, nor neceſſary to be taken; with other ſuch like, agreeing with the anſwers and confeſſion of John Lomas before-mentioned. Whereupon the ſentence being likewiſe read, ſhe was committed to the ſheriffs of Canterbury, and ſo ſuffering martyrdom with the reſt, declared herſelf a perfect and conſtant witneſs of Chriſt and of his truth, the 31ſt day of January.

3. Anne Albright, alias Champnes, Martyr.

AGAINST Anne Albright, likewiſe appearing before the judge and his colleagues, it was alſo objected concerning the ſame matter confeſſion. Whereunto ſhe anſwered in theſe words, ſaying, That ſhe would not be confeſſed by a prieſt; and added moreover, ſpeaking unto the prieſts, You prieſts, ſaid ſhe, are the children of perdition, and can do no good by your confeſſion. And likewiſe ſpeaking unto the judge, and his aſſiſtants, ſhe told them, that they were ſubverters of Chriſt's truth.

And concerning the ſacrament of the altar, ſhe ſaid it was a naughty and abominable idol, and ſo utterly denied the ſame ſacrament. Thus perſiſting and perſevering in her former ſayings and anſwers, ſhe was condemned the ſaid 18th day of January, with the others abovementioned; with whom alſo ſhe ſuffered quietly, and with great comfort, for the truth of Chriſt's religion.

4. Joan Sole.

IN like manner Joan Sole, of the pariſh of Horton, was condemned by the ſame phariſees and prieſts for not allowing auricular confeſſion, and for denying the real preſence and ſubſtance of Chriſt to be in the ſacrament. Who, after their phariſaical ſentence being pronounced, was brought by the ſheriffs to the ſtake with the other four, and ſuſtained the like martyrdom with them, through the aſſiſtance of God's holy grace and Spirit, mightily working in her, to the glory of his name, and confirmation of his truth.

5. Joan Catmer.

THE fifth and laſt of theſe heavenly company of martyrs, was Joan Catmer, of the pariſh of Hith, wife (as it ſhould ſeem) of George Catmer burned before. Who being aſked what ſhe ſaid to confeſſion made to a prieſt, denied to be confeſſed to any ſuch prieſt. And moreover, the judge ſpeaking of the ſacrament of the altar, ſhe ſaid and affirmed, That ſhe believed not in that ſacrament, as it was then uſed, for that it was made, ſaid ſhe, a very idol. In this her confeſſion ſhe remaining and perſiſting, was by the like ſentence cruelly by them condemned, and ſo ſuffered with the aforeſaid John Lomas, and the other three martyrs, ratifying and confeſſing with their blood the true knowledge and doctrine of the glorious goſpel of Chriſt Jeſus our Saviour.

Theſe five perſons were burnt at two ſtakes in one fire together at Canterbury, as is before ſaid; who when the fire was flaming about their ears, did ſing pſalms. Whereat the good knight, Sir John Norton, being there preſent, wept bitterly at the ſight thereof.

The judges and other aſſiſtants which ſat upon her, and the other four above-mentioned, were Richard Faucet, John Warren, John Mills, Robert Collins, and John Baker the notary.

The Hiſtory of the Reverend Paſtor and Prelate, Thomas Cranmer, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Martyr, burnt at Oxford, for the Confeſſion of Chriſt's true Doctrine under Queen Mary, March 21, 1556.

AS concerning the life and eſtate of that moſt reverend father in God, and worthy prelate of godly memory, Thomas Cranmer, late archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of the original cauſe and occaſion of his preferment unto his archiepiſcopal dignity, who by many hath been thought to have procured the ſame by friendſhip only, and of ſome others eſteemed unworthy ſo high a vocation; it is firſt therefore to be noted and conſidered, that the ſame Thomas Cranmer coming of an an ancient parentage, from the conqueſt to be deduced, and continuing ſince in the name and family of a gentleman, was born in a village called Arſelacton, in Nottinghamſhire, of whoſe ſaid name and family there remaineth at theſe days one manor and manſion-houſe, in Lincolnſhire, called Cranmer-Hall, &c. ſometime the heritage of the ſaid ſtock and family. Who being from his infancy kept at ſchool, and carefully brought up, came in proceſs of time unto the univerſity of Cambridge, and there proſpering in good knowledge amongſt the better ſort of ſtudents, was choſen fellow of Jeſus college, in Cambridge. And ſo being maſter of arts, and fellow of the ſame college, it chanced him to marry a gentleman's daughter: by means whereof he loſt and gave over his fellowſhip there, and became the reader in Buckingham college; and becauſe he would with more diligence apply that his office of reading, he placed his ſaid wife in an inn, called the Dolphin, in Cambridge, the wife of the houſe being of affinity unto her. By reaſon whereof, and for that his often reſort unto his wife in that inn, he was much marked by ſome popiſh merchants: whereupon aroſe the ſlanderous noiſe and report againſt him, after he was preferred to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, raiſed up by the malicious diſdain of certain malignant adverſaries to Chriſt and his truth, bruting abroad every where, that he was but an hoſtler, and therefore without all good learning. Of whoſe malicious reports, one of their practices in that behalf ſhall hereafter be declared, as place and time ſhall ſerve.

But in the mean time, to return to the matter preſent: Whilſt this ſaid Mr. Cranmer continued as a reader in Buckingham college, his wife died in childbed. After whoſe death the maſter and fellows of Jeſus college, deſirous again of their old companion, namely, for his towardlineſs in learning, choſe him again fellow of the ſame college. Where he remaining at his ſtudy, became in a few years after the reader of divinity lecture in the ſame college, and in ſuch ſpecial eſtimation and reputation with the whole univerſity, that being doctor of divinity, he was commonly appointed one of the heads (which are two or three of the chiefeſt learned men), to examine ſuch as yearly proceed in commencement, either bachelors or doctors of divinity, by whoſe approbation the whole univerſity licenſed them to proceed unto their degree, and again by whoſe diſallowance the univerſity alſo rejected them for a time to proceed, until they be better furniſhed with more knowledge.

Now Dr. Cranmer, ever much favouring the knowledge of the ſcripture, would never admit any to proceed in divinity, unleſs they were ſubſtantially ſeen in the hiſtory of the bible: by means whereof certain friars, and other religious perſons, who were principally brought up in the ſtudy of ſchool-authors, without regard had to the authority of the ſcripture, were commonly rejected by him; him; ſo that he was greatly, for that his ſevere examination, of the religious ſort much hated, and had in great indignation; and yet it came to paſs in the end, that divers of them being compelled to ſtudy the ſcriptures, became afterwards very well learned and well-affected; inſomuch that when they proceeded doctors of divinity, they could not over-extol and commend Dr. Cranmer's goodneſs towards them, who for a time had put them back, to aſpire unto better knowledge and perfection. Among whom Dr. Barret, a white friar, who afterwards dwelt in Norwich, was handled after that manner, giving him no leſs commendation for his happy rejecting of him for a better amendment. Thus much I repeat, that our apiſh and popiſh ſort of ignorant prieſts, may well underſtand, that this his exerciſe, kind of life, and vocation, was not altogether hoſtler-like.

Well, to go forwards; like as he was neither in fame unknown, nor in knowledge obſcure, ſo was he greatly ſolicited by Dr. Capon, to have been one of the fellows in the foundation of cardinal Wolſey's college, in Oxford, which he utterly refuſed, not without danger of indignation. Notwithſtanding, foreſeeing that which after happened, to the utter confuſion of many well-affected learned men there, without conſideration (becauſe man's glory was more ſought for than God's), he ſtood to the danger of the ſaid indignation, which chanced more proſperouſly unto him within a few years after than he looked for. For while he thus continued in Cambridge, the great and weighty cauſe of king Henry the eighth's divorce with the lady Catharine, dowager of Spain, came into queſtion; which being many ways by the ſpace of two or three years amongſt the canoniſts, civilians, and other learned men, diverſly diſputed and debated, it came to paſs that this ſaid Dr. Cranmer, by reaſon that the plague was in Cambridge, reſorted to Waltham-Abbey, to one Mr. Creſſey's houſe there, whoſe wife was of kin to the ſaid Mr. Cranmer. And for that he had two ſons of the ſaid Mr. Creſſey with him at Cambridge as his pupils, he reſted at Waltham-Croſs, at the houſe of the ſaid Mr. Creſſey, with the ſaid two children, during that ſummer-time, while the plague reigned.

In this ſummer-time cardinal Campeus and cardinal Wolſey, being in commiſſion from the pope, to hear and determine that great cauſe in controverſy betwen the king and the queen, his pretended wife, dallied and delayed all the ſummer-time until the month of Auguſt came, in hearing the ſaid cauſe in controverſy debated. When Auguſt was come, the ſaid cardinals little minding to proceed to give ſentence, to occaſion to finiſh their commiſſion, and not further to determine therein, pretending that it was not permitted by the laws to keep courts of eccleſiaſtical matters in harveſt time: which ſudden ſtay and giving over of the ſaid commiſſion by both the cardinals, being unknown to the king, it ſo much moved him, that he taking it as a mock at the cardinals hands, commanded the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to diſpatch forthwith cardinal Campeius home again to Rome; and ſo in haſte removed himſelf from London to Waltham for a night or two, while his houſhold removed to Greenwich: by means whereof it happened that the harbingers lodged Dr. Stephen Gardiner, ſecretary, and Dr. Foxe, almoner (who were the chief furtherers, preferrers, and defenders on the king's behalf of the ſaid cauſe), in the houſe of the ſaid Mr. Creſſey, where the ſaid Dr. Cranmer was alſo lodged and reſident. When ſupper-time came, the three doctors met together; Dr. Stephen Gardiner, and Dr. Foxe, much marvelling at Dr. Cranmer's being there. Who declared to them the cauſe of his being there, namely, becauſe the plague was in Cambridge: and as they were of old acquaintance, ſo the ſecretary and the almoner right well entertained Dr. Cranmer, minding to underſtand his opinion concerning the great buſineſs they had in hand. And ſo as good occaſion ſerved, while they were at ſupper, they conferred with Dr. Cranmer concerning the king's cauſe, requeſting him to give his judgment and opinion what he thought therein.

Whereto Dr. Cranmer anſwered, "That he could ſay little to the matter, for that he had not ſtudied nor looked for it. Notwithſtanding he ſaid to them, that in his opinion, they made more ado in proſecuting the law eccleſiaſtical than needed. It were better, as I ſuppoſe, ſaid Dr. Cranmer, that the queſtion, Whether a man may marry his brother's wife or no? were diſcuſſed by the divines, and by the authority of the word of God, whereby the conſcience of the prince might be better ſatisfied and quieted, than thus from year to year by unneceſſary delays to prolong the time, leaving the very truth of the matter unbolted out by the word of God. There is but one truth in it, which the ſcripture will ſoon declare, make open and manifeſt, being by learned men well handled, and that may be as well done in England in the univerſities here, as at Rome, or elſewhere in any foreign nation, the authority whereof will compel any judge ſoon to come to a definitive ſentence: and therefore, as I take it, you might this way have made an end of this matter long ſince. When Dr. Cranmer had thus ended his tale, the other two liked well his device, and wiſhed they had ſo proceeded before time, and thereupon conceived ſome matter of that device to inſtruct the king withal, who was then minded to ſend to Rome again for a new commiſſion.

Now the next day, when the king removed to Greenwich, like as he took himſelf not well handled by the cardinals in thus deferring his cauſe, ſo his mind being uneaſy, and deſirous to ſee an end of this long tedious ſuit, he called unto him the two principal managers of his cauſe, namely, Dr. Gardiner and Dr. Foxe: What now, my maſters (quoth the king) ſhall we do in this infinite cauſe of mine? I ſee by it there muſt be a new commiſſion procured from Rome, and when we ſhall have an end, God knoweth, and not I.

When the king had declared ſomewhat of his mind herein, Dr. Foxe the almoner ſaid to the king again, We truſt that there ſhall be better ways deviſed for your majeſty, than to make travel ſo far as to Rome any more in your highneſs's cauſe, which by chance was put into our heads the other night at Waltham. The king being very deſirous to underſtand his meaning, ſaid, Who hath taken in hand to inſtruct you by any better or ſhorter way to proceed in our ſaid cauſe? Then ſaid Dr. Foxe, We happened to lodge the other night at one Mr. Creſſey's houſe at Waltham, your highneſs being there, where we met with an old acquaintance of ours, named Dr. Cranmer, with whom having conference concerning your highneſs's cauſe, he thought that the neareſt way was, firſt to inſtruct and quiet your majeſty's conſcience by trying your highneſs's queſtion out by the word of God, and thereupon to proceed to a final ſentence. With this report the ſecretary was diſpleaſed with the almoner, becauſe they did not take the glory of this invention to themſelves. And when the ſecretary would have ſeemed by colouring words to make it appear to the king, that it was a project of their own deviſing, the king immediately cried out, Where is this Dr. Cranmer, is he ſtill at Waltham? They anſwered that they left him there. Marry, ſaid the king, I will ſurely ſpeak with him, and therefore let him be ſent for out of hand. I perceive (quoth the king) that that man hath the ſow by the right ear. And if I had known this device but two years ago, it had been in my way a great piece of money, and alſo rid me out of much diſquietneſs.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer was ſent for, and being removed from Waltham to Cambridge, and ſo towards his friends in Nottinghamſhire, a poſt went for him. But when he came to London, he began to quarrel with his two acquaintances, that he by their means was thus troubled and brought thither to be encumbered in a matter wherein he had nothing at all travelled in ſtudy; and therefore therefore moſt inſtantly intreated them, that they would make his excuſe in ſuch a manner, that he might be diſpatched away from coming into the king's preſence. They promiſed, and took the matter upon them ſo to do, if by any means they might compaſs it. But all was in vain; for the more they began to excuſe Dr. Cranmer's abſence, the more the king inſiſted to have him brought into his preſence out of hand; ſo that no excuſe ſerving, he was obliged immediately to wait on the king at court, whom the gentle prince benignly accepting, demanded his name, and ſaid unto him, Were not you at Waltham at ſuch a time, in the company of my ſecretary, and my almoner? Dr. Cranmer confeſſing the ſame; the king ſaid again, Had you not conference with them concerning our matter of divorce now in queſtion after this ſort? repeating the manner and order thereof. That is right true, if it pleaſe your highneſs, quoth Dr. Cranmer. Well (ſaid the king) I well perceive that you have the right ſcope of this matter. You muſt underſtand (quoth the king) that I have been long troubled in conſcience, and now I perceive that by this means I might have been long ago relieved one way or other from the ſame, if we had this way proceeded. And therefore, Mr. Doctor, I pray you, and nevertheleſs becauſe you are a ſubject, I charge and command you (all your other buſineſs and affairs ſet apart), to take ſome pains to ſee this my cauſe to be furthered according to your device, as much as it may lie in you, ſo that I may ſhortly underſtand whereunto I may truſt. For this I proteſt before God and the world, that I ſeek not to be divorced from the queen, if by any means I might juſtly be perſuaded that this our matrimony were inviolable, and not againſt the laws of God; for otherwiſe there was never cauſe to move me to ſeek any ſuch extremity. Neither was there ever prince had a more gentle, a more obedient and loving companion and wife than the queen is, nor did I ever fancy woman in all reſpects better, if this doubt had not riſen; aſſuring you for all the ſingular virtues wherewith ſhe is endowed, beſides the conſideration of her noble ſtock, I could be right well contented ſtill to remain with her, if ſo it would ſtand with the will and pleaſure of Almighty God. And thus greatly commending her many and ſingular qualities, the king further ſaid, I therefore pray you with an indifferent eye, and with as much dexterity as lieth in you, that you for your part do handle the matter for the diſcharging of both our conſciences.

Dr. Cranmer much diſabling himſelf to meddle in ſo weighty a matter, beſought the king's highneſs to commit the trial and examining of this matter by the word of God, unto the beſt learned men of both his univerſities, Cambridge and Oxford. You ſay well, ſaid the king, and I am content therewith. But yet nevertheleſs, I will have you eſpecially to write your mind therein. And ſo calling the earl of Wiltſhire to him, ſaid, I pray you, my lord, let Dr. Cranmer have entertainment in your houſe at Durham Place for a time, to the intent he may be there quiet to accompliſh my requeſt, and let him lack neither books, nor any thing requiſite for his ſtudy. And thus after the king's departure, Dr. Cranmer went with my lord of Wiltſhire unto his houſe, wherein he incontinently wrote his mind concerning the king's queſtion; adding to the ſame, beſides the authority of the ſcriptures, of general councils, and of ancient writers, alſo his opinion, which was this; That the biſhop of Rome had no ſuch authority, as whereby he might diſpenſe with the word of God and the ſcripture. When Dr. Cranmer had wrote this book, and committed it to the king, the king ſaid unto him, Will you ſtand to this that you have here written before the biſhop of Rome? That will I do, by God's grace, quoth Dr. Cranmer, if your majeſty do ſend me thither. Marry, quoth the king, I will ſend you even to him in a ſure ambaſſage.

And thus by the means of Dr. Cranmer's handling of this matter with the king, not only certain learned men were ſent abroad to the moſt part of the univerſities in Chriſtendom, to diſpute the queſtion, but alſo the ſame being by commiſſion diſputed by the divin s in both the univerſities of Cambridge and Oxford, it was there concluded, that no ſuch matrimony was by the word of God lawful.

Whereupon a ſolemn ambaſſage was then prepared and ſent to the biſhop of Rome, then being at Bonony, wherein went the earl of Wiltſhire, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Stokeſley, Dr. Carne, Dr. Bennet, and divers other learned men and gentlemen.

And when the time came that they ſhould come before the biſhop of Rome to declare the cauſe of their ambaſſage, the biſhop ſitting on high in his cloth of ſtate, and in his rich apparel, with his ſandals on his feet, offering, as it were, his foot to be kiſſed by the ambaſſadors; the earl of Wiltſhire diſdaining thereat, ſtood ſtill, and made no countenance thereunto, ſo that all the reſt kept themſelves from that idolatry.

Howbeit, one thing here is not to be omitted, as a prognoſticate of our ſeparation from the ſee of Rome, which then chanced by a ſpaniel of the earl of Wiltſhire. For he having there a great ſpaniel which came with him out of England, ſtood directly between the earl and the biſhop of Rome.

And when the ſaid biſhop, that ſervant of the ſervants of God (as he in great humility ſtyled himſelf) offered his foot to be kiſſed, and, while they ſtood ſtill and declined it, the ſaid ſpaniel ſeeing the foot ſhining with gold and jewels, caught hold of it, as taking it to be ſome kind of repaſt, and bit it. The pope diſdaining the affront, in haſte pulled in that glorious foot, and kicked the dog with the other: and while the Engliſhmen ſmiled in their ſleeves at the omen, the pontifical biſhop, knitting his brows, demanded the cauſe of their ambaſſy. Which being declared, the earl of Wiltſhire delivered Cranmer's book to the pope; telling him withal, That there were learned men come along with him from England, who were to defend what was contained in that book, by the holy ſcriptures, the councils, and the writings of the orthodox fathers, againſt all who ſhould contradict it.

The pope often promiſed the ambaſſador to appoint a day for the diſputation; but it was a promiſe which he never performed; by affected delays ſpinning out the time, as his cardinals had done before in England. So giving the ambaſſadors moſt honourable and court-like entertainment, and having made Cranmer (whom he either knew or ſuppoſed to be the author of that book concerning the king's marriage with Catharine) his penitentiary in England, Ireland and Wales; being mighty timerous, and equally afraid of the emperor, the French king, and ours, he durſt not come to any reſolution in a matter of ſuch moment, but diſmiſſed the aſſembly, without determining, or even propoſing any thing about it.

From hence, while the reſt returned home, Cranmer, by the king's private order, made the emperor and the princes of Germany in his way. At that time the emperor was in an expedition againſt the Turk, who was engaged in the ſiege of Vienna, the capital of Auſtria. Whom when Cranmer attended, and aſked him in the king's name which of his domeſtics or others that he knew would contradict him? Cornelius Agrippa was mentioned; a man better verſed in the ſecrets of philoſophy than in divinity. But he being eaſily brought over to Cranmer's ſide of the queſtion, did readily join in perſuading the other learned men of the emperor's retinue, not to oppoſe Cranmer; who, he ſaid, had brought the truth along with him. Therefore meeting with no oppoſition, he took his leave of the emporer. From whence taking a tour throughout Germany, he brought home home with him to the king the opinions and judgment of the moſt learned men there, as well in the univerſities, as in the courts of princes, all agreeing with his own.

This matter thus proſpering on Dr. Cranmer's behalf, as well touching the king's queſtion, as concerning the invalidity of the pope's authority, biſhop Warham, then archbiſhop of Canterbury, departed this tranſitory life, whereby that dignity then being in the king's gift, was immediately given to Dr. Cranmer, as worthy, for his good ſervices, of ſuch a promotion. Thus much concerning the preferment of Dr. Cranmer, and by what means he arrived at this dignity: not by flattery, nor by bribes, nor by any other unlawful means; which thing I have more at large diſcourſed, to ſtop the railing mouths of ſuch, who being themſelves obſcure and unlearned, are not aſhamed moſt ſcurrilouſly to detract ſo learned a man with the nick-name of Hoſtler, whom, for his godly zeal to ſincere religion, they ought with much humility to have had in regard and reputation.

Now as concerning his behaviour and method of living towards God, and the world, being now entered into his ſaid dignity, and foraſmuch as the apoſtle St. Paul, writing to two biſhops, Timothy and Titus, ſetteth out unto us a perfect deſcription of a true biſhop, with all the other properties and conditions belonging to the ſame, unto which pattern it is rare, in theſe ſtrange days, to find the image of any biſhop correſpondent; yet, for example ſake, let us take the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and try him by the rule thereof, to ſee either how near he cometh to the deſcription of St. Paul, or elſe how far off he ſwerveth from the common courſe of others, in his time, of his calling. The rule of St. Paul is found, 1 Tim. 3. Alſo in his epiſtle to Titus, chap. 1. in theſe words:

"A biſhop muſt be faultleſs, as becometh the miniſter of God. Not ſtubborn, nor angry, no drunkard, no fighter, not given to filthy lucre; but harborous, one that loveth goodneſs, ſober-minded, righteous, holy, temperate, and ſuch as cleaveth unto the true word and doctrine, that he may be able to exhort, &c.

Unto this rule and touch-ſtone, to lay now the life and converſation of this archbiſhop, we will firſt begin with that which is thus written,

A Biſhop muſt be faultleſs, as becometh the Miniſter of God.

As no man is without ſin, and as every man carrieth about him his peculiar vice or failings; yet nevertheleſs the apoſtle meaneth, that the biſhop and miniſter muſt be faultleſs, in compariſon of the common converſation of men of the world, who ſeem to live more licentiouſly at their own liberties and pleaſures, than a biſhop or miniſter ought to do, having ſmall regard to the giving of good example; which a biſhop and miniſter moſt carefully ought to conſider, leſt by his diſſolute life the word of God be ſlandered and evil ſpoken of: to avoid which, and the better to accompliſh this precept of the apoſtle, this worthy man gave himſelf up to continual ſtudy, ſtrictly obſerving the order that he in the univerſity commonly uſed, that is, to be by five o'clock in the morning at his book, and ſo continuing in prayer and ſtudy till nine; he then applied himſelf (if the prince's affairs did not call him away) until dinner-time, to hear ſuiters, and to diſpatch ſuch matters as appertained to his ſpecial cure and charge, committing his temporal affairs, both of his houſhold and other foreign buſineſs, to his officers: ſo that ſuch things were never impediments either to his ſtudy, or to his paſtoral charge, which principally conſiſted in reformation of corrupt religion, and in ſetting forth of true and ſincere doctrine. For the moſt part always being in commiſſion, he aſſociated himſelf with learned men for ſifting or bolting ſomething or other for the advantage and profit of the church of England. By means whereof, and what for his private ſtudy, he was never idle; beſides that, he accounted it no idle point to beſtow an hour or two of the day in reading over ſuch works and books as daily came from beyond the ſeas.

After dinner, if any ſuitors were attendant, he would very diligently hear them, and diſpatch them in ſuch an obliging manner, that every one admired and commended his lenity and gentleneſs, although the caſe required that ſometimes divers of them were committed by him to priſon. And having no ſuiters after dinner, for an hour, or thereabouts, he would play at cheſs, or behold ſuch as were at play. That done, then again to his ordinary ſtudy, where he commonly ſtood (ſeldom ſat down) till five of the clock, which hour he beſtowed in hearing the Common Prayer, and walking, or uſing ſome innocent recreation till ſupper-time. At ſupper, if he had no appetite (as many times he would not ſup) yet he would ſit down at the table, having his ordinary proviſion of his meſs furniſhed with expedient company, he wearing his gloves on his hands, becauſe he would, as it were, thereby wean himſelf from eating of meat, but yet entertaining the company with ſuch edifying diſcourſe as did much delight the hearers; ſo that by this means hoſpitality was well furniſhed, and the alms-cheſt well maintained for relief of the poor. After ſupper he would ſpend, at leaſt, one hour in walking, or ſome other harmleſs paſtime, and then again till nine of the clock at his ſtudy: ſo that no hour of the day was ſpent in vain, but the ſame was ſo beſtowed, as tended to the glory of God, the ſervice of the prince, or the advantage of the church. By all which he gained a good report among men, ſo that his converſation, in compariſon of other men, ſeemed to be faultleſs, as the miniſter of God.

That a Biſhop ought not to be ſtubborn.

Secondly, it is required, "That a biſhop ought not to be ſtubborn." With which kind of vice, without great wrong, this archbiſhop in no wiſe ought to be charged; whoſe nature was ſuch, as none more gentle, or ſooner won to an honeſt ſuit or purpoſe, eſpecially in ſuch things, wherein by his word, writing, counſel or deed, he might gratify either any gentleman or nobleman, or do good to any mean perſon, or elſe relieve the needy and poor. Only in cauſes pertaining to God or his prince, no man more ſtout, more conſtant, or more hard to be won; as in that part his earneſt defence in the parliament-houſe above three days together, in diſputing againſt the ſix articles of Gardiner's device, can teſtify. And though the king would needs have them upon ſome politic conſideration to go forward, yet he ſo handled himſelf as well in the parliament-houſe, as afterwards by writing, ſo obediently and with ſuch humble behaviour in words towards his prince, proteſting the cauſe not to be his, but Almighty God's, who was the author of all truth, that the king did not only well like his defence (willing him to depart out of the parliament-houſe into the council-chamber, whilſt the act ſhould paſs and be granted, for ſafeguard of his conſcience; which he with humble proteſtation refuſed, hoping that his majeſty, in proceſs of time, would revoke them again) but alſo after the parliament was finiſhed, the king perceiving the zealous affection that the archbiſhop bare towards the defence of his cauſe, which many ways, by ſcriptures and manifold authorities and reaſons he had ſubſtantially confirmed and defended, ſent the lord Cromwell, then vicegerent, with the two dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and all the lords of the parliament, to dine with him at Lambeth; where it was declared by the vicegerent, and the two dukes, that it was the king's pleaſure, that they all ſhould, in his highneſs's behalf, cheriſh, comfort, and animate him, as one that for his travel in that parliament had ſhewed himſelf both greatly learned, and alſo diſcreet and wiſe, and therefore they willed him not to be diſcouraged for any thing that was paſſed contrary to his allegations. He moſt humbly thanked the king's majeſty for his great goodneſs towards him, and them for all their pains, ſaying, I hope in God, that hereafter my allegations and authorities ſhall take place to the glory of God, and the advantage of the realm; in the mean time I will ſatisfy myſelf with the honourable conſent of your honours, and the whole parliament.

Here it is to be noted, that this man's ſtout and godly defence of the truth herein ſo bound the prince's conſcience, that he would not permit the truth in that man to be clean overthrown with authority and power; and therefore this way God working in the prince's mind, a plain token was declared hereby, that all things were not ſo ſincerely handled in the confirmation of the ſaid ſix articles as it ought to have been, for elſe the prince might have had a juſt cauſe to have borne his great indignation towards the archbiſhop. Let us pray that the like ſtoutneſs may be perceived in all eccleſiaſtical and learned men, where the truth ought to be defended, and alſo the like relenting and flexibility may take place in princes and noblemen, when they ſhall have occaſion offered them to maintain the ſame, ſo that they utterly overwhelm not the truth by ſelf will, power and authority. Now in the end, this archbiſhop's conſtancy was ſuch towards God's cauſe, that he confirmed all his doings by bitter death in the fire, without reſpect of any worldly treaſure or pleaſure. And as concerning his ſtoutneſs in his prince's cauſe, the contrary reſiſtance of the duke of Northumberland againſt him proved right well his good mind that way; which chanced by reaſon that he would not conſent unto the diſſolving of chauntries, until the king came of age, to the intent that they might then better ſerve to furniſh his royal eſtate, than to have ſo great treaſure conſumed in his nonage. Which his ſtoutneſs, joined with ſuch ſimplicity, ſurely was thought to divers of the council a thing incredible, eſpecially in ſuch ſort to contend with him, who was ſo accounted in this realm, as few or none would or durſt withſtand him.

So dear to him was the cauſe of God, and of his prince, that for the one he would not keep his conſcience clogged, nor for the other lurk or hide his head. Otherwiſe (as it is ſaid) his very enemies might eaſily intreat him in any cauſe reaſonable; ſo that he was altogether free from the vice of ſtubbornneſs, and rather culpable of over-much facility and gentleneſs.

Not Angry.

Then followeth, "Not angry." Surely if over-much patience may be a vice, this man may ſeem to offend rather on this ſide than on the contrary. Albeit for all his doings I cannot ſay: for the moſt part ſuch was his mortification that way, that few we ſhall find in whom the ſaying of our Saviour Chriſt ſo much prevailed as with him, who would not only have a man to forgive his enemies, but alſo to pray for them; that leſſon never went out of his memory. It was known that he had many cruel enemies, not for his own deſerts, but only for the ſake of his religion: and yet whoſoever he was that ſought his hindrance, either in goods, eſtimation, or life, and upon conference would ſeem never ſo ſlenderly to relent and excuſe himſelf, he would both forget the offence, and ever afterwards immediately entertain the offender: inſomuch that it became a common proverb; "Do unto my lord of Canterbury a diſpleaſure, or a ſhrewd turn, and then you may be ſure to have him your friend whilſt he liveth." Of which his gentle diſpoſition in abſtaining from revenge, amongſt many examples thereof, I ſhall repeat one.

It happened an ignorant prieſt and parſon in the north parts (the town is not now in remembrance, but he was kinſman to one Cherſey a grocer in London; being one of thoſe prieſts that uſed more to ſtudy at the alehouſe, than in his chamber) to ſit on a time with his honeſt neighbours at the alehouſe in his own pariſh, where they were talking in the praiſe of my lord Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury. And the prieſt, envying his name only for religion ſake, ſaid to his neighbours, "What make you of him, he was but an hoſtler, and hath no more learning than the goſlins that go yonder on the green," with ſuch like ſlanderous and uncomely words. His honeſt neighbours, not much liking his irreverend ſpeech, articled againſt him, and ſent their complaint to the lord Cromwell, then vicegerent in cauſes eccleſiaſtical, who ſent for the prieſt, and committed him to the Fleet, intending to have made him recant thoſe ſlanderous words publicly at Paul's croſs. However the lord Cromwell, having great affairs of the prince then in hand, forgot his priſoner in the Fleet: ſo that the ſaid Cherſey the the grocer, underſtanding that his kinſman was in confinement, only for ſpeaking words againſt my lord of Canterbury, conſulted with the prieſt, and between them deviſed to apply rather to the archbiſhop for deliverance, than to the lord Cromwell, before whom he was accuſed; well knowing the difference of their tempers, the one gentle and full of clemency, the other ſomewhat more ſevere and rigid, eſpecially againſt a papiſt: ſo that Cherſey took upon himſelf firſt to try my lord of Canterbury's benignity, inaſmuch as his couſin's offence was only againſt him, and none other. Whereupon the ſaid Cherſey came to one of the archbiſhop's gentlemen (whoſe father bought all his ſpices and fruit of the ſaid Cherſey, and ſo thereby of familiar acquaintance with the gentleman) and acquainted him with the trouble his kinſman was in, deſiring him to be a means to my lord his maſter, to hear his ſuit in the behalf of his kinſman.

The matter was moved. The archbiſhop, like a good-natured man, would never ſhew himſelf ſtrange to the meaneſt petitioner: he immediately ſent for the ſaid Cherſey, who appearing before him, declared, that there was a kinſman of his in the Fleet, a prieſt of the north country, and as I may tell your grace the truth (quoth Cherſey) a man of ſmall civility, and of leſs learning. And yet he hath a parſonage there, which now (by reaſon that the lord Cromwell hath laid him in priſon) being in his cure, is unſerved, and he hath continued in durance above two months, and is called to no anſwer, and knows not when he ſhall come to any end; ſo that this impriſonment conſumeth his ſubſtance, and will utterly undo him, unleſs your grace be his good lord.

I know not the man, ſaid the archbiſhop, nor what he hath done why he ſhould be thus in trouble.

Said Cherſey again, He only hath offended againſt your grace, and againſt no man elſe, as may well be perceived by the articles objected againſt him; the copy whereof the ſaid Cherſey then exhibited to the ſaid archbiſhop of Canterbury; who well peruſing the ſaid articles ſaid, This is the common talk of all the ignorant popiſh prieſts in England againſt me. Surely, ſaid he, I was never made privy to this accuſation, and of his confinement I never heard before this time. Notwithſtanding, if there be nothing elſe to charge him withal againſt the prince or any of the council, I will at your requeſt take order with him, and ſend him home again to his cure to do his duty; and ſo thereupon ſent his ring to the warden of the Fleet, deſiring him to ſend the priſoner unto him, with his keeper in the afternoon.

When the keeper had brought the priſoner at the hour appointed, and Cherſey had well inſtructed his couſin in any wiſe to ſubmit himſelf to the archbiſhop, confeſſing his fault, whereby that way he ſhould moſt eaſily have an end and win his favour: the parſon was carried into the garden at Lambeth, and there the archbiſhop, ſitting under the vine, demanded of the parſon what was the cauſe of his confinement, and who committed him to the Fleet. The parſon anſwered and ſaid, that the lord Cromwell ſent him thither, thither, and that certain malicious pariſhioners of his pariſh had wrongfully accuſed him of words which he never ſpake nor meant. Cherſey hearing his fooliſh couſin ſo far out of the way from his former inſtruction, ſaid, Thou daſtardly dolt and varlet, is this thy promiſe thou madeſt to me? Are there not a great number of thy honeſt neighbours hands againſt thee, to prove thee a lyar? Surely my lord (quoth Cherſey) it is pity to do him good, I am ſorry that I have troubled your grace thus far with him.

Well, ſaid the archbiſhop unto the parſon, if you have not offended me, I can do you no good: for I am intreated to help one out of trouble that hath offended againſt me, if my lord Cromwell hath committed you to priſon wrongfully, that lieth himſelf to amend, and not in me. If your offence only hath touched me, I will be bold to do ſomewhat for your friend's ſake here. If you have not offended againſt me, then have I nothing to do with you, but that you may go and remain from whence you came.

Lord, what ado his kinſman Cherſey made with him, calling him all kind of opprobrious names: In the end my lord of Canterbury, ſeeming to riſe and go his ways, the prieſt fell on his knees, and ſaid, I beſeech your grace to forgive me this offence, aſſuring your grace that I ſpake thoſe words being drunk and not well adviſed.

Ah, ſaid my lord, this is ſomewhat, and yet it is no good excuſe: for drunkenneſs always uttereth that which lieth hid in the heart of man when he is ſober, alledging a text or two out of the ſcriptures concerning the vice of drunkenneſs, which cometh not now to remembrance.

Now therefore (ſaid the archbiſhop) that you acknowledge ſomewhat your fault, I am content to commune with you, hoping that you are at this preſent of an indifferent ſobriety. Tell me then, quoth he, did you ever ſee me, or were you ever acquainted with me before this day?

The prieſt anſwered and ſaid, that he never ſaw his grace in his life. Why then, ſaid the archbiſhop, what occaſion had you to call me an hoſtler, and that I had not ſo much learning as the goſlins which then went upon the green before your face? If I have no learning you may now try it, and be out of doubt thereof: therefore I pray you poſe me, either in grammar or in other liberal ſciences, for I have at one time or other taſted partly of them. Or elſe if you are a divine, ſay ſomewhat that way.

The prieſt being amazed at my lord's familiar talk, anſwered and ſaid, I beſeech your grace to pardon me. I am altogether unlearned, and underſtand not the Latin tongue, but very ſimply. My only ſtudy hath been to ſay my ſervice and maſs, fair and deliberate, which I can do as well as any prieſt in the country where I dwell, I thank God.

Well, ſaid my lord, if you will not poſe me, I will make bold to poſe you, and yet as eaſily as I can deviſe, and that only in the ſtory of the Bible now in Engliſh, in which I ſuppoſe that you are daily exerciſed. Tell me therefore who was king David's father, ſaid my lord. The prieſt ſtood ſtill, pauſing a while, and ſaid, In good faith, my lord, I have forgotten his name. Then ſaid my lord again to him, If you cannot tell that, I pray you tell me then, who was Solomon's father? The fooliſh prieſt without all conſideration of what was demanded of him before, made anſwer, Good my lord, bear with me, I am no further ſeen in the Bible, than is daily read in our ſervice in the church.

Then the archbiſhop ſaid, This my queſtion may be found well anſwered in your ſervice. But I now well perceive, howſoever you have judged heretofore of my learning, ſure I am that you have none at all. But this is the common practice of all you that be ignorant and ſuperſtitious prieſts, to ſlander, back-bite, and hate all ſuch as are learned and well affected toward God's word and ſincere religion. Common reaſon might have taught you what an unlikely thing it was, and contrary to all manner of reaſon, that a prince having two univerſities within his realm of well learned men, and deſirous to be reſolved of as doubtful a queſtion as in theſe many years the like was not moved within Chriſtendom, ſhould be driven to that neceſſity for the defence of his cauſe, to ſend out of his realm an hoſtler, being a man of no better knowledge than is a goſlin, in an ambaſſy to anſwer all learned men, both in the court of Rome, and the emperor's court, in ſo difficult a queſtion as toucheth the king's matrimony, and the divorce thereof. I ſay, if you were men of any reaſonable conſideration, you might think it both unſeemly and uncomely for a prince ſo to do. But look, where malice reigneth in man, there reaſon can take no place: and therefore I ſee by it, that you are all at a point, that no reaſon or authority can perſuade you to favour my name, who never meant evil to you, but both your advantage and profit, Howbeit, God amend you all, forgive you, and ſend you better minds.

With theſe words the prieſt ſeemed to weep, and deſired his grace to pardon his fault and frailty, ſo that by this means he might return to his cure again, and he would certainly recant thoſe fooliſh words before his pariſhioners ſo ſoon as he came home, and would become a new man. Well, ſaid the archbiſhop, ſo had you need: and giving him a godly admonition to refuſe the haunting of the alehouſe, and to beſtow his time better in the continual reading of the ſcriptures, he diſmiſſed him from the Fleet.

The lord Cromwell, perceiving within a fortnight after that his priſoner was ſent home without any open puniſhment, came to Lambeth to the archbiſhop, and in a great heat ſaid to him; My lord, I underſtand that you have diſpatched the northern prieſt home again, that I of late ſent to the Fleet for railing againſt you, and calling you an hoſtler.

Indeed I have done ſo, ſaid the archbiſhop, for that in his abſence the people of his cure wanted their divine ſervice. It is very devout divine ſervive that he ſaith, quoth the lord Cromwell: It were more meet for him to be an hoſtler than a curate, who ſticked not to call you an hoſtler. But I thought ſo much what you would do, and therefore I would not tell you of his knavery when I ſent him to priſon. Howbeit, henceforth they ſhall cut your throat before that I ſay any thing more to them on your behalf. Why, what would you have done with him? quoth the archbiſhop; there was nothing laid to his charge, other than words ſpoken againſt me; and now the man hath repented, and is well reconciled, and hath been at great charges in priſon: it is time therefore that he were rid out of his trouble. Well, ſaid my lord Cromwell, I meant that he ſhould have preached a recantation at Paul's Croſs before he had gone home. That had been well done, quoth the archbiſhop, for then you would have had all the world to wonder at me as well as at him. Well, well, ſaid the lord Cromwell, we ſhall ſo long bear with theſe popiſh knaves, that at length they will bring us indeed to be wondered at of all the world.

This example among others ſerveth to declare, that there remained ſmall deſire of revenging in the ſaid archbiſhop. But what ſhould I ſay more? His quietneſs and mortification this way was ſuch, that it is reported by all that knew him, that he never raged ſo far with any of his houſhold ſervants, as once to call the meaneſt of them varlet or knave in anger, much leſs to reprove a ſtranger with any reproachful words. Much unlike in this part to the property (as it ſeemeth) of ſome other inferior biſhops of this realm, which have not ſpared to fly in the faces, to pluck off the beards, to burn the hands, to beat and ſcourge with rods the bodies both of gentlemen, married men and others, having almoſt nothing elſe in their mouths, but fools and knaves, &c. and yet after all this, this, think themſelves good perfect biſhops, after the rule which followeth and ſaith,

No Striker, No Fighter.

From which kind of vice, the nature of this archbiſhop was ſo far off, as was his doctrine which he profeſſed, and death which he ſuffered, far from all condition and example of blind popery. After the prohibition of theſe foreſaid vices, ſucceedeth the mother of all good virtues neceſſarily required by all true chriſtians, but chiefly of a ſpiritual prelate: which is,

Not given to filthy Lucre, but harborous.

The contrary whereof was ſo odious unto St. Paul, that he eſteemed the ſame no leſs than a kind of idolatry, in that it maketh men forget their duty to God ſo far, and inſtead of him to worſhip their treaſure. How little this prelate we ſpeak of was infected with this vice, and how he was no niggard, all kind of people that knew him, as well learned beyond the ſeas and on this ſide, to whom yearly he gave in exhibition great ſums of money, as others, both gentlemen, mean men, and poor men, who in their neceſſity that which he could conveniently ſpare, lend or make, can well teſtify. And albeit, ſuch was his liberality to all ſorts of men, that no man did lack whom he could do for, either in giving or lending; yet nevertheleſs ſuch was again his circumſpection, that when he was apprehended and committed to the Tower by queen Mary, he owed no man living a penny, that could or would demand any duty of him, but ſatisfied every man to the uttermoſt; whereas ſeveral ſums of money were owing him by divers perſons, which by breaking their bills and obligations he freely forgave, and ſuppreſſed before his attainder. Inſomuch that when he perceived the fatal end of king Edward would work to him no good ſucceſs touching his body and goods, he immediatedately called for his officers, his ſteward and others, commanding them in any wiſe to pay where any money was owing, which was out of hand diſpatched. And then he ſaid, Now I thank God I am mine own man, and in conſcience with God's help able elſe to anſwer all the world and worldly adverſaries, which ſome men ſuppoſe he might alſo have avoided: if he would have been counſelled by ſome of his friends. It followeth moreover:

Harborous.

And as touching this word Harborous, whereby is meant the good maintenance of hoſpitality; ſo little was this property lacking in him, that ſome men diſliking the ſame, thought rather a houſe of overmuch laviſhing and unprofitable expence. But as nothing can be ſo well done, which by ſome others ſhall not be maligned and detracted; ſo neither did this man lack his cavillers, ſome finding fault with his overmuch prodigality, ſome on the contrary part repining and complaining of his ſcanty houſe-keeping, and ſtrict order, much beneath his revenues and calling. Of which two, the firſt ſort muſt conſider the cauſes which moved him to that liberal and large kind of expences. Wherein here cometh to be conſidered, the time wherein he ſerved: which was when reformation of religion firſt began to be advanced. In which time the whole weight and care of the ſame chiefly depended upon him. During which ſeaſon almoſt for the ſpace of ſixteen years together, his houſe was never lightly unfurniſhed of a number both of learned men and commiſſioners, from time to time appointed for deciding eccleſiaſtical affairs.

And thus as he ſeemed to ſome to be too laviſh and open-handed, even more than hoſpitality required: ſo on the other ſide, there wanted not ſome, by whom he was much noted and accuſed, yea, and complained of to king Henry the eighth, for too niggardly and ſlender houſe-keeping; as not worthy to be accounted the hoſpitality of a mean gentleman, as by the following doth appear.

After that the ample and great poſſeſſions, revenues, jewels, rich ornaments, and other treaſures of the abbies were diſſolved and brought into the king's hands, in the diſſolving whereof many cormorants were fed and ſatisfied, and yet not ſo fully ſatisfied but that in a few years they began to be hungry again; and becauſe no more could be ſcraped out of the abbies, they began to ſeek ſome other pray to ſatisfy their appetites, which was to tickle the king's ears with the rich revenue of the biſhop's lands. And to bring this device to paſs, they procured Sir Thomas Seymour, night of the privy chamber, to be a promoter of the matter: who not in all points much favouring the archbiſhop, having a convenient opportunity, declared to the king, that my lord of Canterbury did nothing elſe but ſell his woods, and let his leaſes by great and many fines, making havock of all the royalties of the archbiſhopric, and that only to the intent to gather up treaſure, for his wife and children, keeping no manner of hoſpitality, in reſpect of ſo great a revenue; advertiſing the king further, that it was the opinion of many wiſe men, that it were more meet for the biſhops to have a ſufficient yearly ſtipend in money out of the Exchequer, than to be encumbered with thoſe temporal affairs of their royalties, being impediments to their ſtudy and paſtoral charge; and his highneſs to have their lands and royalties converted to his proper uſe, which beſides their honeſt ſtipends would be no ſmall advantage and profit to his majeſty.

When the king had heard his fair tale, he ſaid little thereunto, other than this. Well, quoth he, we will talk more of this matter at another time. Now, within a fortnight after, or thereabouts (whether by chance, or by intention, it is not known) it came to paſs, that one day his highneſs going to dinner, had waſhed, Sir Thomas Seymour holding the baſon, and ſaid to the ſaid Sir Thomas, Go you out of hand to Lambeth unto my lord of Canterbury, and bid him to be with me at two of the clock in the afternoon, and fail not. Sir Thomas immediately went to Lambeth, and as he came to the gate, the porter being in the lodge, came out, and conveyed him to the hall, which was thoroughly furniſhed and ſet, both with the houſhold ſervants and ſtrangers, with four principal head meſſes of officers, as daily was accuſtomed to be. When Sir Thomas Seymour ſaw that ſtately large hall ſo well ſet and furniſhed, being therewith abaſhed, and ſomewhat guilty of an untruth told to the king before, he returned back, and would needs have gone to the archbiſhop by the chapel, and not through the hall. Richard Nevil, gentleman, then ſteward to the houſhold, perceiving him to retire, came to him, and deſired to know whether he would ſpeak with my lord: Sir Thomas anſwered, that he muſt needs do ſo from the king's highneſs, ſaying to him, And this way I am going to my lord's grace. Sir, ſaid the ſteward, you cannot go that way, for the door is ſhut faſt in dinner time; and ſo by gentle means brought him up through the hall into the chamber where my lord was at dinner, with whom he dined after he had done his meſſage, whoſe common fare might always well beſeem a right honourable perſonage. When dinner was ſcarce done, Sir Thomas took his leave of my lord, and went again to the court.

So ſoon as the king ſaw him, he ſaid to him, Have you been with my lord Canterbury? Sir Thomas anſwered, That I have, if it pleaſe your majeſty, and he will be with your highneſs immediately. Dined you not with him, ſaid the king? Yes Sir, ſaid he, that I have done. And with that word, whether he eſpied by the king's countenance, or by his words, any thing tending to diſpleaſure, he preſently without delay kneeled down upon his knee, and ſaid, I beſeech your majeſty to pardon me: I do well now remember and underſtand, that of late I told told your highneſs a great untruth concerning my lord of Canterbury's houſe-keeping; but from henceforth I intend never to believe that perſon which did put that vain tale into my head: for I aſſure your highneſs that I never ſaw ſo honourable a hall ſet in this realm, except your majeſty's, in all my life, with better order, and ſo well furniſhed in each decree. If I had not ſeen it myſelf, I could never have believed it, and himſelf alſo ſo honourably ſerved.

Ah, Sir, quoth the king, have you now eſpied the truth, I thought you would have told me another tale when you had been there. He was a varlet, quoth the king, that told you that tale; for he ſpendeth (ah good man) all that he hath in houſe keeping. But now I perceive which way the wind bloweth. There are a ſort of you to whom I have liberally given of the poſſeſſions and revenues of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries, which like as you have lightly gotten, ſo have you more unthriftily ſpent, ſome at dice, other ſome in gay apparel, and other ways worſe I fear; and now that all is gone you would fain have me make another cheviſance with the biſhops' lands, to accompliſh your greedy appetites. But let no other biſhops beſtow their revenues worſe than my lord of Canterbury doth, then ſhall you have no cauſe to complain of their keeping of houſe.

And thus the tale being ſhut up, and ended by the king himſelf, neither Sir Thomas Seymour, nor any other on his behalf, ever after durſt renew or revive that ſuit, or any other againſt the archbiſhop in king Henry's days; ſo that it may be evident to all impartial men, the liberality of the archbiſhop in houſe-keeping what it was, which being defended and commended by the prince himſelf, may rather give a good example to his poſterity to follow, than was then to be depraved of any private ſubject, ſuch as knew him not.

In which archbiſhop this moreover is to be noted with a memorandum touching the relief of the poor, impotent, ſick, and ſuch as then came from the wars at Bullen, and other parts beyond the ſeas, lame, wounded, and deſtitute: for whom he provided, beſides his manſion-houſe at Beckiſburn in Kent, the parſonage barn well furniſhed with certain lodgings for the ſick and maimed ſoldiers. To whom were alſo appointed the almoner, a phyſician, and a ſurgeon to attend upon them, and to dreſs and cure ſuch as were not able to reſort to their countries, having daily from the biſhop's kitchen hot broth and meat: for otherwiſe the common alms of the houſhold was beſtowed upon the poor neighbours of the ſhire. And when any of the impotent did recover, and were able to travel, they had convenient money to bear their charges, according to the number of miles from that place diſtant. And this good example of mercy and liberal benignity, I thought here good not in ſilence to be ſuppreſſed, whereby others may be moved according to their vocation, to walk in the ſteps of no leſs liberality, than in him in this behalf appeared.

One that loveth goodneſs, ſober-minded, righteous, holy, and temperate.

As concerning theſe qualities, the buſineſs of his life before joined with his benign and gentle diſpoſition, do teſtify that he could not be void of theſe virtues reigning in him, which was ſo abundantly adorned with the other, which above we have declared.

To cleave faſt unto the true Word of Doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholſome Learning, and to reprove them that ſay againſt it.

Then concludeth St. Paul with the moſt excellent virtue of all others to be wiſhed in a prelate of the church. For if this conſtancy be not in him to this end, that is, "To cleave faſt unto the true word of doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholſome learning and to reprove them that ſay againſt it." If he be void, I ſay, of theſe giſts and graces, he is worthy of no commendation, but ſhall ſeem an idol, and a deceiver of the world. Neither ſhall he deſerve the name of a biſhop, if either for dread or reward, affection or favour, he do at any time, or in any point ſwerve from the truth. As in this behalf the worthy conſtancy of this ſaid archbiſhop never, for the moſt part, ſhrunk for any manner of ſtorm; but was ſo many ways tried, that neither the fear or favour of his prince, nor any other reſpect could alienate or change his purpoſe, grounded upon that infallible doctrine of the goſpel. Notwithſtanding, his conſtant defence of God's truth was ever joined with ſuch meekneſs toward the king, that he never took occaſion of offence againſt him.

At the time of ſetting forth the ſix articles, this archbiſhop was the man, and the only man that oppoſed them, and diſputed with the whole parliament three days together againſt them. Inſomuch that the king, who could not miſlike his reaſons, and yet would needs have the articles paſs, required him to abſent for a time out of the chamber while the act ſhould paſs, and ſo he did: and ſoon after the king ſent all the lords to Lambeth to comfort and chear up his heart, that he might not be diſcouraged.

And this was done during the time of the lord Cromwell's authority; but that the archbiſhop's conſtancy did not decay with the fall of the lord Cromwell, will appear by what followeth.

After the apprehenſion of the lord Cromwell, the adverſaries of the goſpel thought all things ſure and ſafe on their own ſide, it was ſo appointed amongſt them, that ten or twelve biſhops, and other learned men, joined together in commiſſion, ſhould come to the archbiſhop of Canterbury for the eſtabliſhing of certain articles or our religion, which the papiſts then thought to win to their purpoſe againſt the ſaid archbiſhop. For having now the lord Cromwell faſt and ſure, they thought all had been ſafe and ſure for ever: as indeed to all men's reaſonable conſideration, that time appeared ſo dangerous, that there was no manner of hope that religion reformed ſhould ſtand one week longer, ſuch account was then made of the king's untowardneſs thereunto. Inſomuch that of all thoſe commiſſioners there was not one left to ſtay on the archbiſhop's part, but he alone againſt them all ſtood in defence of the truth; and thoſe that he moſt truſted to, namely, biſhop Heath and biſhop Skip, left him in the plain field, who then ſo turned againſt him, that they took upon them to perſuade him to their purpoſe: and having him down from the reſt of the commiſſioners into his gardens of Lambeth, there by all manner of effectual perſuaſions intreated him to leave off his over-much conſtancy, and to incline unto the king's intent, who was fully ſet to have it otherwiſe than he then had penned, or meant to have ſet abroad. When thoſe two his familiars, with one or two of his other friends, had uſed all their eloquence and policy, he little regarding their inconſtancy and remiſſneſs in God's cauſe and quarrel, very notably ſaid unto them;

You make much ado (quoth the archbiſhop) to have me come to your purpoſe, alledging, that it is the king's pleaſure to have the articles, in that ſort you have deviſed them, to proceed; and now that you do perceive his highneſs by ſiniſter information, to be bent that way, you think it a convenient thing to apply unto his highneſs's mind. You be both my friends, eſpecially one of you I did put to his majeſty as of truſt. beware, I ſay, what you do: There is but one truth in our articles to be concluded upon, which if you do hide from his highneſs by conſenting unto a contrary doctrine, and then after in proceſs of time, when the truth cannot be hidden from him, his highneſs ſhall perceive how that you have dealt colourably with him, I know his grace's nature ſo well (quoth the archbiſhop) that he will never after truſt and credit you, or put any good confidence in you. And as you are both my friends, ſo therefore I will you to beware thereof in time, and diſcharge your conſciences in maintenance of the truth.

But all this would not ſerve, for they ſtill ſwerved; and in diſcharging his conſcience, and declaring the truth unto the king, God ſo wrought with the king, that his highneſs joined with him againſt all the reſt, ſo that the book of articles paſſing on his ſide, he won the prize from them all, contrary to all their expectations, when many wagers would have been laid in London, that he ſhould have been laid up with Cromwell at that time in the Tower for his ſtiff ſtanding to his tackle. After that day there could neither counſellor, biſhop, nor papiſt bring him out of the king's favour.

Notwithſtanding, not long after that, certain of the council, whoſe names need not be mentioned, by the inticement and provocation of his old enemy the biſhop of Wincheſter, and others of the ſame ſect, attempted the king againſt him, declaring plainly, that the realm was ſo infected with hereſies and heretics, that it was dangerous for his highneſs further to permit it unreformed, leſt peradventure by long ſuffering, ſuch contention ſhould riſe and enſue in the realm among his ſubjects, that thereby might ſpring horrible commotions and uproars, like as in ſome parts of Germany it did not long ago; the enormity whereof they could not impute to any ſo much as to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who by his own preaching, and his chaplains had filled the realm with divers and pernicious hereſies. The king would needs know his accuſers. They anſwered foraſmuch as he was a counſellor, no man durſt take upon him to accuſe him; but if it would pleaſe his highneſs to commit him to the Tower for a time, there would be accuſations and proofs enough againſt him: for otherwiſe, juſt teſtimony and witneſs againſt him would not appear, and therefore your highneſs (ſaid they) muſt needs give us the counſel, liberty and leave, to commit him to priſon.

The king perceiving their importunate ſuit againſt the archbiſhop (but yet meaning not to have him wronged and utterly given over into their hands) granted unto them that they ſhould the next day commit him to the Tower for his trial. When night came, the king ſent Sir Anthony Deny about midnight to Lambeth to the archbiſhop, willing him forthwith to reſort unto him at the court. The meſſage done, the archbiſhop ſpeedily addreſſed himſelf at the court, and coming into the gallery where the king walked and tarried from him, his highneſs ſaid, Ah, my lord of Canterbury, I can tell you news. For divers weighty conſiderations it is determined by me and the council, that you to-morrow by nine of the clock, ſhould be committed to the Tower, for that you and your chaplains (as information is given us) have taught and preached, and thereby ſown within the realm ſuch a number of execrable hereſies, that it is feared, the whole realm being infected with them, no ſmall contentions and commotions will ariſe thereby among my ſubjects, as of late days the like was in divers parts of Germany: and therefore the council have requeſted me, for the trial of the matter, to ſuffer them to commit you to the Tower, or elſe no man dare come forth, as witneſs in theſe matters, you being a counſellor.

When the king had ſaid his mind, the archbiſhop kneeled down and ſaid, I am content if it pleaſe your grace, with all my heart to go thither at your highneſs's commandment, and I moſt humbly thank your majeſty that I may come to my trial: for there be thoſe that have many ways ſlandered me, and now by this way I hope to try myſelf not worthy of ſuch report.

The king perceiving the man's uprightneſs joined with ſuch ſimplicity, ſaid; O Lord! what manner of man be you! what ſimplicity is in you? I thought that you would rather have ſued to us to have taken the pains to have heard you and your accuſers together for your trial, without any ſuch impriſonment. Do you not know what ſtate you be in with the whole world, and how many great enemies you have? Do you not conſider what an eaſy thing it is, to procure three or four falſe knaves to witneſs againſt you? Think you to have better luck that way than your maſter Chriſt had? I ſee by it you will run headlong to your own ruin, if I would ſuffer you. Your enemies ſhall not ſo prevail againſt you, for I have otherwiſe deviſed with myſelf to keep you out of their hands. Yet notwithſtanding, to-morrow when the council ſhall ſit, and ſend for you, reſort unto them, and if in charging you with this matter, they do commit you to the Tower, require of them, (becauſe you are one of them, a counſellor) that you may have your accuſers brought before them without any further confinement; and uſe for yourſelf as good arguments that way as you may deviſe; and if no intreaty or reaſonable requeſt will ſerve, then deliver unto them this my ring [which then the king delivered unto the archbiſhop] and ſay unto them, If there be no remedy, my lords, but that I muſt needs go to the Tower, then I revoke my cauſe from you, and appeal to the king's own perſon by this his token unto you all: for (ſaid the king to the archbiſhop) ſo ſoon as they ſhall ſee this my ring, they will know it ſo well, that they ſhall underſtand that I have reſumed the whole cauſe into mine own hands and determination, and that I have diſcharged them thereof.

The archbiſhop perceiving the king's benignity ſo much towards him, had much ado to forbear tears. Well, ſaid the king, go your ways, my lord, and do as I have bidden you. My lord humbling himſelf with thanks, took his leave of his majeſty for that night.

On the morrow about nine of the clock before noon, the council ſent a gentleman uſher for the archbiſhop, who when he came to the council-chamber door, could not be let in, but of purpoſe (as it ſeemed) was compelled there to wait among the pages, lacquies, and ſerving-men. Dr. Butts the king's phyſician reſorting that way, and ſeeing how my lord of Canterbury was uſed, went immediately to the king's highneſs, and ſaid, May it pleaſe your grace, my lord of Canterbury is well promoted: for now he is become a footman: yonder he hath ſtood this half hour at the council-chamber door amongſt them. Sure it is not ſo! (quoth the king) the council hath not ſo little diſcretion as to uſe the metropolitan of all the realm in that manner, eſpecially being one of their own number. But let him alone (ſaid the king) you ſhall hear more by and by.

Anon the archbiſhop was called into the council-chamber, to whom was alledged as before is rehearſed. The archbiſhop anſwered as the king had before adviſed him; and in the end, when he perceived that no manner of perſuaſion or intreaty could ſerve, he delivered the king's ring, revoking his cauſe into the king's hands. At this the whole council were much amazed, and it is an eaſy matter to imagine how fooliſhly they looked upon one another. The earl of Bedford with a loud voice, and rapping out a great oath, When you firſt began the matter, my lords, I told you what would come of it. Do you think that the king will ſuffer this man's finger to ake? much more, I warrant you, will he defend his life againſt brabbling varlets. You do but incumber yourſelves to hear tales and fables againſt him. And ſo immediately upon receipt of the king's token, they all aroſe, and carried the king his ring, ſurrendering the matter, as the order and cuſtom was, into his own hands.

When they were all come into the king's preſence, his highneſs, with a ſevere countenance ſaid unto them, Ah, my lords, I thought I had had wiſer men of my council than now I find you. What diſcretion was this in you, thus to make the primate of all the realm, and one of you in office, to wait at the council-chamber door amongſt footmen? you might have conſidered that he was a counſellor as well as you, and you had no ſuch commiſſion of me ſo to handle him. I was willing that you ſhould try him as a counſellor, and not as a mean ſubject. But now I well perceive that things be done againſt him maliciouſly,

ly, and if ſome of you might have had your minds, you would have tried him to the uttermoſt. But I would have you all to know, and I do proteſt, that if a prince may be beholden to his ſubject (ſolemnly laying his hand upon his breaſt) by the faith I owe to God, I take this man here, my lord of Canterbury, to be of all other a moſt faithful ſubject unto us, and one to whom we are much beholden: giving him great commendations otherwiſe. And with that one or two of the chief of the council, making their excuſe, declared, that in deſiring his confinement, it was rather meant for his trial, that he might have an opportunity of clearing himſelf of the ſlanderous reports of the world, that for any malice conceived againſt him. Well, well, quoth the king, take him and uſe him well, as he is worthy to be, and make no more ado. And with that every man caught him by the hand, and made fair weather of altogethers, which might eaſily be done with that man.

And it was much to be marvelled, that they would go ſo far with him, thus to ſeek his ruin, when they well knew that the king moſt entirely loved him, and would always ſtand in his defence, whoſoever ſpake againſt him; as many other times the king's patience was by ſiniſter informations againſt him tried; inſomuch that the lord Cromwell was commonly wont to ſay unto him, My lord of Canterbury, you are moſt happy of all men; for you may do and ſpeak what you liſt; and ſay what all men can againſt you, the king will never believe one word to your detriment or hindrance. I am ſure I take more pains than all the council doth, and ſpend more largely in the king's affairs, as well beyond the ſeas as on this ſide: yea I aſſure you, even very ſpies in other foreign realms, at Rome and elſewhere, coſt me above a thouſand marks a year: and do what I can to bring matters to knowledge, for the advantage of the king and the realm, I am every day chidden, and many falſe tales now and then believed againſt me; and therefore you are moſt happy, for in no point can you be diſcredited with the king. To this the archbiſhop anſwered, If the king's majeſty were not good to me that way, I were not able to ſtand and endure one whole week, but your wiſdom and policy is ſuch, that you are able to ſhift well enough for yourſelf.

Now when the king's highneſs had thus benignly and mercifully diſpatched the ſaid archbiſhop from this ſore accuſation by the council laid againſt him, all wiſe men would have thought that it had been mere folly afterwards to have attempted any matter againſt him: but yet look, where malice reigneth, there neither reaſon nor honeſty can take place. Such therefore as had conceived deep rancour and diſpleaſure againſt him, ceaſed not to perſecute him by all poſſible means. Then brought they againſt him a new kind of accuſation, and cauſed Sir John Goſtwike knight, a man of a contrary religion, to accuſe the archbiſhop openly in the parliament-houſe, laying to his charge his ſermons preached at Sandwich, and his lectures read at Canterbury, wherein ſhould be contained manifeſt hereſies againſt the ſacrament of the altar, &c. Which accuſation came to the king's ear. Why (quoth the king) where dwelleth Goſtwike? As I take it, either in Bedfordſhire or Buckinghamſhire; and hath he ſo open an ear that he can hear my lord of Canterbury preaching out of Kent? This is very likely, ſaid the king. If he had been a Kentiſh-man, there had been ſomething worthy of conſideration: but as for Goſtwike, I know him well enough, and what good religion he is of. Go to him and tell him, ſaid the king to one of his privy-chamber, if he go not to my lord of Canterbury, and ſo reconcile himſelf to him, that he may become his good lord, I will pull the goſlin's feathers ſo, that hereafter he ſhall have little luſt to ſlander the metropolitan, or any other learned man. When Sir John Goſtwike heard theſe words, there was no need to bid him to haſten to Lambeth unto the metropolitan, making to him as many friends as poſſibly he might. When he came to the archbiſhop, he was fain to diſcloſe unto him, by what means he was procured to do that which he did, requeſting his clemency to be his good lord, or elſe he took himſelf to be utterly undone, being ſo in the king's indignation, as he underſtood he was by that before declared, which petition was ſoon granted by that good-natured archbiſhop, who not only forgave Sir John all his ingratitude, but alſo went to the king, and procured him his majeſty's favour again. And thus the king made a ſhort end of this accuſation.

Well, here you may perceive that malicious invention went not the wiſeſt way to work, to procure a ſtranger dwelling afar off, to accuſe the archbiſhop of his doctrine preached in his dioceſe: and therefore hath blind malice learned ſome more wiſdom now to accuſe their archbiſhop in ſuch a manner as he ſhall never be able to avoid it. And therefore it was procured by his ancient enemies, that not only the prebendaries of his cathedral church in Canterbury, but alſo the moſt famous juſtices of the peace in the ſhire ſhould accuſe him, and article againſt him; which in very deed was moſt ſubſtantially brought to paſs, and the articles both well written and ſubſcribed, were delivered to the king's highneſs as a thing of ſuch effect, that there muſt needs follow to the ſaid archbiſhop, both indignation of the prince, and condign puniſhment for his grievous offence committed by him and his chaplains in preaching ſuch erroneous doctrine as they did within his dioceſe of Canterbury; whereof they being ſuch witneſſes of credit, no man had cauſe to doubt of their circumſpect doings. This accuſation particularly ſent out was delivered to the king by the means of ſome of the council; when the king had peruſed the book, he wrapt it up and put it in his ſleeve; and finding occaſion to ſolace himſelf upon the Thames, came with his barge furniſhed with his muſicians along by Lambeth-bridge towards Chelſea. The noiſe of the muſicians provoked the archbiſhop to reſort to the bridge to do his duty, and to ſalute his prince. Whom, when the king had perceived to ſtand at the bridge, immediately commanded the waterman to draw towards the ſhore, and ſo came ſtraight to the bridge.

Ah, my chaplain (ſaid the king to the archbiſhop) come into the barge to me. The archbiſhop told his highneſs, that he would take his own barge, and wait on his majeſty. No, ſaid the king, you muſt come into my barge, for I want to talk with you. When the king and the archbiſhop were both together alone in the barge, the king ſaid to the archbiſhop, I have news out of Kent for you, my lord. The archbiſhop anſwered, Good, I hope, if it pleaſe your highneſs. Marry, quoth the king, it is ſo good that I now know the greateſt heretic in Kent; and with that pulled the book of articles out of his ſleeve againſt both the archbiſhop and his preachers, and gave the book to him, deſiring him to peruſe the ſame. When the archbiſhop had read the articles, and ſaw himſelf ſo uncourteouſly handled of his own church whereof he was head, I mean the prebendaries of his cathedral, and of ſuch his neighbours as he had many ways gratified, I mean the juſtices of the peace, it much grieved him. Notwithſtanding he kneeled down to the king, and beſought his majeſty to grant out a commiſſion to whomſoever it pleaſed his highneſs, for them to try out the truth of this accuſation. In very deed, ſaid the king, I do mean ſo to do, and you yourſelf ſhall be chief commiſſioner, to adjoin to you ſuch two or three more as you ſhall think good yourſelf. Then will it be thought, quoth the archbiſhop, that it is not fair and impartial that I ſhould be my own judge and my chaplains alſo. Well, ſaid the king, I will have none other but yourſelf, and ſuch as you will appoint: for I am ſure that you will not halt with me in any thing, although you be driven to accuſe yourſelf, and I know partly how this geer proceedeth, and if you handle the matter wiſely, you ſhall find a pretty conſpiracy deviſed againſt you. Whom will you have with you, ſaid the king? Whomſoever it ſhall pleaſe your grace to name, quoth the archbiſhop. I will appoint Dr. Belhouſe for one, name you the other, ſaid the king, meet for that purpoſe. My chancellor, Dr. Cox, and Huſſey my regiſter, ſaid the archbiſhop, are men expert to examine ſuch troubleſome matters. Well, ſaid the king, let there be a commiſſion made forth, and out of hand get you into Kent, and advertiſe me of your doings.

They came into Kent, and there they ſat about three weeks to bolt out who was the firſt occaſion of this accuſation, for thereof the king would chiefly be advertiſed. Now the inquiſition being begun by the commiſſioners, every man ſhrunk in his horns, and no man would confeſs any thing to the purpoſe. For Dr. Cox and Huſſey, being friendly to the papiſts, handled the matter ſo, that they would permit nothing material to come to light. This thing being well perceived by the archbiſhop's ſecretary, he wrote immediately to Dr. Buts and Mr. Deny, declaring that if the king did not ſend ſome other to aſſiſt my lord, than thoſe that then were there with him, it were impoſſible that any thing ſhould come to light: and therefore wiſhed that Dr. Lee, or ſome other ſtout man that had been exerciſed in the king's eccleſiaſtical affairs in his viſitations, might be ſent to the archbiſhop. Upon theſe letters Dr. Lee was ſent for to York by the king, and having the king's further mind declared unto him, when he came to the court, he reſorted immediately into Kent, ſo that on All-hallow even he delivered to the archbiſhop the king's ring, with a declaration of his highneſs's farther pleaſure: and by and by upon his meſſage done, he appointed the archbiſhop to name him a dozen or ſixteen of his officers and gentlemen, ſuch as had both diſcretion, wit, and audacity, to whom he gave in commiſſion from the king to ſearch both the purſes, cheſts, and chambers of all thoſe that were deemed or ſuſpected to be of this confederacy, both within the cathedral church and without, and ſuch letters and writings as they could find about them, to bring them to the archbiſhop and him.

Theſe men thus appointed, went in one hour and inſtant to all the houſes and places they were appointed to; and within four hours afterwards the whole conſpiracy was diſcloſed by finding of letters, ſome from the biſhop of Wincheſter, ſome from Dr. London at Oxford, and from juſtices of the ſhire, with others; ſo that the firſt beginning, the proceeding, and what ſhould have been the end of their conſpiracy, was now made manifeſt. Certain chambers and cheſts of gentlemen of the ſhire were alſo ſearched, where likewiſe letters were found tending to this purpoſe. Amongſt other two letters came to my lord's hands, the one wrote by the ſuffragan of Dover, and the other by Dr. Barbar a civilian, whom the archbiſhop continually retained in his houſe for the expedition of matters in ſuit before him, as a counſellor in the law when need required. Theſe two men being well promoted by the archbiſhop, he uſed ever in ſuch familiarity, that when the ſuffragan, being prebendary of Canterbury, came to him, he always ſet him at his own meſs, and the other never from his table, as men in whom he had much delight and comfort, when time of care and penſiveneſs happened. But that which they did was altogether counterfeit, and the devil was turned into the angel of light, for they were both of this confederacy.

When my lord had gotten theſe their letters into his hands, he on a day, when the ſuffragan happened to come to him at his houſe at Beckiſburn, called to him into his ſtudy the ſaid ſuffragan of Dover and Dr. Barbar, ſaying, Come your ways with me, for I muſt have your advice in a matter. When they were both with him in his ſtudy, he ſaid to them, You twain be men in whom I have had much confidence and truſt; you muſt now give me ſome good counſel, for I am ſhamefully abuſed by one or twain to whom I have ſhewed all my ſecrets from time to time, and did truſt them as myſelf. The matter is ſo now fallen out, that they not only have diſcloſed my ſecrets, but alſo have taken upon them to accuſe me of hereſy, and are become witneſſes againſt me. I require you therefore of your good advice how I ſhall behave myſelf towards them. You are both my friends, and ſuch as I always have uſed when I needed counſel. What ſay you to the matter? quoth the archbiſhop.

Marry, quoth Dr. Barbar, ſuch villains and knaves (ſaving your honour), were worthy to be hanged out of hand without any other law. Hanging were too good, quoth the ſuffragan, and if there lacked one to do execution, I would be hangman myſelf.

At theſe words the archbiſhop being aſtoniſh'd, caſt up his hands to heaven, and ſaid, O Lord moſt merciful God, whom may a man truſt now-a-day? It is moſt true which is ſaid, "Curſed is he who putteth his truſt in man, and in his own ſtrength." There was never man handled as I am: but, O Lord, thou haſt evermore defended me, and ſent me one great friend and maſter (meaning the king) without whoſe protection I were not able to ſtand upright one day unoverthrown, I praiſe thy holy name therefore: And with that he pulled out of his boſom their two letters, and ſaid, Know ye theſe letters, my maſters? With that they fell down upon their knees, and deſired forgiveneſs, declaring how they a year before were attempted to do the ſame, and ſo very lamentably weeping and bewailing their doings, beſought his grace to pardon and forgive them. Well, ſaid the gentle archbiſhop, God make you both good men, I never deſerved this at your hands; but aſk God forgiveneſs, againſt whom you have highly offended. If ſuch men as you are not to be truſted, what ſhould I do alive? I perceive now, that there is no fidelity or truſt amongſt men. I am brought to this point now, that I fear my left hand will accuſe my right hand. I need not much marvel hereat, for our Saviour Chriſt truly propheſied of ſuch a world to come in the latter days. I beſeech him of his great mercy to finiſh that time ſhortly; and ſo departing, he diſmiſſed them both with gentle and comfortable words, in ſuch ſort that never after appeared in his countenance or words any remembrance thereof.

Now, when all thoſe letters and accuſations were found they were put into a cheſt, the king's majeſty minding to have peruſed ſome of them, and to have partly punniſhed the principals of it. The cheſt and writings were brought to Lambeth; at which time began the parliament. Lord, what ado there was to procure the king a ſubſidy, to the intent that thereupon might enſue a pardon, which indeed followed, and ſo nothing was done, other than their falſehood known. This was the laſt puſh of the pike that was inferred againſt the archbiſhop in king Henry the eighth's days: for never after durſt any man move matter againſt him in his time.

And thus have ye both the working and diſcloſing of this popiſh conſpiracy againſt this worthy archbiſhop and martyr of Chriſt, Thomas Cranmer. In which conſpiracy, forſomuch as complaint was alſo made to the king of his chaplains and good preachers in Kent, it ſhall not be out of the ſtory ſomething likewiſe to touch thereof, eſpecially of Richard Turner, then preacher in the archbiſhop's dioceſe, and curate to Mr. Morice, the archbiſhop's ſecretary, in the town of Chartham, by whoſe diligent preaching a great part of this heart-burning of the papiſts took its firſt kindling againſt the archbiſhop. Touching the deſcription of which ſtory, becauſe by me nothing ſhall be ſaid, either more or leſs, than is the truth, ye ſhall hear the very certainty thereof truly compiled in a letter ſent the ſame time to Dr. Buts and Sir Anthony Deny, to be ſhewed unto the king, and ſo it was, written by the aforeſaid Mr. Morice, then ſecretary to the archbiſhop, farmer of the ſame benefice of Chartham and patron to Mr. Turner there miniſter and preacher aforeſaid.

A Letter

A Letter of Apology wrote by Mr. Morice to Sir William Butts, and Sir Anthony Deny, defending the cauſe of Mr. Richard Turner preacher, againſt the papiſts.

THE letter firſt beginning in theſe words: I am certain (right worſhipful) that it is not unknown to your diſcreet wiſdom, &c. And after a few lines, coming to the matter, thus the ſaid letter proceedeth.
